II. God renewed his judgments upon them, bringing them under the power of oppressing enemies. Had they fallen into the hands of the Lord immediately, they might have found that his mercies were great; but God let them fall into the hands of man, whose tender mercies are cruel; he sold them into the hands of the Philistines that lay south-west of Canaan, and of the Ammonites that lay north-east, both at the same time; so that between those two millstones they were miserably crushed, as the original word is, (v. 8.) for oppressed. God had appointed, that if any of the cities of Israel should revolt to idolatry, the rest should make war upon them, and cut them off, Deut. 13. 12, &c. They had been jealous enough in this matter, almost to an extreme, in the case of the altar set up by the two tribes and a half; (Josh. 22.) but now they were grown so very bad, that when one city was infected with idolatry, the next took the infection, and, instead of punishing it, imitated, and out-did it; and therefore, since they, that should have been revengers to execute wrath on them that did this evil, were themselves guilty, or bore the sword in vain, God brought the neighbouring nations upon them, to chastise them for their apostacy.

The oppression of Israel by the Ammonites, the posterity of Lot, was, 1. Very long; it continued eighteen years. Some make those years to be part of the judgeship of Jair, who could not prevail to reform and deliver Israel as he would. Others make them to commence at the death of Jair, which seems the more probable, because that part of Israel which was most infested by the Ammonites was Gilead, Jair's own country, which we cannot suppose to have suffered so much while he was living, but that part at least would be reformed and protected. 2. Very grievous; they vexed them and oppressed them. It was a great vexation to be oppressed by such a despicable people as the children of Ammon were. They began with those tribes that lay next them on the other side Jordan, here called the land of the Amorites, (v. 8.) because the Israelites were so wretchedly degenerated, and had made themselves so like the heathen, that they were become, in a manner, perfect Amorites, Ezek. 16. 3. Or, because by their sin they forfeited their title to this land, so that it might justly be looked upon as the land of the Amorites again, from whom they took it. But by degrees they pushed forward, came over Jordan, and invaded Judah, and Benjamin, and Ephraim, (v. 9.) three of the most famous tribes of Israel; yet thus insulted by them, when they had forsaken God, and unable to make head against the invader. Now the threatening was fulfilled, that they should be slain before their enemies, and should have no power to stand before them, Lev. 26. 17, 37. Their ways and their doings procure this to themselves; they are sadly degenerated, and so they come to be sorely distressed.

10. And the children of Israel cried unto the LORD, saying, We have sinned against thee, both because we have forsaken our God, and also served Baalim. 11. And the LORD said unto the children of Israel, Did not I deliver you from the Egyptians, and from the Amorites, from the children of Ammon, and from the Philistines? 12. The Zidonians also, and the Amalekites, and the Maonites, did oppress you; and ye cried to me, and I delivered you out of their hand. 13. Yet ye have forsaken me, and served other gods: wherefore I will deliver you no more. 14. Go and cry unto the gods which ye have chosen; let them deliver you in the time of your tribulation. 15. And the children of Israel said unto the LORD, We have sinned: do thou unto us whatsoever seemeth good unto thee; deliver us only, we pray thee, this day. 16. And they put away the strange gods from among them, and served the LORD: and his soul was grieved for the misery of Israel. 17. Then the children of Ammon were gathered together, and encamped in Gilead. And the children of Israel assembled themselves together, and encamped in Mizpeh. 18. And the people and princes of Gilead said one to another, What man is he that will begin to fight against the children of Ammon? he shall be head over all the inhabitants of Gilead.

Here is,

I. An humble confession which Israel make to God in their distress, v. 10. Now they own themselves guilty, like a malefactor upon the rack, and promise reformation, like a child under the rod. They did not only complain of the distress, but acknowledged it was their own sin that had brought them into the distress; therefore God was righteous, and they had no reason to repine. They confess their omissions, for in them their sin began, "We have forsaken our God;" and their commissions, "We have served Baalim, and herein have done foolishly, treacherously, and very wickedly."

II. An humbling message which God thereupon sends to Israel; whether by an angel, (as ch. 2. 1.) or by a prophet, (as ch. 6. 8.) is not certain. It was kind that God took notice of their cry, and did not turn a deaf ear to it, and send them no answer at all; it was kind likewise, that, when they began to repent, he sent them such a message as was proper to further and promote their repentance, that they might be qualified and prepared for deliverance. Now in this message, 1. He upbraids them with their great ingratitude, reminds them of the great things he had done for them, delivering them from such and such enemies; the Egyptians first, out of whose land they were rescued; the Amorites whom they conquered, and into whose land they entered; and since their settlement there, when the Ammonites had joined with the Moabites to oppress them, (ch. 3. 13.) when the Philistines were vexatious in the days of Shamgar, and afterward other enemies had given them trouble; upon their petition, God had wrought many a great salvation for them, v. 11, 12. Of their being oppressed by the Zidonians and the Maonites we read not elsewhere: God had in justice corrected them, and in mercy delivered them, and therefore might have expected that either through fear or through love they would have adhered to him and his service; well therefore might the word cut them to the heart, (v. 13.) yet ye have forsaken me that have brought you out of your troubles, and served other gods that brought you into your troubles. Thus did they forsake their own mercies for their own delusions. 2. He shews them how justly he might now abandon them to ruin, by abandoning them to the gods that they had served. To awaken them to a thorough repentance and reformation, he lets them see, (1.) Their folly in serving Baalim; they had been at a vast expence to obtain the favour of such gods as could not help them, then when they had most need of their help. "Go, and cry unto the gods which ye have chosen, (v. 14.) try what they can do for you now: you have worshipped them as gods, try if they have now either a divine power, or a divine goodness, to be employed for you; you paid your homage to them as your kings and lords, try if they will now protect you; you brought your sacrifices of praise to their altars as your benefactors, imagining that they gave you your corn, and honey, and oil; but a friend indeed will be a friend in need; what stead will their favour stand you in now?" Note, It is necessary, in true repentance, that there be a full conviction of the utter insufficiency of all those things to help us and do us any kindness, which we have idolized and set upon the throne in our hearts in competition with God. We must be convinced that the pleasures of sense, on which we have doted, cannot be our satisfaction, nor the wealth of the world, which we have coveted, be our portion; that we cannot be happy or easy any where but in God. (2.) Their misery and danger in forsaking God. "See what a pass you have brought yourselves to; now you can expect no other than that I should say, I will deliver you no more; and what will become of you then?" v. 12. This he tells them, not only as what he might do, but as what he would do, if they rested in a confession of what they had done amiss, and did not put away their idols, and amend for the future.

III. An humble submission which Israel hereupon made to God's justice, with an humble application to his mercy; (v. 15.) The children of Israel met together, it is probable, in a solemn assembly at the door of the tabernacle; received the impressions of the message God had sent them; were not driven by it to despair, though it was very threatening; but resolve to lie at God's feet, and, if they perish, they will perish there. They not only repeat their confession, We have sinned; but, 1. They surrender themselves to God's justice, Do thou unto us whatsoever seemeth good unto thee. Hereby they own that they deserved the severest tokens of God's displeasure, and were sure he could do them no wrong, whatever he laid upon them; they humbled themselves under his mighty and heavy hand, and accepted of the punishment of their iniquity, which Moses had made the condition of God's return in mercy to them, Lev. 26. 41. Note, True penitents dare, and will, refer themselves to God, to correct them as he thinks fit, knowing that their sin is highly malignant in its deserts, and that God is not rigorous or extreme in his demands. 2. They supplicate for God's mercy, and implore that; "Deliver us only, we pray thee, this day, from this enemy." They acknowledge what they deserved, yet pray to God not to deal with them according to their deserts. Note, We must submit to God's justice, with a hope in his mercy.

IV. A blessed reformation set on foot hereupon. They brought forth fruits meet for repentance; (v. 16.) they put away the gods of strangers, (as the word is,) strange gods, and worshipped by those nations that were strangers to the commonwealth of Israel, and to the covenants of promise, and they served the Lord. Need drove them to him. They knew it was to no purpose to go to the gods whom they had served, and therefore returned to the God whom they had slighted. This is true repentance, not only for sin, but from sin.

V. God's gracious return in mercy to them, which is expressed here very tenderly; (v. 16.) His soul was grieved for the misery of Israel. Not that there is any grief in God, he has infinite joy and happiness in himself, which cannot be broken in upon by either the sins or the miseries of his creatures; not that there is any change in God, he is in one mind, and who can turn him? But his goodness is his glory; by it he proclaims his name, and magnifies it above all names; and as he is pleased to put himself into the relation of a father to his people that are in covenant with him, so he is pleased to represent his goodness to them, by the compassion of a father toward his children; for as he is the Father of lights, so he is the Father of mercies; as the disobedience and misery of a child are a grief to a tender father, and make him feel very sensibly from his natural affection, so the provocations of God's people are a grief to him; (Ps. 95. 10.) he is broken with their whorish heart; (Ezek. 6. 9.) their troubles also are a grief to him; so he is pleased to speak when he is pleased to appear for the deliverance of his people; changing his way and method of proceeding, as tender parents, when they begin to relent toward their children with whom they have been displeased. Such are the tender mercies of our God, and so far is he from having any pleasure in the death of sinners.

VI. Things are now working toward their deliverance from the Ammonites' oppression, v. 17, 18. God had said, "I will deliver you no more;" but now they are not what they were, they are other men, they are new men, and now he will deliver them. That threatening was denounced to convince and humble them; and now that it had taken its desired effect, it is revoked, in order to their deliverance. 1. The Ammonites are hardened to their own ruin; they gathered together in one body, that they might be destroyed at one blow, Rev. 16. 16. 2. The Israelites are animated to their own rescue. They assembled likewise, v. 17. During their eighteen years' oppression, as in their former servitudes, they were run down by their enemies, because they would not incorporate; each family, city, or tribe, would stand by itself, and act independently, and so they all became an easy prey to the oppressors, for want of a due sense of common interest to cement them; but whenever they got together, they did well; so they did here. When God's Israel become as one man to advance a common good, and oppose a common enemy, what difficulty can stand before them? The people and princes of Gilead, being met, consult first about a general that should command in chief against the Ammonites. Hitherto most of the deliverers of Israel had an extraordinary call to the office, as Ehud, Barak, Gideon; but the next is to be called in a more common way, by a convention of the states, who inquired out a fit man to command their army, found out one admirably well qualified for the purpose, and God owned their choice by putting his Spirit upon him, ch. 11. 29. So that this instance is of use for direction and encouragement in after-ages, when extraordinary calls are no longer to be expected. Let such be impartially chosen to public trust and power, whom God has qualified, and then God will graciously own those who are thus chosen.

CHAP. XI.

This chapter gives us the history of Jephthah, another of Israel's judges, and numbered among the worthies of the Old Testament, that by faith did great things, (Heb. 11. 32.) though he had not such an extraordinary call as the rest there mentioned had. Here is, I. The disadvantages of his rise and origin, v. 1. 3. II. The Gileadites choice of him to be commander in chief against the Ammonites, and the terms he made with them, v. 4. 11. III. His treaty with the king of Ammon, about the rights of the two nations, that the matter might be determined, if possible, without bloodshed, v. 12. 28. IV. His war with the Ammonites, which he enters upon with a solemn vow, (v. 29. 31.) prosecutes with bravery, (v. 32.) and ends with a glorious victory, v. 33. V. The traits he was brought into at his return to his own house, by the vow he had made, v. 34. 40.

1. NOW Jephthah the Gileadite was a mighty man of valour, and he was the son of an harlot: and Gilead begat Jephthah. 2. And Gilead's wife bare him sons; and his wife's sons grew up, and they thrust out Jephthah, and said unto him, Thou shalt not inherit in our father's house; for thou art the son of a strange woman. 3. Then Jephthah fled from his brethren, and dwelt in the land of Tob: and there were gathered vain men to Jephthah, and went out with him.

The princes and people of Gilead we left, in the close of the foregoing chapter, consulting about the choice of a general, being come to this resolve, that whoever would undertake to lead their forces against the children of Ammon should, by common consent, be head over all the inhabitants of Gilead. The enterprise was difficult, and it was fit that so great an encouragement as this should be proposed to him that would undertake it. Now all agreed that Jephthah, the Gileadite, was a mighty man of valour, and very fit for that purpose: none so fit as he; but he lay under three disadvantages:

1. He was the son of a harlot, (v. 1.) of a strange woman, (v. 2.) one that was neither a wife nor a concubine; some think his mother was a Gentile; so Josephus, who calls him a stranger by the mother's side. An Ishmaelite, say the Jews. If his mother was a harlot, that was not his fault, however it was his disgrace. Men ought not to be reproached with any of the infelicities of their parentage or extraction, so long as they are endeavouring by their personal merits to roll away the reproach. The son of a harlot, if born again, born from above, shall be accepted of God, and be as welcome as any other to the glorious liberties of his children. Jephthah could not read in the law the brand there put on the Ammonites, the enemies he was to grapple with, that they should not enter into the congregation of the Lord, but in the same paragraph he met with that which looked back upon himself, that a bastard should be in like manner excluded, Deut. 23. 2, 3. But if that law means, as most probably it does, only those that are born of incest, not of fornication, he was not within the reach of it.

2. He had been driven from his country by his brethren. His father's legitimate children, insisting upon the rigour of the law, thrust him out of having any inheritance with them, without any consideration had of his extraordinary qualifications, which merited a dispensation, and would have made him a mighty strength and ornament of their family, if they had overlooked his being illegitimate, and admitted him to a child's part, v. 2. One would not have thought this abandoned youth was intended to be Israel's deliverer and judge, but God often humbles those whom he designs to exalt, and makes that stone the head of the corner, which the builders refused; so Joseph, Moses, and David, the three most eminent of the shepherds of Israel, were all thrust out by men, before they were called of God to their great offices.

3. He had, in his exile, headed a rabble, v. 3. Being driven out by his brethren, his great soul would not suffer him either to dig, or beg, but by his sword he must live; and, being soon noted for his bravery, those that were reduced to such straits, and animated by such a spirit, enlisted themselves under him. Vain men they are here called, that is, men that had run through their estates, and were to seek for a livelihood, those that went out with him, not to rob or plunder, but to hunt wild beasts, and, perhaps, to make incursions upon those countries which Israel was entitled to, but were not as yet come to the possession of, or were some way or other injured by.

This is the man that must save Israel. That people had by their idolatry made themselves children of whoredoms, and aliens from God and his covenant, and therefore, though God upon their repentance will deliver them, yet, to mortify them and remind them of their sin, he chooses to do it by a bastard and an exile.

4. And it came to pass in process of time, that the children of Ammon made war against Israel.

5. And it was so, that when the children of Ammon made war against Israel, the elders of Gilead went to fetch Jephthah out of the land of Tob: 6. And they said unto Jephthah, Come, and be our captain, that we may fight with the children of Ammon.

7. And Jephthah said unto the children of Gilead, Did not ye hate me, and expel me out of my father's house? and why are ye come unto me now when ye are in distress? 8. And the elders of Gilead said unto Jephthah, Therefore we turn again to thee now, that thou mayest go with us, and fight against the children of Ammon, and be our head over all the inhabitants of Gilead. 9. And Jephthah said unto the elders of Gilead, If ye bring me home again to fight against the children of Ammon, and the LORD deliver them before me, shall I be your head? 10. And the elders of Gilead said unto Jephthah, The LORD be witness between us, if we do not so according to thy words. 11. Then Jephthah went with the elders of Gilead, and the people made him head and captain over them: and Jephthah uttered all his words before the LORD in Mizpeh.

Here is,

I. The distress which the children of Israel were in upon the Ammonites' invasion of their country, v. 4. Probably, this was the same invasion with that mentioned ch. 10. 17. when the children of Ammon were gathered together, and encamped in or against Gilead. And those words, in process of time, refer to what goes immediately before the expulsion of Jephthah: many days after he had been thus thrust out in disgrace, was he fetched back again with honour.

II. The court which the elders made to Jephthah hereupon to come and help them. They did not write or send a messenger to him, but went themselves to fetch him, resolving to have no denial, and the exigence of the case was such as would admit not delay. Their errand to him was, (v. 6.) Come, and be our captain. They knew none among themselves that was able to undertake that great trust, but do in effect confess themselves unfit for it; they know him to be a stout man, and inured to the sword, and therefore he must be the man. See how God prepares men for the service he designs them for, and makes their troubles work for their advancement. If Jephthah had not been put to his shifts, by his brethren's unkindness, he had not had such an occasion as that gave him, to exercise and improve his martial genius, and so to signalize himself and become famous; Out of the eater comes forth meat. The children of Israel were assembled and encamped, ch. 10. 17. But an army without a general is like a body without a head, therefore, Come, say they, and be our captain, that we may fight. See the necessity of government; though they were hearty enough in the cause, yet they owned they could not fight without a captain to command them. So necessary is it to all societies, that there be a pars imperans, and a pars subdita, some to rule, and others to obey, and that a community should humbly beg the favour of being commanded, rather than that every man should be his own master. Blessed be God for government, for a good government!

III. The objections Jephthah makes against accepting their offer; (v. 7.) Did ye not hate me, and expel me? It should seem that his brethren were some of these elders; or these elders, by suffering his brethren to abuse him, and not righting him as they ought to have done, (for their business is to defend the poor and fatherless, Ps. 82. 3, 4.) had made themselves guilty of this expulsion, and he might justly charge them with it. Magistrates that have power to protect those that are injured, if they do not do them right, really do them wrong. "You hated me, and expelled me, and therefore how can I believe that you are sincere in this proposal? And how can you expect that I should do you any service?" Not but that Jephthah was very willing to serve his country, but he thought fit to give them a hint of their former unkindness to him, that they might repent of their sin in using him so ill, and might for the future be the more sensible of their obligations. Thus Joseph humbled his brethren before he made himself known to them. The particular case between the Gileadites and Jephthah was, a resemblance of the general state of the case between Israel and God at this time: they had thrust God out by their idolatries, yet in their distress begged his help; he told them how justly he might have rejected them, and yet graciously delivered them. So did Jephthah. Many slight God and good men, till they come to be in distress, and then they are desirous of God's mercy, and good men's prayers.

IV. Their urgency with him to accept the government they offer him, v. 8. "Therefore because we formerly did thee that wrong, and to shew thee that we repent of it, and would gladly atone for it, we turn again to thee now, to put such an honour upon thee as shall balance that indignity." Let this instance be, 1. A caution to us not to despise or trample upon any because they are mean, or to be injurious to any that we have advantage against, because, whatever we think of them now, the time may come when we may have need of them, and would be glad to be beholden to them. It is our wisdom to make no man our enemy, because we know not how soon our distresses may be such as that we may be highly concerned to make him our friend. 2. An encouragement to men of worth that are slighted and ill-treated; let them bear it with meekness and cheerfulness, and leave it to God to make their light shine out of obscurity. Fuller's remark on this story in his Pisgah-Sight, is this; Virtue once in an age will work her own advancement, and when such as hate it chance to need it, they will be forced to prefer it, and then the honour will appear the brighter.

V. The bargain he makes with them. He had mentioned the injuries they had formerly done him, but, perceiving their repentance, his spirit was too great and generous to mention them any more. God had forgiven Israel the affronts they had done him, (ch. 10. 16.) and therefore Jephthah will forgive. Only he thinks it prudent to make his bargain wisely for the future, since he deals with men that he had reason to distrust. 1. He puts to them a fair question, v. 9. He speaks not with too much confidence of his success, knowing how justly God might suffer the Ammonites to prevail for the further punishment of Israel; but puts an if upon it. Nor does he speak with any confidence at all in himself; if he do succeed, it is the Lord that delivers them into his hand, intending thereby to remind his countrymen to look up to God as Arbitrator of the controversy, and the Giver of victory, for so he did. "Now if, by the blessing of God, I come home a conqueror, tell me plainly, shall I be your head? If I deliver you, under God, shall I, under him, reform you?" The same question is put to those who desire salvation by Christ. "If he save you, will ye be willing that he shall rule you? For on no other terms will he save you; if he make you happy, shall he make you holy? If he be your helper, shall he be your head?" 2. They immediately give him a positive answer; (v. 10.) "We will do according to thy words; command us in war, and thou shalt command us in peace." They do not take time to consider of it; the case was too plain to need a debate, and the necessity too pressing to admit a delay; they knew they had power to conclude a treaty for those whom they represented, and therefore bound it with an oath, The Lord be witness between us. They appeal to God's omniscience as the judge of their present sincerity, and to his justice as an avenger, if afterward they should prove false. The Lord be a hearer, so the word is. Whatever we speak, it concerns us to remember that God is a hearer, and to speak accordingly. Thus was the original contract ratified between Jephthah and the Gileadites, which all Israel, it should seem, agreed to afterward, for it is said, (ch. 12. 7.) he judged Israel. He hereupon went with them (v. 11.) to the place where they were all assembled, (ch. 10. 17.) and there, by common consent, they made him head and captain, and so ratified the bargain their representatives had made with him, that he should be not only captain now, but head for life. Jephthah, to obtain this little honour, was willing to expose his life for them (ch. 12. 3.) and shall we be discouraged in our Christian warfare by any of the difficulties we may meet with in it, when Christ himself has promised a crown of life to him that overcometh?

VI. Jephthah's pious acknowledgment of God in this great affair, (v. 11.) he uttered all his words before the Lord in Mizpeh. That is, upon his elevation, he immediately retired to his devotions, and, in prayer, spread the whole matter before God, both his choice to the office, and his execution of the office, as one that had his eye ever toward the Lord, and would do nothing without him, that leaned not to his own understanding or courage, but depended on God and his favour. He utters before God all his thoughts and cares in this matter, for he gives us leave to be free with him. 1. "Lord, the people have made me their head; wilt thou confirm the choice, and own me as thy people's head under thee, and for thee?" God justly complains of Israel, (Hos. 8. 4.) they have set up kings, but not by me; "Lord," said Jephthah, "I will be no head of their making, without thee. I will not accept the government, unless thou give me leave." Had Abimelech done this, he might have prospered. 2. "Lord, they have made me their captain, to go before them in this war with the Ammonites; shall I have thy presence? Wilt thou go before me? If not carry me not up hence. Lord, satisfy me in the justice of the cause. Assure me of success in the enterprise." This is a rare example, to be imitated by all, particularly by great ones; in all our ways, let us acknowledge God, seek his favour, ask counsel at his mouth, and take him along with us; so shall we make our way prosperous. Thus Jephthah opened the campaign with prayer. That was likely to end gloriously which began piously.

12. And Jephthah sent messengers unto the king of the children of Ammon, saying, What hast thou to do with me, that thou art come against me to fight in my land? 13. And the king of the children of Ammon answered unto the messengers of Jephthah, Because Israel took away my land, when they came up out of Egypt, from Arnon even unto Jabbok, and unto Jordan: now therefore restore those lands again peaceably. 14. And Jephthah sent messengers again unto the king of the children of Ammon: 15. And said unto him, Thus saith Jephthah, Israel took not away the land of Moab, nor the land of the children of Ammon: 16. But when Israel came up from Egypt, and walked through the wilderness unto the Red sea, and came to Kadesh; 17. Then Israel sent messengers unto the king of Edom, saying, Let me, I pray thee, pass through thy land: but the king of Edom would not hearken thereto. And in like manner they sent unto the king of Moab: but he would not consent: and Israel abode in Kadesh. 18. Then they went along through the wilderness and compassed the land of Edom, and the land of Moab, and came by the east side of the land of Moab, and pitched on the other side of Arnon, but came not within the border of Moab: for Arnon was the border of Moab. 19. And Israel sent messengers unto Sihon king of the Amorites, the king of Heshbon; and Israel said unto him, Let us pass, we pray thee, through thy land unto my place. 20. But Sihon trusted not Israel to pass through his coast: but Sihon gathered all his people together ther, and pitched in Jahaz, and fought against Israel. 21. And the LORD God of Israel delivered Sihon and all his people into the hand of Israel, and they smote them: so Israel possessed all the land of the Amorites, the inhabitants of that country. 22. And they possessed all the coasts of the Amorites, from Arnon even unto Jabbok, and from the wilderness even unto Jordan. 23: So now the LORD God of Israel hath dispossessed the Amorites from before his people Israel, and shouldest thou possess it? 24. Wilt not thou possess that which Chemosh thy god giveth thee to possess? So whomsoever the LORD our God shall drive out from before us, them will we possess. 25. And now art thou any thing better than Balak the son of Zipper king of Moab? did he ever strive against Israel, or did he ever fight against them, 26. While Israel dwelt in Heshbon and her towns, and in Aroer and her towns, and in all the cities that be along by the coasts of Arnon, three hundred years? why therefore did ye not recover them within that time? 27. Wherefore I have not sinned against thee, but thou doest me wrong to war against me: the LORD the Judge be Judge this day between the children of Israel and the children of Ammon. 28. Howbeit the king of the children of Ammon hearkened not unto the words of Jephthah which he sent him.

We have here the treaty between Jephthah, now judge of Israel, and the king of the Ammonites, who is not named; that the controversy between the two nations might, if possible, be accommodated without the effusion of blood.

I. Jephthah, as one having authority, sent to the king of Ammon, who in this war was the aggressor, to demand his reasons for invading the land of Israel; (v. 12.) "Why art thou come to fight against me in my land?" Had I come first into thy land to disturb thee in thy possession, that had been reason enough for fighting against me, for how must force be repelled but by force? But what hast thou to do, to come thus in a hostile manner into my land?" So he calls it, in the name both of God and Israel. Now this fair demand shews, 1. That Jephthah did not delight in war, though he was a mighty man of valour, but was willing to prevent it by a peaceable accommodation. If he could by reason persuade the invaders to retire, he would not compel them to do it by the sword. War should be the last remedy, not to be used till all other methods of ending matters in variance have been tried in vain. Ratio ultima regum—The last resource of kings. This rule should be observed in going to law. The sword of justice, as well as the sword of war, must not be appealed to, till the contending parties have first endeavoured by gentler means to understand one another, and to accommodate matters in variance, 1 Cor. 6. 1. 2. That Jephthah did delight in equity, and designed no other than to do justice. If the children of Ammon could convince him that Israel had done them wrong, he was ready to restore the rights of the Ammonites. If not, it was plain by their invasion, that they did Israel wrong, and he was ready to maintain the rights of the Israelites. A sense of justice should guide and govern us in all our undertakings.

II. The king of the Ammonites now gives in his demand, which he should have published before he had invaded Israel, v. 13. His pretence is, "Israel took away my land long since, now therefore restore these lands." We have reason to think the Ammonites, when they made this descent upon Israel, meant no other than to spoil and plunder the country, and enrich themselves with the prey, as they had done formerly under Egton, (ch. 3. 13.) when no such demand as this was made, though the matter was then fresh: but when Jephthah demanded the cause of their quarrel, and they could not for shame own what was their true intent and meaning, some old forgotten records were searched, or some ancient traditions inquired into, and from them this reason drawn to serve the present turn, for a colourable pretence of equity in the invasion. Even those that do the greatest wrong, yet have such a conviction in their consciences of justice, that they would seem to do right. Restore those lands. See upon what uncertain terms we hold our worldly possessions; what we think we have the surest hold of may be challenged from us, and wrested out of our hands. Those that are got to the heavenly Canaan, need not fear having their titles questioned.

III. Jephthah gives in a very full and satisfactory answer to this demand, shewing it to be altogether unjust and unreasonable, and that the Ammonites had no title to this country that lay between the rivers Arnon and Jabbok, now in the possession of the tribes of Reuben and Gad. As one very well versed in the history of his country, he shews,

1. That Israel never took any land away, either from the Moabites or Ammonites; he puts them together, because they were brethren, the children of Lot, near neighbours, and of united interests, having the same god, Chemosh, and perhaps sometimes the same king. The lands in question Israel took away, not from the Moabites or Ammonites, they had particular orders from God not to meddle with them, or any thing they had, (Deut. 2. 9, 19.) and religiously observed their orders; but they found them in the possession of Sihon king of the Amorites, and out of his hand they took them justly and honourably, as he will shew afterward. If the Amorites, before Israel came into that country, had taken these lands from the Moabites or Ammonites, as it should seem they had, (Numb. 21. 26. Josh. 13. 25.) Israel was not concerned to inquire into that, or answer for it. If the Ammonites had lost these lands and their title to them, the children of Israel were under no obligation to recover the possession for them. Their business was to conquer for themselves, not for other people. This is his first plea, "Not guilty of the trespass."

2. That they were so far from invading the property of any other nations than those of the devoted posterity of cursed Canaan, (one of the branches of which the Amorites were, Gen. 10. 16.) that they would not so much as force a passage through the country either of the Edomites, the seed of Esau, or of the Moabites, the seed of Lot, but, even after a very tedious march through the wilderness, with which they were sadly tired, (v. 16.) when the king of Edom first, and afterward the king of Moab, denied them the courtesy of a way through their country, (v. 17.) rather than give them any offence or annoyance, weary as they were, they put themselves to the further fatigue of compassing both the land of Edom, and that of Moab, and came not within the border of either, v. 18. Note, Those that conduct themselves inoffensively may take the comfort of it, and plead it against those that charge them with injustice and wrong-doing. Our righteousness will answer for us in time to come, (Gen. 30. 33.) and will put to silence the ignorance of foolish men, 1 Pet. 2. 15.

3. That in that war in which they took this land out of the hands of Sihon king of the Amorites, he was the aggressor, and not they, v. 19, 20. They sent a humble petition to him for leave to go through his land, willing to give him any security for their good behaviour in their march; "Let us pass (say they) unto my place, that is, to the land of Canaan; that is the only place we call our's, and to which we are pressing forward, not designing a settlement here." But Sihon not only denied them this courtesy, as Edom and Moab had done, (had he only done so, who knows but Israel might have gone about some other way?) but he mustered all his forces, and fought against Israel; (v. 20.) not only shut them out of his own land, but would have cut them off from the face of the earth; (Numb. 21. 23, 24.) aimed at nothing less than their ruin, v.20. Israel therefore, in their war with him, stood in their own just and necessary defence, and therefore, having routed his army, might justly, in further revenge of the injury, seize his country, as forfeited; so Israel came to the possession of this country, and doubted not to make good their title to it; and it is very unreasonable for the Ammonites to question their title, for the Amorites were the inhabitants of that country, and it was purely their land and their coasts that the Israelites then made themselves masters of, v.21.

4. He pleads a grant from the crown, and claims under that, v.23,24. It was not Israel, they were fatigued with their long march, and were not fit for action so soon; but it was the Lord God of Israel, who is King of nations, whose the earth is, and the fulness thereof, he it was that dispossessed the Amorites, and planted Israel in their room. God gave it them by an express and particular conveyance, such as vested the title in them, which they might make good against all the world; (Deut.2.24.) I have given into thy hand Sihon and his land; he gave it them by giving them a complete victory over the present occupants, notwithstanding the great disadvantages they were under: "Can you think that God gave it us, in such an extraordinary manner, with design that we should return it to the Moabites or Ammonites again? No; we put a higher value upon God's favours, than to part with them so easily." To corroborate this plea, he urges him with an argument ad hominem—directed to the man, Wilt thou possess that which Chemosh thy god giveth thee? He not only appeals to the common resolutions of men, to hold their own against all the world, but to the common religion of the nations, which, they thought, obliged them to make much of that which their gods gave them; not that Jephthah thought Chemosh a god, only he is thy god; and the worshippers even of those dunghill-deities, that could do neither good nor evil, yet thought themselves beholden to them for all they had, (Hos.2.12. These are my rewards which my lovers have given me: and see Judg.16.24.) and make this a reason why they would hold it fast, that their gods gave it them. "This thou thinkest a good title, and shall not we?" The Ammonites had dispossessed those that dwelt in their land before them; they thought they did it by the help of Chemosh their god, but really it was Jehovah the God of Israel that did it for them, as is expressly said, Deut.2.19,21. "Now," says Jephthah, "we have as good a title to our country as you have to your's." Note, One instance of the honour and respect we owe to God, as our God, is, rightly to possess that which he gives us to possess, receive it from him, use it for him, keep it for his sake, and part with it when he calls for it. He has given us to possess, not to enjoy. He himself only must be enjoyed.

5. He pleads prescription. (1.) Their title had not been disputed, when they first entered upon it, v.25. "Barak, who was then king of Moab, from whom the greatest part of these lands had been taken by the Amorites, and who was most concerned and best able to oppose us, if he had had any thing to object against our settlement there, yet sat still, and never offered to strive against Israel." He knew, that, for his own part, he had fairly lost it to the Amorites, and was not able to recover it, and could not but acknowledge that Israel had fairly won it of the Amorites, and therefore all his care was to secure what was left; he never pretended a title to what was lost. See Numb.21.2,3. "He then acquiesced in God's way of disposing kingdoms, and wilt not thou now?" (2.) Their possession had never yet been disturbed, v.26. He pleads that they had kept this country, as their own, now about three hundred years, and the Ammonites, in all that time, had never attempted to take it from them, no not when they had it in their power to oppress them, ch.3.12,13. So that, supposing their title had not been clear at the first, (which yet he had proved it was,) yet, no continual claim being made by so many descents, the entry of the children of Ammon, without doubt, was barred for ever. A title so long unquestioned shall be presumed unquestionable.

6. By these arguments, Jephthah justifies himself and his own cause; (v.27.) "I have not sinned against thee in taking or keeping what I have no right to; if I had, I would instantly make restitution; and condemns the Ammonites, "Thou doest me wrong to war against me, and must expect to speed accordingly." It seems to me an evidence that the children of Israel, in the days of their prosperity and power, (for some such days they had in the times of the judges,) had conducted themselves very inoffensively to all their neighbours, and had not been vexations or oppressing to them, (either by way of reprisal, or under colour of propagating their religion,) that the king of the Ammonites, when he would seek an occasion of quarrelling with them, was forced to look three hundred years back for a pretence. It becomes the people of God thus to be blameless and harmless, and without rebuke.

7. For the deciding of the controversy, he puts himself upon God and his sword, and the king of Ammon joined issue with him; (v.27,28.) The Lord the Judge be Judge this day. With this solemn reference of the matter to the Judge of heaven and earth, he designs either to deter the Ammonites from proceeding, and oblige them to retire, when they saw the right of the cause was against them, or to justify himself in subduing them, if they should go on. Note, War is an appeal to heaven, to God the Judge of all, to whom the issues of it belong. If doubtful rights be disputed, he is thereby requested to determine them; if manifest rights be invaded or denied, he is thereby applied to for the vindicating of what is just, and the punishing of wrong. As the sword of justice was made for lawless and disobedient persons, (1 Tim.1.9.) so was the sword of war made for lawless and disobedient princes and nations. In war, therefore, the eye must be ever up to God, and it must always be thought a dangerous thing to desire or expect that God should patronise unrighteousness.

Neither Jephthah's apology nor his appeal wrought upon the king of the children of Ammon; they had found the sweets of the spoil of Israel, in the eighteen years wherein they had oppressed them, (ch.10.8.) and hoped now to make themselves masters of the tree which they had so often enriched themselves with the fruit of. He hearkened not to the words of Jephthah, his heart being hardened to his destruction.

29. Then the Spirit of the LORD came upon Jephthah, and he passed over Gilead, and Manasseh, and passed over Mizpeh of Gilead, and from Mizpeh of Gilead he passed over unto the children of Ammon. 30. And Jephthah vowed a vow unto the LORD, and said, If thou shalt without fail deliver the children of Ammon into mine hands, 31. Then it shall be, that whatsoever cometh forth of the doors of my house to meet me, when I return in peace from the children of Ammon, shall surely be the LORD'S, and I will offer it up for a burnt-offering. 32. So Jephthah passed over unto the children of Ammon to fight against them; and the LORD delivered them into his hands. 33. And he smote them from Arocr, even till thou come to Minnith, even twenty cities, and unto the plain of the vineyards, with a very great slaughter. Thus the children of Ammon were subdued before the children of Israel. 34. And Jephthah came to Mizpeh unto his house, and, behold, his daughter came out to meet him with timbrels and with dances: and she was his only child, beside her he had neither son nor daughter. 35. And it came to pass, when he saw her, that he rent his clothes, and said, Alas, my daughter! thou hast brought me very low, and thou art one of them that trouble me: for

I have opened my mouth unto the LORD, and I cannot go back. 36. And she said unto him, My father, if thou hast opened thy mouth unto the LORD, do to me according to that which hath proceeded out of thy mouth; forasmuch as the LORD hath taken vengeance for thee of thine enemies, even of the children of Ammon. 37. And she said unto her father, Let this thing be done for me: Let me alone two months, that I may go up and down upon the mountains, and bewail my virginity, I and my fellows. 38. And he said, Go. And he sent her away for two months: and she went with her companions, and bewailed her virginity upon the mountains. 39. And it came to pass at the end of two months, that she returned unto her father, who did with her according to his vow which he had vowed: and she knew no man. And it was a custom in Israel, 40. That the daughters of Israel went yearly to lament the daughter of Jephthah the Gileadite four days in a year.

We have here Jephthah triumphing in a glorious victory, but, as an allay to his joy, troubled and distressed by an unadvised vow.

1. Jephthah's victory was clear, and shines very bright, both to his honour, and to the honour of God; his in pleading, and God's in owning, a righteous cause.

1. God gave him an excellent spirit, and he used it bravely, v. 29. Then when it appeared, by the people's unanimous choice of him for their leader, that he had so clear a call to engage, and, by the obstinate deafness of the king of Ammon to the proposals of accommodation, that he had so just a cause to engage in, then the Spirit of the Lord came upon him, and very much advanced his natural faculties, enduing him with power from on high, and making him more bold and more wise than ever he had been, and more fired with a holy zeal against the enemies of his people. Hereby God confirmed him in his office, and assured him of success in his undertaking. Thus animated, he loses no time, but, with an undaunted resolution, takes the field. Particular notice is taken of the way by which he advanced toward the enemy's camp, probably because the choice of it was an instance of that extraordinary direction with which the Spirit of the Lord had furnished him: for those who sincerely walk after the Spirit shall be led forth the right way.

2. God gave him eminent success, and he bravely improved that too; (v. 32.) The Lord delivered the Ammonites into his hand, and so gave judgment upon the appeal in favour of the righteous cause, and made those feel the force of war that would not yield to the force of reason, for he sits in the throne, judging right. Jephthah lost not the advantages given him, but pursued, and completed his victory; having routed their forces in the field, he pursued them to their cities, where he put to the sword all he found in arms, so as utterly to disable them to give Israel any molestation, v. 33. But it does not appear that he utterly destroyed the people, as Joshua had done those of the devoted nations, or that he offered to make himself master of the country, though their pretensions to the land of Israel might have given him colour to do so, only he took care that they should be effectually subdued. Though others' attempting wrong to us will justify us in the defence of our own right, yet it will not authorise us to do them wrong.

11. Jephthah's vow is dark, and much in the clouds. When he was going out from his own house upon this hazardous undertaking, in prayer to God for his presence with him, he makes a secret, but solemn, vow, or religious promise, to God, that, if God would graciously bring him back a conqueror, whosoever, or whatsoever, should first come out of his house to meet him, it should be devoted to God, and offered up for a burnt-offering; at his return, tidings of his victory coming home before him, his own and only daughter meets him, with the seasonable expressions of joy; this puts him into a great confusion, but there was no remedy; after she had taken some time to lament her own infelicity, she cheerfully submitted to the performance of his vow.

Now, 1. There are several good lessons to be learned out of this story. (1.) That there may be remainders of distrust and doubting, even in the hearts of true and great believers. Jephthah had reason enough to be confident of success, especially when he found the Spirit of the Lord come upon him; and yet, now that it comes to the settling, he seems to hesitate; (v. 30.) "If thou shalt without fail deliver them into my hand, then I will do so and so." And perhaps the snare into which his vow brought him was designed to correct the weakness of his faith; and a fond conceit he had, that he could not promise himself a victory, unless he proffered something considerable to be given to God in lieu of it. (2.) That yet it is very good, when we are in the pursuit or expectation of any mercy, to make vows to God of some instance of acceptable service to him, not as a purchase of the favour we desire, but as an expression of our gratitude to him, and the deep sense we have of our obligations to render according to the benefit done to us. The matter of such a singular vow (Lev. 27. 2.) must be something that has a plain and direct tendency, either to the advancement of God's glory, and the interests of his kingdom among men, or to the furtherance of ourselves in his service, and in that which is antecedently our duty. (3.) That we have great need to be very cautious, and well advised, in the making of such vows, lest, by indulging a present emotion, even of pious zeal, we entangle our own consciences, involve ourselves in perplexities, and are forced, at last, to say before the angel, that it was an error, Eccl. 5. 2. . 6. It is a snare to a man hastily to devour that which is holy, without due consideration, (quid valeant humeri, quid ferre recusent — what we are able or unable to effect,) and without inserting the needful provisos and limitations, which might prevent the entanglement, and then, after vows, to make the inquiry which should have been made before, Prov. 20. 25. Let Jephthah's harm be our warning in this matter. See Deut. 23. 22. (4.) That what we have solemnly vowed to God we must conscientiously perform, if it be possible and lawful, though it be ever so difficult and grievous to us. Jephthah's sense of the powerful obligation of his vow must always be our's, (v. 35.) I have opened my mouth unto the Lord in a solemn vow, and I cannot go back; that is, "I cannot recall the vow myself, it is too late, nor can any power on earth dispense with it, or give me up my bond. The thing was mine own, and in mine own power, (Acts, 5. 4.) but now it is not." Vow and pay, Ps. 76. 11. We deceive ourselves, if we think to mock God. If we apply this to the consent we have solemnly given in our sacramental vows to the covenant of grace, made with poor sinners in Christ, what a powerful argument will it be against the sins we have, by those vows, bound ourselves out from, and what a strong inducement to the duties we have thereby bound ourselves up to, and what a ready answer to every temptation, "I have opened my mouth to the Lord, and I cannot go back; I must therefore go forward; I have sworn, and I must, I will, perform it. Let me not dare to play fast and loose with God." (5.) That it well becomes children, obediently and cheerfully to submit to their parents in the Lord, and particularly to comply with their pious resolutions for the honour of God, and the keeping up of religion in their families, though they be harsh and severe, as the Rechabites, who, for many generations, religiously observed the commands of Jonadab their father in forbearing wine, and Jephthah's daughter here, who, for the satisfying of her father's conscience, and for the honour of God and her country, yielded herself as one devoted; (v. 36.) "Do to me according to that which hath proceeded out of thy mouth; I know I am dear to thee, but I am well content that God should be dearer." The father might disallow any vow made by the daughter, (Numb. 30. 5.) but the daughter could not disallow or disannul, no not such a vow as this, made by the father. This magnifies the law of the fifth commandment. (6.) That our friends' grievances should be our griefs. Where she went to bewail her hard fate, the virgins, her companions, joined with her in her lamentations, v. 38. With those of her own sex and age she used to associate, who, no doubt, now that her father was, of a sudden, grown so great, expected, shortly after his return, to dance at her wedding, but were heavily disappointed, when they were called to retire to the mountains with her, and share in her griefs. Those are unworthy of the name of friends that will only rejoice with us, and not weep with us. (7.) That heroic zeal for the honour of God and Israel, though allayed with infirmity and indiscretion, is worthy to be had in perpetual remembrance. It well became the daughters of Israel, by an annual solemnity, to preserve the honourable memory of Jephthah's daughter, who made light even of her own life, like a noble heroine, when God had taken vengeance of Israel's enemies, v. 36. Such a rare instance of one that preferred the public interest before life itself, was never to be forgotten. Her sex forbade her to follow to the war, and so to expose her life in battle, in lieu of which she hazards it much more (and perhaps apprehended that she did so, having some intimation of his vow, and did it designedly, for he tells her, (v. 35.) Thou hast brought me very low) to grace his triumphs. So transported was she with the victory, as a common benefit, that she was willing to be herself offered up as a thank-offering for it, and would think her life well bestowed, when laid down on so great an occasion. She thinks it an honour to die, not as a sacrifice of atonement for the people's sins, (that honour was reserved for Christ only,) but as a sacrifice of acknowledgment for the people's mercies. (8.) From Jephthah's concern on this occasion, we must learn, not to think it strange if the day of our triumphs in this world proves, upon some account or other, the day of our griefs, and therefore must rejoice with trembling! we hope for a day of triumph hereafter which will have no allay.

2. Yet there are some difficult questions, that do arise upon this story, which have very much employed the pens of learned men; I will say but little to them, because Mr. Poole has discussed them very fully in his English annotations.

(1.) It is hard to say what Jephthah did to his daughter, in performance of his vow. [1.] Some think he only shut her up for a nun, and that, it being unlawful, according to one part of his vow, (for they make it disjunctive,) to offer her up for a burnt-offering, he thus, according to the other part, engaged her to be the Lord's, that is, totally to sequester herself from all the affairs of this life, and consequently from marriage, and to employ herself wholly in the acts of devotion all her days. That which countenances this opinion, is, that she is said to bewail her virginity, (v. 37, 38.) and that she knew no man, v. 39. But, if he sacrificed her, it was proper enough for her to bewail, not her death, because that was intended to be for the honour of God, and she would undergo it cheerfully, but that unhappy circumstance of it, which made it more grievous to her than any other, because she was her father's only child, in whom he hoped his name and family would have been built up; that she was unmarried, and so left no issue to inherit her father's honour and estate; therefore that is it that is particularly taken notice of, (v. 34.) that beside her he had neither son nor daughter. But that which makes me think Jephthah did not go about thus to satisfy his vow, or evade it rather, is, that we do not find any law, usage, or custom, in all the Old Testament, which does in the least intimate that a single life was any branch or article of religion, or that any person, man or woman, was looked upon as the more holy, more the Lord's, or devoted to him, for living unmarried; it was no part of the law, either of the priests or of the Nazarites; Deborah and Huldah, both prophetesses, are both of them particularly taken notice of to be married women. Besides, had she only been confined to a single life, she needed not to have desired these two months to bewail it in, she had her whole life before her to do that, if she saw cause. Nor needed she to take such a sad leave of her companions; for they that are of that opinion, understand what is said, (v. 40.) of their coming to talk with her, as our margin reads it, four days in the year. Therefore, [2.] It seems more probable that he offered her up for a sacrifice, according to the letter of his vow, misunderstanding that law which spoke of persons devoted by the curse of God, as if it were to be applied to such as were devoted by men's vows; (Lev. 27. 29.) None devoted shall be redeemed, but shall surely be put to death; and wanting to be better informed of the power the law gave him in this case to redeem her. Abraham's attempt to offer up Isaac perhaps encouraged him, and made him think, if God would not accept this sacrifice, which he had vowed, he would send an angel to stay his hand, as he did Abraham's; if she came out designedly to be made a sacrifice, as who knows but she might, perhaps he thought that would make the case the plainer; Volenti non sit injuria—An injury cannot be done to a person when he himself consents to it. He imagined, it may be, that, where there was neither anger nor malice, there was no murder, and that his good intention would sanctify this bad action; and, since he had made such a vow, he thought better to kill his daughter than break his vow, and let Providence bear the blame, that brought her forth to meet him.

(2.) But, supposing that Jephthah did sacrifice his daughter, the question is, whether he did well? [1.] Some justify him in it, and think he did well, and as became one that preferred the honour of God before that which was dearest to him in this world. He is mentioned among the eminent believers, who, by faith, did great things, Heb. 11. 32. And this was one of the great things he did; it was done deliberately, and upon two months' consideration and consultation. He is never blamed for it by any inspired writer. Though it highly exalts the paternal authority, yet it cannot justify any in doing the like; he was an extraordinary person, the Spirit of the Lord came upon him; many circumstances, now unknown to us, might make this altogether extraordinary, and justify it, yet not so as that it might justify the like. Some learned men have made this sacrifice a figure of Christ, the great Sacrifice; he was of unspotted purity and innocence, as she a chaste virgin; he was devoted to death by his father, and so made a curse, or an anathema, for us; he submitted himself, as she did, to his Father's will—Not as I will, but as thou wilt. But, [2.] Most condemn Jephthah; he did ill to make so rash a vow, and worse to perform it. He could not be bound, by his vow, to that which God had forbidden, by the letter of the sixth commandment, Thou shalt not kill. God had forbidden human sacrifices, so that it was, (says Dr. Lightfoot,) in effect, a sacrifice to Moloch. And, probably, the reason why it is left dubious by the inspired penman, whether he sacrificed her or no, was, that they who did afterward offer their children might not take any encouragement from this instance. Concerning this, and some other such passages in the sacred story, which learned men are in the dark, divided, and in doubt about, we need not much amuse ourselves; what is necessary to our salvation, thanks be to God, is plain enough.

CHAP. XII.

In this chapter, we have, I. Jephthah's encounter with the Ephraimites, and the bloodshed on that unhappy occasion, (v. 1. .6.) and the conclusion of Jephthah's life and government, v. 7. II. A short account of three other of the judges of Israel; Ibzan, (v. 8. .10.) Elon, (v. 11, 12.) and Aodan, v. 13. .15.

1. AND the men of Ephraim gathered themselves together, and went northward, and said unto Jephthah, Wherefore passedst thou over to fight against the children of Ammon, and didst not call us to go with thee? we will burn thine house upon thee with fire. 2. And Jephthah said unto them, I and my people were at great strife with the children of Ammon; and when I called you, ye delivered me not out of their hands. 3. And when I saw that ye delivered me not, I put my life in my hands, and passed over against the children of Ammon, and the LORD delivered them into my hand: wherefore then are ye come up unto me this day, to fight against me? 4. Then Jephthah gathered together all the men of Gilead, and fought with Ephraim: and the men of Gilead smote Ephraim, because they said, Ye Gileadites are fugitives of Ephraim among the Ephraimites, and among the Manassites. 5. And the Gileadites took the passages of Jordan before the Ephraimites: and it was so, that when those Ephraimites which were escaped said, Let me go over; that the men of Gilead said unto him, Art thou an Ephraimite? If he said, Nay; 6. Then said they unto him, Say now Shibboleth: and he said, Sibboleth; for he could not frame to pronounce it right. Then they took him, and slew him at the passages of Jordan: and there fell at that time of the Ephraimites forty and two thousand. 7. And Jephthah judged Israel six years. Then died Jephthah the Gileadite, and was buried in one of the cities of Gilead.

Here is,

I. The unreasonable displeasure of the men of Ephraim against Jephthah, because he had not called them in to his assistance against the Ammonites, that they might have shared in the triumphs and spoils, v.1. Pride was at the bottom of the quarrel; only by that comes contention. Proud men think all the honours lost that go beside themselves, and then who can stand before envy? The Ephraimites had the same quarrel with Gideon, (ch.3.1.) who was of Manasseh on their side Jordan, as Jephthah was of Manasseh on the other side Jordan. Ephraim and Manasseh were nearer akin than any other of the tribes, being both the sons of Joseph, and yet they were more jealous one of another than any other of the tribes. Jacob having crossed hands, and given Ephraim the preference, looking as far forward as the kingdom of the ten tribes, which Ephraim was the head of, after the revolt from the house of David, that tribe, not content with that honour in the promise, was displeased if Manasseh had any honour done it in the mean time. It is pity that kindred and relation, which should be an inducement to love and peace, should be ever an occasion (as it often proves) of strife and discord. A brother offended is harder to be won than a strong city, and their contentions are as the bars of a castle. The anger of the Ephraimites at Jephthah was, 1. Causeless, and unjust. Why didst thou not call us to go with thee? For a good reason, because they were the men of Gilead, that had made him their captain, not the men of Ephraim, so that he had no authority to call them. Had his attempt miscarried, for want of their help, they might justly have blamed him for not desiring it; but, when the work was done, and done effectually, the Ammonites subdued, and Israel delivered, there was no harm done, though their hands were not employed in it. 2. It was cruel and outrageous. They got together in a tumultuous manner, went over Jordan as far as Mizpeh in Gilead, where Jephthah lived, and no less will satisfy their fury, but they will burn his house, and him in it. Cursed be their anger, for it was fierce. Those resentments that have the least reason for them have commonly the most rage in them. Jephthah was now a conqueror over the common enemies of Israel, and they should have come to congratulate him, and return him the thanks of their tribe, for the good services he had done; but we must not think it strange if we receive ill from those from whom we deserve well. Jephthah was now a mourner for the calamity of his family, upon his daughter's account, and they should have come to condole and comfort him; but barbarous men take a pleasure in adding affliction to the afflicted. In this world, the end of one trouble often proves the beginning of another; ~~not~~ must we ever boast as though we had put off the harness.

II. Jephthah's warm vindication of himself. He did not endeavour to pacify them, as Gideon had done in the like case; the Ephraimites were now more outrageous than they were then, and Jephthah had not so much of a meek and quiet spirit as Gideon had. Whether they would be pacified or no, Jephthah takes care,

1. To justify himself, v.2,3. He makes it out that they had no cause to quarrel with him, for, (1.) It was not in pursuit of glory that he had engaged in this war, but for the necessary defence of his country, with which the children of Ammon greatly strove. (2.) He had invited the Ephraimites to come and join with him, though he neither needed them, nor was under any obligation to pay that respect to them; but they had declined the service; I called you, and ye delivered me not out of their hands. Had that been true which they charged him with, yet it had not been a just ground of quarrel, but, it seems, it was false; and, as the matter of fact now appears, he had more cause to quarrel with them, for deserting the common interests of Israel in a time of need. It is no new thing for those who are themselves most culpable to be most clamorous in accusing the innocent. (3.) The enterprise was very hazardous, and they had more reason to pity him than to be angry with him; I put my life in my hands; that is, "exposed myself to the utmost peril in what I did, having so small an army." The honour they envied was bought dear enough, they needed not to grudge it him; few of them would have ventured so far for it. (4.) He does not take the glory of the success to himself, (that had been invidious,) but gives it all to God. "The Lord delivered them into mine hand. If God was pleased so far to make use of me, for his glory, why should you be offended at that? Have you any reason to fight against me? Is not that, in effect, to fight against God, in whose hand I have been only an unworthy instrument?"

2. When this just answer (though not so soft an answer as Gideon's) did not prevail to turn away their wrath, he took care, both to defend himself from their fury, and to chastise their insolence with the sword, by virtue of his authority as Israel's judge.

(1.) The Ephraimites had not only quarrelled with Jephthah, but, when his neighbours and friends appeared to take his part, they had abused them, and given them foul language; for I adhere to our translation, and so take it, v.4. They said, in scorn, "Ye Gileadites, that dwell here on the other side Jordan, are but fugitives of Ephraim, the scum and dregs of the tribes of Joseph, of which Ephraim is the chief, the refuse of the family, and are so accounted among the Ephraimites, and among the Manassites. Who cares for you? All your neighbours know what you are, no better than fugitives and vagabonds, separated from your brethren, and driven hither into a corner." The Gileadites were as true Israelites as any other, and at this time had signalized themselves, both in the choice of Jephthah, and in the war with Ammon, above all the families of Israel, and yet are most basely and unjustly called fugitives. It is an ill thing to fasten names or characters of reproach upon persons or countries, as is common, especially upon those that lie under outward disadvantages; it often occasions quarrels that prove of ill consequence, as it did here. See likewise what a mischievous thing an abusive tongue is, that calls ill names, and gives scurrilous language; it sets on fire the course of nature, and is set on fire of hell, (Jam.3.6.) and many a time cuts the throat of him that uses it, as it did here, Ps.64.8. If these Ephraimites could have denied themselves the poor satisfaction of calling the Gileadites fugitives, they might have prevented a great deal of bloodshed, for grievous words stir up anger; and who knows how great a matter a little of that fire may kindle?

(2.) This affront raises the Gileadites' blood, and the indignity done to themselves, as well as to their captain, must be revenged. [1.] They routed them in the field, v.4. They fought with Ephraim, and Ephraim being but a rude unheaded rabble, smote Ephraim, and put them to flight. [2.] They cut off their retreat, and so completed their revenge, v.5,6. The Gileadites, who perhaps were better acquainted with the passages of Jordan than the Ephraimites were, secured them with strong guards, who were ordered to slay every Ephraimite that offered to pass the river. Here was, First, Cruelty enough in the destruction of them. Sufficient surely was the punishment which was inflicted by many; when they were routed in the field, there needed not this severity to cut off all that escaped. Shall the sword devour for ever? Whether Jephthah is to be praised for this, I know not, perhaps he saw it to be a piece of necessary justice. Secondly, Cunning enough in the discovery of them. It seems the Ephraimites, though they spoke the same language with other Israelites, yet had got a custom, in the dialect of their country, to pronounce the Hebrew letter Shin like Samech, and they had so strangely used themselves to it, that they could not do otherwise, no, not to save their lives. We learn to speak by imitation; they that first used s for sh, did it either because it was shorter, or because it was finer, and their children liked to speak like them, so that you might know an Ephraimite by it; as in England we know a west-country man, or a north-country man, nay, perhaps a Shropshire man, and a Cheshire man, by his pronunciation. Thou art a Galilean, and thy speech betrays thee. By this the Ephraimites were discovered. If they took a man that they suspected to be an Ephraimite, but he denied it, they bade him say Shibboleth; but either he could not, as our translation reads it, or he did not heed, or frame, or direct himself, as some read, to pronounce it right, but said Sibboleth, and so was known to be an Ephraimite, and was slain immediately. Shibboleth signifies a river or stream; "Ask leave to go over Shibboleth, the river." Those that were thus cut off, made up the whole number of slaughtered Ephraimites forty-two thousand, v. 6. Thus another mutiny of that angry tribe was prevented.

Now let us observe the righteousness of God in the punishment of these proud and passionate Ephraimites, which in several instances answered to their sin. 1. They were proud of the honour of their tribe, gloried in this, that they were Ephraimites; but how soon are they brought to be ashamed or afraid to own their country! Art thou an Ephraimite? No, now rather of any tribe than that. 2. They had gone in a rage over Jordan to burn Jephthah's house with fire, but now they come back to Jordan as sneakingly as they had passed it furiously, and were cut off from ever returning to their own houses. 3. They had upbraided the Gileadites with the infelicity of their country, lying at such a distance; and now they suffer by an infirmity peculiar to their own country, in not being able to pronounce Shibboleth. 4. They had called the Gileadites, unjustly, fugitives, and now they are really and in good earnest become fugitives themselves; and, in the Hebrew, the same word (v. 5.) is used of the Ephraimites that escaped, or that fled, which they had used in scorn of the Gileadites, calling them fugitives; he that rolls the stone of reproach unjustly upon another, let him expect that it will justly return upon himself.

Lastly, Here is the end of Jephthah's government. He judged Israel but six years, and then died, v. 7. Perhaps the death of his daughter sunk him so, that he never looked up after, but it shortened his days, and he went to his grave mourning.

8. And after him Ibzan of Beth-lehem judged Israel. 9. And he had thirty sons, and thirty daughters, whom he sent abroad, and took in thirty daughters from abroad for his sons. And he judged Israel seven years. 10. Then died Ibzan, and was buried at Beth-lehem. 11. And after him Elon, a Zebulunite, judged Israel; and he judged Israel ten years. 12. And Elon the Zebulunite died, and was buried in Aijalon in the country of Zebulun. 13. And after him Abdon the son of Hillel, a Pirathonite, judged Israel. 14. And he had forty sons and thirty nephews, that rode on threescore and ten ass-colts: and he judged Israel eight years.

15. And Abdon the son of Hillel the Pirathonite died, and was buried in Pirathon in the land of Ephraim, in the mount of the Amalekites.

We have here a short account of the short reigns of three more of the judges of Israel; the first of which governed but seven years, the second ten, and the third eight. For the transgression of a land, many are the princes thereof, many in a short time, successively, Prov. 28. 2. Good men being removed in the beginning of their usefulness, and by the time they had applied themselves to their business.

I. Ibzan of Bethlehem; most probably, Bethlehem of Judah, David's city, not that in Zebulun, which is only mentioned once, Josh. 19. 15. He ruled but seven years, but, by the number of his children, and his disposing of them all in marriage himself, it appears that he lived long; and, probably, the great increase of his family, and the numerous alliances he made, added to his personal merits, made him the more fit to be either chosen by the people, as Jephthah was, or called of God immediately, as Gideon was, to be Israel's judge, to keep up and carry on the work of God among them. That which is remarkable concerning him, is, his children. 1. That he had many children, sixty in all, a quiver full of these arrows. Thus was Bethlehem of old famous for increase, the very city where he was to be born, whose spiritual seed should be as the stars of heaven. 2. That he had an equal number of each sex, thirty sons and thirty daughters, a thing which does not often happen in the same family, yet, in the great family of mankind, he that first made two, male and female, by his wise providence, preserves a succession of both in some sort of equality, as far as is requisite to the keeping up of the generations of men upon earth. 3. That he took care to marry them all; his daughters he sent abroad, et maritis dedit—(so the vulgar Latin adds)—he provided husbands for them; and, as it were in exchange, and both ways strengthening his interest, he took in thirty daughters from abroad for his sons. The Jews say, Every father owes three things to his son—to teach him to read the law, give him a trade, and get him a wife. What a difference was there between Ibzan's family and that of his immediate predecessor, Jephthah! Ibzan has sixty children, and all married, Jephthah but one, a daughter, that dies or lives unmarried. Some are increased, others are diminished; both are the Lord's doing.

II. Elon of Zebulun, in the north of Canaan, was next raised up to preside in public affairs, to administer justice, and to reform abuses; ten years he continued a blessing to Israel, and then died, v. 11, 12. Dr. Lightfoot computes, that, in the beginning of his time, the forty years' oppression by the Philistines began, (spoken of, ch. 13. 1.) and about that time Samson was born. Probably, his residence being in the north, the Philistines, who bordered upon the southern parts of Canaan, took the opportunity of making incursions upon them.

III. Abdon, of the tribe of Ephraim, succeeded, and in him that illustrious tribe begins to recover in reputation, having not afforded any person of note since Joshua; for Abimelech the Shechemite was rather a scandal to it. This Abdon was famous for the multitude of his offspring; (v. 14.) he had forty sons and thirty grandsons, all which he lived to see grown up; and they rode on seventy ass-colts, either as judges and officers, or as gentlemen and persons of distinction. It was a satisfaction to him thus to see his children's children, but it is feared he did not see peace upon Israel, for by this time the Philistines had begun to break in upon them.

Concerning this, and the rest of these judges that have ever so short an account given of them, yet notice is taken where they were buried; (v. 7, 10, 12, 15.) perhaps, because the inscriptions upon their monuments (for such were anciently used, 2 Kings, 23. 17.) would serve for the confirmation and enlargement of their story, and might be consulted by such as desired further information concerning them. St. Peter, having occasion to speak of David, says, His sepulchre is with us unto this day, Acts, 2. 29. Or

It is intended for the honour of the places where they laid their bones; but may be improved for the lessening of our esteem of all worldly glory, which death and the grave will stain the pride of. These judges, that were as gods to Israel, died like men, and all their honour was laid in the dust.

It is very strange, that, in the history of all these judges, some of whose actions are very particularly related, there is not so much as once mention made of the high priest, or any other priest, or Levite, appearing either for counsel or action in any public affair, from Phinehas (ch. 20. 28.) to Eli, which may well be computed two hundred and fifty years; only the names of the high priests at that time are preserved, 1 Chron. 6. 4. .7. and Ezra, 7. 3. .5. How can this strange obscurity of that priesthood for so long a time, now in the beginning of its days, agree with that mighty splendour with which it was introduced, and the figure which the institution of it makes in the law of Moses? Surely it intimates, that the institution was chiefly intended to be typical, and that the great benefits that seemed to be promised by it were to be chiefly looked for in its antitype, the everlasting priesthood of our Lord Jesus, in comparison of the excellent glory of which, that priesthood had no glory, 2 Cor. 3. 10.

CHAP. XIII.

At this chapter begins the story of Samson, the last of the judges of Israel, whose story is recorded in this book, and next before Eli. The passages related concerning him, are, from first to last, very surprising and uncommon. The figure he makes in this history is really great, and yet vastly different from that of his predecessors. We never find him at the head, either of a court or of an army, never upon the throne of judgment, or in the field of battle, yet, in his own proper person, a great patriot of his country, and a terrible scourge and check to its enemies and oppressors; he was an eminent believer, (Heb. 11. 32.) and a glorious type of Him who with his own arm wrought salvation. The history of the rest of the judges commences from their advancement to that station, but Samson's begins with his birth, nay with his conception, and no less than an angel from heaven ushers him into the world, as a pattern of what should be afterward done to John Baptist, and Christ. This is related in this chapter. I. The occasion of raising up this deliverer was the oppression of Israel by the Philistines, v. 1. II. His birth is foretold by an angel to his mother, v. 2. .5. III. She relates it to his father, v. 6, 7. IV. They both together have it again from the angel, (v. 8. .14.) whom they treat with respect, (v. 15. .18.) and who, to their great amazement, discovers what he was, at parting, v. 19. .23. VI. Samson is born, v. 21, 25.

1. AND the children of Israel did evil again in the sight of the LORD; and the LORD delivered them into the hand of the Philistines forty years. 2. And there was a certain man of Zorah, of the family of the Danites, whose name was Manoah; and his wife was barren, and bare not. 3. And the angel of the LORD appeared unto the woman, and said unto her, Behold now, thou art barren, and bearest not: but thou shalt conceive, and bear a son. 4. Now therefore beware, I pray thee, and drink not wine nor strong drink, and eat not any unclean thing: 5. For, lo, thou shalt conceive, and bear a son; and no razor shall come on his head: for the child shall be a Nazarite unto God from the womb: and he shall begin to deliver Israel out of the hand of the Philistines. 6. Then the woman came and told her husband, saying, A man of God came unto me, and his countenance was like the countenance of an angel of God, very terrible: but I asked him not whence he was, neither told he me his name: 7. But he said unto me, Behold, thou shalt conceive, and bear a son; and now drink no wine nor strong drink, neither eat any unclean thing: for the child shall be a Nazarite to God from the womb to the day of his death.

The first verse gives us a short account, such as we have too often met with already, of the great distress that Israel was in, which gave occasion for the raising up of a deliverer. They did evil, as they had done, in the sight of the Lord, and then God delivered them, as he had done, into the hands of their enemies. If there had been no sin, there had needed no Saviour; but sin was suffered to abound, that grace might much more abound. The enemies God now sold them to, were the Philistines, their next neighbours, that lay within them, the first and chief of the nations which were devoted to destruction; but which God left to prove them, (ch. 3. 1, 3.) the five lords of the Philistines, an inconsiderable people, in comparison with Israel, (they had but five cities of any note,) and yet, when God made use of them as the staff in his hand, they were very oppressive and vexatious. And this trouble lasted longer than any yet, it continued forty years, though, probably, not always alike violent.

When Israel was in this distress, Samson was born; and here we have his birth foretold by an angel. Observe,

I. His extraction. He was of the tribe of Dan, v. 2. Dan signifies a judge or judgment, Gen. 30. 6. And, probably, it was with an eye to Samson, that dying Jacob foretold, Dan shall judge his people, that is, "he shall produce a judge for his people, though one of the sons of the handmaids, as one, as well as any one, of the tribes of Israel," Gen. 49. 16. The lot of the tribe of Dan lay next to the country of the Philistines, and therefore one of that tribe was most fit to be made a bridle upon them. His parents had been long childless. Many eminent persons were born of mothers that had been kept a great while in the want of the blessing of children; as Isaac, Joseph, Samuel, and John Baptist, that the mercy might be the more acceptable when it did come. Sing, O barren, thou that didst not bear, Isa. 54. 1. Note, Mercies long waited for often prove signal mercies, and it is made to appear that they were worth waiting for, and by them others may be encouraged to continue their hope in God's mercy.

II. The glad tidings brought to his mother, that she should have a son. The messenger was an angel of the Lord, (v. 3.) yet appearing as a man, with the aspect and garb of a prophet, or man of God. And this angel (as the learned Bishop Patrick supposes, on v. 18.) was the Lord himself, that is, the Word of the Lord, who was to be the Messiah, for his name is called Wonderful, (v. 18.) and Jehovah, v. 19. The great Redeemer did in a particular manner concern himself about this typical redeemer. It was not so much for the sake of Manoah and his wife, obscure Danites, that this extraordinary message was sent, but for Israel's sake, whose deliverer he was to be; and not only so, his services to Israel not seeming to answer to the grandeur of his entry, but for the Messiah's sake, whose type he was to be, and whose birth must be foretold by an angel, as his was.

The angel, in the message he delivers, 1. Takes notice of her affliction, Behold now, thou art barren, and bearest not. From hence she might gather he was a prophet, that, though a stranger to her, and one she had never seen before, yet he knew this to be her grievance. He tells her of it, not to upbraid her with it, but because perhaps at this time she was actually thinking of this affliction, and bemoaning herself as one written childless. God often sends in comfort to his people very seasonably, when they feel most from their troubles. "Now thou art barren, but thou shalt not be always so," as she feared, nor "long so." 2. He assures her that she should conceive and bear a son, (v. 3.) and repeats it, v. 5. To shew the power of a divine word, the strongest man that ever was was a child of promise, as Isaac, born by force and virtue of a promise, and faith in that promise, Heb. 11. 11. Gal. 4. 23. Many a woman, after having been long barren, has born a son by providence, but Samson was by promise, because a figure of the Promised Seed, so long expected by the faith of the Old Testament saints. 3. He appoints that the child should be a Nazarite from his birth, and therefore that the mother should be subject to the law of the Nazarites, (though not under the vow of a Nazarite,) and should drink no wine or strong drink, so long as this child was to have his nourishment from her, either in the womb or at the breast, v.4,5. Observe, This deliverer of Israel must be in the strictest manner devoted to God, and an example of holiness. It is spoken of as a kindness to the people, that God raised up of their young men for Nazarites, Amos, 2. 11. Other judges had corrected their apostasies from God, but Samson must appear as one, more than any of them, consecrated to God; and, notwithstanding what we read of his faults, we have reason to think, that, being a Nazarite of God's making, he did, in the course of his conversation, exemplify, not only the ceremony, but the substance, of that separation to the Lord, in which the Nazariteship did consist, Numb. 6. 2. Those that would save others, must by singular piety distinguish themselves. Samuel, who carried on Israel's deliverance from the Philistines, was a Nazarite by his mother's vow, (1 Sam. 1. 11.) as Samson by the divine appointment. The mother of this deliverer must therefore deny herself, and not eat any unclean thing; what was lawful at another time, was now to be forborne. As the promise tried her faith, so this precept tried her obedience; for God requires both from those on whom he will bestow his favours. Women with child ought conscientiously to avoid whatever they have reason to think will be any way prejudicial to the health or good constitution of the fruit of their body. And perhaps Samson's mother was to refrain from wine and strong drink, not only because he was designed for a Nazarite, but because he was designed for a man of great strength, which his mother's temperance would contribute to. 4. He foretells the service which this child should do to his country, He shall begin to deliver Israel. Note, It is very desirable that our children may be not only devoted entirely to God themselves, but instrumental for the good of others, and the service of their generation; not recluses, candles under a bushel, but on a candlestick. Observe, He shall begin to deliver Israel. This intimated that the oppression of the Philistines should last long, for Israel's deliverance from it should not so much as begin, not one step be taken towards it, till this child, which was now unborn, should be grown up to a capacity of beginning it. And yet he must not complete the deliverance neither, he shall only begin to deliver Israel, which intimates that the trouble should still be prolonged; God chooses to carry on his work gradually, and by several hands. One lays the foundation of a good work, another builds, and perhaps a third brings forth the top-stone.

Now herein Samson was a type of Christ. (1.) As a Nazarite to God, a Nazarite from the womb. For though our Lord Jesus was not a Nazarite himself, yet he was typified by the Nazarites, as being perfectly pure from all sin, not so much as conceived in it, and entirely devoted to his Father's honour. Of the Jewish church, as concerning the flesh, Christ came, because to them pertained the promise of him, Rom. 9. 4. 5. By virtue of that promise, he long lay as it were in the womb of that church, which for many ages was pregnant of him, and therefore, like Samson's mother, during that pregnancy, was made a holy nation and a peculiar people, and strictly forbidden to touch any unclean thing, for his sake, who in the fulness of time was to come from them. (2.) As a deliverer of Israel; for he is Jesus a Saviour, who saves his people from their sins. But with this difference: Samson did only begin to deliver Israel, David was afterward raised up to complete the destruction of the Philistines; but our Lord Jesus is both Samson and David too; both the Author and Finisher of our faith.

III. The report which Manoah's wife, in a transport of joy, brings in all haste to her husband, of this surprising message, v. 6, 7. The glad tidings were brought her when she was alone, perhaps religiously employed in meditation or prayer; but she could not, she would not, conceal it from her husband, but gives him an account,

1. Of the messenger. It was a man of God, v. 6. His countenance she could describe; it was very awful, he had such a majesty in his looks, such a sparkling eye, such a shining face, so powerfully commanding reverence and respect, that, according to the idea she had of an angel, he had the very countenance of one. But his name she can give no account of, nor to what tribe or city of Israel he belonged, for he did not think fit to tell her, and, for her part, the very sight of him struck such an awe upon her, that she durst not ask him. She was abundantly satisfied that he was a servant of God, his person and message she thought carried their own evidence along with them, and she inquired no further.

2. Of the message. She gives him a particular account both of the promise and of the precept, (v. 7.) that he also might believe the promise, and might on all occasions be a monitor to her to observe the precept. Thus should yoke-fellows communicate to each other their experiences of communion with God, and their improvements in acquaintance with him, that they may be helpful to each other in the way that is called holy.

3. Then Manoah entreated the LORD, and said, O my LORD, let the man of God which thou didst send come again unto us, and teach us what we shall do unto the child that shall be born. 9. And God hearkened to the voice of Manoah; and the angel of God came again unto the woman as she sat in the field: but Manoah her husband was not with her. 10. And the woman made haste, and ran, and shewed her husband, and said unto him, Behold, the man hath appeared unto me, that came unto me the other day. 11. And Manoah arose, and went after his wife; and came to the man, and said unto him, Art thou the man that spakest unto the woman? And he said, I am. 12. And Manoah said, Now let thy words come to pass. How shall we order the child, and how shall we do unto him? 13. And the angel of the LORD said unto Manoah, Of all that I said unto the woman let her beware. 14. She may not eat of any thing that cometh of the vine, neither let her drink wine or strong drink, nor eat any unclean thing: all that I commanded her let her observe.

We have here an account of a second visit, which the angel of God made to Manoah and his wife.

1. Manoah earnestly prayed for it, v. 8. He was not incredulous of the story his wife told him; he knew she was a virtuous woman, and therefore the heart of her husband doth safely trust in her; he knew she would not go about to impose upon him, much less was he, as Josephus unworthily represents him, jealous of his wife's conversation with this stranger; but, 1. He takes it for granted that this child of promise should in due time be given them, and speaks without hesitation of the child that shall be born. There was not found so great faith, no not in Zechariah, a priest, then in waiting at the altar of the Lord, and to whom the angel himself appeared, as was in this honest Danite. Things hidden from the wise and prudent, who value themselves upon the niceness of their inquiries, are often revealed unto babes, who know how to prize God's gifts, and to take God's word. Blessed are they that have not seen, and yet, as Manoah here, have believed. 2. All his care is, What they should do to the child that should be born. Note, Good men are more solicitous and desirous to know the duty that is to be done by them, than to know the events that shall be concerning them; for duty is our's, events are God's. Solomon inquires concerning what the good men should do, not the good they should have, Eccl. 2. 3. 3. He therefore prays to God to send the same blessed messenger again, to give them further instructions concerning the management of this Nazarite, fearing lest his wife's joy for the promise might have made her forget some part of the precept, in which he was desirous to be fully informed, and v. 12 under no mistake. "Lord, let the man of God come again unto us, for we desire to be better acquainted with him." Note, Those that have heard from heaven, cannot but wish to hear more from thence, again and again to meet with the name of God. Observe, He does not go, or send his servants abroad, to find out this man of God, but seeks him upon his knees, prays to God to send him, and, thus seeking, finds him. Would we have God's messengers, the ministers of his gospel, to bring a word proper for us, and for our instruction? Entreat the Lord to send them to us to teach us, Rom. 15. 30, 32.

II. God graciously granted it; (v. 9.) God hearkened to the voice of Manoah. Note, God will not fail, some way or other, to guide those by his counsel that are sincerely desirous to know their duty, and apply themselves to him to teach them, Ps. 25. 3, 9.

1. The angel appears the second time also to the wife, when she was sitting alone, probably tending the flocks, or otherwise well employed in the field where she was retired; solitude is often a good opportunity of communion with God; good people have thought themselves never less alone than when alone, if God be with them.

2. She goes in all haste to call her husband, doubtless, humbly beseeching the stay of this blessed messenger, till she return, and her husband with her, v. 10, 11. She did not desire him to go with her to her husband, but will fetch her husband to him. Those that would meet with God, must attend there where he is pleased to manifest himself. "Ob," says she, overjoyed, "my dear love, thy prayers are answered, yonder is the man of God come to make us another visit; he that came the other day;" or, as some read it, this day, for other is not in the original, and it is probable enough that both these visits were the same day, and at the same place, and that the second time she sat expecting him. The man of God is very willing she should call her husband, John, 4. 16. Those that have got acquaintance with the things of God themselves, should invite others to the same acquaintance, John, 1. 45, 46. Manoah is not disgusted that the angel did not this second time appear to him, but very willingly goes after his wife to the man of God. To atone (as it were) for the first fatal miscarriage, when Eve earnestly pressed Adam to that which was evil, and he too easily yielded to her, let yoke-fellows excite one another to love and follow good works; and if the wife will lead, let not the husband think it any disparagement to him to follow her in that which is virtuous and praiseworthy.

3. Manoah being come to the angel, and satisfied by him that he was the same that had appeared to his wife, does, with all humility, (1.) Welcome the promise; (v. 12.) Now let thy words come to pass; this was the language, not only of his desire, but of his faith, like that of the blessed Virgin, (Luke, 1. 38.) "Be it according to thy word." Lord, I lay hold on what thou hast said, and depend upon it; let it come to pass." (2.) Beg that the prescriptions given might be repeated: How shall we order the child? The directions were given to his wife, but he looks upon himself as concerned to assist her in the careful management of this promised seed, according to order; for the utmost care of both the parents, and their constant joint endeavour, are little enough to be engaged for the good ordering of children that are devoted to God, and to be brought up for him. Let not one devolve it on the other, but both do their best. Observe from Manoah's inquiry, [1.] In general, that when God is pleased to bestow any mercy upon us, our great care must be how to use it well, and as we ought, because it is then only a mercy indeed, when it is rightly managed. God has given us bodies, souls, estates; how shall we order them, that we may answer the intent of the Donor, and give a good account of them? [2.] In particular, those to whom God has given children must be very careful how they order them, and what they do unto them, that they may drive out the foolishness that is bound up in their hearts, form their minds and manners well betimes, and train them in the way wherein they shall go. Herein pious parents will beg divine assistance. "Lord, teach us how we may order our children, that they may be Nazarites, and living sacrifices to thee."

4. The angel repeats the directions he had before given; (v. 13, 14.) Of all that I forbade let her beware. And all that I commanded her let her observe. Note, There is need of a great deal both of caution and observation, for the right ordering both of ourselves and of our children. Beware, and observe; take heed not only of drinking wine or strong drink, but of eating any thing that cometh of the vine. Those that would preserve themselves pure must keep at a distance from that which borders upon sin, or leads to it. When she was with child of a Nazarite, she must not eat any unclean thing; so those in whom Christ is formed must carefully cleanse themselves from all filthiness of flesh and spirit, and do nothing to the prejudice of that new man.

15. And Manoah said unto the angel of the LORD, I pray thee, let us detain thee, until we shall have made ready a kid for thee. 16. And the angel of the LORD said unto Manoah, Though thou detain me, I will not eat of thy bread: and if thou wilt offer a burnt-offering, thou must offer it unto the LORD. For Manoah knew not that he was an angel of the LORD. 17. And Manoah said unto the angel of the LORD, What is thy name, that when thy sayings come to pass, we may do thee honour? 18. And the angel of the LORD said unto him, Why askest thou thus after my name, seeing it is secret? 19. So Manoah took a kid with a meat-offering, and offered it upon a rock unto the LORD: and the angel did wondrously; and Manoah and his wife looked on. 20. For it came to pass, when the flame went up toward heaven from off the altar, that the angel of the LORD ascended in the flame of the altar. And Manoah and his wife looked on it, and fell on their faces to the ground. 21. But the angel of the LORD did no more appear to Manoah and to his wife. Then Manoah knew that he was an angel of the LORD. 22. And Manoah said unto his wife, We shall surely die, because we have seen God. 23. But his wife said unto him, If the LORD were pleased to kill us, he would not have received a burnt-offering and a meat-offering at our hands, neither would he have shewed us all these things, nor would as at this time have told us such things as these.

We have here an account,

I. Of what further passed between Manoah and the angel at this interview. It was in kindness to him, that, while the angel was with him, it was concealed from him that it was an angel; for, had he known it, it would have been such a terror to him, that he durst not have conversed with him as he did; (v. 16.) He knew not that he was an angel. So Christ was in the world, and the world knew him not. Verily, thou art a God that hidest thyself. We could not bear the sight of the divine glory unveiled. God having determined to speak to us by men like ourselves, prophets and ministers, even when he spake by his angels, or by his Son, they appeared in the likeness of men, and were taken but for men of God.

Now, 1. The angel declined to accept his treat, and appointed him to turn it into a sacrifice. Manoah, being desirous to shew some token of respect and gratitude to this venerable stranger who had brought them these glad tidings, begged he would take some refreshment with him; (v. 15.) "We will soon make ready a kid for thee." They that welcome the message will be kind to the messengers, for his sake that sends them, 1 Thess. 5. 13. But the angel told him (v. 16.) he would not eat of his bread, any more than he would of Gideon's, but, as there, directed him to offer it to God, ch. 6. 20, 21. Angels need not meat or drink; but the glorifying of God is their meat and drink, and it was Christ's, John, 4. 34. And we in some measure do the will of God as they do it, if, though we cannot live without meat and drink, yet we eat and drink to the glory of God, and so turn even our common meals into sacrifices.

2. The angel declined telling him his name, and would not so far gratify his curiosity. Manoah desired to know his name, (v. 17.) and of what tribe he was, not as if he doubted the truth of his message, but that they might return his visit, and be better acquainted with him. It is good to increase and improve our acquaintance with good men and good ministers: and he has a further design, "That when thy sayings come to pass, we may do thee honour, celebrate thee as a true prophet, and recommend others to thee for divine instruction; that we may call the child that shall be born after thy name, and so do the honour; or that we may send thee a present, honouring one whom God has honoured." But the angel denies his request, with something of a check to his curiosity, (v. 18.) Why askest thou thus after my name? Jacob himself could not prevail for this favour, Gen. 32. 29. Note, We have not what we ask, when we ask we know not what. Manoah's request was honestly meant, and yet was denied. God told Moses his name, (Exod. 3. 13, 14.) because there was a particular occasion for his knowing it; but here there was no occasion. What Manoah asked, for instruction in his duty, he was readily told; (v. 12, 13.) but what he asked, to gratify his curiosity, was denied. God has in his word given us full directions concerning our duty, but never designed to answer all the inquiries of a speculative head. He gives him a reason for his refusal, "It is secret." The names of angels were not as yet revealed, to prevent the idolizing of them: after the captivity, when the church was cured of idolatry, angels made themselves known to Daniel by their names, Michael, and Gabriel; and to Zacharias, the angel told his name unasked, (Luke, 1. 19.) I am Gabriel. But here it is secret, or it is wonderful, too wonderful for us. One of Christ's names is Wonderful, Isa. 9. 6. His name was long a secret, but by the gospel it is brought to light, Jesus a Saviour. Manoah must not ask, because he must not know. Note, (1.) There are secret things which belong not to us, and which we must content ourselves to be in the dark about, while we are here in this world. (2.) We must therefore never indulge a vain curiosity in our inquiries concerning these things, Col. 2. 18. Nescire velle quæ Magister maximus docere non vult, erudita inscitia est—To be willingly ignorant of those things which our great Master refuses to teach us, is to be at once ignorant and wise.

3. The angel assisted, and owned their sacrifice, and, at parting, gave them to understand who he was. He had directed them to offer their burnt-offering to the Lord, v. 16. Praises offered up to God are the most acceptable entertainment of the angels; see Rev. 22. 9. Worship God. And Manoah, having so good a warrant, though he was no priest, and had no altar, turned his meat into a meat-offering, and offered it upon a rock to the Lord; (v. 19.) that is, he brought and laid it to be offered; "Lord, here it is, do what thou pleasest with it." Thus we must bring our hearts to God as living sacrifices, and submit them to the operation of his Spirit. All things being now ready, (1.) The angel did wondrously, for his name was Wonderful. Probably, the wonder he did was the same with what he had done for Gideon, he made fire to come either down from heaven, or up out of the rock, to consume the sacrifice. (2.) He ascended up toward heaven in the flame of the sacrifice, v. 20. By this it appeared, that he was not, as they thought, a mere man, but a messenger immediately from heaven; thence certainly he descended, for thither he ascended, John, 3. 13.—6. 62. This signified God's acceptance of the offering, and intimates to what we owe the acceptance of all our offerings, even to the mediation of the Angel of the covenant, that other Angel, who puts much incense to the prayers of saints, and so offers them before the throne, Rev. 8. 3. Prayer is the ascent of the soul to God. But it is Christ in the heart, by faith, that makes it an offering of a sweet-smelling savour; without him, our services are offensive smoke, but in him, acceptable flame. We may apply it to Christ's sacrifice of himself for us; he ascended in the flame of his own offering, for by his own blood he entered in once into the holy place, Heb. 9. 12. While the angel did this, it is twice said, (v. 19, 20.) that Manoah and his wife looked on. This is a proof of the miracle, the matter of fact was true, for out of the mouth of these two eye-witnesses the report of it is established. The angel did all that was done in the sacrifice, they did but look on; yet doubtless, when the angel ascended toward heaven, their hearts ascended with him in thanksgiving for the promise which came from thence, and in expectation of the performance to come from thence too. Yet, when the angel is ascended, they dare not, as those that were the witnesses of Christ's ascension, stand gazing up into heaven, but, in holy fear and reverence, they fell on their faces to the ground. And now, [1.] They knew that it was an angel, v. 21. It was plain it was not the body of a man they saw, since it was not chained to the earth, nor prejudiced by fire; but ascended, and ascended in flame; and therefore with good reason they conclude it was an angel, for he maketh his angels spirits, and his ministers a flame of fire. [2.] But he did not any more appear to them; it was for a particular occasion, now over, that he was sent, not to settle a constant correspondence, as with prophets. They must remember and observe what the angel had said, and not expect to hear more.

II. We have an account of the impressions which this vision made upon Manoah and his wife. While the angel did wondrously, they looked on, and said nothing; (so it becomes us carefully to observe the wondrous works of God, and to be silent before him;) but when he was gone, having finished his work, they had time to make their reflections.

1. In Manoah's reflections upon it there is great fear, v. 22. He had spoken with great assurance of the son they should shortly be the joyful parents of, (v. 8, 12.) and yet it is now put into such a confusion by that very thing which should have strengthened and encouraged his faith, that he counts upon nothing but their being both cut off immediately, We shall surely die. It was a vulgar opinion, generally received among the ancient Jews, that it was present death to see God, or an angel; and this notion quite overcame his faith for the present, as it did Gideon, ch. 6. 22.

2. In his wife's reflection upon it there is great faith, v. 23. Here the weaker vessel was the stronger believer, which perhaps was the reason why the angel chose once and again to appear to her. Manoah's heart began to fail him, but his wife, as a help meet for him, encouraged him. Two are better than one, for if one fall into dejections and despondencies, the other will help to raise him up. Yoke-fellows should piously assist each other's faith and joy, as there is occasion. None could argue better than Manoah's wife does here; We shall surely die, said her husband; "Nay," said she, "we need not fear that; let us never turn that against us which is really for us. We shall not die unless God be pleased to kill us, our death must come from his hand and his pleasure; now, the tokens of his pleasure which we have received forbid us to think that he designs our destruction. Had he thought fit to kill us, (1.) He would not have accepted our sacrifice, and signified to us his acceptance of it by turning it to ashes, Ps. 30. 3. margin. The sacrifice was the ransom of our lives, and the fire, fastening upon that, was a plain indication of the turning away of his wrath from us. The sacrifice of the wicked is an abomination, but you see our's is not so." (2.) "He would not have shewed us all these things, these strange sights, now at a time when there is little or no open vision, (1 Sam. 3. 1.) nor would he have given these exceeding great and precious promises of a son, that shall be a Nazarite, and a deliverer of Israel; he would not have told us such things as these, if he had been pleased to kill us. We need not fear the withering of those roots, out of which such a branch is yet to spring." Note, Hereby it appears God designs not the death of sinners, that he has accepted the great sacrifice which Christ offered up for their salvation, and has put them in a way of obtaining his favour, and assured them of it upon their repentance. Had he been pleased to kill them, he would not have done so. And let those good Christians, who have had communion with God in the word and prayer, to whom he has graciously manifested himself, and who have had reason to think God has accepted their works, take encouragement from thence in a cloudy and dark day; "God would not have done what he has done for my soul, if he had designed to forsake me, and leave me to perish at last; for his work is perfect, nor will he mock his people with his favours." Learn to reason as Manoah's wife did, "If God had designed me to perish under his wrath, he would not have given me such distinguishing tokens of his favours." O woman, great is thy faith.

24. And the woman bare a son, and called his name Samson: and the child grew, and the LORD blessed him. 25. And the Spirit of the LORD began to move him at times in the camp of Dan, between Zorah and Eshtaol.

Here is,

1. Samson's birth. The woman that had been long barren bare a son, according to the promise; for no word of God shall fall to the ground. Hath he spoken, and shall he not make it good? His name, Samson, has been derived, by some, from Shemesh, the sun, turned into a diminutive, sol exiguus—the sun in miniature; perhaps because, being born, like Moses, to be a deliverer, he was, like him, exceeding fair, his face shone like a little sun: or, in remembrance of the shining countenance of that man of God, who brought them the notice of him; though they knew not his name, yet thus, now that his sayings were come to pass, they did him honour. A little sun, because a Nazarite born, for the Nazarites were as rabies and sapphires, Lam. 4. 7. And because of his great strength; the sun is compared to a strong man; (Ps. 19. 5.) why should not a strong man then be compared to the sun when he goes forth in his strength? A little sun, because the glory of, and light to, his people Israel. A type of Christ, the Sun of righteousness.

2. His childhood. He grew more than ordinary in strength and stature, far out-grew other children of his age, and not in that only, but in other instances, it appeared that the Lord blessed him, qualified him, both in body and mind, for something great and extraordinary. Children of promise shall have the blessing.

3. His youth. When he grew up a little, the Spirit of the Lord began to move him, v. 25. This was an evidence that the Lord blessed him. Where God gives his blessing, he gives his Spirit to qualify for the blessing. Those are blessed indeed, in whom the Spirit of grace begins to work betimes, in the days of their childhood. If the Spirit be poured out upon our offspring, they will spring up as willows by the water-courses, Isa. 41. 3, 4. The Spirit of God moved Samson in the camp of Dan, that is, in the general muster of the trained bands of that tribe, who, probably, had formed a camp between Zorah and Eshtaol, near the place where he lived, to oppose the incursions of the Philistines; there Samson, when a child, appeared among them, and signalized himself by some very brave actions, excelling them all in many exercises and trials of strength, and, probably, he shewed himself more than ordinarily zealous against the enemies of his country, and discovered more of a public spirit than could be expected in a child. The Spirit moved him at times, not at all times, but, as the wind blows, when he listed, to shew that what he did was not from himself, then he could have done it at any time. Strong men think themselves greatly animated by wine; (Ps. 78. 65.) but Samson drank no wine, and yet excelled in strength and courage, and every thing that was bold and brave, for he had the Spirit of God moving him: therefore be not drunk with wine, but be filled with the Spirit, who will come to those that are sober and temperate.

CHAP. XIV.

The idea which this chapter gives us of Samson, is not what one might have expected concerning one, who, by the special designation of heaven, was a Nazarite to God, and a deliverer of Israel; and yet really he was both. Here is, I. Samson's courtship of a daughter of the Philistines, and his marriage to her, v. 1. .5, 7, 8. II. His conquest of a lion, and the prize he found in the carcase of it, v. 5, 6, 8, 9. III. Samson's riddle proposed to his companions, (v. 10. .14.) and unriddled by the treachery of his wife, v. 15. .18. IV. The occasion this gave him to kill thirty of the Philistines, (v. 19.) and to break off his new alliance, v. 20

1. AND Samson went down to Timnath, and saw a woman in Timnath of the daughters of the Philistines. 2. And he came up, and told his father and his mother, and said, I have seen a woman in Timnath of the daughters of the Philistines: now therefore get her to me to wife. 3. Then his father and his mother said unto him, Is there never a woman among the daughters of thy brethren, or among all my people, that thou goest to take a wife of the uncircumcised Philistines? And Samson said unto his father, Get her for me; for she pleaseth me well. 4. But his father and his mother knew not that it was of the LORD, that he sought an occasion against the Philistines: for at that time the Philistines had dominion over Israel. 5. Then went Samson down, and his father and his mother, to Timnath, and came to the vineyards of Timnath: and, behold, a young lion roared against him. 6. And the Spirit of the LORD came mightily upon him, and he rent him as he would have rent a kid, and he had nothing in his hand: but he told not his father or his mother what he had done. 7. And he went down, and talked with the woman; and she pleased Samson well. 8. And after a time he returned to take her, and he turned aside to see the carcase of the lion: and, behold, there was a swarm of bees, and honey, in the carcase of the lion. 9. And he took thereof in his hands, and went on eating, and came to his father and mother, and he gave them, and they did eat: but he told not them that he had taken the honey out of the carcase of the lion.

Here,

1. Samson, under the extraordinary guidance of Providence, seeks an occasion of quarrelling with the Philistines, by joining in affinity with them. A strange method, but the truth is, Samson was himself a riddle, a paradox of a man, did that which was really great and good, by that which was seemingly weak and evil, because he was designed not to be a pattern to us, (who must walk by rule, not by example,) but a type of him who, though he knew no sin, was made sin for us, and appeared in the likeness of sinful flesh, that he might condemn and destroy sin in the flesh, Rom. 8. 3.

1. As the negotiation of Samson's marriage was a common case, we may observe, (1.) That it was weakly and foolishly done of him, to set his affections upon a daughter of the Philistines; the thing appeared very improper. Shall one, that is not only an Israelite, but a Nazarite, devoted to the Lord, covet to become one with a worshipper of Dagon? Shall one, marked for a patriot & his country, match among those that were its sworn enemies? He saw this woman, (v. 1.) and she pleased him well, v. 3. It does not appear that he had any reason to think her either wise or virtuous, or any way likely to be a help meet for him, but he saw something in her face that was very agreeable to his fancy, and therefore nothing will serve, but she must be his wife. He that, in the choice of a wife, is guided only by his eye, and governed by his fancy, must afterward thank himself, if he find a Philistine in his arms. (2.) Yet it was wisely and well done, not to proceed so much as to make his addresses to her, till he had first made his parents acquainted with the matter. He told them, and desired them to get her for him to wife, v. 2. Herein he is an example to all children, conformable to the law of the fifth commandment. Children ought not to marry, nor to move towards it, without the advice and consent of their parents; they that do, (as Bishop Hall here expresses it,) wilfully unchild themselves, and exchange natural affections for violent. Parents have a property in their children as parts of themselves. In marriage this property is transferred, for such is the law of the relation, that a man shall leave his father and his mother, and cleave to his wife: it is therefore not only unkind and ungrateful, but very unjust, to alienate this property without their concurrence; whoso thus rabbeth his father or mother, stealing himself from them, who is nearer and dearer to them than their goods, and yet saith, It is no transgression, the same is the companion of a destroyer, Prov. 28. 24. (3.) His parents did well to dissuade him from yoking himself thus unequally with unbelievers. Let those who profess religion, but are courting an affinity with the profane and irreligious, matching into families where they have reason to think the fear of God is not, nor the worship of God, let them hear their reasoning, and apply it to themselves. “Is there never a woman among the daughters of thy brethren, or, if none of our own tribe, never a one among my people, never an Israelite, that pleases thee, or that thou canst think worthy of thine affection, that thou shouldst marry a Philistine?” In the old world, the sons of God corrupted and ruined themselves, their families, and that truly primitive church, by marrying with the daughters of men, Gen. 6. 2. God had forbidden the people of Israel to marry with the devoted nations, one of which the Philistines were, Deut. 7. 3. (4.) If there had not been a special reason for it, it had certainly been improper in him to insist upon his choice, and in them to agree to it at last. Yet their tender compliance with his affections may be observed as an example to parents, not to be unreasonable in crossing their children's choices, not to deny their consent, especially to those that have seasonably and dutifully asked it, without some very good cause. As children most obey their parents in the Lord, so parents must not provoke their children to wrath, lest they be discouraged. This Nazarite, in his subjection to his parents, asking their consent, and not proceeding till he had it, was not only an example to all children, but a type of the holy child Jesus, who went down with his parents to Nazareth, (thence called a Nazarene;) and was subject to them, Luke, 2. 51.

2. But this treaty of marriage is expressly said to be of the Lord, v. 4. Not only that God afterwards over-ruled it to serve his design against the Philistines, but that he put it into Samson's heart to make his choice, that he might have occasion against the Philistines. It was not a thing evil in itself for him to marry a Philistine. It was forbidden, because of the danger of receiving hurt by idolaters; where there was not only no danger of that kind, but an opportunity hoped for of doing that hurt to them which would be good service to Israel, the law might well be dispensed with. It was said, (ch. 13. 25.) that the Spirit of the Lord began to move him at times, and, we have reason to think, he himself perceived that Spirit to move him at this time, when he made this choice; and that, otherwise, he would have yielded to his parents' dissuasives, nor would they have consented at last, if he had not satisfied them it was of the Lord. This would bring him into acquaintance and converse with the Philistines, by which he might have such opportunities of galling them, as otherwise he could not have. It should seem, the way in which the Philistines oppressed Israel, was, not by great armies, but by the clandestine incursions of their giants, and small parties of their plunderers; in the same way, therefore, Samson must deal with them; let him but by this marriage get among them, and he would be a thorn in their sides. Jesus Christ, being to deliver us from the present evil world, and to cast out the prince of it, did himself visit it, though full of pollution and enmity, and, by assuming a body, did in some sense join in affinity with it, that he might destroy our spiritual enemies, and his own arm might work the salvation.

II. Samson, by a special providence, is animated and encouraged to attack the Philistines. That being the service for which he was designed, God, when he called him to it, prepared him for it by two occurrences.

1. By enabling him, in one journey to Timnath, to kill a lion, v. 5, 6. Many decline doing the service they might do, because they know not their own strength. God let Samson know what he could do in the strength of the Spirit of the Lord, that he might never be afraid to look the greatest difficulties in the face. David, that was to complete the destruction of the Philistines, must try his hand first upon a lion and a bear, that from thence he might infer, as we might suppose Samson did, that the uncircumcised Philistines should be as one of them, 1 Sam. 17. 36. (1.) Samson's encounter with the lion was hazardous. It was a young lion, one of the fiercest sort, that set upon him, roaring for his prey, and setting his eye particularly upon him; he roared in meeting him, so the word is. He was all alone, in the vineyards, whither he had rambled from his father and mother, (who kept the high road,) probably, to eat grapes. Children consider not how they expose themselves to the roaring lion that seeks to devour, when, out of a foolish fondness for liberty, they wander from under the eye and wing of their prudent pious parents. Nor do young people consider what lions lurk in the vineyards, the vineyards of red wines, as dangerous as snakes under the green grass. Had Samson met with this lion in the way, he might have had more reason to expect help both from God and man, than here in the solitary vineyards out of his road. But there was a special providence in it, and the more hazardous the encounter was, (2.) The victory was so much the more illustrious. It was obtained without any difficulty; he strangled the lion, and tore his throat as easily as he would have strangled a kid, yet without any instrument, not only no sword or bow, but not so much as a staff or knife; he had nothing in his hand. Christ engaged the roaring lion, and conquered him in the beginning of his public work, (Matth. 4. 1, &c.) and afterward spoiled principalities and powers, triumphing over them in himself, as some read it, not by any instrument. He was exalted in his own strength. That which added much to the glory of Samson's triumph over the lion, was, that, when he had done this great exploit, he did not boast of it, did not so much as tell his father or mother that which many a one would soon have published through the whole country. Modesty and humility make up the brightest crown of great performances.

2. By providing him, the next journey, with honey in the carcase of this lion, v. 8, 9. When he came down the next time, to solemnize his nuptials, and his parents with him, he had the curiosity to turn aside into the vineyard where he had killed the lion, perhaps, that with the sight of the place he might affect himself with the mercy of that great deliverance, and might there solemnly give thanks to God for it. It is good thus to remind ourselves of God's former favours to us. There he found the carcase of the lion; the birds or beasts of prey, it is likely, had eaten the flesh, and in the skeleton a swarm of bees had knit, and made a hive of it, and had not been idle, but had there laid up a good stock of honey, which was one of the staple commodities of Canaan; such plenty was there of it, that it was said to flow with milk and honey. Samson, having a better title than any man to the hive, seizes the honey with his hands. This supposes an encounter with the bees; but he that dreaded not the lion's paws, had no reason to fear their stings. As by his victory over the lion, he was emboldened to encounter the Philistine giants, if there should be occasion, notwithstanding their strength and fierceness, so, by dislodging the bees, he was taught not to fear the multitude of the Philistines; though they compassed about him like bees, yet in the name of the Lord he should destroy them. Ps. 118. 12. Of the honey he here found, (1.) He ate himself, asking no questions, for conscience-sake; for the dead bones of an unclean beast had not that ceremonial pollution in them that the bones of a man had. John Baptist, that Nazarite of the New Testament, lived upon wild honey. (2.) He gave to his parents, and they did eat; he did not eat all himself; Hast thou found honey, eat so much as is sufficient for thee, and no more, Prov. 25. 16. He let his parents share with him. Children should be grateful to their parents with the fruits of their own industry, and so show piety at home, 1 Tim. 5. 4. Let those that, by the grace of God, have found sweetness in religion themselves, communicate their experience to their friends and relations, and invite them to come and share with them. He told not his parents whence he had it, lest they should have scrupled eating it. Bishop Hall observes here, that those are less wise and more scrupulous than Samson, that decline the use of God's gifts, because they find them in ill vessels. Honey is honey still, though in a dead lion. Our Lord Jesus having conquered Satan, that roaring lion, believers find honey in the carcase, abundant strength and satisfaction, enough for themselves, and for all their friends, from that victory.

10. So his father went down unto the woman: and Samson made there a feast; for so used the young men to do. 11. And it came to pass, when they saw him, that they brought thirty companions to be with him. 12. And Samson said unto them, I will now put forth a riddle unto you: if ye can certainly declare it me within the seven days of the feast, and find it out, then I will give you thirty sheets and thirty change of garments: 13. But if ye cannot declare it me, then shall ye give me thirty sheets and thirty change of garments. And they said unto him, Put forth thy riddle, that we may hear it. 14. And he said unto them, Out of the eater came forth meat, and out of the strong came forth sweetness. And they could not in three days expound the riddle. 15. And it came to pass on the seventh day, that they said unto Samson's wife, Entice thy husband, that he may declare unto us the riddle, lest we burn thee and thy father's house with fire: have ye called us to take that we have? Is it not so? 16. And Samson's wife wept before him, and said, Thou dost but hate me, and lovest me not: thou hast put forth a riddle unto the children of my people, and hast not told it me. And he said unto her, Behold, I have not told it my father nor my mother, and shall I tell it thee? 17. And she wept before him the seven days, while their feast lasted: and it came to pass on the seventh day, that he told her, because she lay sore upon him: and she told the riddle to the children of her people. 18. And the men of the city said unto him on the seventh day before the sun went down, What is sweeter than honey? and what is stronger than a lion? And he said unto them, If ye had not ploughed with my heifer, ye had not found out my riddle. 19. And the Spirit of the Lord came upon him, and he went down to Ashkelon, and slew thirty men of them, and took their spoil, and gave change of garments unto them which expounded the riddle. And his anger was kindled, and he went up to his father's house. 20. But Samson's wife was given to his companion, whom he had used as his friend.

We have here an account of Samson's wedding feast, and the occasion it gave him to fall foul of the Philistines.

I. Samson conformed to the custom of the country in making a festival on his nuptial solemnities, which continued seven days, v. 10. Though he was a Nazarite, he did not affect, in a thing of this nature, to be singular, but did as the young men used to do upon such occasions. It is no part of religion to go contrary to the innocent usages of the places where we live: nay, it is a reproach to religion, when those who profess it give just occasion to others to call them covetous, sneaking, and morose. A good man should strive to make himself, in the best sense, a good companion.

II. His wife's relations paid him the accustomed respect of the place on that occasion, and brought him thirty young men to keep him company during the solemnity, and to attend him as his grooms-men. When they saw him, (v. 11.) what a comely man he was, and what an ingenious graceful look he had, they brought him these to do him honour, and to improve by his conversation, while he stayed among them. Or, rather, when they saw him, what a strong stout man he was, they brought these, seemingly, to be his companions, but really to be a guard upon him, or spies to observe him. Jealous enough they were of him, but would have been more so, had they known of his victory over the lion, which therefore he had industriously concealed. The favours of Philistines have often some mischief or other designed in them.

III. Samson, to entertain the company, propounds a riddle to them, and lays a wager with them, that they cannot find it out in seven days, v. 12. 14. The usage, it seems, was very ancient upon such occasions, when friends were together, to be innocently merry, not to spend all the time in dull eating and drinking, as Bishop Patrick expresses it, or in the other gratifications of sense, as music, dancing, or shows, but to propose questions by which their learning and ingenuity might be tried and improved. This becomes men, wise men, that value themselves by their reason; but very unlike to it are the infamous and worse than brutish entertainments of this degenerate age, which send nothing round but the glass and the health, till reason is drowned, and wisdom sunk. Now, 1. Samson's riddle was his own invention, for it was his own achievement that gave occasion for it; Out of the eater came forth meat, and out of the strong came forth sweetness. Read my riddle, what is this? Beasts of prey do not yield meat for man, yet food came from the devourer; and those creatures that are strong when they are alive, commonly smell strong, and are every way offensive, when they are dead, as horses, and yet out of the strong, or out of the bitter, so the Syriac and Arabic read it, came sweetness. If they had but so much sense as to consider what eater is most strong, and what meat is most sweet, they would have found out the riddle; and neither lions nor honey were such strangers to their country, that the thoughts of them needed to be out of the way: the solving of the riddle, would have given him occasion to tell them the entertaining story on which it was founded. This riddle is applicable to many of the methods of divine providence and grace. When God, by an over-ruling providence, brings good out of evil to his church and people; when that which threatened their ruin turns to their advantage; when their enemies are made serviceable to them, and the wrath of men turns to God's praise, then comes meat out of the eater, and sweetness out of the strong. See Phil. 1. 12. 2. His wager was more considerable to him than to them, because he was one against thirty partvers. It was not a wager laid upon God's providence, or upon the chance of a die or a card, but upon their ingenuity, and amounted to no more than an honorary recompence of wit, and a disgrace upon stupidity.

IV. His companions, when they could not expound the riddle themselves, obliged his wife to get from him the exposition of it, v. 15. Whether they were really of a dull capacity, or whether under a particular infatuation at this time, it was strange that none of the thirty could in all this time stumble upon so plain a thing as that, What is sweeter than honey, and what stronger than a lion? It should seem, that in wit, as well as manners, they were barbarous; barbarous indeed, to threaten the bride, that, if she would not use means with the bridegroom to let them into the meaning of it, they would burn her and her father's house with fire. Could any thing be more brutish? It was base enough to turn a jest into earnest, and they were unworthy of conversation, that would grow so outrageous rather than confess their ignorance and lose so small a wager; nor would it save their credit at all, to tell the riddle when they were told it. It was yet more villanous to engage Samson's wife to be a traitor to her own husband, and to pretend a greater interest in her than he had. Now that she was married, she must forget her own people. Yet most inhuman of all was it, to threaten, if she could not prevail, to burn her and all her relations with fire, and all, for fear of losing each of them the value of a shirt and a coat: Have ye called us to take what we have? Those must never lay wagers that cannot lose more tamely and easily than thus.

V. His wife, by unreasonable importunity, obtains from him a key to his riddle. It was on the seventh day, that is, the seventh day of the week, (as Dr. Lightfoot conjectures,) but the fourth day of the feast, that they solicited her to entice her husband; (v. 15.) and she did it, 1. With great art and management, (v. 16.) resolving not to believe he loved her, unless he would gratify her in this thing. She knew he could not bear to have his love questioned, and therefore, if any thing would work upon him, that would, "Thou dost but hate me, and lovest me not, if thou deniest me;" whereas he had much more reason to say, "Thou dost but hate me, and lovest me not, if thou insistest on it." And, that she might not make this the test of his affection, he assures her he had not told his own parents, notwithstanding the confidence he reposed in them. If this prevail not, she will try the powerful eloquence of tears, she wept before him the rest of the days of the feast, choosing rather to mar the mirth, as the bride's tears must needs do, than not gain her point, and oblige her countrymen, v. 17. 2. With great success. At last, being quite wearied with her importunity, he told her what was the meaning of his riddle, and, though we may suppose she promised secrecy, and that, if he would but let her know, she would tell nobody, she immediately told it to the children of her people; nor could he expect better from a Philistine, especially when the interests of her country were ever so little concerned. See Mic. 7. 5, 6. The riddle is at length unriddled; (v. 18.) What is sweeter than honey, or a better meat? Prov. 24. 13. What is stronger than a lion, or a greater devourer? Samson generously owns they had won the wager, though he had good reason to dispute it, because they had not declared the riddle, as the bargain was, (v. 12.) but it had been declared to them. But he only thought fit to tell them of it, If ye had not ploughed with my heifer, made use of your interest with my wife, you had not found out my riddle. Satan, in his temptations, would not do us the mischief he does, if he did not plough with the heifer of our own corrupt nature.

VI. Samson pays his wager to these Philistines with the spoils of others of their countrymen, v. 19. He took this occasion to quarrel with the Philistines, went down to Ashkelon, one of their cities, where, probably, he knew there was some great festival observed at this time, to which many flocked, out of whom he picked out thirty, slew them, and took their clothes, and gave them to those that expounded the riddle: so that, in balancing the account, it appeared that the Philistines were the losers, for one of the lives they lost was worth all the suits of clothes they won; since the body is more than raiment. The Spirit of the Lord came upon him, both to authorize and to enable him to do this.

Lastly, This proves a good occasion of weaning Samson from his new relations. He found how his companions had abused him, and how his wife had betrayed him, and therefore his anger was kindled, v. 19. Better be angry with Philistines, than in love with them, because, when we join ourselves to them, we are most in danger of being insuared by them. And, meeting with this ill usage among them, he went up to his father's house. It were well for us, if the unkindness we meet with from the world, and our disappointments in it, had but this good effect upon us, to oblige us by faith and prayer to return to our heavenly Father's house, and rest there. The inconveniencies that occur in our way should make us love home, and long to be there. No sooner was he gone, than his wife was disposed of to another, v. 20. Instead of begging his pardon for the wrong she had done him, when he justly signified his resentment of it, only by withdrawing in displeasure for a time, she immediately marries him that was the chief of the guests, the friend of the bridegroom, whom perhaps she loved too well, and was too willing to oblige, when she got her husband to tell her the riddle. See how little confidence is to be put in man, when those may prove our enemies whom we have used as our means.

CHAP. XV.

Samson, when he had courted an alliance with the Philistines, did but seek an occasion against them, ch. 11. 4. Now here we have a further account of the occasions he took to weaken them, and to avenge, not his own, but Israel's quarrels, upon them. Every thing here is surprising: if any thing be thought incredible, because impossible, it must be remembered that with God nothing is impossible, and it was by the Spirit of the Lord coming upon him, that he was both directed to, and strengthened for, those unusual ways of making war. I. From the perfidiousness of his wife and her father, he took occasion to burn their corn, v. 1. 5. II. From the Philistines' barbarous cruelty to his wife and her father, he took occasion to smite them with a great slaughter, v. 6. 8. III. From the treachery of his countrymen, who delivered him bound to the Philistines, he took occasion to kill one thousand of them with the jaw-bone of an ass, v. 9. 17. IV. From the distress he was then in for want of water, God took occasion to shew him favour in a seasonable supply, v. 18. 20.

1. BUT it came to pass within a while after, in the time of wheat-harvest, that Samson visited his wife with a kid; and he said, I will go in to my wife into the chamber. But her father would not suffer him to go in. 2. And her father said, I verily thought that thou hadst utterly hated her; therefore I gave her to thy companion: is not her younger sister fairer than she? take her, I pray thee, instead of her. 3. And Samson said concerning them, Now shall I be more blameless than the Philistines, though I do them a displeasure. 4. And Samson went and caught three hundred foxes, and took fire-brands, and turned tail to tail, and put a fire-brand in the midst between two tails. 5. And when he had set the brands on fire, he let them go in to the standing corn of the Philistines, and burnt up both the shocks, and also the standing corn, with the vineyards and olives. 6. Then the Philistines said, Who hath done this? And they answered, Samson, the son-in-law of the Timnite, because he had taken his wife, and given her to his companion. And the Philistines came up and burnt her and her father with fire. 7. And Samson said unto them, Though ye have done this, yet will I be avenged of you, and after that I will cease. 8. And he smote them hip and thigh with a great slaughter; and he went down and dwelt in the top of the rock Etam.

Here is,

I. Samson's return to his wife, whom he had left in displeasure; not hearing, perhaps, that she was given to another; when time had a little cooled his resentments, he came back to her, visited her with a kid, v. 1. The value of the present was inconsiderable, but it was intended as a token of reconciliation, and perhaps was then so used, when those that had been at variance were brought together again; he sent this, that he might sup with her in her apartments, and she with him, on his provision, and so they might be friends again. It was generously done of Samson, though he was the party offended, and the superior relation, to whom therefore she was bound in duty to sue for peace, and to make the first motion of reconciliation. When differences happen between near relations, let those be ever reckoned among the wisest and the best that are most forward to forgive and forget injuries, and most willing to stoop and yield for peace-sake.

II. The repulse he met with; her father forbade him to come near her, for, truly, he had married her to another, v. 2. He endeavours, 1. To justify himself in this wrong. I verily thought that thou hadst utterly hated her. A very ill opinion he had of Samson, measuring that Nazarite by the common temper of the Philistines; could he think worse of him, than to suspect, that, because he was justly angry with his wife, he utterly hated her, and, because he had seen cause to return to his father's house for a while, therefore he had abandoned her for ever? Yet this is all he had to say, in excuse of this injury. Thus he made the worst of jealousies to patronise the worst of robberies. But it will never bear us out in doing ill, to say, "We thought others designed ill." 2. He endeavours to pacify Samson, by offering him his younger daughter, whom, because the handsomer, he thought Samson might accept, in full recompence for the wrong. See what confusions those did admit, and bring their families to, that were not governed by the fear and law of God; marrying a daughter this week to one, and next week to another; giving a man one daughter first, and then another. Samson scorned his proposal, he knew better things than to take a wife to her sister, Lev. 18. 18.

III. The revenge Samson took upon the Philistines for this abuse. Had he designed herein only to plead his own cause, he would have challenged his rival, and would have chastised him and his father-in-law only. But he looks upon himself as a public person, and the affront as done to the whole nation of Israel; for, probably, they put this slight upon him, because he was of that nation, and pleased themselves with it, that they had put such an abuse upon an Israelite; and therefore he resolves to do the Philistines a displeasure, and does not doubt but this treatment which he had met with among them, would justify him in it; (v. 3.) Now shall I be more blameless than the Philistines. He had done what became him, in offering to be reconciled to his wife, but she having rendered it impracticable, now they could not blame him if he shewed his just resentments. Note, When differences arise, we ought to do our duty in order to the ending of them, and then, whatever the ill consequences of them may be, we shall be blameless. Now the way Samson took to be revenged on them, was, by setting their corn-fields on fire, which would be a great weakening and impoverishing to the country, v. 4, 5. 1. The method he took to do it was very strange; he sent one hundred and fifty couple of foxes, tied tail to tail, into the corn-fields; each couple had a stick of fire between their tails, with which being terrified, they ran into the corn for shelter, and so set fire to it; thus the fire would break out in many places at the same time, and therefore could not be conquered, especially if it was done, as it is probable it was, in the night. He might have employed men to do it, but perhaps he could not find Israelites enough that had courage to do it, and himself could do it but in one place at a time, which would not effect his purpose. We never find Samson, in any of his exploits, make use of any person whatsoever, either servant or soldier, therefore, in this project, he chose to make use of foxes as his incendiaries. They had injured Samson by their subtlety and malice, and now Samson returns the injury by subtle foxes and mischievous fire-brands. By the meanness and weakness of the animals he employed, he designed to put contempt upon the enemies he fought against. This stratagem is often alluded to, to shew how the church's adversaries, that are of different interests and designs among themselves, that look and draw contrary ways in other things, yet have often united in a fire-brand, some cursed project or other, to waste the church of God, and particularly to kindle the fire of division in it. 2. The mischief he hereby did to the Philistines was very great. It was in the time of wheat harvest, (v. 4.) so that the straw being dry, it soon burnt both the shocks of corn that were cut, and the standing corn, and the vineyards and olives. This was a waste of the good creatures, but, where other acts of hostility are lawful, destroying the forage is justly reckoned to be so. If he might take away their lives, he might take away their livelihood; and God was righteous in it; the corn, and the wine, and the oil, which they had prepared for Dagon to be a meat-offering to him, were thus, in the season thereof, made a burnt-offering to God's justice.

IV. The Philistines' outrage against Samson's treacherous wife and her father; understanding that they had provoked Samson to do this mischief to the country, the rabble set upon them, and burnt them with fire, perhaps in their own houses, v. 6. Samson himself they durst not attack, and therefore, with more justice than perhaps they themselves designed in it, they wreak their vengeance upon those who, they could not but own, had given him cause to be angry. Instead of taking vengeance upon Samson, they took vengeance for him, when he, out of respect to the relation he had stood in to them, was not willing to do it for himself. See His hand in it to whom vengeance belongs; those that deal treacherously shall be spoiled and dealt treacherously with, and the Lord is known by these judgments which he executes; especially when, as here, he makes use of his people's enemies as instruments for revenging his people's quarrels one upon another. When a barbarous Philistine sets fire to a treacherous one, the righteous may rejoice to see the vengeance, Ps. 58. 10, 11. Thus shall the wrath of man praise thee, Ps. 76. 10. The Philistines had threatened Samson's wife, that, if she would not get the riddle out of him, they would burn her and her father's house with fire, ch. 14. 15. She, to save herself, and oblige her countrymen, betrayed her husband. And what came of it? The very thing that she feared, and sought by sin to avoid, came upon her; she and her father's house were burnt with fire, and her countrymen, whom she sought to oblige by the wrong she did to her husband, brought it upon her. The mischief we seek to escape by any unlawful practices, we often pull upon our own heads. He that will thus save his life, shall lose it.

V. The occasion Samson took from hence to do them yet a greater mischief, which touched their bone and their flesh; (v. 7, 8.) "Though ye have done this to them, and thereby shewed what ye would do to me if ye could, yet that shall not deter me from being further vexatious to you." Or, "Though ye think, by doing this, ye have made me satisfaction for the affront I received among you, yet I have Israel's cause to plead as a public person; and, for the wrongs done to them, I will be avenged on you; and if ye will then forbear your insults, I will cease, aiming at no more than the deliverance of Israel." So he smote them hip and thigh, with a great stroke; so the word is. We suppose the wounds he gave them to have been mortal, as wounds in the hip or thigh often prove, and therefore translate it with a great slaughter. Some think he only lamed them, disabled them for service, as horses were houghed or ham-strung. It seems to be a phrase used to express a desperate attack; he killed them pell-mell, or routed them, horse and foot. He smote them with his hip upon thigh, that is, with the strength he had, not in his arms and hands, but in his hips and thighs, for he kicked and spurned at them, and so mortified them, trod them in his anger, and trampled them in his fury, Isa. 63. 3. And, when he had done, he retired to a natural fortress in the top of the rock Etam, where he waited to see whether the Philistines would be tamed by the correction he had given them.

9. Then the Philistines went up, and pitched in Judah, and spread themselves in Lehi. 10. And the men of Judah said, Why are ye come up against us? And they answered, To bind Samson: are we come up, to do to him as he hath done to us. 11. Then three thousand men of Judah went to the top of the rock Etam, and said to Samson, Knowest thou not that the Philistines are rulers over us? What is this that thou hast done unto us? And he said unto them, As they did unto me, so have I done unto them. 12. And they said unto him, We are come down to bind thee, that we may deliver thee into the hand of the Philistines. And Samson said unto them, Swear unto me, that ye will not fall upon me yourselves. 13. And they spake unto him, saying, No; but we will bind thee fast, and deliver thee into their hand: but surely we will not kill thee. And they bound him with two new cords, and brought him up from the rock. 14. And when he came unto Lehi, the Philistines shouted against him: and the Spirit of the LORD came mightily upon him, and the cords that were upon his arms became as flax that was burnt with fire, and his hands loosed from off his hands. 15. And he found a new jaw-bone of an ass, and put forth his hand, and took it, and slew a thousand men therewith. 16. And Samson said, With the jaw-bone of an ass, heaps upon heaps, with the jaw of an ass have I slain a thousand men. 17. And it came to pass, when he had made an end of speaking, that he cast away the jaw-bone out of his hand, and called that place Ramath-lehi.

Here is,

I. Samson violently pursued by the Philistines. They went up in a body, a more formidable force than they had together when Samson smote them hip and thigh, and they pitched in Judah, and spread themselves up and down the country to find out Samson, who, they heard, was come this way, v. 9. When the men of Judah, who had tamely submitted to their yoke, pleaded that they had paid their tribute, and that none of their tribe had given them any offence, they freely own they designed nothing in this invasion but to seize Samson; they would fight neither against small nor great, but only that Judge of Israel, (v. 10.) to do to him as he has done to us; that is, to smite hip and thigh, as he did our's; an eye for an eye. Here was an army come against one man, for indeed he was himself an army. Thus a whole band of men was sent to seize our Lord Jesus, that blessed Samson, though a tenth part would have served, now that his hour was come, and ten times as many would have done nothing, if he had not yielded.

II. Samson basely betrayed and delivered up by the men of Judah, v. 11. Of Judah were they? Degenerate branches of that valiant tribe! Utterly unworthy to carry in their standard the lion of the tribe of Judah. Perhaps they were disaffected to Samson because he was not of their tribe; out of a foolish fondness for their forfeited precedency, they would rather be oppressed by Philistines, than rescued by a Danite. Often has the church's deliverance been obstructed by such jealousies, and pretended points of honour. Rather it was, because they stood in awe of the Philistines, and were willing, at any rate, to get them out of their country. If their spirits had not been perfectly cowed and broken by their sins and troubles, and they had not been given up to a spirit of slumber, they would have taken this fair opportunity to shake off the Philistines' yoke. If they had had the least spark of ingenuousness and courage remaining in them, having so brave a man as Samson was to head them, they would now have made one bold struggle for the recovery of their liberty; but no marvel if they that had debased themselves to hell in the worship of their dunhill-gods, (Isa. 57. 9.) thus debased themselves to the dust, in submission to their insulting oppressors. Sin dispirits men, nay, it infatuates them, and hides from their eyes the things that belong to their peace. Probably, Samson went into the border of that country to offer his service, supposing his brethren would have understood how that God by his hand would deliver them, as Moses did, Acts, 7. 25. But they thrust him from them, and very disingenuously, 1. Blamed him for what he had done against the Philistines, as if he had done them a great injury. Such ungrateful returns have those often received that have done the best service imaginable to their country. Thus our Lord Jesus did many good works, and for those they were ready to stone him. 2. They begged of him that he would suffer them to bind him, and deliver him up to the Philistines. Cowardly, unthankful wretches! Fond of their fetters, and in love with servitude! Thus the Jews delivered up our Saviour, under pretence of a fear lest the Romans should come, and take away their place and nation. With what a sordid servile spirit do they argue; Knowest thou not that the Philistines rule over us? And whose fault was that? They knew they had no right to rule over them, nor had they been sold into their hands, if they had not first sold themselves to work wickedness.

III. Samson tamely yielded to be bound by his countrymen, and delivered into the hands of his enraged enemies, v. 12, 13. How easily could he have beaten them off, and kept the top of his rock against these three thousand men, and none of them all could, or durst, have laid hands on him; but he patiently submitted, 1. That he might give an example of great meekness, mixed with great strength and courage; as one that had rule over his own spirit, he knew how to yield, as well as how to conquer. 2. That, by being delivered up to the Philistines, he might have an opportunity of making a slaughter among them. 3. That he might be a type of Christ, who, when he had shewed what he could do in striking those down that came to seize him, yielded to be bound and led as a lamb to the slaughter. Samson justified himself in what he had done against the Philistines; As they did to me, so did I to them; it was a piece of necessary justice, and they ought not to retaliate it upon me, for they began." He covenants with the men of Judah, that, if he put himself into their hands, they should not fall upon him themselves, because then he should be tempted to fall upon them, which he was very loath to do. This they promised him, (v. 13.) and then he surrendered. The men of Judah, being his betrayers, were in effect his murderers; they would not kill him themselves, but they did that which was worse, they delivered him into the hands of the uncircumcised Philistines, who, they knew, would do worse than kill him, would abuse and torment him to death. Perhaps they thought, as some think Judas did, when he betrayed Christ, that he would, by his strength, deliver himself out of their hands; but if he did, that was no thanks to them, and if they thought he would, they might of themselves have thought this again, that he could and would have delivered them too, if they would have adhered to him, and made him their head. Justly is their misery prolonged, who, to oblige their worst enemies, thus abuse their best friend. Never were men so infatuated, except those who thus treated our blessed Saviour.

IV. Samson making his part good against the Philistines, even then when he was delivered into their hands, fast pinioned with two new cords. The Philistines, when they had him among them, shouted against him, v. 14. So, triumphing in their success, and insulting over him; if God had not tied their hands faster than the men of Judah had tied his, they would have shot at him, (as their archers did at Saul,) to despatch him immediately, rather than have shouted at him, and given him time to help himself. But their security and joy were a presage of their ruin. When they shouted against him as a man run down, confident that all was their own, then the Spirit of the Lord came upon him, came mightily upon him, inspired him with more than ordinary strength and resolution. Thus fired, 1. He presently got clear of his bonds; the two new cords, upon the first struggle he gave, broke, and were melted (as the original word is) from off his hands, no doubt, to the great amazement and terror of those that shouted against him, whose shouts were hereby turned into shrieks. When the Spirit of the Lord came upon him, his cords were loosed; where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty, and those are free indeed, who are thus freed. This typified the resurrection of Christ by the power of the Spirit of holiness; in it he loosed the bands of death; and its cords, the grave-clothes, fell from his hands without being loosed, as Lazarus's were, because it was impossible that the mighty Saviour should be holden of them; and thus he triumphed over the powers of darkness that shouted against him, as if they had him sure. 2. He made a great destruction among the Philistines, who all gathered about him to make sport with him, v. 15. See how poorly he was armed, he had no better weapon than the jaw-bone of an ass, and yet what execution he did with it; he never laid it out of his hand, till he had with it laid a thousand Philistines dead upon the spot; and thus that promise was more than accomplished, One of you shall chase a thousand, Josh. 23. 10. A jaw-bone was an inconvenient thing to grasp, and, one would think, might easily be wrested out of his hand, and a few such blows as he gave with it might have crushed and broken it, and yet it held good to the last. Had it been the jaw-bone of a lion, especially that which he himself had slain, it might have helped to heighten his fancy, and to make him think himself the more formidable; but to take the bone of that despicable animal, was to do wonders by the foolish things of the world, that the excellency of the power might be of God, and not of man. One of David's worthies slew three hundred Philistines at once, but it was with a spear, 1 Chron. 11. 11. Another slew of them till his hand was weary, and stuck to his sword, 2 Sam. 23. 10. But they all came short of Samson. What could be thought too hard, too much, for him to do, on whom the Spirit of the Lord came mightily? Through God we shall do valiantly. It was strange the men of Judah did not now come in to his aid; cowards can strike a falling enemy: but he was to be a type of him that trod the wine-press alone.

V. Samson celebrating his own victory, since the men of Judah would not do even that for him: he composed a short song, which he sang to himself, for the daughters of Israel did not meet him, as afterwards they did Saul, to sing, with more reason, Samson hath slain his thousands. The burthen of this song was, With the jaw-bone of an ass, heaps upon heaps, have I slain a thousand men, v. 16. The same word in Hebrew (Chamor) signifies both an ass and a heap, which make this an elegant paronomasia, and represents the Philistines falling as tamely as asses. He also gave a name to the place, to perpetuate the Philistines' disgrace, (v. 17.) Ramath-Lehi, the lifting up of the jaw-bone. Yet he did not vain-gloriously carry the bone about with him as a shew, but threw it away when he had done with it. So little were relics valued then.

18. And he was sore athirst, and called on the LORD, and said, Thou hast given this great deliverance into the hand of thy servant: and now shall I die for thirst, and fall into the hand of the uncircumcised? 19. But God clave an hollow place that was in the jaw, and there came water thereout; and when he had drunk, his spirit came again, and he revived: wherefore he called the name thereof En-hakkore, which is in Lehi unto this day. 20. And he judged Israel in the days of the Philistines twenty years.

Here is,

I. The distress Samson was in, after this great performance, v. 18. He was sore athirst. It was a natural effect of the great heat he had been in, and the great pains he had taken: his zeal consumed him, ate him up, and made him forget himself, till, when he had time to pause a little, he found himself reduced to the last extremity for want of water, and ready to faint. Perhaps there was a special hand of God in it, as there was in the whole transaction; and God would hereby keep him from being proud of his great strength and great achievements, and let him know that he was but a man, and liable to the calamities that are common to men. And Josephus says, It was designed to chastise him for not making mention of God and his hand, in his memorial of the victory he had obtained, but taking all the praise to himself; I have slain a thousand men; now that he is ready to die for thirst, he is under a sensible conviction that his own arm could not have saved him, without God's right-hand and arm. Samson had drunk largely of the blood of the Philistines, but blood will never quench any man's thirst. Providence so ordered it, that there was no water near him, and he was so fatigued that he could not go far to seek it: the men of Judah, one would think, should have met him, now that he was come off a conqueror, with bread and wine, as Melchizedek did Abram, to atone for the injury they had done him; but so little notice did they take of their deliverer, that he was ready to perish for want of a draught of water. Thus are the greatest slights often put upon those that do the greatest services. Christ, on the cross, said, I thirst.

II. His prayer to God in this distress. Those that forget to attend God with their praises, may perhaps be compelled to attend him with their prayers. Afflictions are often sent to bring unthankful people to God. Two things he pleads with God in this prayer; 1. His having experienced the power and goodness of God in his late success; Thou hast given this great deliverance into the hand of thy servant. He owns himself God's servant in what he had been doing, "Lord, wilt thou not own a poor servant of thine, that has spent himself in thy service? I am thine, save me." He calls this victory a deliverance, a great deliverance; for if God had not helped him, he had not only not conquered the Philistines, but had been swallowed up by them. He owns it to come from God, and now corrects his former error, in assuming it too much to himself; and this he pleads in his present strait. Note, Past experiences of God's power and goodness are excellent pleas in prayer for further mercy. "Lord, thou hast delivered often, wilt thou not deliver still? 2 Cor. 1. 10. Thou hast begun, wilt thou not finish? Thou hast done the greater, wilt thou not do the lesser?" Ps. 56. 13. 2. His being now exposed to his enemies, Lest I fall into the hands of the uncircumcised, and then they will triumph, will tell it in Gath, and in the streets of Askelon; and will it not redound to God's dishonour, if his champion become so easy a prey to the uncircumcised? The best pleas are those taken from God's glory.

III. The seasonable relief God sent him. God heard his prayer, and sent him water, either out of the bone, or out of the earth through the bone, v. 19. That bone which he had made an instrument of God's service, God to recompense him, made an instrument of his supply. But I rather incline to our marginal reading, God clave a hollow place that was in Lehi: the place of this action was, from the jaw-bone, called Lehi; even before the action we find it so called, v. 9, 14. And there, in that field, or hill, or plain, or whatever it was, that was so called, God caused a fountain suddenly and seasonably to open just by him, and water to spring up out of it in abundance, which continued a well ever after. Of this fair water he drank, and his spirits revived. We should be more thankful for the mercy of water, did we consider how ill we can spare it. And this instance of Samson's relief should encourage us to trust in God, and seek to him, for, when he pleases, he can open rivers in high places. See Isa. 41. 17, 18.

IV. The memorial of this, in the name Samson, gave this upstart fountain, En-hakkore, the well of him that cried, thereby keeping in remembrance, both his own distress, which occasioned him to cry, and God's favour to him, in answer to his cry. Many a spring of comfort God opens to his people, which may fitly be called by his name, it is the well of him that cried. Samson had given a name to that place, which denoted him great and triumphant, Ramath-lehi, the lifting up of the jaw-bone; but here he gives it another name, which denotes him wanting and dependent.

Lastly, The continuance of Samson's government after these achievements, v. 20. At length Israel submitted to him whom they had betrayed. Now it was past dispute that God was with him, so that henceforward they all owned him, and were directed by him as their judge; the stone which the builders refused became the head-stone. It intimates the low condition of Israel, that the government was dated by the days of the Philistines; yet it was a mercy to Israel, that though they were oppressed by a foreign enemy, yet they had a judge that preserved order, and kept them from ruining one another. Twenty years his government continued, according to the usage of the judges' administration; but of the particulars we have no account, save of the beginning of his government in this chapter, and the end of it in the next.

CHAP. XVI.

Samson's name (we have observed before) signifies a little sun; (sol parvus;) we have seen this sun rising very very bright, and his morning ray strong and clear; and, nothing appearing to the contrary, we take it for granted, that the middle of the day was proportionably illustrious, while he judged Israel twenty years; but the melancholy story of this chapter gives us such an account of his evening, as did not commence his day. This little sun set under a cloud, and yet, just in the setting, darted forth one such strong and glorious beam, as made him even then a type of Christ, conquering by death. Here is, 1. Samson greatly endangered by his familiarity with one harlot, and hardly escaping, v. 1. 3. 11. Samson quite ruined by his familiarity with another harlot, Delilah. Observe, 1. How he was betrayed by her to his sworn enemies, the Philistines, who, (1.) By her means, got it out of him at last where his great strength lay, 5. 17. (2.) Then robbed him of his strength, by taking from his head the crown of his separation, v. 18. 20. (3.) Then seized him, blinded him, imprisoned him, abused him, and, at a solemn festival, made a show of him, v. 21. 25. 2. How he avenged himself of them, by pulling down the theatre upon their heads, and so dying with them, v. 26. 31.

1. THEN went Samson to Gaza, and saw there an harlot, and went in unto her. 2. And it was told the Gazites, saying, Samson is come hither. And they compassed him in, and laid wait for him all night in the gate of the city, and were quiet all the night, saying, In the morning, when it is day, we shall kill him. 3. And Samson lay till midnight, and arose at midnight, and took the doors of the gate of the city, and the two posts, and went away with them, bar and all, and put them upon his shoulders, and carried them up to the top of an hill that is before Hebron.

Here is,

1. Samson's sin, v. 1. His taking a Philistine to wife, in the beginning of his time, was, in some degree, excusable; but to join himself to a harlot, that he accidentally saw among them, was such a profanation of his honour, as an Israelite, as a Nazarite, that we cannot but blush to read it. Tell it not in Gath. This vile impurity makes the graceful visage of this Nazarite blacker than a coal, Lam. 4. 7, 8. We find not that Samson had any business at Gaza; if he went thither in quest of a harlot, it would make one willing to hope, that, as bad as things were otherwise, there were no prostitutes among the daughters of Israel. Some think he went thither to observe what posture the Philistines were in, that he might get some advantages against them; if so, he forgot his business, neglected that, and so fell into this snare. His sin began in his eye, with which he should have made a covenant; he saw there one in the attire of a harlot, and the lust which conceived, brought forth, sin; he went in unto her.

2. Samson's danger. Notice was sent to the magistrates of Gaza, perhaps by the treacherous harlot herself, that Samson was in the town, v. 2. Probably he came in a disguise, or, in the dusk of the evening, went into an inn, or public-house, which happened to be kept by this harlot. The gates of the city were hercupon shut, guards set, all kept quiet, that Samson might suspect no danger; now they thought they had him in a prison, and doubted not but to be the death of him the next morning. Oh that all those who indulge their sensual appetites in drunkenness, uncleanness, or any fleshly lusts, would see themselves thus surrounded, way-laid, and marked for ruin, by their spiritual enemies! The faster they sleep, and the more secure they are, the greater is their danger.

3. Samson's escape, v. 3. He rose at midnight, perhaps roused by a dream, in slumberings upon the bed, (Job, 33. 15.) by his guardian angel, or rather by the checks of his own conscience; he rose with a penitent abhorrence (we hope) of the sin he was now committing, and of himself because of it, and with a pious resolution not to return to it; rose under an apprehension of the danger he was in, that he was as one that slept upon the top of a mast; rose with such thoughts as these; "Is this a bed fit for a Nazarite to sleep in? Shall a temple of the living God be thus polluted? Can I be safe under this guilt?" It was bad that he lay down without such checks; but it would have been worse, if he had lain still under them. He makes immediately toward the gate of the city, probably finds the guards asleep, else he had made them sleep their last; stays not to break open the gates, but plucks up the posts, takes them, gates and bar and all, all very large and strong, and a vast weight; yet he carries them on his back several miles, up to the top of a hill, in disdain of their attempt to secure him with gates and bars, designing thus to render himself more formidable to the Philistines, and more acceptable to his people; thus to give a proof of the great strength God had given him, and a type of Christ's victory over death and the grave. He not only rolled away the stone from the door of the sepulchre, and so came forth himself, but carried away the gates of the grave, bar and all, and so left it, ever after, an open prison to all that are his; it shall not, it cannot, always detain them. O death, where is thy sting? Where are thy gates? Thanks be to him that not only gained a victory for himself, but giveth us the victory!

4. And it came to pass afterward, that he loved a woman in the valley of Sorek, whose name was Delilah. 5. And the lords of the Philistines came up unto her, and said unto her, Entice him, and see wherein his great strength lieth, and by what means we may prevail against him, that we may bind him to afflict him: and we will give thee every one of us eleven hundred pieces of silver. 6. And Delilah said to Samson, Tell me, I pray thee, wherein thy great strength lieth, and wherewith thou mightest be bound to afflict thee. 7. And Samson said unto her, If they bind me with seven green withs that were never dried, then shall I be weak, and be as another man. 8. Then the lords of the Philistines brought up to her seven green withs which had not been dried, and she bound him with them. 9. Now there were men lying in wait, abiding with her in the chamber. And she said unto him, The Philistines be upon thee, Samson. And he brake the withs, as a thread of tow is broken when it toucheth the fire. So his strength was not known. 10. And Delilah said unto Samson, Behold, thou hast mocked me, and told me lies: now tell me, I pray thee, wherewith thou mightest be bound. 11. And he said unto her, If they bind me fast with new ropes that never were occupied, then shall I be weak, and be as another man. 12. Delilah therefore took new ropes, and bound him therewith, and said unto him, The Philistines be upon thee, Samson. And there were liers in wait abiding in the chamber. And he brake them from off his arms like a thread. 13. And Delilah said unto Samson, Hitherto thou hast mocked me, and told me lies: tell me wherewith thou mightest be bound. And he said unto her, If thou weavest the seven locks of my head with the web. 14. And she fastened it with the pin, and said unto him, The Philistines be upon thee, Samson. And he awaked out of his sleep, and went away with the pin of the beam, and with the web. 15. And she said unto him, How canst thou say, I love thee, when thine heart is not with me? thou hast mocked me these three times, and hast not told me wherein thy great strength lieth. 16. And it came to pass, when she pressed him daily with her words, and urged him, so that his soul was vexed unto death; 17. That he told her all his heart, and said unto her, There hath not come a razor upon mine head; for I have been a Nazarite unto God from my mother's womb: if I be shaven, then my strength will go from me, and I shall become weak, and be like any other man.

The burnt child dreads the fire; yet Samson, that has more than the strength of a man, in this comes short of the wisdom of a child; for though he had been more than once brought into the highest degree of mischief and danger by the love of women, and lusting after them, yet he would not take warning, but is here again taken in the same snare, and this third time pays for all. Solomon seems to refer especially to this story of Samson, when, in his caution against uncleanness, he gives this account of a whorish woman, Prov. 7.26. That she hath cast down many wounded, yea many strong men have been slain by her. And, ch. 6.26. That the adulteress will hunt for the precious life. This bad woman, that brought Samson to ruin, is here named Delilah, an infamous name, and fitly used to express the person, or thing, that, by flattery or falsehood, brings mischief and destruction on those to whom kindness is pretended. See here,

I. The affection Samson had for Delilah; he loved her, v.4. Some think she was his wife, but then he would have had her home to his own house; others, that he courted her to make her his wife; but there is too much reason to suspect that it was a sinful affection he had for her, and that he lived in uncleanness with her: whether she was an Israelite or a Philistine, is not certain. If an Israelite, which is scarcely probable, yet she had the heart of a Philistine.

II. The interest which the lords of the Philistines made with her to betray Samson, v.5. 1. That which they told her they designed, was, to humble him, or afflict him; they would promise not to do him any hurt, only they would disable him to do them any. And so much conscience it should seem they made of this promise, that even then, when he lay ever so much at their mercy, they would not kill him, no, not when the razor that cut his hair might sooner and more easily have cut his throat. 2. That which they desired, in order hereunto, was, to know where his great strength lay, and by what means he might be bound. Perhaps they imagined he had some spell or charm which he carried about with him, by the force of which he did these great things, and doubted not, but if they could get that from him, he would be manageable; and therefore, having had reason enough formerly to know which was his blind side, hoped to find out his riddle a second time; by ploughing with his heifer, they engaged Delilah to get it out of him, telling her what a kindness it would be to them, and, perhaps, assuring her it should not be improved to any real mischief, either to him or her. 3. For this they bid high, promised to give her each of them eleven hundred pieces of silver, fifty-five hundred in all. So many shekels reckoned to above one thousand pounds sterling; with this she was hired to betray one she pretended to love; see what horrid wickedness the love of money is the root of. Our blessed Saviour was thus betrayed by one whom he called friend, and with a kiss too, for filthy lucre. No marvel if those who are unchaste, as Delilah, be unjust; such as lose their honesty in one instance, will in another.

III. The arts by which he put her off from time to time, and kept his own counsel a great while. She asked him where his great strength lay, and whether it were possible for him to be bound and afflicted, (v.6.) pretending that she desired only he would satisfy her curiosity in that one thing, and that she thought it was impossible he should be bound, otherwise than by her charms. When she urged him very much, he told her, 1. That he might be bound with seven green withs, v.7. The experiment was tried, (v.8.) but it would not do; he broke the withs as easily as a thread of tow is broken when it toucheth the fire, v.9. 2. When she still continued her importunity, (v.10.) he told her that with two new ropes he might be so cramped and hampered, that he might be as easily dealt with as any other man, v.11. This experiment was tried too, but it failed; the new ropes broke from off his arm like a thread, v.12. 3. When she still pressed him to communicate the secret, and upbraided him with it as an unkindness, that he had bantered her so long, he then told her that the weaving of the seven locks of his head would make a great alteration in him, v.13. This came nearer the matter than any thing he had yet said, but it would not do; his strength appeared to be very much in his hair, when, upon the trial of this, purely by the strength of his hair, he carried away the pin of the beam, and the web.

Now, in the making of all these experiments, it is hard to say whether there appears more of Samson's weakness, or Delilah's wickedness. (1.) Could any thing be more wicked than her restless and unreasonable importunity with him, to discover a secret, which she knew would endanger his life, if ever it were lodged any where but in his own breast? What could be more base and dishonourous, more false and treacherous, than to lay his head in her lap, as one whom she loved, and at the same time to design the betraying of him to those by whom he was mortally hated? (2.) Could any thing be more weak than for him to continue a parley with one who, he so plainly saw, was aiming to do him a mischief, that he should lend an ear so long to such an impudent request, that she might know how to do him a mischief; that when he perceived liers in wait for him in the chamber, and that they were ready to apprehend him if they had been able, he did not immediately quit the chamber, with a resolution never to come into it any more; nay, that he should again lay his head in that lap, out of which he had been so often roused with that alarm, The Philistines are upon thee, Samson? One can hardly imagine a man so perfectly besotted, and void of all consideration, as Samson now was; but whoredom is one of those things that take away the heart. It is hard to say what Samson meant, in suffering her to try so often whether she could weaken and afflict him: some think he did not certainly know where his strength lay; but that, it should seem, he did; for, when he told her that which would disable him indeed it is said, He told her all his heart. It seems, he designed to banter her, and to try if he could turn it off with a jest, and to baffle the liers in wait, and make fools of them; but it was very unwise in in, that he did not quit the field, as soon as ever he perceived that he was not able to keep the ground.

IV. The discovery he at last made of this great secret; and if the discovery prove fatal to him, he must thank himself, who had not power to keep his own counsel from one that manifestly sought his ruin. Surely in vain is the net spread in the sight of any bird, but in Samson's sight is the net spread, and yet he is taken in it. If he had not been blind before the Philistines put out his eyes, he might have seen himself betrayed. Delilah signifies a consumer, she was so to him. Observe, 1. How she teased him, telling him she will not believe he loved her, unless he will gratify her in this matter; (v. 15.) How canst thou say, I love thee, when thine heart is not with me? That is, "when thou canst not trust me with the counsels of thy heart?" Passionate lovers cannot bear to have their love called in question, they would do any thing rather than their sincerity should be suspected; here therefore Delilah had this fond fool (excuse me that I call him so) at an advantage. This expostulation is indeed grounded upon a great truth. That those only have our love, not that have our good words, or our good wishes, but that have our hearts. That is love without dissimulation; but it is falsehood and flattery, in the highest degree, to say, We love those with whom our hearts are not. How can we say, We love either our brother, whom we have seen, or God, whom we have not seen, if our hearts be not with them? She continued many days vexations to him with her importunity, so that he had no pleasure of his life with her; (v. 16.) Why then did he not leave her? It was because he was captivated to her by the power of love, falsely so called, but, truly, lust. This bewitched and perfectly intoxicated him, and, by the force of it, see, 2. How she conquered him; (v. 17.) he told her all his heart. God left him to himself to do this foolish thing, to punish him for indulging himself in the lusts of uncleanness. The angel that foretold his birth, said nothing of his great strength, but only that he should be a Nazarite, and particularly that no razor should come upon his head, ch. 13. 5. His consecration to God was to be his strength, for he was to be strengthened according to the glorious power of that Spirit which wrought in him mightily, that his strength, by promise, not by nature, might be a type and figure of the spiritual strength of believers, Col. 1. 11, 29. Therefore the badge of his consecration was the pledge of his strength; if he lose the former, he knows he forfeits the latter. "If I be shaven, I am no longer a Nazarite, and then my strength is gone." The making of his bodily strength to depend so much on his hair, which could have no natural influence upon it, either one way or other, teaches us to magnify divine institutions, and to expect God's grace, and the continuance of it, only in the use of those means of grace wherein he has appointed us to attend upon him—the word, sacraments, and prayer. In these earthen vessels is this treasure.

18. And when Delilah saw that he had told her all his heart, she sent and called for the lords of the Philistines, saying, Come up this once, for he hath shewed me all his heart. Then the lords of the Philistines came up unto her, and brought money in their hand. 19. And she made him sleep upon her knees; and she called for a man, and she caused him to shave off the seven locks of his head; and she began to afflict him, and his strength went from him. 20. And she said, The Philistines be upon thee, Samson. And he awoke out of his sleep, and said, I will go out as at other times before, and shake myself. And he wist not that the LORD was departed from him. 21. But the Philistines took him, and put out his eyes, and brought him down to Gaza, and bound him with fetters of brass; and he did grind in the prison-house.

We have here the fatal consequences of Samson's folly in betraying his own strength; he soon paid dear for it. A whore is a deep ditch; he that is abhorred of the Lord shall fall therein. In that pit Samson sinks. Observe,

1. What care Delilah took to make sure of the money for herself. She now perceived, by the manner of his speaking, that he had told her all his heart, and the lords of the Philistines, that hired her to do this base thing, are sent for; but they must be sure to bring the money in their hands, v. 18. The wages of unrighteousness are accordingly produced, unknown to Samson; it would grieve one's heart, to see one of the bravest men then in the world sold and bought, as a sheep for the slaughter; how does this instance sully all the glory of man, and forbid the strong man ever to boast of his strength!

2. What course she took to deliver him up to them, according to the bargain. Many in the world would, for the hundredth part of what was here given Delilah, sell those that they pretend the greatest respect for. Trust not in a friend, then, put not confidence in a guide. See what a treacherous method she took, (v. 19.) she made him sleep upon her knees. Josephus says, She gave him some intoxicating liquor, which laid him to sleep; what opiates she might steal into his cup, we know not, but we cannot suppose that he knowingly drank wine or strong drink, for that would have been a forfeiture of his Nazariteship, as much as the cutting off his hair. She pretended the greatest kindness then when she designed the greatest mischief; which yet she could not have compassed, if she had not made him sleep. See the fatal consequences of security. Satan ruins men by rocking them asleep, flattering them into a good opinion of their own safety, and so bringing them to mind nothing, and fear nothing, and then he robs them of their strength and honour, and leads them captive at his will. When we sleep, our spiritual enemies do not. When he was asleep, she had a person ready to cut off his hair, which he did so silently and so quickly, that it did not awake him, but plainly afflicted him; even in his sleep, his spirit manifestly sunk upon it. I think we may suppose, that if this ill turn had been done him in his sleep by some spiteful body, without his being himself accessory to it, as he was here, it would not have had this strange effect upon him; but it was his own wickedness that corrected him. It was his iniquity, else it had not been so much his infelicity.

3. What little concern he himself was in at it, v. 20. He could not but miss his hair as soon as he awoke; and yet said, "I will shake myself as at other times, after sleep;" or, "as at other times, when the Philistines are upon me, to make my part good against them." Perhaps he thought to shake himself the more easily, and that his head would feel the lighter, now that his hair was cut; little thinking how much heavier the burthen of guilt was, than that of hair. He soon found in himself some change, we have reason to think so, and yet wist not that the Lord was departed from him. He did not consider that that was the reason of the change. Note, Many have lost the favourable presence of God, and are not aware of it; they have provoked God to withdraw from them, but are not sensible of their loss, nor ever complain of it. Their souls languish and are grown weak, their gifts wither, every thing goes cross with them; and yet they impute not this to the right cause, they are not aware that God is departed from them, nor are they in any care to reconcile themselves to him, or to recover his favour. When God is departed, we cannot do as at other times.

4. What improvement the Philistines soon made of their advantages against him, v. 21. The Philistines took him when God was departed from him; those that have thrown themselves out of God's protection become an easy prey to their enemies. If we sleep in the lap of our lusts, we shall certainly wake in the hands of the Philistines. It is probable they had promised Delilah not to kill him, but they took an effectual course to disable him; the first thing they did, when they had him in their hands, and found they could manage him, was, to put out his eyes, by applying fire to them, says the Arabic version. They considered that his eyes would never come again, as perhaps his hair might, and that the strongest arms could do little without eyes to guide them, and therefore, if now they blind him, they for ever blind him. His eyes were the inlets of his sin, he saw the harlot at Gaza, and went in unto her, (v. 1.) and now his punishment began there. Now that the Philistines had blinded him, he had time to remember how his own lust had blinded him. The best preservative of the eyes, is, to turn them away from beholding vanity. They brought him down to Gaza, that there he might appear in weakness, where he had lately given such proofs of his strength, (v. 3.) and be a jest to those to whom he had been a terror. They bound him with fetters of brass, who had before been held in the cords of his own iniquity, and he did grind in the prison, work in their Bridewell, either for their profit, or his punishment, or both. The Devil does thus by sinners, blinds the minds of them which believe not, and so enslaves them, and secures them in his interests. Poor Samson, how art thou fallen! How is thine honour laid in the dust! How are the glory and defence of Israel become the drudge and triumph of the Philistines! The crown is fallen from his head; woe unto him, for he hath sinned. Let all take warning by his fall, carefully to preserve their purity, and to watch against all fleshly lusts; for all our glory is gone, and our defence departed from us, when the covenant of our separation to God, as spiritual Nazarites, is profaned.

22. Howbeit the hair of his head began to grow again after he was shaven. 23. Then the lords of the Philistines gathered them together for to offer a great sacrifice unto Dagon their god, and to rejoice: for they said, Our god hath delivered Samson our enemy into our hand. 24. And when the people saw him, they praised their god: for they said, Our god hath delivered into our hands our enemy, and the destroyer of our country, which slew many of us. 25. And it came to pass, when their hearts were merry, that they said, Call for Samson, that he may make us sport. And they called for Samson out of the prison-house; and he made them sport: and they set him between the pillars. 26. And Samson said unto the lad that held him by the hand, Suffer me that I may feel the pillars whereupon the house standeth, that I may lean upon them. 27. Now the house was full of men and women; and all the lords of the Philistines were there: and there were upon the roof about three thousand men and women, that beheld while Samson made sport. 28. And Samson called unto the LORD, and said, O LORD God, remember me, I pray thee, and strengthen me, I pray thee, only this once, O God, that I may be at once avenged of the Philistines for my two eyes. 29. And Samson took hold of the two middle pillars upon which the house stood, and on which it was borne up, of the one with his right hand, and of the other with his left. 30. And Samson said, Let me die with the Philistines. And he bowed himself with all his might; and the house fell upon the lords, and upon all the people that were therein.

So the dead which he slew at his death were more than they which he slew in his life. 31. Then his brethren and all the house of his father came down, and took him, and brought him up, and buried him between Zorah and Eshtaol, in the burying place of Manoah his father. And he judged Israel twenty years.

Though the last stage of Samson's life was inglorious, and one could wish there were a veil drawn over it, yet this account here given of his death may be allowed to lessen, though it do not quite roll away, the reproach of it, for there was honour in his death. No doubt, he greatly repented of his sin, the dishonour he had by it done to God, and his forfeiture of the honour God had put upon him; for that God was reconciled to him appears, 1. By the return of the sign of his Nazariteship; (v. 22.) his hair began to grow again, as when he was shaven; that is, to be as thick and as long as when it was cut off. It is probable that their general thanksgiving to Dagon was not long deferred, before which Samson's hair was thus grown, by which, and the particular notice taken of it, it seems to have been extraordinary, and designed for a special indication of the return of God's favour to him upon his repentance. For the growth of his hair was neither the cause nor the sign of the return of his strength, further than as it was the badge of his consecration, and a token that God accepted him as a Nazarite again, after the interruption, without those ceremonies which were appointed for the restoration of a lapsed Nazarite, which he had not now the opportunity of performing, Numb. 6. 9. It is strange that the Philistines, in whose hands he was, were not jealous of the growth of his hair again, and did not cut it; but perhaps they were willing his great strength should return to him, that they might have so much the more work out of him, and, now that he was blind, they were in no fear of any hurt from him. 2. By the use God made of him for the destruction of the enemies of his people, and that at a time when it would be most for the honour of God, and the vindication of that, and not immediately for the defence and deliverance of Israel. Observe,

1. How insolently the Philistines affronted the God of Israel. 1. By the sacrifices they offered to Dagon, his rival. This Dagon they call their god, a god of their own making, represented by an image, the upper part of which was in the shape of a man, the lower part, of a fish, purely the creature of fancy; yet it served them to set up in opposition to the true and living God. To this pretended deity they ascribe their success; (v. 23, 24.) Our God has delivered Samson our enemy, and the destroyer of our country, into our hands. So they dreamed, though he could do neither good nor evil. They knew Delilah had betrayed him, and they had paid her for doing it, yet they attribute it to their god, and are confirmed by it in their belief of his power to protect them; all people will thus walk in the name of their gods, they will give them the praise of their achievements; and shall we not pay this tribute to our God, whose kingdom ruleth over all? Yet, considering what wicked arts they used to get Samson into their hands, it must be confessed, it was only such a dunghill deity as Dagon that was fit to be made a patron of their villainies. Sacrifices were offered, and songs of praise sung, on the general thanksgiving-day, for this victory obtained over one man; there were great expressions of joy, and all to the honour of Dagon. Much more reason have we to give the praise of all our successes to our God; Thanks be to him who causes us to triumph in Christ Jesus! 2. By the sport they made with Samson, God's champion, they reflected on God himself. When they were merry with wine, to make them more merry, Samson must be fetched to make them sport; (v. 25, 27;) that is, for them to make sport with. Having sacrificed to their god, and eaten and drunk upon the sacrifice, they rose up to play; according to the usage of idolaters, (1 Cor. 10. 7.) and Samson must be the fool in the play. They made themselves, and our another, laugh, to see how, being blind, he stumbled and blundered. It is likely they smote this Judge of Israel upon the cheek, (Mic. 5.1.) and said, Prophecy who smote thee. It was an instance of their barbarity to trample thus upon a man in misery, at the sight of whom, a while ago, they would have trembled. It put Samson in the depth of misery, and as a sword in his bones were their reproaches, when they said, Where is now thy God? Nothing could be more grievous to so great a spirit; yet, being a penitent, that makes him patient, and he accepts it as a punishment of his iniquity. How unrighteous soever the Philistines were, he could not but own that God was righteous. He had sported himself in his own deceivings, and with his own deceivers, and justly are the Philistines let loose upon him, to make sport with him. Uncleanness is a sin that makes men vile, and exposes them to contempt; a wound and dishonour shall he get whose heart is deceived by a woman, and his reproach shall not be wiped away. Everlasting shame and contempt will be the portion of those that are blinded and bound by their own lusts; the Devil, that deceived them, will insult over them.

II. How justly the God of Israel brought sudden destruction upon them, by the hands of Samson. Thousands of the Philistines were got together, to attend their lords in the sacrifices and joys of this day, and to be the spectators of this comedy; but it proved to them a fatal tragedy, for they were all slain, and buried in the ruins of the house; whether it was a temple, or a theatre, or some slight building run up for the purpose, is uncertain. Observe,

1. Who were destroyed; all the lords of the Philistines, (v.27.) who had, by bribes, corrupted Delilah to betray Samson to them. Evil pursued those sinners. Many of the people, likewise, to the number of three thousand, and among them a great many women, one of whom, it is likely, was that harlot of Gaza, mentioned v.1. Samson had been drawn into sin by the Philistine women, and a great slaughter is made among them, as was, by Moses's order, among the women of Midian, because it was they that caused the children of Israel to trespass against the Lord in the matter of Peor, Num. 31. 16.

2. When they were destroyed; (1.) When they were merry, secure, and jovial, and far from apprehending themselves in any danger. When they saw Samson lay hold on the pillars, we may suppose it served them for a jest, and they made sport with that too; What will this feeble Jew do? How are sinners brought to desolation in a moment! They are lifted up in pride and mirth, that their fall may be the more dreadful. Let us never enjoy the mirth of wicked people, but infer, from this instance, that their triumphing is short, and their joy but for a moment. (2.) It was when they were praising Dagon their god, and giving that honour to him which is due to God only, which is no less than treason against the King of kings, his crown and dignity; justly, therefore, is the blood of these traitors mingled with their sacrifices. Belshazzar was cut off when he was praising his made gods, Dan. 5.4. (3.) It was when they were making sport with an Israelite, a Nazarite, and insulting over him, persecuting him, whom God had smitten. Nothing fills the measure of the iniquity of any person or people faster than mocking and mis-using the servants of God, yea, though it is by their own folly that they are brought low. Those know not what they do, nor whom they affront, that make sport with a good man.

3. How they were destroyed; Samson pulled the house down upon them; God, no doubt, putting it into his heart, as a public person, thus to avenge God's quarrel with them, Israel's, and his own. (1.) He gained strength to do it by prayer, v.23. That strength which he had lost by sin he recovers, like a true penitent, by prayer, as David, who, when he had provoked the Spirit of grace to withdraw, prayed, (Ps. 51.12.) Restore unto me the joy of thy salvation, and uphold me with thy free Spirit. We may suppose that this was only a mental prayer, and that his voice was not heard, (for it was made in a noisy clamorous crowd of Philistines;) but, though his voice was not heard of men, yet his prayer was heard of God, and graciously answered; and, though he lived not to give an account himself of this his prayer, as Nehemiah did of his, yet God not only accepted it in heaven, but, by revealing it to the inspired penman, provided for the registering of it in his church. He prayed to God to remember him, and strengthen him this once, thereby owning that his strength, for what he had already done, he had from God, and begged it might be afforded to him once more, to give them a parting blow. That it was not from a principle of passion or personal revenge, but from a holy zeal for the glory of God and Israel, that he desired to do this, appears from God's accepting and answering the prayer. Samson died praying, so did our blessed Saviour; but Samson prayed for vengeance, Christ for forgiveness. (2.) He gained opportunity to do it, by leaning on the two pillars, which were the chief supports of the building, and were, it seems, so near together, that he could take hold of them both at one time, v.26,29. Having hold of them, he bore them down with all his might, crying aloud, Let me die with the Philistines, v.30. Animamque in vulnere pouit—While inflicting the wound, he dies. The vast concourse of people that was upon the roof, looking down through it to see the sport, we may suppose contributed to the fall of it. A weight so much greater than ever it was designed to carry, might, perhaps, have sunk of itself, at least it made the fall more fatal to those within; and, indeed, few of either could escape being either stifled or crushed to death. This was done, not by any natural strength of Samson, but by the almighty power of God, and is not only marvellous, but miraculous, in our eyes.

Now in this, [1.] The Philistines were greatly mortified. All their lords and great men were killed, and abundance of their people, and this in the midst of their triumph; the temple of Dagon (as many think the house was) was pulled down, and Dagon buried in it. This would give a great check to the insolence of the survivors; and, if Israel had had but so much sense and spirit left them as to improve the advantages of this juncture, they might now have thrown off the Philistines' yoke. [2.] Samson may very well be justified, and brought in not guilty of any sinful murder, either of himself or the Philistines. He was a public person, a declared enemy to the Philistines, against whom he might therefore take all advantages; they were now, in the most barbarous manner, making war upon him, all present were aiding and abetting, and justly die with him. Nor was he a felo de se, or a self-murderer, in it, for it was not his own life that he aimed at, though he had too much reason to be weary of it, but the lives of Israel's enemies, for the reaching of which he bravely resigned his own, not counting it dear to him, so he might finish his course with honour. [3.] God was very much glorified in pardoning Samson's great transgressions, of which this was an evidence. It has been said that the prince's giving of a commission to one convicted amounts to a pardon. Yet, though he was a God that forgave him, he took vengeance of his inventions; (Ps. 99.8.) and, by suffering his champion to die in fetters, warned all to take heed of those lusts which war against the soul. However, we have good reason to hope, that, though Samson died with the Philistines, he had not his everlasting portion with them. The Lord knows them that are his. [4.] Christ was plainly typified. He pulled down the Devil's kingdom, as Samson did Dagon's temple; and, when he died, obtained the most glorious victory over the powers of darkness. Then, when his arms were stretched out upon the cross, as Samson's to the two pillars, he gave a fatal shake to the gates of hell, and, through death, destroyed him that had the power of death, that is, the Devil; (Heb. 2.14,15.) and herein exceeded Samson, that he not only died with the Philistines, but rose again to triumph over them.

Lastly, The story of Samson concludes, 1. With an account of his burial; his own relations, animated by the glories that attended his death, came and found out his body among the slain, brought it honourably to his own country, and buried it in the place of his fathers' sepulchres, the Philistines being in such a consternation that they durst not oppose it. 2. With the repetition of the account we had before of the continuance of his government, he judged Israel twenty years; and, if they had not been as mean and sneaking as he was brave and daring, he had left them clear or the Philistines' yoke. They might have been easy, safe, and happy, if they would but have given God and their judges leave to make them so.

CHAP. XVII.

All agree, that what is related in this, and the rest of the chapters to the end of this book, was not done, as the narrative occurs, after Samson, but long before, even soon after the death of Joshua, in the days of Phinehas the son of Eleazar, ch. 20. .28. But it is cast here into the latter part of the book, that it might not interrupt the history of the judges. That it might appear how happy the nation was in the judges, here is shewed how unhappy they were when there was none. I. Then idolatry began in the family of Micah, ch. 17. II. Then it spread itself into the tribe of Dan, ch. 18. III. Then villany was committed in Gibeon of Benjamin, ch. 19. IV. Then that whole tribe was destroyed, for countenancing it, ch. 20. V. Then strange expedients were adopted to keep up that tribe, ch. 21. Therefore, blessed be God for the government we are under! In this chapter, we are told how Micah, an Ephraimite, furnished himself, 1. With an image for his god, v. 1. .6. 2. With a Levite, such a one as he was, for his priest, v. 7. .13.

1. AND there was a man of mount Ephraim, whose name was Micah. 2. And he said unto his mother, The eleven hundred shekels of silver that were taken from thee, about which thou cursedst, and spakest of also in mine ears, behold, the silver is with me; I took it. And his mother said, Blessed be thou of the LORD, my son. 3. And when he had restored the eleven hundred shekels of silver to his mother, his mother said, I had wholly dedicated the silver unto the LORD from my hand for my son, to make a graven image and a molten image: now therefore I will restore it unto thee. 4. Yet he restored the money unto his mother; and his mother took two hundred shekels of silver, and gave them to the founder, who made thereof a graven image and a molten image: and they were in the house of Micah. 5. And the man Micah had an house of gods, and made an ephod, and teraphim, and consecrated one of his sons, who became his priest. 6. In those days there was no king in Israel, but every man did that which was right in his own eyes.

Here we have,

I. Micah and his mother quarrelling. 1. The son robs the mother. The old woman had hoarded, with long scraping and saving, a great sum of money—eleven hundred pieces of silver. It is likely she intended, when she died, to leave it to her son; in the mean time, it did her good to look upon it, and to count it over. The young man has a family of children grown up, for he had one of age to be a priest; (v. 5.) he knows where to find his mother's cash, thinks he has more need of it than she has, cannot stay till she dies, and so takes it away privately, for his own use. Though it is a fault in parents to withhold from their children that which is meet, and lead them into temptation to wish them in their graves, yet even that will by no means excuse the wickedness of those children that steal from their parents, and think all their own which they can get from them, though by the most indirect methods. 2. The mother curses the son, or whoever had taken her money. It should seem she suspected her son; for, when she cursed, she spoke in his ears so loud, and with so much passion and vehemence, as made both his ears to tingle. See what mischief the love of money makes, how it destroys the duty and comfort of every relation. It was the love of money that made Micah so undutiful to his mother as to rob her, and made her so unkind, and void of natural affection, to her son, as to curse him, if he had it, and concealed it. Outward losses drive good people to their prayers, but bad people to their curses. This woman's silver was her god, before it was made either into a graven or a molten image, else the loss of it would not have put her into such a passion, as quite to forget and break through all the laws of decency and piety. It is a very foolish thing for those that are provoked, to throw their curses about, as a madman that casteth fire-brands, arrows, and death, since they know not but they may light upon those that are most dear to them.

II. Micah and his mother reconciled. 1. The son was so terrified with the mother's curses, that he restored the money. Though he had so little grace as to take it, he had so much left as not to dare to keep it, when his mother had sent a curse after it. He cannot believe his mother's money would do him any good, without his mother's blessing; nor dares he deny the theft when he is charged with it, nor retain the money when it is demanded by the right owner. It is best not to do evil, but it is next best, when it is done, to undo it again, by repentance, confession, and restitution. Let children be afraid of having the prayers of their parents against them; for though the curse, causeless, shall not come, yet that which is justly deserved may be justly feared; even though it was passionately and indecently uttered. 2. The mother was so pleased with her son's repentance, that she recalled her curses, and turned them into prayers for her son's welfare; Blessed be thou of the Lord, my son. When those that have been guilty of a fault, appear to be free and ingenuous in owning it, they ought to be commended for their repentance, rather than still be condemned and upbraided for their fault.

III. Micah and his mother agreeing to turn their money into a god, and set up idolatry in their family; and this seems to have been the first instance of the revolt of any Israelite from God, and his instituted worship, after the death of Joshua, and the elders that out-lived him, and is therefore thus particularly related. And, though this was only the worship of the true God by an image, against the second commandment, yet this opened the door to the worship of other gods, Baalim and the groves, against the first and great commandment. Observe,

1. The mother's contrivance of this matter. When the silver was restored, she pretends she had dedicated it to the Lord; (v. 3.) either before it was stolen, and then she would have that thought to be the reason why she was so much grieved at the loss of it, and imprecated evil on him that had taken it, because it was a dedicated, and therefore an accursed, thing; or, after it was stolen, she had made a vow, that, if she could retrieve it, she would dedicate it to God, and then she would have the providence that had so far favoured her as to bring it back to her hands, to be an owning of her vow. "Come," said she to her son, "the money is mine, but thou hast a mind to it; let it be neither mine nor thine, but let us both agree to make it into an image for a religious use." Had she put it to a use that had been indeed for the service and honour of God, it had been a good way of accommodating the matter between them; but, as it was, the project was wicked. Probably this old woman was one of those that came out of Egypt, and would have such images made as she had seen there; now that she began to dote, she called to remembrance the follies of her youth, and perhaps told her son that this way of worshipping God by images was, to her knowledge, the old religion.

2. The son's compliance with her. It should seem, when she first proposed the thing, he stumbled at it, knowing what the second commandment was; for when she said (v. 3.) she designed it for her son, to make an image of, yet he restored it to his mother, (being loath to have a hand in making the image,) and she gave it the founder, and had the thing done, blaming him perhaps for scrupling it, v. 4. But, when the images were made, Micah, by his mother's persuasion, was not only well reconciled to them, but exceedingly pleased and in love with them: so strangely bewitching was idolatry, and so much supported by traditions received from their parents, 1 Pet. 1. 18. Jer. 44. 17. But, observe how the old woman's covetousness prevailed, in part, above her superstition; she had wholly dedicated the silver to make the graven and molten images, (v. 3.) all the eleven hundred pieces; but, when it came to be done, she made less than a fifth part serve, even two hundred shekels, v. 4. She thought that enough, and indeed it was too much, to give for an image that is a teacher of lies. Had it been devoted truly to the honour of God, he would not thus have been put off with part of the price, but would have signified his resentment of the affront, as he did in the case of Ananias and Sapphira.

Now observe, (1.) What was the corruption here introduced, v. 5. The man Micah had a house of gods, (a house of God, so the LXX.) for so he thought it, as good as that at Shiloh, and better, because his own, of his own inventing, and at his own disposal; for people love to have their religion under their girdle, to manage it as they please. A house of error, so the Chaldee; for really it was so, a deviation from the way of truth, and an inlet to all deceit. Idolatry is a great cheat, and one of the worst of errors. That which he aimed at, in the progress of his idolatry, whether he designed it at first or no, was, to mimic and rival both God's oracles and his ordinances. [1.] His oracles; for he made Teraphim, little images, which he might advise with as there was occasion, and receive informations, directions, and predictions from. What the Urim and Thummim were to the prince and people, these Teraphim should be to his family; yet he could not think that the true God should own them, or give answers by them, and therefore depended upon such demons as the heathen worshipped, to inspire them, and make them serviceable to him. Thus, while the honour of Jehovah was pretended, (v. 3.) yet, his institution being relinquished, they unavoidably lapsed into downright idolatry and demon-worship. [2.] His ordinances. Some room or apartment in the house of Micah was appointed for the temple or house of God; an ephod, or holy garment, was provided for his priest, to officiate in, in imitation of those used at the tabernacle of God; and one of his sons he consecrated, probably the eldest, to be his priest. And, when he had set up a graven or molten image, to represent the object of his worship, no marvel if a priest of his own getting, and his own making, served to be the manager of it. Here is no mention of any altar, sacrifice, or incense, in honour of these silver gods; but, having a priest, it is probable he had all these, unless we suppose that, at first, his gods were intended only to be advised with, not to be adored, like Laban's Teraphim: but the beginning of idolatry, as of other sins, is like the letting forth of water; break the dam, and you bring a deluge. Here idolatry began, and it spread like a fretting leprosy. Dr. Lightfoot would have us observe, that, as eleven hundred pieces of silver were here devoted to the making of an idol, which ruined religion, especially in the tribe of Dan, (as we shall find after,) which was Samson's tribe, so eleven hundred pieces of silver were given by each Philistine lord for the ruin of Samson.

(2.) What was the cause of this corruption; (v. 6.) There was no king in Israel, no judge or sovereign prince to take cognizance of the setting up of these images, (which, doubtless, the country about soon resorted to,) and to give orders for the destroying of them; none to convince Micah of his error, and to restrain and punish him; to take this disease in time, by which the spreading of the infection might have been happily prevented. Every man did that which was right in his own eyes, and then they soon did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord. When they were without a king, to keep good order among them, God's house was forsaken, his priests neglected, and all went to ruin among them. See what a mercy government is, and what reason there is that not only prayers and intercessions, but giving of thanks, should be made for kings, and all in authority, 1 Tim. 2. 1, 2. Nothing contributes more, under God, to the support of religion in the world, than the due administration of those two great ordinances, magistracy and ministry.

7. And there was a young man out of Beth-lehem-judah, of the family of Judah, who was a Levite, and he sojourned there. 8. And the man departed out of the city from Beth-lehem-judah, to sojourn where he could find a place: and he came to mount Ephraim to the house of Micah, as he journeyed. 9. And Micah said unto him, Whence comest thou? And he said unto him, I am a Levite of Beth-lehem-judah, and I go to sojourn where I may find a place. 10. And Micah said unto him, Dwell with me, and be unto me a father and a priest, and I will give thee ten shekels of silver by the year, and a suit of apparel, and thy victuals. So the Levite went in. 11. And the Levite was content to dwell with the man; and the young man was unto him as one of his sons. 12. And Micah consecrated the Levite; and the young man became his priest, and was in the house of Micah. 13. Then said Micah, Now know I that the LORD will do me good, seeing I have a Levite to my priest.

We have here an account of Micah's furnishing himself with a Levite for his chaplain, either thinking his son, because the heir of his estate, too good to officiate, or rather, because not of God's tribe, not good enough. Observe,

I. What brought this Levite to Micah. By his mother's side, he was of the family of Judah, and lived at Bethlehem, among his mother's relations, (for that was not a Levites' city,) or, upon some other account, as a stranger or inmate, sojourned there, v. 7. Thence he went to sojourn where he could find a place, and, in his travels, came to the house of Micah, in mount Ephraim, v. 8. Now, 1. Some think it was his unhappiness that he was under a necessity of removing, either because he was persecuted and abused, or rather neglected and starved, at Bethlehem. God had made plentiful provision for the Levites, but the people withheld their dues, and did not help them into the possession of the cities assigned them, so that they were reduced to straits, and no care was taken for their relief. Israel's forsaking of God began with forsaking the Levites, which therefore they are warned against, Dent. 12. 19. It is a sign religion is going to decay, when good ministers are neglected, and at a loss for a livelihood. But, 2. It seems rather to have been his fault and folly, that he loved to wander, threw himself out where he was, and forfeited the respect of his friends, and, having a roving head, would go seek his fortune, as we say. We cannot conceive that things were yet come to that bad pass among them, that a Levite should be poor, unless it was his own fault. As those are fit to be pitied that would fix, but may not, so those are fit to be punished that might fix, but will not. Unsettledness being, one would think, a constant uneasiness, it is strange that any Israelite, especially any Levite, should affect it.

II. What bargain Micah made with him. Had he not been well enough content with his son for a priest, he would have gone or sent abroad to inquire out a Levite; but now he only takes hold of one that drops into his hands, which shewed that he had no great zeal in the matter. It is probable that this rambling Levite heard, in the country, of Micah's house of gods, his graven and molten image, which, if he had had any thing of the spirit of a Levite in him, would have brought him thither, to reprove Micah for his idolatry, to tell how directly contrary it was to the law of God, and how it would bring the judgments of God upon him; but, instead of that, like a base and degenerate branch of that sacred tribe, thither he goes, to offer his service, with, "Have you any work for a Levite? for I am out of business, and go to sojourn where I may find a place;" all he aimed at was, to get bread, not to do good, v. 9. Micah courts him into his family, (v. 10.) and promises him, 1. Good preferment; Be unto me a father and a priest. Though a young man, and taken up at the door, yet, if he take him for a priest, he will respect him as a father, so far is he from setting him among his servants. He asks not for his credentials, takes no time to inquire how he behaved in the place of his last settlement, considers not whether, though he was a Levite, yet he might not be of such a bad character, as to be a plague and scandal to his family, but thinks, though he were ever so great a rake, he might serve for a priest to a graven image, like Jeroboam's priests of the lowest of the people, 1 Kings 12. 31. No marvel if they who can make any thing serve for a god, make any thing serve for a priest. 2. A tolerable maintenance. He will allow him meat, and drink, and clothes, a double suit, so the word is in the margin, a better and a worse, one for every day's wear, and one for holy days, and ten shekels, about twenty-five shillings a year, for spending money; a poor salary, in comparison of what God provided for the Levites that behaved well; but those that forsake God's service, will never mend themselves, nor find a better master. The ministry is the best calling, but the worst trade, in the world.

III. The Levite's settlement with him, v. 11. He was content to dwell with the man; though his work was superstitious, and his wages scandalous, he objected against neither, but thought himself happy that he had lighted on so good a house. Micah, thinking himself holier than any of his neighbours, presumes to consecrate this Levite; (v. 12.) as if his building, furnishing, and endowing, this chapel, authorized him, not only to appoint the person that should officiate there, but to confer those orders upon him, which he had no right to give, nor the other to receive. And now he shows him respect as a father, and tenderness as a son, and, with that, is willing to make up the deficiency of the coin he gave him.

IV. Micah's satisfaction in this; (v. 13.) Now know I that the Lord will do me good; that is, he hoped that his new establishment would gain reputation among his neighbours, and that would turn to his advantage, for he would share in the profits of his altar; or rather, that God would countenance and bless him in all he put his hand unto, because I have a Levite to be my priest. 1. He thought it was a sign of God's favour to him and his images, that he had so opportunely sent a Levite to his door. Thus they who please themselves with their own delusions, if Providence unexpectedly bring any thing to their hands, that furthers them in their evil way, are too apt from thence to infer that God is pleased with them. 2. He thought now that the error of his priesthood was amended, all was well, though he still retained his graven and molten image. Note, Many deceive themselves into a good opinion of their state, by a partial reformation. They think they are as good as they should be, because, in some one particular instance, they are not so bad as they have been: as if the correcting of one fault would atone for persisting in all the rest. 3. He thought the making of a Levite into a priest, was a very meritorious act, which really was a presumptuous usurpation, and very provoking to God. Men's pride, and ignorance, and self-flattery, will undertake, not only to justify, but magnify and sanctify, the most daring impieties and invasions upon the divine prerogatives. With much reason might Micah have said, "Now may I fear that God will curse me, because I have debauched one of his own tribe, and drawn him into the worship of a graven image;" yet, for this, he hopes God will do him good. 4. He thought that having a Levite in the house with him, would of course entitle him to the divine favour. Carnal hearts are apt to build too much upon their external privileges, and to conclude that God will certainly do them good, because they are born of godly parents, dwell in praying families, are linked in society with those that are very good, and sit under a lively ministry; whereas all this is but like having a Levite to be their priest, which amounts to no security at all that God will do them good, unless they be good themselves, and make a good use of those advantages.

CHAP. XVIII.

How idolatry crept into the family of Micah we read in the chapter before, how it was translated from thence into the tribe of Dan we have an account in this chapter, and how it gained a settlement in a city of note; for how great a matter doth a little fire kindle! The tribe of Dan had their lot assigned them last of all the tribes, and, it happening to be too strait for them, a considerable city in the utmost corner of Canaan northward was added to it, "Let them get it, and take it;" it was called Laish or Leshem, Josh. 19. 47. Now here we are told, I. How they sent spies to bring them an account of the place, who, by the way, got acquainted with Micah's priest, v. 1. .6. II. What an encouraging report these spies brought back, v. 7. .10. III. What forces were sent to conquer Laish, v. 11. .13. IV. How they, by the way, plundered Micah of his gods, v. 14. .25. V. How easily they conquered Laish, (v. 27. .29.) and, when they had it, set up the graven image in it, v. 30, 31.

1. IN those days there was no king in Israel: and in those days the tribe of the Danites sought them an inheritance to dwell in; for unto that day all their inheritance had not fallen unto them among the tribes of Israel. 2. And the children of Dan sent of their family five men from their coasts, men of valour, from Zorah, and from Eshtaol, to spy out the land, and to search it; and they said unto them, Go, search the land: who, when they came to mount Ephraim, to the house of Micah, they lodged there. 3. When they were by the house of Micah, they knew the voice of the young man, the Levite; and they turned in thither, and said unto him, Who brought thee hither? And what makest thou in this place? And what hast thou here? 4. And he said unto them, Thus and thus dealeth Micah with me, and hath hired me, and I am his priest. 5. And they said unto him, Ask counsel, we pray thee, of God, that we may know whether our way which we go shall be prosperous. 6. And the priest said unto them, Go in peace: before the LORD is your way wherein ye go.

Here is,

1. The eye which these Danites had upon Laish, not the whole tribe of Dan, but one family of them, to whose lot, in the subdivision of Canaan, that city fell. Hitherto this family had sojourned with their brethren, who had taken possession of their lot, which lay between Judah and the Philistines, and had declined going to their own city, because there was no king in Israel to rule over them, v. 1. It lay a great way off, separate from the rest of their tribe; it was entirely in the enemy's hand, and therefore they would sponge upon their brethren, rather than go far to provide for themselves. But, at length, necessity forced them to it, and they began to think of an inheritance to dwell in. It is better to have a little of one's own, than always to hang upon others.

2. The inquiry which this family of the Danites made concerning Laish. They sent five men to search the land, (v. 2.) that they might know the character of the country, whether it was an inheritance worth going so far for; and the posture of the people, whether the making of themselves masters of it was a thing practicable, what force was necessary in order thereunto, and which was the best way of making an attack upon it. The men they sent, were men of valour, who, if they fell into their enemies' hands, knew how to look danger in the face. It is prudent to look before we leap; Dan had the subtilty of a serpent by the way, (Gen. 49. 17.) as well as the courage of a lion's whelp, leaping from Bashan, Deut. 33. 22.

3. The acquaintance which their spies got with Micah's priest, and the improvement they made of that acquaintance. It seems, they had known this Levite formerly, he having, in his rambles, been sometimes in their country; and though his countenance might be altered, they knew him again by his voice, v. 3. They were surprised to find him so far off, inquired what brought him thither, and he told them (v. 4.) what business he had there, and what encouragement. They, understanding that he had an oracle in his custody, desired he would tell them whether they should prosper in their present undertaking, v. 5. See their carelessness and regardlessness of God and his providence; they would not enquire of the Lord at all, if this Levite's mentioning of the Teraphim he had with him had not put it into their heads. Many never think of religion but just when it falls in their way, and they cannot avoid it, like chance-customers. See their ignorance of the divine law, that they thought God, who had forbidden the religious use of graven images, would yet own them in consulting an image, and give them an answer of peace. Should he be inquired of by them? Ezek. 14. 3. They seem to have had a greater opinion of Micah's Teraphim, than of God's Urim; for they had passed by Shiloh, and, for aught that appears, had not inquired there of God's high priest, but Micah's shabby Levite shall be an oracle to them. He betakes himself to his usual method of consulting his Teraphim; and, whether he himself believed it or no, he humoured the thing so well, that he made them believe he had an answer from God, encouraging them to go on, and assuring them of good success, v. 6. "Go in peace, you shall be safe, and may be easy, for before the Lord is your way," that is, "he approves it," (as the Lord is said to know the way of the righteous with acceptance,) "and therefore he will make it prosperous; his eye will be upon you for good, he will direct your way, and preserve your going out, and coming in." Note, Our great care should be that our way be such as God approves, and if it be so, we may go in peace. If God care for us, on him let us cast our care, and be satisfied that we cannot miss our way, if he go before us.

7. Then the five men departed, and came to Laish, and saw the people that were therein, how they dwelt careless, after the manner of the Zidonians, quiet and secure, and there was no magistrate in the land, that might put them to shame in any thing; and they were far from the Zidonians, and had no business with any man. 8. And they came unto their brethren to Zorah and Eshtaol: and their brethren said unto them, What say ye? 9. And they said, Arise, that we may go up against them: for we have seen the land, and, behold, it is very good: and are ye still? be not slothful to go, and to enter to possess the land. 10. When ye go, ye shall come unto a people secure, and to a large land: for God hath given it into your hands; a place where there is no want of any thing that is in the earth. 11. And there went from thence of the family of the Danites, out of Zorah and out of Eshtaol, six hundred men, appointed with weapons of war. 12. And they went up, and pitched in Kirjath-jearim, in Judah: wherefore they called that place Mahaneh-dan unto this day: behold, it is behind Kirjath-jearim. 13. And they passed thence unto mount Ephraim, and came unto the house of Micah.

Here is,

I. The observation which the spies made upon the city of Laish, and the posture of its inhabitants, v. 7. Never was place so ill governed, and so ill guarded, which would make it a very easy prey to the invader.

1. It was ill governed, for every man might be as bad as he would, and there was no magistrate, no heir of restraint, as the word is, that might so much as put them to shame in any thing, much less put them to death; so that, by the most impudent immoralities, they provoked God's wrath, and, by all manner of mutual mischiefs, weakened and consumed one another. See here, (1.) What the office of magistrates is, they are to be heirs of restraint, that is, to preserve a constant entail of power, as heirs to an inheritance, in the places where they are, for the restraining of that which is evil. They are possessors of restraint, intrusted with their authority for this end, that they may check and suppress every thing that is vicious, and be a terror to evil doers. It is only God's grace that can renew men's depraved minds, and turn their hearts; but the magistrate's power may restrain their bad practices, and tie their hands, so that the wickedness of the wicked may not be either so injurious, or so infectious, as otherwise it would be. Though the sword of justice cannot cut up the root of bitterness, it may cut off its branches, and hinder its growth and spreading, that vice may not go without a check, for then it becomes daring and dangerous, and the community shares in the guilt. (2.) See what method must be used for the restraint of wickedness. Sinners must be put to shame, that they who will not be restrained by the shamefulness of the sin before God and their own consciences, may be restrained by the shamefulness of the punishment before men. All ways must be tried to dash sin out of countenance, and cover it with contempt, to make people ashamed of their idleness, drunkenness, cheating, lying, and other sins, by making reputation always appear on virtue's side. (3.) See how miserable, and how near to ruin, those places are, that either have no magistrates, or none that bear the sword to any purpose; the wicked then walk on every side, Ps. 12. 8. And how happy we are in good laws, and a good government.

2. It was ill guarded. The people of Laish dwelt careless, quiet, and secure, their gates left open, their walls out of repair, because under no apprehension of danger any way; though their wickedness was so great, that they had reason to fear divine vengeance every day. It was a sign that the Israelites, through their sloth and cowardice, were not now such a terror to the Canaanites, as they had been, when they first came among them, else the city of Laish, which, probably, knew itself to be assigned to them, would not have been so very secure. Though they were an open and inland town, they lived secure, like the Zidonians, who were surrounded with the sea, and were well fortified both by art and nature; but were far from the Zidonians, who therefore could not come in to their assistance, nor help to defend them from the danger, which, by debauching their manners, they had helped to bring them into. And, lastly, They had no business with any man, which bespeaks either the idleness they affected, they followed no trade, and so grew lazy and luxurious, and utterly unable to defend themselves, or the independency they affected, they scorned to be either in subjection to, or alliance with, any of their neighbours, and so they had none to protect them, or bring in any aid to them. They cared for nobody, and therefore nobody cared for them. Such as these were the men of Laish.

II. The encouragement which from hence they gave to their countrymen that sent them to prosecute their design upon this city, v. 8. 10. Probably, the Danites had formed notions of the insuperable difficulties of the enterprise, thought it impossible ever to make themselves masters of Laish, and therefore had kept themselves so long out of the possession of it; perhaps, suggesting likewise to one another, in their unbelief, that it was not a country worth going so far and running such a risk for. Which jealousies the spies (and they were not, in this, evil spies) had an eye to in their report. 1. They represent the place as desirable. "If you will trust our judgments, we have seen the land, and we are agreed in our verdict upon the view, that, behold, it is very good, (v. 9.) better than this mountainous country, into which we are here crowded by the Philistines. You need not doubt of living comfortably in it, for it is a place where there is no want of any thing," v. 10. See what a good land Canaan was, that this city, which lay furthest of all northward, in the utmost corner of the country, stood on such a fruitful spot. 2. They represent it as attainable; they do not at all question, but, with God's blessing, they may soon get possession of it; for the people are secure, v. 10. And the more secure, always the less safe; "God has given it into your hands, and you may have it for the taking." They stir them up to the undertaking; "Arise, that we may go up against them, let us go about it speedily and resolutely." They expostulate with them for their delays, and chide them out of their sluggishness; Are ye still? Be not slothful to go. Men need to be thus stirred up to mind even their interest. Heaven is a very good land, where there is no want of any thing; our God has, by the promise, given it into our hands, let us not be slothful then in making it sure, and laying hold on eternal life, but strive to enter.

III. The Danites' expedition against Laish. This particular family of them, to whose lot that city fell, now at length make towards it, v. 11. . 13. The military men were but six hundred in all, not a hundredth part of that tribe, for, when they entered Canaan, the Danites were above sixty-four thousand, Numb. 26. 43. It was strange that none of their brethren of their own tribe, much less of any other, came in to their assistance; but it was long after Israel came to Canaan, before there appeared among them any thing of a public spirit, or concern for a common interest, which was the reason why they seldom united in a common head, and that kept them low and inconsiderable. It appears, by v. 24. that these six hundred were the whole number that went to settle there, for they had their families and effects with them, their little ones and cattle, so confident were they of success. The other tribes gave them a free passage through their country; their first day's march brought them to Kirjath-jearim; (v. 12.) and such rare things were military encampments now become in Israel, that the place where they rested that night, was, from thence, called Mahanach-dan, the camp of Dan; and, probably, the place whence they began their march, between Zorah and Eshtaol, was called by the same name, and is meant, ch. 13. 25. The second day's march brought them unto mount Ephraim, near Micah's house, (v. 13.) and there we must pause a while.

14. Then answered the five men that went to spy out the country of Laish, and said unto their brethren, Do ye know that there is in these houses an ephod, and teraphim, and a graven image, and a molten image? now therefore consider what ye have to do. 15. And they turned thitherward, and came to the house of the young man the Levite, even unto the house of Micah, and saluted him. 16. And the six hundred men, appointed with their weapons of war, which were of the children of Dan, stood by the entering of the gate. 17. And the five men that went to spy out the land went up, and came in thither, and took the graven image, and the ephod, and the teraphim, and the molten image: and the priest stood in the entering of the gate with the six hundred men that were appointed with weapons of war. 18. And these went into Micah's house, and fetched the carved image, the ephod, and the teraphim, and the molten image. Then said the priest unto them, What do ye? 19. And they said unto him, Hold thy peace, lay thine hand upon thy mouth, and go with us, and be to us a father and a priest: is it better for thee to be a priest unto the house of one man, or that thou be a priest unto a tribe and a family in Israel? 20. And the priest's heart was glad, and he took the ephod, and the teraphim, and the graven image, and went in the midst of the people. 21. So they turned and departed, and put the little ones and the cattle and the carriage before them. 22. And when they were a good way from the house of Micah, the men that were in the houses near to Micah's house were gathered together, and overtook the children of Dan. 23. And they cried unto the children of Dan. And they turned their faces, and said unto Micah, What aileth thee, that thou comest with such a company? 24. And he said, Ye have taken away my gods which I made, and the priest, and ye are gone away: and what have I more? and what is this that ye say unto me, What aileth thee? 25. And the children of Dan said unto him, Let not thy voice be heard among us, lest angry fellows run upon thee, and thou lose thy life, with the lives of thy household. 26. And the children of Dan went their way: and when Micah saw that they were too strong for him, he turned and went back unto his house.

The Danites had sent out their spies to find out a country for them, and they sped well in their search; but here, now that they came to the place, (for, till that brought it to their mind, it does not appear that they had mentioned it to their brethren,) they oblige them with a further discovery, they can tell them where there are gods; "Here, in these houses, there are an ephod, and teraphim, and a great many fine things, for devotion, such as we have not the like in our country, now, therefore, consider what ye have to do, v. 14. We consulted them, and had a good answer from them; they are worth having, nay, they are worth stealing, (that is, having, upon the worst terms,) and if we can but make ourselves masters of these gods, we may the better hope to prosper, and make ourselves masters of Laish." So far they were in the right, that it was desirable to have God's presence with them, but wretchedly mistaken, when they took these images for tokens of God's presence, which were fitter to be used in a puppet-play, than in acts of devotion. They thought an oracle would be pretty company for them in their enterprise, and, instead of a council of war, to advise upon every emergency; and the place they were going to settle in, being so far from Shiloh, they thought they had more need of a house of gods among themselves, than Micah had, that lived so near it. They might have made as good an ephod and teraphim themselves as this was, and which would have served their purpose every whit as well, but the reputation which they found this in the possession of, (though it had that reputation but a while,) amused them into a strange veneration for it, which they would soon have dropped, if they had had so much sense as to inquire into its original, and whether there was any thing divine in its institution.

Being determined to take these gods along with them, we are here told how they stole the images, cajoled the priest, and frightened Micah from attempting to rescue them.

I. The five men that knew the house, and the avenues to it, and particularly the chapel, went in and fetched out the images, with the ephod, and teraphim, and all the appertenances, while the six hundred men kept the priest in talk at the gate, v. 16. . 18. See what little care this sorry priest took of his gods; while he was sauntering at the gate, and gazing at the strangers, his treasure (such as it was) was gone. See how impotent these sorry gods were, that could not keep themselves from being stolen; it is mentioned as the reproach of idols, that themselves are gone into captivity, Isa. 46. 2. Oh the sottishness of these Danites! How could they imagine those gods should protect them, that could not keep themselves from being stolen? Yet, because they went by the name of gods, as if it were not enough that they had with them the presence of the invisible God, nor that they stood in relation to the rabernacl, where there were even visible tokens of his presence, nothing will serve them but they must have gods to go before them, not of their own making, indeed, but, which was as bad, of their own stealing. Their idolatry began in theft, a proper prologue for such an opera. In order to the breaking of the second commandment, they begin with the eighth, and take their neighbour's goods to make them their gods. The holy God hates robbery for burnt-offerings, but the Devil loves it. Had these Danites seized the images, to deface and abolish them, and the priest, to punish him, they had done like Israelites indeed, and had appeared jealous for their God, as their fathers had done; (Josh. 22. 16.) but, to take them for their own use was such a complicated crime, as shewed they neither feared God nor regarded man, but were perfectly lost both to godliness and honesty.

II. They set upon the priest, and flattered him into a good humour, not only to let the gods go, but to go himself along with them; for, without him, they knew not well how to make use of the gods. Observe, 1. How they tempted him, v. 19. They assured him of better preferment with them than what he now had. It would be more honour and profit to be chaplain to a regiment, (for they were no more, though they call themselves a tribe,) than to be only a domestic chaplain to a private gentleman. Let him go with them, and he shall have more dependents on him, more sacrifices brought to his altar, and more fees for consulting his teraphim, than he had here. 2. How they won him. A little persuasion served, his heart was glad, v. 20. The proposal took well enough with his rambling fancy, which would never let him stay long at a place, and gratified his covetousness and ambition. He had no reason to say, but that he was well off, where he was, Micah had not deceived him, or changed his wages, he was not moved with any remorse of conscience for attending on a graven image; had he gone away to Shiloh to minister to the Lord's priests, according to the duty of a Levite, he might have been welcome there, (Deut. 18. 6.) and his removal had been commendable; but, instead of that, he takes the images with him, and carries the infection of the idolatry into the whole city. It had been very unjust and ungrateful to Micah, if he had only gone away himself, but much more so, to take the images along with him, which, he knew, the heart of Micah was set upon. Yet better could not be expected from a treacherous Levite; what house can be sure of him who has forsaken the house of the Lord? Or what friend will he be true to, that has been false to his God? He could not pretend that he was under compulsive force, for he was glad in his heart to go. If ten shekels won him, (as Bishop Hall expresses it,) eleven would lose him; for what can hold those that have made shipwreck of a good conscience? The hireling flees, because he is a hireling. The priest and his gods went in the midst of the people, there they placed him, that they might secure him, either from going back himself, if his mind should change, or from being fetched back by Micah; or, perhaps, in imitation of the order of Israel's march through the wilderness, in which the ark and the priests went in the midst of their camp.

III. They frightened Micah back, when he pursued them to recover his gods. As soon as ever he perceived that his chapel was plundered, and his chaplain had run away from him, he mustered all the forces he could, and pursued the robbers, v. 22. His neighbours, and perhaps tenants, that used to join with him in his devotions, were forward to help him on this occasion; they got together, and pursued the robbers, who, having their children and cattle before them, (v. 21.) could make no great haste, so that they soon overtook them; hoping, by strength of reason, to recover what was stolen, for the disproportion of their numbers was such, that they could not hope to do it by strength of arm. The pursuers called after them, desiring to speak a word with them; they, in the rear, (where, it is probable, they posted the fiercest and strongest of their company, expecting there to be attacked,) turned about, and asked Micah what ailed him to be so much concerned, and what he would have, v. 23. He argues with them, and pleads his right, which he thought should prevail; but they, in answer, plead their might, which, it proved, did prevail; for it is common that might overcomes right.

1. He insists upon the wrong they had certainly done him; (v. 24.) "Ye have taken away my gods, my images of God, which I have such an incontestable title to, for I made them myself, and which I have such an affection for, that I am undone if I lose them, for what have I more that will do me any good, if these be gone?" Now, (1.) This discovers to us the folly of idolaters, and the power that Satan has over them. What a folly was it for him to call those his gods, which he had made, when he only is to be worshipped by us, as a God, that made us! Folly, indeed, to set his heart upon such silly idle things, and to look upon himself as undone, when he had lost them! (2.) This may discover to us our spiritual idolatry; that creature which we place our happiness in, which we set our affections inordinately upon, and which we can by no means find in our hearts to part with, of which we say, "What have we more?" That we make an idol of. That is put in God's place, and is an usurper, which we are concerned about, as if our life and comfort, our hope and happiness, and all, were bound up in it. But, (3.) If all people will thus walk in the name of their god, shall we not be, in like manner, affected towards our God, the true God? Let us reckon the having of an interest in God, and communion with him, incomparably the richest portion, and the loss of God the sorest loss; woe unto us if we depart, for what have we more? Deserted souls, that are lamenting after the Lord, may well wonder, as Micah did, that you should ask what ails them. For the tokens of God's favour are suspended, his comforts are withdrawn; and what have they more?

2. They insist upon the mischief they would certainly do him, if he prosecuted his demand. They would not hear reason, nor do justice, nor would so much as offer to pay him the prime cost he had been at upon those images, nor promise to make restitution of what they had taken, when they had served their present purpose with them in this expedition, and had time to copy them, and make others like them for themselves; much less had they any compassion for a loss he so bitterly lamented; they would not so much as accost him kindly, or give him good words, but resolve to justify their robbery with murder, if he did not immediately let fall his claims; (v. 25.) "Take heed, lest angry fellows run upon thee, and thou lose thy life; and that is worse than losing thy gods." Wicked and unreasonable men reckon it a great provocation to be asked to do justice, and support themselves by their power against right and reason. Micah's crime is asking his own, yet, for this, he is in danger to lose his life, and the lives of his household. Micah has not courage enough to venture his life for the rescue of his gods, so little opinion had he of their being able to protect him and bear him out, and therefore tamely gives them up; (v. 26.) He turned, and went back to his house; and if the loss of his idols did but convince him (as, one would think, it should) of their vanity and impotency, and of his own folly in setting his heart upon them, and send him back to the true God from whom he had revolted, he that lost them had a much better bargain than they that by force of arms carried them off. If the loss of our idols cure us of the love of them, and make us say, What have we to do any more with idols? the loss will be unspeakable gain. See Isa. 2. 20.—30. 22.

27. And they took the things which Micah had made, and the priest which he had, and came unto Laish, unto a people that were at quiet and secure: and they smote them with the edge of the sword, and burnt the city with fire. 28. And there was no deliverer, because it was far from Zidon, and they had no business with any man: and it was in the valley that lieth by Beth-rehob. And they built a city, and dwelt therein. 29. And they called the name of the city Dan, after the name of Dan their father, who was born unto Israel: howbeit the name of the city was Laish at the first. 30. And the children of Dan set up the graven image: and Jonathan, the son of Gershom, the son of Manasseh, he and his sons were priests to the tribe of Dan until the day of the captivity of the land. 31. And they set them up Micah's graven image, which he made, all the time that the house of God was in Shiloh.

Here is,

I. Laish conquered by the Danites. They proceeded on their march, and, because they met with no disaster, perhaps concluded they had not done amiss in robbing Micah; many justify themselves in their impiety by their prosperity. Observe, 1. What posture they found the people of Laish in, both those of the city, and those of the country about; they were quiet and secure, not jealous of the five spies that had been among them to search out the land, nor had they any intelligence of the approach of this enemy, which made them a very easy prey to this little handful of men that came upon them, v. 27. Note, Many are brought to destruction by their security. Satan gets advantage against us when we are careless and off our watch; happy, therefore, is the man that feareth always. 2. What a complete victory they obtained over them; they put all the people to the sword, and burnt down so much of the city as they thought fit to rebuild, (v. 27, 28.) and, for aught that appears herein, they met with no resistance; for the measure of the iniquity of the Canaanites was full, that of the Danites was but beginning to fill. 3. How the conquerors settled themselves in their room, v. 28, 29. They built the city, or much of it, anew, (the old buildings being gone to decay,) and called the name of it Dan, to be a witness for them that they were Danites by birth, though separated so far off from their brethren, which might, hereafter, by reason of their distance, be called in question. We should feel concerned not to lose the privilege of our relation to God's Israel, and therefore should take all occasions to own it, and preserve the remembrance of it to our's after us.

II. Idolatry immediately set up there. God had graciously performed his promise, in putting them in possession of that which fell to their lot, obliging them thereby to be faithful to him who had been so to them; they inherited the labour of the people, that they might observe his statutes, Ps. 105. 44, 55. But the first thing they do after they are settled, is, to break his statutes; as soon as they began to settle themselves, they set up the graven image, (v. 30.) perversely attributing their success to that idol, which, if God had not been infinitely patient, would have been their ruin. Thus a prosperous idolater goes on to offend, imputing this his power unto his god, Hab. 1. 11. Their Levite, who officiated as priest, is at length named here, Jonathan, the son of Gershom, the son of Manasseh. The word Manasseh, in the original, has the letter Nun set over the head, which, some of the Jewish rabbins say, is an intimation that it should be left out, and then Manasseh will be Moses, and this Levite, they say, was grandson to the famous Moses, who, indeed, had a son, named Gershom; but, say they, the historian, in honour of Moses, by a half interposition of that letter, turned the name into Manasseh. The vulgar Latin reads it Moses. And if, indeed, Moses had a grandson that was rakish, and was picked up as a fit tool to be made use of in the setting up of idolatry, it is not the only instance (would to God it were!) of the unhappy degenerating of the posterity of great and good men. Children's children are not always the crown of old men. But the learned Bishop Patrick takes this to be an idle conceit of the rabbins, and supposes this Jonathan to be of some other family of the Levites. How long these corruptions continued, we are told in the close. 1 That the posterity of this Jonathan continued to act as priests to this family of Dan, that was seated at Laish, and in the country about, till the captivity, v. 30. After Micah's image was removed, that family retained the character of priests, and had respect paid them as such by that city, and it is very probable that Jeroboam had an eye to them, when he set up one of his calves there, (which they would welcome at Dan, and put some reputation upon, when the priests of the Lord would have nothing to do with them,) and that his family officiated as some of his priests. 2. That these images continued till Samuel's time, for so long the ark of God was at Shiloh; and, it is probable, in his time effectual care was taken to suppress and abolish this idolatry. See how dangerous it is to admit an infection, for spiritual distempers are not so soon cured as caught.

CHAP. XIX.

The three remaining chapters of this book contain a most tragical story of the wickedness of the men of Gibeah, patronised by the tribe of Benjamin, for which that tribe was severely chastised, and almost entirely cut off, by the rest of the tribes. This seems to have been done, not long after the death of Joshua, for it was when there was no king, no judge, in Israel; (v. 1. and ch. 21. 25.) and Phinehas was then high priest, ch. 20. 28. These particular iniquities, the Danites' idolatry, and the Benjamites' immorality, let in that general apostacy, ch. 3. 7. The abuse of the Levite's concubine is here very particularly related. I. Her adulterous clopement from him, v. 1, 2. II. His reconciliation to her, and the journey he took to fetch her home, v. 3. III. Her father's kind entertainment of him, v. 4. 9. IV. The abuse he met with at Gibeah, where, being benighted, he was forced to take up. 1. He was neglected by the men of Gibeah, (v. 10. 15.) and entertained by an Ephraimite that sojourned among them, v. 16. 21. 2. They set upon him in his quarters, as the Sodomites did on Lot's guests, v. 22. 24. 3. They villanously forced this concubine to death, v. 25. 28. V. The course he took, to send notice of this to all the tribes of Israel, v. 29, 30.

1. AND it came to pass in those days, when there was no king in Israel, that there was a certain Levite sojourning on the side of mount Ephraim, who took to him a concubine out of Beth-lehem-judah. 2. And his concubine played the whore against him, and went away from him unto her father's house to Beth-lehem-judah, and was there four whole months. 3. And her husband arose, and went after her, to speak friendly unto her, and to bring her again, having his servant with him, and a couple of asses: and she brought him into her father's house: and when the father of the damsel saw him, he rejoiced to meet him. 4. And his father-in-law, the damsel's father, retained him; and he abode with him three days: so they did eat and drink, and lodged there. 5. And it came to pass on the fourth day, when they arose early in the morning, that he rose up to depart: and the damsel's father said unto his son-in-law, Comfort thine heart with a morsel of bread, and afterward go your way. 6. And they sat down, and did eat and drink both of them together: for the damsel's father had said unto the man, Be content, I pray thee, and tarry all night, and let thine heart be merry. 7. And when the man rose up to depart, his father-in-law urged him: therefore he lodged there again. 8. And he arose early in the morning on the fifth day to depart: and the damsel's father said, Comfort thine heart, I pray thee. And they tarried until afternoon, and they did eat both of them. 9. And when the man rose up to depart, he, and his concubine, and his servant, his father-in-law, the damsel's father, said unto him, Behold, now the day draweth toward evening, I pray you tarry all night: behold, the day groweth to an end, lodge here, that thine heart may be merry; and to-morrow get you early on your way, that thou mayest go home. 10. But the man would not tarry that night, but he arose up and departed, and came over against Jebus, which is Jerusalem; and there were with him two asses saddled, his concubine also was with him. 11. And when they were by Jebus, the day was far spent; and the servant said unto his master, Come, I pray thee, and let us turn in unto this city of the Jebusites, and lodge in it. 12. And his master said unto him, We will not turn aside hither into the city of a stranger, that is not of the children of Israel; we will pass over to Gibeah. 13. And he said unto his servant, Come, and let us draw near to one of these places to lodge all night, in Gibeah, or in Ramah. 14. And they passed on and went their way; and the sun went down upon them when they were by Gibeah, which belongeth to Benjamin. 15. And they turned aside thither, to go in and to lodge in Gibeah: and when he went in, he sat him down in a street of the city: for there was no man that took them into his house to lodging.

The domestic affairs of this Levite would not have been related thus largely, but to make way for the following story of the injuries done him, in which the whole nation interested themselves. Bishop Hall's first remark upon this story is, That there is no complaint of a public ordered state, but there is a Levite at one end of it, either as an agent, or as a patient. In Micah's idolatry, a Levite was active; in the wickedness of Gibeah, a Levite was passive; no tribe shall sooner feel the want of government than that of Levi; and, in all the book of Judges, no mention is made of any of that tribe, but of these two. This Levite was of mount Ephraim, v.1. He married a wife of Bethlehem-Judah; she is called his concubine, because she was not endowed, for perhaps he had nothing to endow her with, being himself a sojourner, and not settled; but it does not appear that he had any other wife, and the margin calls her a wife, a concubine, v.1. She came from the same city that Micah's Levite came from, as if Bethlehem-Judah owed a double ill turn to mount Ephraim, for she was as bad for a Levite's wife, as that other for a Levite.

I. This Levite's concubine played the whore, and eloped from her husband, v.2. The Chaldee reads it, only that she carried it insolently to him, or despised him, and he being displeased at it, she went away from him, and (which was not fair) was received and entertained at her father's house. Had her husband turned her out of doors unjustly, her father ought to have pitied her affliction; but when she treacherously departed from her husband to embrace the bosom of a stranger, her father ought not to have countenanced her sin. Perhaps she would not have violated her duty to her husband, if she had not known too well where she should be kindly received. Children's ruin is often owing very much to parents' indulgence.

II. The Levite went himself to court her return. It was a sign there was no king, no judge, in Israel, else she had been prosecuted and put to death, as an adulteress; but, instead of that, she is applied to in the most respectful manner by her injured husband, who takes a long journey on purpose to beseech her to be reconciled, v.3. If he had put her away, it had been a crime in him to return to her again, Jer.3.1. But, she having gone away, it was a virtue in him to forgive the offence, and, though the party wronged, to make the first motion to her to be friends again. It is part of the character of the wisdom from above, that it is gentle and easy to be entreated. He spake friendly to her, or comfortably, for so the Hebrew phrase of speaking to the heart commonly signifies; which intimates that she was in sorrow, penitent for what she had done amiss, which, probably, he heard of when he came to fetch her back. Thus God promises concerning adulterous Israel, (Hos.2.14.) I will bring her into the wilderness, and speak comfortably unto her.

III. Her father bid him very welcome, and, by his extraordinary kindness to him, endeavoured to atone for the countenance he had given his daughter in withdrawing from him, and to confirm him in his disposition to be reconciled to her. 1. He entertains him kindly, rejoices to see him, (v.3.) treats him generously for three days, v.4. And the Levite, to shew that he was perfectly reconciled, accepted his kindness, and we do not find that he upbraided him or his daughter with what had been amiss, but was as easy and as pleasant as at his first wedding-feast. It becomes all, but especially Levites, to forgive, as God does. Every thing among them gave a hopeful prospect of their living comfortably together for the future; but, could they have foreseen what befell them within one day or two, how would all their mirth have been imbittered and turned into mourning! When the affairs of our families are in the best posture, we ought to rejoice with trembling, because we know not what troubles one day may bring forth. We cannot foresee what evil is near us, but we ought to consider what may be, that we may not be secure, as if to-morrow must needs be as this day, and much more abundant, Isa.56.12. 2. He is very earnest for his stay, as a further demonstration of his hearty welcome; the affection he had for him, and the pleasure he took in his company, proceeded, (1.) From a civil regard to him as his son-in-law and an ingrafted branch of his own house. Note, Love and duty are owing to those whom we are by marriage related to, as well as to those who are bone of our bone: and they that shew kindness, as this Levite did, may expect, as he did, to receive kindness. And, (2.) From a pious respect to him as a Levite, a servant of God's house; if he were such a Levite as he should be, (and nothing appears to the contrary,) he is to be commended for courting his stay, finding his conversation profitable, and having opportunity to learn from him the good knowledge of the Lord, hoping also that the Lord will do him good, because he has a Levite to be his son-in-law, and will bless him for his sake. [1.] He forces him to stay the fourth day, and that was kind; not knowing when they might be together again, he engages him to stay as long as he possibly could. The Levite, though nobly treated, was very urgent to be gone; a good man's heart is where his business is, for as a bird that wanders from her nest, so is the man that wanders from his place. It is a sign a man has either little to do at home, or little heart to do what he has to do, that can take pleasure in being long abroad, where he has nothing to do. It is especially good to see a Levite willing to go home to his few sheep in the wilderness. Yet this Levite was overcome, by importunity and kind management, to stay longer than he intended, v.5..7. We ought to avoid the extreme of an over-easy yielding, to the neglect of our duty on the one hand, and that of moroseness and wilfulness, to the neglect of our friends and their kindness on the other hand. Our Saviour, after his resurrection, was prevailed upon to stay with his friends longer than he at first intimated to be his purpose, Luke,24.28,29. [2.] He forces him to stay till the afternoon of the fifth day, and that, as it proved, was unkind, v.8,9. He would by no means let him go before dinner, promises him he shall have dinner early, designing thereby, as he had done the day before, to detain him another night; but the Levite was intent on the house of the Lord at Shiloh, (v.18.) and being impatience to get thither, would stay no longer. Had they set out early, they might have reached some better lodging-place than that which they were now constrained to take up with, nay, they might have got to Shiloh. Note, Our friends' designed kindnesses often prove, in the event, real injuries; what is meant for our welfare becomes a trap. Who knows what is good for a man in this life? The Levite was unwise in setting out so late; he might have got home better, if he had staid a night longer, and taken the day before him.

IV. In the return home, he was forced to lodge at Gibeah, a city in the tribe of Benjamin, afterward called Gibeah of Saul, which lay on his road toward Shiloh and mount Ephraim. When it drew toward night, and the shadows of the evening were stretched out, they began to think (as it behoves us to do when we observe the day of our life hastening towards a period) where they must lodge. When night came, they could not pursue their journey; he that walketh in darkness, knoweth not whither he goes: they could not but desire rest, for which the night was intended, as the day for labour. 1. The servant proposed that they should lodge in Jebus, afterward Jerusalem, but as yet in the possession of Jebusites, "Come," (said the servant,) "let us lodge in this city of the Jebusites," v. 11. And, if they had done so, it is probable they had had much better usage than they met with in Gibeah of Benjamin. Debauched and profligate Israelites are worse, and much more dangerous, than Canaanites themselves. 2. But the master, as became one of God's tribe, would by no means quarter, no, not one night, in a city of strangers, (v. 12.) not because he questioned his safety among them, but he was not willing, if he could possibly avoid it, to have so much intimacy and familiarity with them as a night's lodging came to, nor to be so much beholden to them. By shunning this place, he would witness against the wickedness of those that contracted friendship and familiarity with those devoted nations. Let Israelites, Levites especially, associate with Israelites, and not with the sons of the stranger. 3. Having passed by Jebus, which was about five or six miles from Beth-lehem, (the place whence they came,) and not having day-light to bring them to Ramah, they stopped at Gibeah; (v. 13. . 15.) there they sat down in the street, nobody offering them a lodging. In these countries, at that time, there were no inns, or public-houses, in which, as with us, travellers might have entertainment for their money; but they carried entertainment along with them, as this Levite did here, (v. 19.) and depended upon the courtesy and hospitality of the inhabitants for a lodging. Let us take occasion from hence, when we are in journeys, to thank God for this, among other conveniencies of travelling, that there are inns to entertain strangers, and in which they may be welcome, and well accommodated, for their money. Surely there is no country in the world, wherein one may stay at home with more satisfaction, or go abroad with more comfort, than in our own nation. This traveller, though a Levite, (and to those of that tribe God had particularly commanded his people to be kind upon all occasions,) met with very cold entertainment at Gibeah, no man took them into his house; if they had any reason to think he was a Levite, perhaps that made those ill-disposed people the more shy of him. There are those who will have this laid to their charge at the great day, I was a stranger, and ye took me not in.

16. And, behold, there came an old man from his work out of the field at even, which was also of mount Ephraim; and he sojourned in Gibeah: but the men of the place were Benjamites. 17. And when he had lifted up his eyes, he saw a way-faring man in the street of the city: and the old man said, Whither goest thou? and whence comest thou? 18. And he said unto him, We are passing from Beth-lehem-judah toward the side of mount Ephraim; from thence am I: and I went to Bethlehem-jndam, but I am now going to the house of the LORD; and there is no man that receiveth me to house. 19. Yet there is both straw and provender for our asses; and there is bread and wine also for me and for thy handmaid, and for the young man which is with thy servants: there is no want of any thing. 20. And the old man said, Peace be with thee; howsoever, let all thy wants lie upon me: only lodge not in the street. 21. So he brought him into his house, and gave provender unto the asses: and they washed their feet, and did eat and drink.

Though there was not one of Gibeah, yet it proved there was one in Gibeah, that shewed some civility to this distressed Levite, who was glad that any one took notice of him. It was strange that some of those wicked people, who, when it was dark, designed so ill to him and his concubine, did not, under pretence of kindness, invite them in, that they might have a fairer opportunity of perpetrating their villany; but either they had not wit enough to be so designing, or not wickedness enough to be so deceiving. Or, perhaps, none of them separately thought of such a wickedness, till in the black and dark night they got together to contrive what mischief they should do. Bad people in confederacy make one another much worse than any of them would be by themselves. When the Levite, and his wife, and servant, were beginning to fear that they must lie in the street all night, (and as good have lain in a den of lions,) they were at length invited into a house. And we are here told,

I. Who that kind man was that invited them. He was a man of mount Ephraim, and only sojourned in Gibeah, v. 16. Of all the tribes of Israel, the Benjamites had most reason to be kind to poor travellers, for their ancestor, Benjamin, was born upon the road, his mother then upon a journey, and very near to this place, Gen. 35. 16, 17. Yet they were hard-hearted to a traveller in distress, while an honest Ephraimite had compassion on him, and, no doubt, was the more kind to him, when, upon inquiry, he found that he was his countryman, of mount Ephraim likewise. He, that was himself but a sojourner in Gibeah, was the more compassionate to a wayfaring man, for he knew the heart of a stranger, Exod. 23. 9. Deut. 10. 19. Good people, that look upon themselves but as strangers and sojourners in this world, should, for this reason, be tender to one another, because they all belong to the same better country, and are not at home here. 2. He was an old man, one that retained some of the expiring virtue of an Israelite; the rising generation was entirely corrupted; if there was any good remaining among them, it was only with those that were old and going off. 3. He was coming home from his work out of the field at even. The evening calls home labourers, Ps. 104. 23. But, it should seem, this was the only labourer that this evening brought home to Gibeah. The rest had given up themselves to sloth and luxury, and no marvel there was among them, as in Sodom, abundance of uncleanness, when there was among them, as in Sodom, abundance of idleness, Ezek. 16. 49. But he that was honestly diligent in his business, all day, was disposed to be generously hospitable to these poor strangers, at night. Let men labour, that they may have to give, Eph. 4. 28. It appears, from v. 21. that he was a man of some substance, and yet had been himself at work in the field. No man's estate will privilege him in idleness.

II. How free and generous he was in his invitation: he did not stay till they applied themselves to him to beg for a night's lodging, but, when he saw them, (v. 17.) inquired into their circumstances, and prevented them with his kindness: thus our good God answers before we call. Note, A charitable disposition expects only opportunity, not importunity, to do good, and will succour, upon sight, unsought unto. Hence we read of a bountiful eye, Prov. 22. 9.

If Gibeah was like Sodom, this old man was like Lot in Sodom, who sat in the gate to invite strangers, Gen. 19. 1. Thus Job opened his doors to the traveller, and would not suffer him to lodge in the street, Job, 31. 32. Observe, 1. How ready he was to give credit to the Levite's account of himself, when he saw no reason at all to question the truth of it. Charity is not apt to distrust, but hopeth all things, (1 Cor. 13. 7.) and will not make use of Nabal's excuse for his churlishness to David, Many servants now-a-days break from their master, 1 Sam. 25. 10. The Levite, in his account of himself, professes that he was now going to the house of the Lord, (v. 18.) for there he designed to attend, either with a trespass-offering for the sins of his family, or with a peace-offering for the mercies of his family, or both, before he went to his own house. And if the men of Gibeah had any intimation of his being bound that way, probably, they would therefore be disinclined to entertain him; the Samaritans would not receive Christ, because his face was toward Jerusalem, Luke, 9. 53. But for that reason, because he was a Levite, and was now going to the house of the Lord, this good old man was the more kind to him. Thus he received a disciple in the name of a disciple, a servant of God for his Master's sake. 2. How free he was to give him entertainment. The Levite was himself provided with all necessaries, (v. 19.) wanted nothing but a lodging, but his generous host would be himself at the charge of his entertainment, (v. 20.) Let all thy wants be upon me; so he brought him into his house, v. 21. Thus God will, some way or other, raise up friends for his people and ministers, even when they seem forlorn.

22. Now as they were making their hearts merry, behold, the men of the city, certain sons of Belial, beset the house round about, and beat at the door, and spake to the master of the house, the old man, saying, Bring forth the man that came into thine house, that we may know him. 23. And the man, the master of the house, went out unto them, and said unto them, Nay, my brethren, nay, I pray you, do not so wickedly; seeing that this man is come into mine house, do not this folly. 24. Behold, here is my daughter a maiden, and his concubine; them I will bring out now, and humble ye them, and do with them what seemeth good unto you: but unto this man do not so vile a thing. 25. But the men would not hearken to him: so the man took his concubine, and brought her forth unto them; and they knew her, and abused her all the night until the morning: and when the day began to spring, they let her go. 26. Then came the woman in the dawning of the day, and fell down at the door of the man's house where her lord was, till it was light. 27. And her lord rose up in the morning, and opened the doors of the house, and went out to go his way: and, behold, the woman his concubine was fallen down at the door of the house, and her hands were upon the threshold. 28. And he said unto her, Up, and let us be going. But none answered. Then the man took her up upon an ass, and the man rose up, and gat him unto his place. 29. And when he was come into his house, he took a knife, and laid hold on his concubine, and divided her, together with her bones, into twelve pieces, and sent her into all the coasts of Israel. 30. And it was so, that all that saw it said, There was no such deed done nor seen from the day that the children of Israel came up out of the land of Egypt unto this day: consider of it, take advice, and speak your minds.

Here is,

I. The great wickedness of the men of Gibeah. One could not imagine that ever it should enter into the heart of men that had the use of human reason, of Israelites that had the benefit of divine revelation, to be so very wicked. "Lord, what is man!" said David, "what a mean creature is he!" "Lord, what is man," may we say, upon the reading of this story, "what a vile creature is he, when he is given up to his own heart's lusts! 1. The sinners are here called the sons of Belial, that is, ungovernable men, men that would endure no yoke. Children of the devil, for he is Belial, resembling him, and joining with him in rebellion against God and his government. Sons of Benjamin, of whom Moses had said, The beloved of the Lord shall dwell in safety by him, (Deut. 33. 12.) are become such sons of Belial, that an honest man cannot lodge in safety among them. 2. The sufferers were a Levite and his wife, and that kind man that gave them entertainment. We are strangers upon earth, and must expect strange usage. It is said they were making their hearts merry when this trouble came upon them, v. 22. If the mirth was innocent, it teaches us of what uncertain continuance all our creature-comforts and enjoyments are; when we are ever so well pleased with our friends, we know not how near our enemies are; nor, if it be well with us this hour, can we be sure it will be so the next. If the mirth was sinful and excessive, let it be a warning to us to keep a strict guard upon ourselves, that we grow not intemperate in the use of lawful things, nor be transported into indecencies by our cheerfulness, for the end of that mirth is heaviness. God can soon change the note of those that are making their hearts merry, and turn their laughter into mourning, and their joy into heaviness.

Let us see what the wickedness of these Benjamites was.

(1.) They made a rude and insolent assault, in the night, upon the habitation of an honest man, that not only lived peaceably among them, but kept a good house, and was a blessing and ornament to their city. They beset the house round, and, to the great terror of those within, beat as hard as they could at the door, v. 22. A man's house is his castle, in which he ought to be both safe and quiet, and, where there is law, it is taken under the special protection of it; but there was no king in Israel to keep the peace, and secure honest men from the sons of violence.

(2.) They had a particular spite at the strangers that were within their gates, that only desired a night's lodging among them, contrary to the laws of hospitality, which all civilized nations have accounted sacred, and which the master of the house pleaded with them; (v. 23.) Seeing that this man is come into my house. They are base and abject spirits indeed, that will trample upon the helpless, and use a man the worse for his being a stranger, whom they know no ill of.

(3.) They designed, in the most filthy and abominable manner, (not to be thought of without horror and detestation,) to abuse the Levite, whom perhaps they had observed to be young and comely. Bring him forth, that we may know him. We should certainly have concluded they meant only to inquire whence he came, and to know his character, but that the good man of the house, who understood their meaning too well, by his answer lets us know that they designed the gratification of that most unnatural and worse than brutish lust, which was expressly forbidden by the law of Moses, and called an abomination, Lev. 18. 22. They that are guilty of it are ranked in the New Testament among the worst and vilest of sinners, (1 Tim. 1. 10.) and such as shall not inherit the kingdom of God, 1 Cor. 6. 9. Now, [1.] This was the sin of Sodom, and from thence is called Sodomy. The dead Sea, which was the standing monument of God's vengeance upon Sodom for its filthiness, was one of the boundaries of Canaan, and lay not many miles off from Gibeah; we may suppose the men of Gibeah had seen it many a time, and yet would not take warning by it, but did worse than Sodom, (Ezek. 16. 48.) and sinned just after the similitude of their transgression. Who would have expected (says Bishop Hall) such extreme abomination to come out of the loins of Jacob? Even the worst pagans were saints to them. What did it avail them that they had the ark of God in Shiloh, when they had Sodom in their streets; God's law in their fringes, but the devil in their hearts? Nothing but hell itself can yield a worse creature than a depraved Israelite. [2.] This was the punishment of their idolatry, that sin to which they were, above all other, most addicted. Because they liked not to retain God in their knowledge, therefore he gave them up to these vile affections, by which they dishonoured themselves, as they had by their idolatry dishonoured him, and turned his glory into shame, Rom. 1. 24, 28. See and admire, in this instance, the patience of God; why were not these sons of Belial struck blind, as the Sodomites were? Why were not fire and brimstone rained from heaven upon their city? It was because God would leave it to Israel to punish them by the sword, and would reserve his own punishment of them for the future state, in which those that go after strange flesh shall suffer the vengeance of eternal fire, Jude, 7.

(4.) They were deaf to the reproofs and reasonings of the good man of the house, who, being well acquainted (we may suppose) with the story of Lot and the Sodomites, seeing the men of this city imitate the Sodomites, set himself to imitate Lot, v. 23, 24. Compare Gen. 19. 6. . 8. He went out to them as Lot did, spoke civilly to them, and called them brethren, begged of them to desist, pleaded the protection of his house which his guests were under, and represented to them the great wickedness of their attempt; "Do not so wickedly, so very wickedly," he calls it folly and a vile thing. But in one thing he conformed too far to Lot's example, (as we are apt, in imitating good men, to follow them, even in their false steps,) in offering them his daughter to do what they would with. He had not power thus to prostitute his daughter, nor ought he to have done this evil that good might come. But this wicked proposal of his may be in part excused, from the great surprise and terror he was in, his concern for his guests, and his having too close a regard to what Lot did in the like case, especially not finding that the angels, who were by, reproved him for it. And perhaps he hoped that his mentioning of this, as a more natural gratification of their lust, would have sent them back to their common harlots. But they would not hearken to him, v. 25. Headstrong lusts are like the deaf adder that stoppeth her ear, they sear the conscience, and make it insensible.

(5.) They got the Levite's wife among them, and abused her to death, v. 25. They slighted the old man's offer of his daughter to their lust, either because she was not handsome, or because they knew her to be one of great gravity and modesty; but when the Levite brought them his concubine, they took her with them by force to the place appointed for their filthiness. Josephus, in his narrative of this story, makes her to be the person they had a design upon when they beset the house, and says nothing of their villainous design upon the Levite himself. They saw her (he says) in the street, when they came into the town, and were smitten with her beauty; and perhaps, though she was reconciled to her husband, her looks did not speak her to be one of the most modest; many bring mischief of this kind upon themselves by their loose carriage and behaviour; a little spark may kindle a great fire. One would think the Levite should have followed them, to see what became of his wife, but it is probable he durst not, lest they should do him a mischief. In the miserable end of this woman, we may see the righteous hand of God, punishing her for her former uncleanness, when she played the whore against her husband, v. 12. Though her father had countenanced her, and her husband had forgiven her, and the fault was forgotten, now that the quarrel was made up, yet God remembered it against her, when he suffered these wicked men thus wretchedly to abuse her; in doing which, how unrighteous soever they were, in permitting it the Lord was righteous. Her punishment answered her sin Culpa libido fuit, pœna libido fuit—Lust was her sin, and lust was her punishment. By the law of Moses, she was to have been put to death for her adultery; she escaped that punishment from men, yet vengeance pursued her; for if there was no king in Israel, yet there was a God in Israel, a God that judgeth in the earth. We must not think it enough to make our peace with men, whom by our sins we have wronged, but are concerned, by repentance and faith, to make our peace with God, who sees not as men see, nor makes so light of sin as men often do. The justice of God in this matter, does not at all extenuate the horrid wickedness of those men of Gibeah, than which nothing could be more barbarous and inhuman.

II. The notice that was sent of this wickedness to all the tribes of Israel. The poor abused woman made towards her husband's lodgings, as soon as ever the approach of the day-light obliged the sons of Belial to let her go, (for those works of darkness hate and dread the light,) v. 25. Down she fell at the door, with her hands on the threshold, begging pardon (as it were) for her former transgression, and in that posture of a penitent, with her mouth in the dust, she expired; there he found her, (v. 26, 27.) supposed her asleep, or overcome with shame and confusion for what had happened, but soon perceived she was dead, (v. 28.) took up her dead body, which, we may suppose, had all over it marks of the hands, the blows, and other abuses, she had received. On this sad occasion, he waved his purpose of going to Shiloh, and went directly home; he that went out in hopes to return rejoicing, came in again melancholy and disconsolate, sat down, and considered, "Is this an injury fit to be passed by?" He cannot call for fire from heaven to consume the men of Gibeah, as those angels did, who were, after the same manner, insulted by the Sodomites. There was no king in Israel, nor (for aught that appears) any Sanhedrim, or great council, to appeal to, and demand justice from; Phinehas is high priest, but he attends closely to the business of the sanctuary, and will be no judge or divider; he has therefore no other way left him, than to appeal to the people; let the community be judge; though they had no general stated assembly of all the tribes, yet it is probable that each tribe had a meeting of their chiefs within itself; to each of the tribes, in their respective meetings, he sent by special messengers a remonstrance of the wrong that was done him, in all its aggravating circumstances, and with it a piece of his wife's dead body, (v. 29.) both to confirm the truth of the story, and to affect them the more with it. He divided it into twelve pieces, according to the bones, so some read it, that is, by the joints, sending one to each tribe, even to Benjamin among the rest, with the hope that some among them would have been moved to join in punishing so great a villany, and the more warmly, because committed by some of their own tribe. It did indeed look very barbarous, thus to mangle a dead body, which, having been so wretchedly dishonoured, ought to have been decently interred; but the Levite designed hereby, 1. To represent their barbarous usage of his wife, whom they had better have cut in pieces thus, than have used as they did. 2. To express his own passionate concern, and thereby to excite the like in them.

And it had the desired effect. All that saw the pieces of the dead body, and were told how the matter was, expressed the same sentiments upon it. (1.) That the men of Gibeah had been guilty of a very heinous piece of wickedness, the like to which had never been known before in Israel, v. 30. It was a complicated crime, loaded and blackened with all possible aggravations. They were not such fools as to make a mock at this sin, or turn the story off with a jest. (2.) That a general assembly of all Israel should be called, to debate what was fit to be done for the punishment of this wickedness, that a stop might be put to this threatening inundation of debauchery, and the wrath of God might not be poured upon the whole nation for it. It is not a common case, and therefore they stir up one another to come together upon the occasion, with this, Consider of it, take advice, and speak your minds. We have here the three great rules by which they that sit in council ought to go in every arduous affair. [1.] Let every man retire into himself, and weigh the matter impartially and fully in his own thoughts, and seriously and calmly consider it, without prejudice on either side, before he speaks of it. [2.] Let them freely talk it over, and every man take advice of his friend, know his opinion, with his reasons, and weigh them. [3.] Then let every man speak his mind, and give his vote according to his conscience. In the multitude of such counsellors there is safety.

CHAP. XX.

Into the book of the wars of the Lord the story of this chapter must be brought, but it looks as sad and uncomfortable as any article in all that history; for there is nothing in it that looks in the least bright or pleasant, but the pious zeal of Israel against the wickedness of the men of Gibeah, which made it on their side a just and holy war; but, otherwise, the obstinacy of the Benjamites in protecting their criminals, which was the foundation of the war, the vast loss which the Israelites sustained in carrying on the war, and (though the righteous cause was victorious at last, yet) the issuing of the war, in the almost utter extirpation of the tribe of Benjamin, make it, from first to last, melancholy. And yet this happened soon after the glorious settlement of Israel in the land of promise, upon which, one would have expected every thing to be prosperous and serene. In this chapter we have, I. The Levite's cause heard in a general convention of the tribes, v. 1..7. II. A unanimous resolve to avenge his quarrel upon the men of Gibeah, v. 8..11. III. The Benjamites appearing in defence of the criminals, v. 12..17. IV. The defeat of Israel in the first and second days' battle, v. 18..25. V. Their humbling of themselves before God upon that occasion, v. 26..28. VI. The total rout they gave the Benjamites in the third engagement, by a stratagem, by which they were all cut off, except six hundred men, v. 29..48. And all this, the effect of the indignities done to one poor Levite and his wife; so little do they, that do iniquity, consider what will be the end thereof.

1. THEN all the children of Israel went out, and the congregation was gathered together as one man, from Dan even to Beer-sheba, with the land of Gilead, unto the Lord in Mizpeh. 2. And the chief of all the people, even of all the tribes of Israel, presented themselves in the assembly of the people of God, four hundred thousand footmen that drew sword. 3. (Now the children of Benjamin heard that the children of Israel were gone up to Mizpeh.) Then said the children of Israel, Tell us, how was this wickedness? 4. And the Levite, the husband of the woman that was slain, answered and said, I came into Gibeah that belongeth to Benjamin, I and my concubine, to lodge. 5. And the men of Gibeah rose against me, and beset the house round about upon me by night, and thought to have slain me: and my concubine have they forced, that she is dead. 6. And I took my concubine, and cut her in pieces, and sent her throughout all the country of the inheritance of Israel: for they have committed lewdness and folly in Israel. 7. Behold, ye are all children of Israel; give here your advice and counsel. 8. And all the people arose as one man, saying, We will not any of us go to his tent, neither will we any of us turn into his house. 9. But now this shall be the thing which we will do to Gibeah; we will go up by lot against it; 10. And we will take ten men of an hundred throughout all the tribes of Israel, and an hundred of a thousand, and a thousand out of ten thousand, to fetch victual for the people, that they may do, when they come to Gibeah of Benjamin, according to all the folly that they have wrought in Israel.

11. So all the men of Israel were gathered against the city, knit together as one man.

Here is,

1. A general meeting of all the congregation of Israel, to examine the matter concerning the Levite's concubine, and to consider what was to be done upon it, v. 1, 2. It does not appear that they were summoned by the authority of any one common head, but they came together by the consent and agreement, as it were, of one common heart, fired with a holy zeal for the honour of God and Israel. 1. The place of their meeting was Mizpeh, they gathered together unto the Lord there; for Mizpeh was so very near to Shiloh, that their encampment might very well be supposed to reach from Mizpeh to Shiloh. Shiloh was a small town, and therefore, when there was a general meeting of the people to present themselves before God, they chose Mizpeh for their head-quarters, which was the next adjoining city of note: perhaps, because they were not willing to give that trouble to Shiloh, which so great an assembly would occasion; it being the residence of the priests that attended the tabernacle. 2. The persons that met, were all Israel, from Dan, (the city very lately so called, ch. 18. 29.) in the north, to Beer-sheba, in the south, with the land of Gilead, that is, the tribes on the other side Jordan, all as one man; so unanimous were they in their concern for the public good. Here was an assembly of the people of God; not a convocation of the Levites and priests, though a Levite was the person principally concerned in the cause, but an assembly of the people, to whom the Levite referred himself with an Appello populum—I appeal to the people; the people of God were four hundred thousand footmen that drew sword, that is, were armed and disciplined, and fit for service; and some of them, perhaps, such as had known the wars of Canaan, ch. 3. 1. In this assembly of all Israel, the chief (or corners) of the people (for the rulers are the corner-stones of the people that keep all together) presented themselves as the representatives of the rest; they rendered themselves at their respective posts, at the head of the thousands and hundreds, the fifties and tens, over which they presided; for so much order and government, we may suppose at least, they had among them, though they had no general or commander in chief. So that here was, (1.) A general congress of the states for counsel; the chief of the people presented themselves, to lead and direct in this affair. (2.) A general rendezvous of the militia for action; all that drew sword and were men of war, (v. 17.) not hirelings or pressed men, but the best freeholders, that went at their own charge. Israel was above six hundred thousand when they came into Canaan, and we have reason to think they were, at this time, much increased, rather than diminished: but then all between twenty and sixty were military men; now we may suppose more than the one half exempted from bearing arms, to husband the land; so that these were as the trained bands. The militia of the two tribes and a half were forty thousand, (Josh. 4. 13.) but the tribes were many more.

II. Notice given to the tribe of Benjamin of this meeting, (v. 3.) They heard that the children of Israel were gone up to Mizpeh: probably, they had a legal summons sent them to appear with their brethren, that the cause might be fairly debated, before any resolutions were taken up upon it, and so the mischiefs that followed would have been happily prevented; but the notice they had of this meeting rather hardened and exasperated them, than awakened them to think of the things that belonged to their peace and honour.

III. A solemn examination of the crime charged upon the men of Gibeah. A very horrid representation of it had been made by the report of the messengers that were sent to call them together, but it was fit it should be more closely inquired into, because such things are often made worse than really they were; a committee therefore was appointed to examine the witnesses, (upon oath, no doubt,) and to report the matter. It is only the testimony of the Levite himself that is here recorded, but it is probable his servant, and the old man, were examined, and gave in their testimony, for that more than one were examined, appears by the original, (v. 3.)

which is, Tell ye us; and the law was, that none should be put to death, much less many, upon the testimony of one witness only. The Levite gives a particular account of the matter. That he came into Gibeah only as a traveller, to lodge there, not exciting the least suspicion that he designed them any ill turn, v. 4. That the men of Gibeah, even those that were of substance among them, that should have been a protection to the stranger within their gates, riotously set upon the house where he lodged, and thought to have slain him; he could not, for shame, relate the demand which they, without shame, made, ch. 19. 22. They declared their sin as Sodom, even the sin of Sodom, but his modesty would not suffer him to repeat it, it was sufficient to say they would have slain him, for he would rather have been slain than have submitted to their villany; and, if they had got him into their hands, they would have abused him to death; witness what they had done to his concubine, they have forced her, that she is dead, v. 5. And, to excite in his countrymen an indignation at this wickedness, he had sent pieces of the mangled body to all the tribes, which had fetched them together to bear their testimony against the lewdness and folly committed in Israel, v. 6. All lewdness is folly, but especially lewdness in Israel; for them to defile their own bodies, who have the honourable seal of the covenant in their flesh; for them to defy the divine vengeance, to whom it is so clearly revealed from heaven—Nabal is their name, and folly is with them. He concludes his declaration with an appeal to the judgment of the court; (v. 7.) Ye are all children of Israel, and therefore ye know law and judgment; (Esth. 1. 13.) “Ye are a holy people to God, and have a dread of every thing which will dishonour God, and defile the land; ye are of the same community, members of the same body, and therefore likely to feel from the distempers of it; ye are the children of Israel, that ought to take particular care of the Levites, God’s tribe among you, and therefore give here your advice and counsel, what is to be done.”

IV. The resolution they came to hereupon, which was, that, being now together, they would not disperse till they had seen vengeance taken upon this wicked city, which was the reproach and scandal of their nation. Observe, 1. Their zeal against the lewdness that was committed. They would not return to their houses, how much soever their families and their affairs at home wanted them, till they had vindicated the honour of God and Israel, and recovered with their swords, if it could not be had otherwise, that satisfaction for the crime which the justice of the nation called for, v. 8. By this they shewed themselves children of Israel indeed, that they preferred the public interest before their private concerns. 2. Their prudence in sending out a considerable body of their forces, to fetch provisions for the rest; (v. 9, 10.) one of ten, and be chosen by lot, forty thousand in all, must go to their respective countries, whence they came, to fetch bread and other necessaries for the subsistence of this great army; for, when they came from home, they took with them provisions only for a journey to Mizpeh, not for an encampment (which might prove long) before Gibeah. This was to prevent their scattering to forage for themselves, which if they had done, it would have been hard to get them all together again, especially all in so good a mind. Note, When there appears in people a pious zeal for any good work, it is best to strike while the iron is hot, for such zeal is apt to cool quickly, if the prosecution of it be delayed. Let it never be said that we left that good work to be done to-morrow, which we could as well have done to-day. 3. Their unanimity in these counsels, and the execution of them. The resolution was voted Nemine contradicente—Without a dissenting voice, (v. 8.) it was one and all; and, when it was put in execution, they were kuit together as one man, v. 11. This was their glory and strength, that the several tribes had no separate interests when the common good was concerned.

12. And the tribes of Israel sent men through all the tribe of Benjamin, saying, What wickedness is this that is done among you? 13. Now therefore deliver us the men, the children of Belial; which are in Gibeah, that we may put them to death, and put away evil from Israel. But the children of Benjamin would not hearken to the voice of their brethren the children of Israel: 14. But the children of Benjamin gathered themselves together out of the cities unto Gibeah, to go out to battle against the children of Israel. 15. And the children of Benjamin were numbered at that time out of the cities twenty and six thousand men that drew sword, beside the inhabitants of Gibeah, which were numbered seven hundred chosen men. 16. Among all this people there were seven hundred chosen men left-handed; every one could sling stones at an hair-breadth, and not miss. 17. And the men of Israel, beside Benjamin, were numbered four hundred thousand men that drew sword: all these were men of war.

Here is,

1. The fair and just demand which the tribes of Israel, now encamped, sent to the tribe of Benjamin, to deliver up the malefactors of Gibeah to justice, v. 12, 13. If the tribe of Benjamin had come up, as they ought to have done, to the assembly, and agreed with them in their resolutions, they had had none to deal with but the men of Gibeah only, but they, by their absence, taking part with the criminals, application must be made to them all; the Israelites were zealous against the wickedness that was committed, yet they were discreet in their zeal, and did not think it would justify them in falling upon the whole tribe of Benjamin, unless they, by refusing to give up the criminals, and protecting them against justice, should make themselves guilty ex post facto—as accessories after the fact. They desire them to consider how great the wickedness was, that was committed, (v. 12.) and that it was done among them; and how necessary it was therefore that they should either punish the malefactors with death themselves, according to the law of Moses, or deliver them up to this general assembly, to be so much the more publicly and solemnly punished, that evil might be put away from Israel, the national guilt removed, the infection stopped by cutting off the gangrened part, and national judgments prevented; for the sin was so very like that of the Sodomites, that they might justly fear, if they did not punish it, God would rain hail from heaven upon them, as he did, not only upon Sodom, but the neighbouring cities. If the Israelites had not made this reasonable demand, they would have had much more reason to lament the following desolations of Benjamin. All methods of accommodation must be used before we go to war, or go to law. The demand was like that of Joab’s to Abel, 2Sam. 20. 20, 21. “Only deliver up the traitor, and we will lay down our arms.” On these terms, and no other, God will be at peace with us, that we part with our sins, that we mortify and crucify our lusts, and then all shall be well; his anger will be turned away.

II. The wretched obstinacy and perverseness of the men of Benjamin, who seem to have been as unanimous and zealous in their resolutions to stand by the criminals, as the rest of the tribes were to punish them; so little sense had they of their honour, duty, and interest.

1. They were so prodigiously vile as to patronise the wickedness that was committed. They would not hearken to the voice of their brethren, v. 13. Either because they of that tribe were generally more vicious and debauched at this time than the rest of the tribes, and therefore would not bear to have that punished in others which they knew themselves guilty of. (Some of the most fruitful and pleasant parts of Canaan fell to the lot of this tribe; their land, like that of Sodom, was as the garden of the Lord, which, perhaps, helped to make the inhabitants, like the men of Sodom, wicked, and sinners before the Lord exceedingly, Gen. 13. 10, 13.) Or, because (as Bishop Patrick suggests) they took it ill that the other tribes should meddle with the concerns of their's; they would not do that which they knew was their duty, because they were reminded of it by their brethren, by whom they scorned to be taught and controuled. If there were any wise men among them that would have complied with the demand made, yet they were overpowered by the majority, who thus made the crime of the men of Gibeah their own. Thus we have fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness, if we confederate with those that have, and make ourselves guilty of other men's sins, by countenancing and defending them. It seems there is no cause so bad but it will find some patrons, some advocates, to appear for it; but woe be to those by whom such offences come. Those will have a great deal to answer for, that obstruct the course of necessary justice, and strengthen the hands of the wicked, by saying, O wicked man, thou shalt not die.

2. They were so prodigiously vain and presumptuous, as to make head against the united force of all Israel. Never, surely, were men so wretchedly infatuated as they were, when they took up arms in opposition, (1.) To so good a cause as Israel had. How could they expect to prosper when they fought against justice, and consequently against the just God himself, against them that had the high priest and the divine oracle on their side, and so acted in downright rebellion against the sacred and supreme authority of the nation? (2.) To so great a force as Israel had. The disproportion of their numbers was much greater than that, Luke, 14, 31, 32. where he that had but ten thousand durst not meet him that came against him with twenty thousand, and therefore desired conditions of peace. There the enemy was but two to one, here above fifteen to one; yet they despised conditions of peace. All the forces they could bring into the field were but twenty-six thousand men, beside seven hundred men of Gibeah; (v. 15.) yet with these they will dare to face four hundred thousand men of Israel, v. 17. Thus sinners are infatuated to their own ruin, and provoke Him to jealousy, who is infinitely stronger than they, 1 Cor. 10. 22. But it should seem they depended upon the skill of their men, to make up what was wanting in numbers, especially a regiment of slingers, seven hundred men, who, though left-handed, were so dexterous at sling stones, that they would not be a hair's breadth beside their mark, v. 16. But these good marksmen were very much out in their aim, when they espoused this bad cause. Benjamin signifies the son of the right hand, yet we find his posterity left-handed.

18. And the children of Israel arose, and went up to the house God, and asked counsel of God, and said, Which of us shall go up first to the battle against the children of Benjamin? And the LORD said, Judah shall go up first. 19. And the children of Israel rose up in the morning, and encamped against Gibeah. 20. And the men of Israel went out to battle against Benjamin; and the men of Israel put themselves in array to fight against them at Gibeah. 21. And the children of Benjamin came forth out of Gibeah, and destroyed down to the ground of the Israelites that day twenty and two thousand men. 22. And the people the men of Israel encouraged themselves, and set their battle again in array in the place where they put themselves in array the first day. 23. (And the children of Israel went up and wept before the LORD until even, and asked counsel of the LORD, saying, Shall I go up again to battle against the children of Benjamin my brother? And the LORD said, Go up against him.) 24. And the children of Israel came near against the children of Benjamin the second day. 25. And Benjamin went forth against them out of Gibeah the second day, and destroyed down to the ground of the children of Israel again eighteen thousand men; all these drew the sword.

We have here the defeat of the men of Israel in their first and second battle with the Benjamites.

1. Before their first engagement they asked counsel of God concerning the order of their battle, and were directed, and yet they were sorely beaten. They did not think it was proper to ask of God, whether they should go up at all against Benjamin, (the case was plain enough, the men of Gibeah must be punished for their wickedness, and they must do it, or it will not be done,) but "Who shall go first?" (v. 18.) that is, "Who shall be general of our army?" For, whichever tribe was appointed to go first, the prince of that tribe must be looked upon as commander in chief of the whole body; for, if they had meant it of the order of their march only, it had been proper to have asked, "Who shall go next?" and then, "Who next?" But if they know that Judah must go first, they know they must all observe the orders of the prince of that tribe. This honour was done to Judah because our Lord Jesus was to spring from that tribe, who was in all things to have the pre-eminence. The tribe that went up first had the most honourable post, but withal the most dangerous, and, probably, lost most in the engagement. Who would strive for precedence that sees the peril of it?

Yet though Judah, that strong and valiant tribe, goes up first, and all the tribes of Israel attend them, little Benjamin (so he is called, Ps. 68. 27.) is too hard for them all. The whole army lay siege to Gibeah, v. 19. The Benjamites advance to raise the siege, and the army prepares to give them a warm reception, v. 20. But, between the Benjamites that attacked them in the front with incredible fury, and the men of Gibeah that sallied out upon their rear, they were put into confusion, and lost twenty-two thousand men, v. 21. Here were no prisoners taken, for there was no quarter given, but all put to the sword.

II. Before the second engagement, they again asked counsel of God, and more solemnly than before, for they wept before the LORD until even, (v. 23.) lamenting the loss of so many brave men, especially as it was a token of God's displeasure, and would give occasion to the Benjamites to triumph in the success of their wickedness. Also at this time they did not ask, Who should go up first; but, Whether they should go up at all. They intimate a reason why they should scruple it, especially now that Providence had frowned upon them, because Benjamin was their brother; and a readiness to lay down their arms, if God should so order them. God bid them go up, he allowed the attempt; though Benjamin was their brother, he was a gangrened member of their body, and must be cut off. Upon this, they encouraged themselves, perhaps more in their own strength than in the divine commission, and made a second attempt upon the forces of the rebels, in the same place where the former battle was fought, (v. 22.) with the hope of retrieving their credit upon the same spot of ground where they had lost it, which they would not superstitiously change, as if there were any thing unlucky in the place; but they were, this second time, repulsed, with the loss of eighteen thousand men, v. 25. The former day's loss, and this, amounted to forty thousand, which was just a tenth part of the whole army, and the same number that they had drawn out by lot to fetch vic'uals, v. 10. They decimated themselves for that service, and now God again decimated them for the slaughter.

But what shall we say to these things, that so just and honourable a cause should thus be put to the worst once and again? Were they not fighting God's battles against sin? Had they not his commission? What, and yet miscarry thus! 1. God's judgments are a great deep, and his way is in the sea. Clouds and darkness are often round about him, but judgment and justice are always the habitation of his throne. We may be sure of the righteousness, when we cannot see the reasons, of God's proceedings. 2. God would hereby shew them, and us in them, that the race is not to the swift, nor the battle to the strong, that numbers are not to be confided in, which perhaps the Israelites did with too much assurance. We must never lay that weight on an arm of flesh which the Rock of ages only will bear. 3. God designed hereby to correct Israel for their sins. They did well to shew such a zeal against the wickedness of Gibeah; but were there not with them, even with them, sins against the Lord their God? Those must be made to know their own iniquity, that are forward in condemning the iniquity of others. Some think it was a rebuke to them, for not witnessing against the idolatry of Micah and the Danites, by which their religion was corrupted, as they now did against the lewdness of Gibeah and the Benjamites, by which the public peace was disturbed, though God had particularly ordered them to levy war upon idolaters, Deut. 13, 12, &c. 4. God would hereby teach us, not to think it strange, if a good cause suffer worst for a while, nor to judge of the merits of it by the success of it. The interest of grace in the heart, and of religion in the world, may be foiled, and suffer great loss, and seem to be quite run down, but judgment will be brought forth to victory at last. Vincitur in praelio, sed non in bello—We are foiled in a battle, but not in the whole campaign. Right may fall, but it shall arise.

26. Then all the children of Israel, and all the people, went up, and came unto the house of God, and wept, and sat there before the LORD, and fasted that day until even, and offered burnt-offerings and peace-offerings before the LORD. 27. And the children of Israel inquired of the LORD, (for the ark of the covenant of God was there in those days, 28. And Phinehas, the son of Eleazar, the son of Aaron, stood before it in those days,) saying, Shall I yet again go out to battle against the children of Benjamin my brother, or shall I cease? And the LORD said, Go up, for to-morrow I will deliver them into thine hand. 29. And Israel set liers in wait round about Gibeah. 30. And the children of Israel went up against the children of Benjamin on the third day, and put themselves in array against Gibeah as at other times. 31. And the children of Benjamin went out against the people, and were drawn away from the city; and they began to smite of the people, and kill, as at other times, in the high-ways, of which one goeth up to the house of God, and the other to Gibeah in the field, about thirty men of Israel. 32. And the children of Benjamin said, They are smitten down before us, as at the first. But the children of Israel said, Let us flee and draw them from the city unto the high-ways. 33. And all the men of Israel rose up out of their place, and put themselves in array at Baal-tamar: and the liers in wait of Israel came forth out of their places, even out of the meadows of Gibeah. 34. And there came against Gibeah ten thousand chosen men out of all Israel, and the battle was sore: but they knew not that evil was near them. 35. And the LORD smote Benjamin before Israel: and the children of Israel destroyed of the Benjamites that day twenty and five thousand and an hundred men: all these drew the sword. 36. So the children of Benjamin saw that they were smitten: for the men of Israel gave place to the Benjamites, because they trusted unto the liers in wait which they had set beside Gibeah. 37. And the liers in wait hasted, and rushed upon Gibeah; and the liers in wait drew themselves along, and smote all the city with the edge of the sword. 38. Now there was an appointed sign between the men of Israel and the liers in wait, that they should make a great flame with smoke to rise up out of the city. 39. And when the men of Israel retired in the battle, Benjamin began to smite and kill of the men of Israel about thirty persons: for they said, Surely they are smitten down before us, as in the first battle. 40. But when the flame began to rise up out of the city with a pillar of smoke, the Benjamites looked behind them, and, behold, the flame of the city ascended up to heaven. 41. And when the men of Israel turned again, the men of Benjamin were amazed: for they saw that evil was come upon them. 42. Therefore they turned their backs before the men of Israel unto the way of the wilderness; but the battle overtook them; and them which came out of the cities they destroyed in the midst of them. 43. Thus they enclosed the Benjamites round about, and chased them, and trode them down with ease over against Gibeah toward the sun-rising. 44. And there fell of Benjamin eighteen thousand men; all these were men of valour. 45. And they turned and fled toward the wilderness unto the rock of Rimmon: and they gleaned of them in the high-ways five thousand men; and pursued hard after them unto Gidom, and slew two thousand men of them. 46. So that all which fell that day of Benjamin were twenty and five thousand men that drew the sword; all these were men of valour. 47. But six hundred men turned and fled to the wilderness unto the rock Rimmon, and abode in the rock Rimmon four months. 48. And the men of Israel turned again upon the children of Benjamin, and smote them with the edge of the sword, as well the men of every city, as the beast, and all that came to hand: also they set on fire all the cities that they came to.

We have here a full account of the complete victory which the Israelites obtained over the Benjamites in the third engagement: the righteous cause was victorious at last, when the managers of it amended what had been amiss; for when a good cause suffers, it is for want of good management. Observe then how the victory was obtained, and how it was pursued.

I. How the victory was obtained. Two things they had trusted too much to in the former engagements, the goodness of their cause, and the superiority of their numbers; it was true, that they had both right and strength on their side, which were great advantages. But they depended too much upon them, to the neglect of those duties, which now, this third time, when they see their error, they apply themselves to.

1. They were, previously, so confident of the goodness of their cause, that they thought it needless to address themselves to God for his presence and blessing; they took that for granted, nay, perhaps, they concluded that he owed them his favour, and could not in justice withhold it, since it was in defence of virtue that they appeared, and took up arms. But God having shewed them that he was under no obligation to succeed their enterprise, that he neither needed them, nor was tied to them, that they were more indebted to him for the honour of being ministers of his justice, than he to them for the service, now they became humble petitioners for success. Before, they only consulted God's oracle, Who shall go up first? And, Shall we go up? But now they implored his favour, fasted and prayed, and offered burnt-offerings and peace-offerings, (v. 26.) to make an atonement for sin, and an acknowledgment of their dependence upon God, as an expression of their desire toward him. We cannot expect the presence of God with us, unless we thus seek it in the way he has appointed. And when they were in this frame, and thus sought the Lord, then he not only ordered them to go up against the Benjamites the third time, but gave them a promise of victory, To-morrow I will deliver them into thine hand, v. 28.

2. They were, previously, so confident of the greatness of their strength, that they thought it needless to use any art, to lay any ambush, or form a stratagem, not doubting but to conquer them purely by a strong hand; but now they saw it was requisite to use some policy, as if they had an enemy to deal with them that had been superior in number; accordingly, they set liers in wait, (v. 29.) and gained their point, as their father's did before Ai; (Josh. 8.) stratagems of that kind being most likely to take effect after a previous defeat, which has flushed the enemy, and made the pretended flight the less suspected. The management of this artifice is here very largely described. The assurance God had given them of success in this day's action, instead of making them remiss and presumptuous, set all heads and hands on work for the effecting of what God had promised. Observe the method they took; the body of the army faced the city of Gibeah, as they had done before, advancing toward the gates, v. 30. The Benjamites, the body of whose army was now quartered at Gibeah, sallied out upon them, charged them with great bravery; the besiegers gave back, retired with precipitation, as if their hearts failed them upon the sight of the Benjamites, which they were willing to believe, who, proudly conceited, that by their former success they had made themselves very formidable; some loss the Israelites sustained in this counterfeit flight, about thirty men were cut off in their rear, v. 31, 39. But when the Benjamites were all drawn out of the city, the ambush seized the city, (v. 37.) gave a signal to the body of the army, (v. 38, 40.) which immediately turned upon them, (v. 41.) and, it should seem, another considerable party that was posted at Baal-tamar came upon them at the same time; (v. 33.) so that the Benjamites were quite surrounded, which put them into the greatest consternation that could be: a sense of guilt now disheartened them, and the higher their hopes had been raised, the more grievous was this confusion. At first, the battle was sore, (v. 34.) the Benjamites fought with fury; but when they saw what a snare they were drawn into, they thought one pair of heels (as we say) was worth two pair of hands, and they made the best of their way toward the wilderness, (v. 42.) but in vain, the battle overtook them, and, to complete their distress, they which came out of the cities of Israel, that waited to see the event of the battle, joined with the pursuers, and helped to cut them off. Every man's hand was against them.

Observe, in this story, (1.) That the Benjamites, in the beginning of the battle, were confident that the day was their own.

They are smitten down before us, v. 32, 39. Sometimes God suffers wicked men to be lifted up in successes and hopes, that their fall may be the sorer. See how short their joy is, and their triumphing but for a moment. Let not him that girdeth on the harness boast, except he has reason to boast in God. (2.) Evil was near them, and they did not know it; (v. 34.) but (v. 41.) they saw, when it was too late to prevent it, that evil was come upon them. What evils may at any time be near us we cannot tell, but the less they are feared, the heavier they fall; sinners will not be persuaded to see evil near them, but how dreadful will it be when it comes, and there is no escaping! 1 Thess. 5. 3. (3.) Though the men of Israel played their parts so well in this engagement, yet the victory is ascribed to God; (v. 35.) The Lord smote Benjamin before Israel. The battle was his, and so was the success. (4.) They trode down the men of Benjamin with ease, when God fought against them, v. 43. It is an easy thing to trample upon those who have made God their Enemy. See Mal. 4. 3.

II. How the victory was prosecuted and improved in a military execution done upon these sinners against their own souls. 1. Gibeah itself was destroyed in the first place, the nest of lewdness. The ambush that entered the city by surprise, drew themselves along, that is, dispersed themselves into several parts of it, which they might easily do, now that all the men of war were sallied out, and had very presumptuously left it defenceless; and they smote all they found, even women and children, with the sword, (v. 37.) and set fire to the city, v. 40. Sin brings ruin upon cities. 2. The army in the field was quite routed and cut off, eighteen thousand men of valour lay dead upon the spot, v. 44. 3. Those that escaped from the field were pursued, and cut off in their flight, to the number of seven thousand, v. 45. It is to no purpose to think of out-running divine vengeance. Evil pursues sinners, and it will overtake them. 4. Even they that tarried at home were involved in the ruin. They let their sword devour for ever, not considering that it would be bitterness in the latter end, as Abner pleads, long after, when he was at the head of an army of Benjamites, probably with an eye to this very story, 2 Sam. 2. 25, 26. They put to the sword all that breathed, and set fire to all the cities, v. 48. So that of all the tribe of Benjamin, for aught that appears, there remained none alive but six hundred men that took shelter in the rock Rimmon, and lay close there four months, v. 47. Now, (1.) It is hard to justify this severity, as it was Israel's act. The whole tribe of Benjamin was culpable; but must they therefore be used as devoted Canaanites? That it was done in the heat of war—that this was the way of prosecuting victories, which the sword of Israel had been accustomed to—that the Israelites were extremely exasperated against the Benjamites for the slaughter they had made among them in the two former engagements—will go but a little way to excuse the cruelty of this execution. It is true, they had sworn, that whosoever did not come up to Mizpeh should be put to death: (ch. 21. 5.) but that, if it was a justifiable oath, yet extended only to the men of war; the rest were not expected to come. Yet, (2.) It is easy to justify the hand of God in it; Benjamin had sinned against him, and God had threatened, that, if they forgot him, they should perish as the nations that were before them perished, (Deut. 8. 20.) who were all in this manner cut off. It is easy, likewise, to improve it for warning against the beginnings of sin, they are like the letting forth of water, therefore leave it off before it be meddled with for we know not what will be in the end thereof. The eternal ruin of souls will be worse, and more fearful, than all these desolations of a tribe. This affair of Gibeah is twice spoken of by the prophet Hosea, as the beginning of the corruption of Israel, and a pattern to all that followed, ch. 9. 9. They have deeply corrupted themselves as in the days of Gibeah, and ch. 10. 9. Thou hast sinned from the days of Gibeah, and it is added, that the battle in Gibeah against the children of iniquity did not, that is, did not, at first, overtake them.

CHAP. XXI.

The ruins of the tribe of Benjamin we read of in the foregoing chapter; now here we have, I. The lamentation which Israel made over these ruins, v. 1. .4. 6, 12.

11. The provision they made for the repair of them out of the six hundred men that escaped, for whom they procured wives, 1. Of the virgins of Jabesh-gilead, when they destroyed that city for not sending to the general rendezvous, v. 5, 7, 14. 2. Of the daughters of Shiloh, v. 16, 25. And so this melancholy story concludes.

1. NOW the men of Israel had sworn in Mizpeh, saying, There shall not any of us give his daughter unto Benjamin to wife. 2. And the people came to the house of God, and abode there till even before God, and lifted up their voices, and wept sore; 3. And said, O LORD God of Israel, why is this come to pass in Israel, that there should be to-day one tribe lacking in Israel? 4. And it came to pass on the morrow, that the people rose early, and built there an altar, and offered burnt-offerings and peace-offerings. 5. And the children of Israel said, Who is there among all the tribes of Israel that came not up with the congregation unto the LORD? for they had made a great oath concerning him that came not up to the LORD to Mizpeh, saying, He shall surely be put to death. 6. And the children of Israel repented them for Benjamin their brother, and said, There is one tribe cut off from Israel this day. 7. How shall we do for wives for them that remain, seeing we have sworn by the LORD that we will not give them of our daughters to wives? 8. And they said, What one is there of the tribes of Israel that came not up to Mizpeh to the LORD? And, behold, there came none to the camp from Jabesh-gilead to the assembly. 9. For the people were numbered, and, behold, there were none of the inhabitants of Jabesh-gilead there. 10. And the congregation sent thither twelve thousand men of the valiantest, and commanded them, saying, Go and smite the inhabitants of Jabesh-gilead with the edge of the sword, with the women and the children. 11. And this is the thing that ye shall do, ye shall utterly destroy every male, and every woman that hath lain by man. 12. And they found among the inhabitants of Jabesh-gilead four hundred young virgins, that had known no man by lying with any male: and they brought them unto the camp to Shiloh, which is in the land of Canaan. 13. And the whole congregation sent some to speak to the children of Benjamin that were in the rock Rimmon, and to call peaceably unto them. 14. And Benjamin came again at that time; and they gave them wives which they had saved alive of the women of Jabesh-gilead: and yet so they sufficed them not. 15. And the people repented them for Benjamin, because that the LORD had made a breach in the tribes of Israel.

We may observe, in these verses,

I. The ardent zeal which the Israelites had expressed against the wickedness of the men of Gibeah: as it was countenanced by the tribe of Benjamin. Occasion is here given to mention two instances of their zeal on this occasion, which we did not meet with before.

1. While the general convention of the states was gathering together, and was waiting for a full house before they would proceed, they bound themselves with the great execration, which they called the Cherum, utterly to destroy all those cities that should not send in their representatives, and their quota of men, upon this occasion; or, had sentenced them to that curse, who should thus refuse; (v. 5.) for they would look upon such refusers as having no indignation at the crime committed, no concern for the securing of the nation from God's judgments by the administration of justice, nor any regard to the authority of a common consent, by which they were summoned to meet.

2. When they were met, and had heard the cause, they made another solemn oath, that none of all the thousands of Israel, then present, nor any of those whom they represented, (not intending to bind their posterity,) should, if they could help it, marry a daughter to a Benjamite, v. 1. This was made an article of the war, not with any design to extirpate the tribe, but because, in general, they would treat them who were then actors and abettors of this villany, in all respects, as they treated the devoted nations of Canaan, whom they were not only obliged to destroy, but with whom they were forbidden to marry; and because, in particular, they judged them unworthy to match with a daughter of Israel, that had been so very barbarous and abusive to one of the tender sex, than which nothing could be done more base and villanous, nor a more certain indication of a mind perfectly lost to all honour and virtue. We may suppose that the Levite's sending the mangled pieces of his wife's body, to the several tribes, helped very much to inspire them with all this fury, and much more than a bare narrative of the fact, though ever so well attested, would have done. So much does the eye affect the heart.

II. The deep concern which the Israelites did express for the destruction of the tribe of Benjamin when it was accomplished. The tide of their anger at Benjamin's crime did not run so high and so strong before, but the tide of their grief for Benjamin's destruction ran as high and as strong after. They repented for Benjamin their brother, v. 6, 15. They did not repent of their zeal against the sin; there is a holy indignation against sin, the fruit of godly sorrow, which is to salvation, not to be repented of, 2 Cor. 7. 10, 11. But they repented of the sad consequences of what they had done, that they had carried the matter further than was either just or necessary; it had been enough to destroy all they found in arms, they needed not to have cut off the husbandmen and shepherds, the women and children. Note, 1. There may be over-doing in well-doing. Great care must be taken in the government of our zeal, lest that which seemed supernatural in its causes, prove unnatural in its effects. That is no good divinity, which swallows up humanity. Many a war is ill-ended which was well-begun. 2. Even necessary justice is to be done with compassion. God does not punish with delight, nor should men. 3. Strong passions make work for repentance. What we say and do in a heat, our calmer thoughts commonly wish undone again. 4. In a civil war, (according to the usage of the Romans,) no victories ought to be celebrated with triumphs, because, whichever side gets, the community loses, as here there is a tribe cut off from Israel. What the better is the body for one member's crushing another?

Now, how did they express their concern?

(1.) By their grief for the breach that was made; they came to the house of God, for thither they brought all their doubts, all their counsels, all their cares, and all their sorrows. There was to be heard on this occasion, not the voice of joy and praise, but only that of lamentation, and mourning, and woe. They lifted up their voices and wept sore, (v. 2.) not so much for the forty thousand which they had lost, (those would not be so much missed out of eleven tribes,) but for the entire destruction of one whole tribe; for this was the complaint they poured out before God, (v. 3.) There is one tribe lacking. God had taken care of every tribe; their twelve was that which they were known by; every tribe had his station appointed in the camp, and his stone in the high priest's breast-plate; every tribe had his blessing, both from Jacob and Moses; and it would be an intolerable reproach to them, if they should drop any out of this illustrious jury, and lose one out of twelve; especially Benjamin, the youngest, who was particularly dear to Jacob their common ancestor, and whom all the rest ought to have been in a particular manner tender of. Benjamin is not; what then will become of Jacob? Benjamin become a Benoni; the son of the right hand, a son of sorrow! In this trouble they built an altar, not in competition, but in communion, with the appointed altar at the door of the tabernacle, which was not large enough to contain all the sacrifices they designed; for they offered burnt-offerings, and peace-offerings, to give thanks for their victory, and also to atone for their own folly in the pursuit of it, and to implore the divine favour in their present strait. Every thing that grieves us should bring us to God.

(2.) By their amicable treaty with the poor distressed refugees that were hidden in the rock Rimmon, to whom they sent an act of indemnity, assuring them, upon the public faith, that they would now no longer treat them as enemies, but receive them as brethren, v. 13. The falling out of friends should thus be the renewing of friendship. Even those that have sinned, if at length they repent, must be forgiven and comforted, 2 Cor. 2. 7.

(3.) By the care they took to provide wives for them, that their tribe might be built up again, and the ruins of it repaired. Had the men of Israel sought themselves, they would have been secretly pleased with the extinguishing of the families of Benjamin, because then the land allotted to them would escheat to the rest of the tribes, ob defectum sanguinis—for want of heirs, and be easily seized for want of occupants; but those have not the spirit of Israelites who aim to raise themselves upon the ruins of their neighbours. They were so far from any design of this kind, that all heads are at work to find out ways and means for the re-building of this tribe. All the women and children of Benjamin were slain; they had sworn not to marry their daughters to any of them; it was against the divine law that they should match with the Canaanites; to oblige them to that, would be, in effect, to bid them go serve other gods.

What must they do then for wives for them? While the poor distressed Benjamites, that were hidden in the rock, feared their brethren were contriving to ruin them, they were, at the same time, upon a project to prefer them; and it was this:

[1.] There was a piece of necessary justice to be done upon the city of Jabesh-Gilead, which belonged to the tribe of Gad, on the other side Jordan. It was found, upon looking over the muster-roll, (which was taken, ch. 20. 2.) that none appeared, from that city, upon the general summons, (v. 8, 9.) and it was then resolved, before it appeared who were absent, that whatever city of Israel should be guilty of such a contempt of the public authority and interest, that city should be an anathema; Jabesh-Gilead lies under that severe sentence, which might by no means be dispensed with. They that had spared the Canaanites in many places, who were devoted to destruction by the divine command, could not find in their hearts to spare their brethren that were devoted by their own curse. Why did they not now send men to root the Jebusites out of Jerusalem, to avoid whom, the poor Levite had been forced to go to Gibeah? ch. 19. 11, 12. Men are commonly more zealous to support their own authority than God's. A detachment is therefore sent of twelve thousand men, to execute the sentence upon Jabesh-Gilead. Having found, that when the whole body of the army went against Gibeah, the people were thought too many for God to deliver them into their hands, on this expedition they sent but a few, v. 10. Their commission is, to put all to the sword, men, women, and children, (v. 11.) according to that law, (Lev. 27. 29.) Whatsoever is devoted of men, by those that have power to do it, shall surely be put to death.

[2.] An expedient is from hence formed for providing the Benjamites with wives. When Moses sent the same number of men to avenge the lord of Midian, the same orders were given, as here, that all married women should be slain with their husbands, as one with them, but that the virgins should be saved alive, Numb. 31. 17, 18. That precedent was sufficient to support the distinction here made between a wife and a virgin, v. 11, 12. Four hundred virgins that were marriageable were found in Jabesh-Gilead, and these were married to so many of the surviving Benjamites, v. 14. Their fathers were not present when the vow was made not to marry with Benjamites, so that they were not under any colour of obligation by it; and, besides, being a prey taken in war, they were at the disposal of the conquerors. Perhaps the alliance now contracted between Benjamin and Jabesh-Gilead, made Saul, who was a Benjamite, the more concerned for that place, (1 Sam. 11. 4.) though then inhabited by new families.

16. Then the elders of the congregation said, How shall we do for wives for them that remain, seeing the women are destroyed out of Benjamin? 17. And they said, There must be an inheritance for them that be escaped of Benjamin, that a tribe be not destroyed out of Israel. 18. Howbeit we may not give them wives of our daughters: for the children of Israel have sworn, saying, Cursed be he that giveth a wife to Benjamin. 19. Then they said, Behold, there is a feast of the LORD in Shiloh yearly in a place which is on the north side of Beth-el, on the east side of the high-way that goeth up from Beth-el to Shechem, and on the south of Lebouah. 20. Therefore they commanded the children of Benjamin, saying, Go and lie in wait in the vineyards; 21. And see, and, behold, if the daughters of Shiloh come out to dance in dances, then come ye out of the vineyards, and catch you every man his wife of the daughters of Shiloh, and go to the land of Benjamin. 22. And it shall be, when their fathers or their brethren come unto us to complain, that we will say unto them, Be favourable unto them for our sakes: because we reserved not to each man his wife in the war: for ye did not give unto them at this time, that ye should be guilty. 23. And the children of Benjamin did so, and took them wives, according to their number, of them that danced, whom they caught: and they went and returned unto their inheritance, and repaired the cities, and dwelt in them. 24. And the children of Israel departed thence at that time, every man to his tribe and to his family, and they went out from thence every man to his inheritance. 25. In those days there was no king in Israel: every man did that which was right in his own eyes.

We have here the method that was taken to provide the two hundred Benjamites that remained, with wives. And though the tribe was reduced to a small number, they were only in care to provide each man with one wife, not with more, under pretence of multiplying them the faster. They may not bestow their daughters upon them, but, to save their oath, and yet marry some of their daughters to them, they put them into a way of taking them by surprise, and marrying them, which should be ratified by their parents' consent, ex post facto—afterward. The less consideration is used before the making of a vow, the more, commonly, there is need of after, for the keeping of it.

I. That which gave an opportunity for the doing of this, was, a public ball at Shiloh, in the fields, at which all the young ladies of that city, and the parts adjacent, that were so disposed, met to dance, in honour of a feast of the Lord, then observed; probably the feast of tabernacles, (v. 19.) for that feast (Bishop Patrick says) was the only season wherein the Jewish virgins were allowed to dance; and that, not so much for their recreation, as to express their holy joy, as David, when he danced before the ark; otherwise, the present melancholy posture of public affairs would have made dancing unseasonable, as Isa. 22. 12, 13. The dancing was very modest and chaste, it was not mixed dancing; no men danced with these daughters of Shiloh, nor did any married women so far forget their gravity as to join with them. However, their dancing thus in public made them an easy prey to those that had a design upon them. Whence Bishop Hall observes, that the ambushes of evil spirits carry away many souls from dancing to a fearful desolation.

II. The elders of Israel gave authority to the Benjamites to do this, to lie in wait in the vineyards which surrounded the green they used to dance on, and, when they were in the midst of their sport, to come upon them, and catch every man a wife for himself, and carry them straight away to their own country, v. 20, 21. They knew that none of their own daughters would be there, so that they could not be said to give them, for they knew nothing of the matter. A sorry salvo is better than none, to save the breaking of an oath: it were much better to be cautious in making vows, that there be not occasion afterward, as there was here, to say before the angel, that it was an error. Here was a very preposterous way of match-making, when both the mutual affection of the young people, and the consent of their parents, must be presumed to come after; the case was extraordinary, and may by no means be drawn into a precedent. Over-hasty marriages often occasion a leisurely repentance; and what comfort can be expected from a match made either by force or fraud? The virgins of Jabesh-Gilead were taken out of the midst of blood and slaughter, but these of Shiloh out of the midst of mirth and joy; the former had reason to be thankful that they had their lives for a prey, and the latter, it is to be hoped, had no cause to complain, after a while, when they found themselves matched, not to men of broken and desperate fortunes, as they seemed to be, who were lately fetched out of a cave, but to men of the best and largest estates in the nation, as they must needs be, when the lot of the whole tribe of Benjamin, which consisted of forty-five thousand six hundred men, (Numb. 26. 41.) came to be divided again among six hundred, who had all by survivorship.

III. They undertook to pacify the fathers of these young women: as to the infringement of their paternal authority, they would easily forgive it, when they considered to what fair estates their daughters were matched, and what mothers in Israel they were likely to be; but the oath they were bound by, not to give their daughters to Benjamites, might perhaps stick with some of them, whose consciences were tender; yet, as to that, this might satisfy them: 1. That the necessity was urgent, (v. 22.) We reserved not to each man his wife; now owing that they did ill to destroy all the women, and desiring to atone for their too rigorous construction of their vow to destroy them, by the most favourable construction of their vow not to match with them. "And therefore, for our sakes, who were too severe, let them keep what they have got." For, 2. In strictness, it was not a breach of their vow; they had sworn not to give them their daughters, but they had not sworn to fetch them back, if they were forcibly taken. So that, if there was any fault, the elders must be responsible, not the parents. And Quod fieri non debuit, factum valet—That which ought not to have been done, is yet valid when it is done. The thing was done, and is ratified only by connivance, according to the law, Numb. 30. 4.

Lastly, In the close of all, we have, 1. The settling of the tribe of Benjamin again. The few that remained, returned to the inheritance of that tribe, v. 23. And soon after, from among them, sprang Ehud, who was famous in his generation, the second judge of Israel, ch. 3. 15. 2. The disbanding and dispersing of the army of Israel, v. 24. They did not set up for a standing army, nor pretend to make any alterations or establishments in the government; but, when the affair was over for which they were called together, they quietly departed in God's peace, every man to his family. Public services must not make us think ourselves above our own private affairs, and the duty of providing for our own house. 3. A repetition of the cause of these confusions, v. 25. Though God was their King, every man would be his own master, as if there was no king. Blessed be God for magistracy.

UPON THE BOOK OF

R U T H.

This short history of the domestic affairs of one particular family fitly follows the book of Judges, (the events related here happening in the days of the Judges,) and fitly goes before the books of Samuel, because in the close it introduces David: yet the Jews, in their Bibles, separate it from both, and make it one of the five Megilloth, or Volumes, which they put together toward the latter end; in this order, Solomon's Song, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, and Esther. It is probable that Samuel was the penman of it. It relates, not miracles or laws, wars or victories, or the revolutions of states, but the afflictions first, and afterward the comfort, of Naomi; the conversion first, and afterward the preferment, of Ruth. Many such events have happened, which perhaps we may think as well worthy to be recorded. But these God saw fit to transact the knowledge of to us; and even common historians think they have liberty to choose their subject. The design of this book is,

- I. To lead to Providence; to shew us how conversant it is about our private concerns, and to teach us in them all to have an eye to it, acknowledging God in all our ways, and in all events that concern us. See 1 Sam. 2. 7, 8. Ps. 113. 7. . 9.
- II. To lead to Christ, who descended from Ruth, and part of whose genealogy concludes the book, from whence it is fetched into Matth. 1. In the conversion of Ruth the Moabitess, and the bringing of her into the pedigree of the Messiah, we have a type of the calling of the Gentiles in due time into the fellowship of Christ Jesus our Lord. The afflictions of Naomi and Ruth we have an account of, ch. 1. Instances of their industry and humility, ch. 2. The bringing of them into an alliance with Boaz, ch. 3. And their happy settlement thereby, ch. 4. And let us remember the scene is laid in Beth-lehem, the city where our Redeemer was born.

Before Christ 1312.

Elimelech and Naomi.

CHAP. I.

In this chapter we have Naomi's afflictions. I. As a distressed housekeeper, forced by famine to remove into the land of Moab, v. 1, 2. II. As a mournful widow and mother, bewailing the death of her husband and her two sons, v. 3. . 5. III. As a careful mother-in-law, desirous to be kind to her two daughters, but at a loss how to be so, when she returns to her own country, v. 6. . 13. Orpah she parts with in sorrow, v. 14. Ruth she takes with her in fear, v. 15. . 18. IV. As a poor woman sent back to the place of her first settlement, to be supported by the kindness of her friends, v. 19. . 22. All these things were melancholy, and seemed against her, and yet all were working for good.

NOW it came to pass in the days when the judges ruled, that there was a famine in the land. And a certain man of Beth-lehem-judah went to sojourn in the country of Moab, he, and his wife, and his two sons. 2. And the name of the man was Elimelech, and the name of his wife Naomi, and the name of his two sons Mahlon and Chilion, Ephrathites of Beth-lehem-judah. And they came into the country of Moab, and continued there. 3. And Elimelech Naomi's husband died; and she was left, and her two sons. 4. And they took them wives of the women of Moab; the name of the one was Orpah, and the name of the other Ruth: and they dwelled there about ten years. 5. And Mahlon and Chilion died also both of them; and the woman was left of her two sons and her husband.

The first words give all the date we have of this story. It was in the days when the judges ruled, (v. 1.) not in those disorderly times when there was no king in Israel. But under which of the judges these things happened, we are not told, and the conjectures of the learned are very uncertain. It must be toward the beginning of the judges' time, for Boaz, who married Ruth, was born of Rahab, who received the spies, in Joshua's time. Some think it was in the days of Ehud; others, of Deborah; the learned Bishop Patrick inclines to think it was in the days of Gideon, because in his days only we read of a famine by the Midianites' invasion, Judges, 6. 3, 4. While the judges were ruling, some one city, and some another, Providence takes particular cognizance of Beth-lehem, and has an eye to a King, to Messiah himself, who should descend from two Gentile mothers, Rahab and Ruth.

Here is,

I. A famine in the land; in the land of Canaan, that land flowing with milk and honey. This was one of the judgments which God had threatened to bring upon them for their sins, Lev. 26. 19, 20. He has many arrows in his quiver; in the days of the judges they were oppressed by their enemies; and when by that judgment they were not reformed, God tried this, for when he judges, he will overcome. When the land had rest, yet it had not plenty; even in Beth-lehem, which signifies the house of bread, there was scarcity. A fruitful land is turned into barrenness, to correct and restrain the luxury and wantonness of them that dwell therein.

II. An account of one particular family distressed in the famine; it is that of Elimelech. His name signifies my God a King; agreeable to the state of Israel when the judges ruled, for the Lord was their King; and comfortable to him and his family in their affliction, that God was their's, and that he reigns for ever. His wife was Naomi, which signifies my amiable or pleasant one. But his sons' names were Mahlon and Chilion, sickness and consumption, perhaps because weakly children, and not likely to be long-lived. Such are the productions of our pleasant things, weak and infirm, fading and dying.

III. The removal of this family from Beth-lehem into the country of Moab, on the other side Jordan, for subsistence, because of the famine, v. 1, 2. It seems there was plenty in the country of Moab, when there was scarcity of bread in the land of Israel. Common gifts of Providence are often bestowed in greater plenty upon those that are strangers to God, than upon those that know and worship him. Moab is at ease from his youth, while Israel is emptied from vessel to vessel; (Jer. 48. 11.) not because God loves Moabites better, but because they have their portion in this life. Thither Elimelech goes, not to settle for ever, but to sojourn for a time, during the dearth, as Abraham, on the like occasion, went into Egypt, and Isaac into the land of the Philistines. Now here, 1. Elimelech's care to provide for his family, and his taking his wife and children with him, were, without doubt, commendable. If any provide not for his own, he hath denied the faith, 1 Tim. 5. 8. When he was in his straits, he did not forsake his house, go seek his fortune himself, and leave his wife and children to shift for their own maintenance, but, as became a tender husband and a loving father, where he went, he took them with him, not as the ostrich, Job, 39. 16. But, 2. I see not how his removal into the country of Moab, upon this occasion, could be justified. Abraham and Isaac were only sojourners in Canaan, and it was agreeable to their condition to remove; but the seed of Israel were now fixed, and ought not to remove into the territories of the heathen. What reason had Elimelech to go, more than any of his neighbours? If by any ill husbandry he had wasted his patrimony, and sold his land, or mortgaged it, (as it should seem, ch. 4. 3, 4.) which brought him into a more necessitous condition than others, the law of God had obliged his neighbours to relieve him; (Lev. 25. 35.) but that was not his case, for he went out full, v. 21. By those who tarried at home, it appears that the famine was not so extreme, but that there was sufficient to keep life and soul together; and his charge was but small, only two sons. But if he could not be content with the short allowance that his neighbours took up with, and in the day of famine could not be satisfied, unless he kept as plentiful a table as he had done formerly; if he could not live in hope that there would come years of plenty again in due time, or could not with patience wait for these years, it was his fault, and he did by it dishonour God, and the good land he had given them, weaken the hands of his brethren, with whom he should have been willing to take his lot, and set an ill example to others. If all should do as he did, Canaan would be dispeopled. Note, It is an evidence of a discontented, distrustful, unstable spirit, to be weary of the place in which God hath set us, and to be for leaving it immediately, whenever we meet with any uneasiness or inconvenience in it. It is folly to think of escaping that cross which, being laid in our way, we ought to take up. It is our wisdom to make the best of that which is, for it is seldom that changing our place is mending it. Or if he would remove, why to the country of Moab? If he had made inquiry, it is probable he would have found plenty in some of the tribes of Israel, those, for instance, on the other side Jordan, that bordered on the land of Moab; if he had that zeal for God and his worship, and that affection for his brethren, which became an Israelite, he would not have persuaded himself so easily to go to sojourn among Moabites.

IV. The marriage of his two sons to two of the daughters of Moab after his death, v. 4. All agree that this was ill done; the Chaldee says, They transgressed the decree of the word of the Lord, in taking strange wives. If they would not stay unmarried till their return to the land of Israel, they were not so far off but that they might have fetched them wives from thence. Little did Elimelech think, when he went to sojourn in Moab, that ever his sons should thus join in affinity with Moabites. But those that bring young people into bad acquaintance, and take them out of the way of public ordinances, though they may think them well-principled, and armed against temptation, know not what they do, nor what will be the end thereof. It does not appear that the women they married were proselyted to the Jewish religion, for Orpah is said to return to her gods, (v. 15.) the gods of Moab were her's still. It is a groundless tradition of the Jews, that Ruth was the daughter of Eglon king of Moab, yet the Chaldee paraphrast inserts it; but this and their other tradition, which he inserts likewise, cannot agree, that Boaz who married Ruth was the same with Ibbzan who judged Israel two hundred years after Eglon's death, Judg. 12.

V. The death of Elimelech and his two sons, and the disconsolate condition Naomi was thereby reduced to. Her husband died, (v. 3.) and her two sons, (v. 5.) soon after their marriage; and the Chaldee says, Their days were shortened, because they transgressed the law in marrying strange wives. See here, 1. That, wherever we go, we cannot out-run death, whose fatal arrows fly in all places. 2. That we cannot expect to prosper when we go out of the way of our duty. He that will save his life, by any indirect courses, shall lose it. 3. That death, when it comes into a family, often makes breach upon breach. One is taken away, to prepare another to follow soon after; one is taken away, and that affliction is not duly improved, and therefore God sends another of the same kind. When Naomi had lost her husband, she took so much the more complacency, and put so much the more confidence in her sons: under the shadow of those surviving comforts, she thinks she shall live among the heathen; and exceedingly glad she was of these gourds: but, behold, they wither presently; green and growing up in the morning, cut down and dried up before night; buried soon after they were married, for neither of them left any children. So uncertain and transient are all our enjoyments here. It is therefore our wisdom to make sure of those comforts that will be made sure, and which death cannot rob us of. But how desolate was the condition, and how disconsolate the spirit of poor Naomi, when the woman was left of her two sons and her husband! When these two things come upon her in a moment, come upon her in their perfection, by whom shall she be comforted? Loss of children, and widowhood! Isa. 47. 9.—51. 19. It is God alone who has wherewithal to comfort those that are cast down.

6. Then she arose with her daughters-in-law, that she might return from the country of Moab: for she had heard in the country of Moab how that the LORD had visited his people in giving them bread. 7. Wherefore she went forth out of the place where she was, and her two daughters-in-law with her; and they went on the way to return unto the land of Judah. 8. And Naomi said unto her two daughters-in-law, Go, return each to her mother's house: the LORD deal kindly with you, as ye have dealt with the dead, and with me. 9. The LORD grant you that ye may find rest, each of you in the house of her husband. Then she kissed them; and they lifted up their voice, and wept. 10. And they said unto her, Surely we will return with thee unto thy people. 11. And Naomi said, Turn again, my daughters: why will ye go with me? are there yet any more sons in my womb, that they may be your husbands? 12. Turn again, my daughters, go your way; for I am too old to have an husband. If I should say, I have hope, if I should have an husband also to-night, and should also bear sons; 13. Would ye tarry for them till they were grown? would ye stay for them from having husbands? nay, my daughters; for it grieveth me much for your sakes, that the hand of the LORD is gone out against me. 14. And they lifted up their voice, and wept again: and Orpah kissed her mother-in-law; but Ruth clave unto her. 15. And she said, Behold, thy sister-in-law is gone back unto her people, and unto her gods: return thou after thy sister-in-law. 16. And Ruth said, entreat me not to leave thee, or to return from following after thee; for whither thou goest, I will go; and where thou lodgest, I will lodge: thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God: 17. Where thou diest, will I die, and there will I be buried: the LORD do so to me, and more also, if aught but death part thee and me. 18. When she saw that she was steadfastly minded to go with her, then she left speaking unto her.

See here,

1. The good affection Naomi bore to the land of Israel, v. 6. Though she could not stay in it while the famine lasted, she would not stay out of it when the famine ceased; though the country of Moab had afforded her shelter and supply in a time of need, yet she did not intend it should be her rest for ever, no land should be that but the holy land, in which the sanctuary of God was, of which he had said, This is my rest for ever. Observe,

1. God, at last, returned in mercy to his people; for, though he contend long, he will not contend always. As the judgment of oppression, under which they often groaned in the time of the Judges, still came to an end, after a while, when God had raised them up a deliverer; so here, the judgment of famine: at length God graciously visited his people in giving them bread. Plenty is God's gift, and it is his visitation which, by bread, the staff of life, holds our souls in life. Though this mercy be the more striking when it comes after famine, yet if we have constantly enjoyed it, and never knew what famine meant, we are not to think it the less valuable.

2. Naomi then returned, in duty, to her people. She had often inquired of their state, what harvests they had, and how the markets went, and still the tidings were discouraging; but, like the prophet's servant, who, having looked seven times, and seen no sign of rain, at length discerned a cloud, no bigger than a man's hand, which soon overspread the heavens; so Naomi, at last, has good news brought her of plenty in Beth-lehem, and then she can think of no other than returning thither again. Her new alliances, in the country of Moab, could not make her forget her relation to the land of Israel. Note, Though there be a reason for our being in bad places, yet, when the reason ceases, we must by no means continue in them. Forced absence from God's ordinances, and forced presence with wicked people, are great afflictions, but when the force ceases, and it is continued of choice, then it becomes a great sin. It should seem, she began to think of returning immediately upon the death of her two sons: (1.) Because she looked upon that affliction to be a judgment upon her family for lingering in the country of Moab; and hearing this to be the voice of the rod, and of him that appointed it, she obeys and returns. Had she returned upon the death of her husband, perhaps she might have saved the life of her sons; but when God judgeth, he will overcome, and if one affliction prevail not to awaken us to a sigh and sense of sin and duty, another shall. When death comes into a family, it ought to be improved for the reforming of what is amiss in the family: when relations are taken away from us, we are put upon inquiry, whether, in some instance or other, we are not out of the way of our duty, that we may return to it. God calls our sins to remembrance when he slays a son, 1 Kings, 17. 18. And if he thus hedge up our way with thorns, it is that he may oblige us to say, We will go and return to our first Husband, as Naomi here to her country, Hos. 2. 7. (2.) Because the land of Moab was now become a melancholy place to her. It is with little pleasure that she can breathe in that air in which her husband and sons had expired; or go on that ground in which they lay buried out of her sight, but not out of her thoughts; now she will go to Canaan again. Thus God takes away from us the comforts we stay ourselves too much upon, and solace ourselves too much in, here in the land of our sojourning, that we may think more of our home in the other world, and by faith and hope may hasten towards it. Earth is imbittered to us, that heaven may be endeared.

II. The good affection which her daughters-in-law, and one of them especially, bore to her, and her generous return of their good affection.

1. They were both so kind as to accompany her, some part of the way at least, when she returned toward the land of Judah. Her two daughters-in-law did not go about to persuade her to continue in the land of Moab, but, if she was resolved to go home, would pay her all possible civility and respect at parting; and this was one instance of it, they would bring her on her way, at least, to the utmost limits of their country, and help to carry her luggage as far as they went, for it does not appear she had any servant to attend her, v. 7. By this we see, both that Naomi, as became an Israelite, had been very kind and obliging to them, and had won their love, in which she is an example to all mothers-in-law; and that Orpah and Ruth had a just sense of her kindness, for they were willing to return it thus far. It was a sign they had dwelt together in unity, though they were dead by whom the relationship between them came. Though they retained an affection to the gods of Moab, (v. 15.) and Naomi was still faithful to the God of Israel, yet that was no hindrance to either side from love and kindness, and all the good offices that the relation required. Mothers-in-law and daughters-in-law are too often at variance, (Matth. 10. 35.) and therefore it is the more commendable if they live in love; let all in that relation aim at the praise of doing so.

2. When they had gone a little way with her, Naomi, with a great deal of affection, urged them to go back; (c. 8. 9.) Return each to her mother's house. When they were dislodged, by a sad providence, from the house of their husbands, it was a mercy to them that they had their parents yet living, that they had their houses to go to, where they might be welcome and easy, and were not turned out to the wide world. Naomi suggests that their own mothers would be more agreeable to them than a mother-in-law, especially when their own mothers had houses, and their mother-in-law was not sure she had a place to lay her head in, which she could call her own.

She dismisses them, (1.) With commendation; that is a debt owing to those who have conducted themselves well in any relation, they ought to have the praise of it, Ye have dealt kindly with the dead, and with me; that is, "Ye were good wives to your husbands that are gone, and have been good daughters to me, and not wanting to your duty in either relation." Note, When we and our relations are parting, by death, or otherwise, it is very comfortable, if we have both their testimony and the testimony of our own consciences, for us, that, while we were together, we carefully endeavoured to do our duty in the relation. This will help to allay the bitterness of parting; and while we are together, we should labour so to conduct ourselves, as that, when we part, we may not have cause to reflect with regret upon our miscarriages in the relation. (2.) With prayer. It is very proper for friends, when they part, to part with prayer. She sends them home with her blessing; and the blessing of a mother-in-law is not to be slighted. In this blessing, she twice mentions the name Jehovah, Israel's God, and the only true God; that she might direct her daughters to look up to him as the only Fountain of all good. To him she prays, in general, that he would recompense to them the kindness they had shewed to her and her's. It may be expected, and prayed for in faith, that God will deal kindly with those that have dealt kindly with their relations; He that watereth shall be watered also himself; and, in particular, that they might be happy in marrying again; The Lord grant that ye may find rest, each of you in the house of her husband. Note, [1.] It is very fit, that, according to the apostle's direction, (1 Tim. 5. 14.) the younger women, and he speaks there of young widows, should marry, bear children, and guide the house. And it is a pity that those who have approved themselves good wives should not again be blessed with good husbands, especially those that, like these widows, have no children. [2.] The married state is a state of rest, of such rest as this world affords, rest in the house of a husband, more than can be expected in the house of a mother, or a mother-in-law. [3.] This rest is God's gift. If any content and satisfaction be found in our outward condition, God must be acknowledged in it. There are those that are unequally yoked, that find little rest even in the house of a husband. Their affliction ought to make those the more thankful to whom the relation is comfortable; yet let God be the Rest of the soul, and no perfect rest thought of on this side heaven. (3.) She dismissed them with great affection; she kissed them; wished she had somewhat better to give them, but silver and gold she has none. However, this parting kiss shall be the seal of such a true friendship, as (though she never see them more) she will, while she lives, retain the pleasing remembrance of. If relations must part, let them thus part in love, that they may (if they never meet again in this world) meet in the world of everlasting love.

3. The two young widows could not think of parting with their good mother-in-law, so much had the good conversation of that pious Israelite won upon them; they not only lifted up their voice and wept, as loath to part, but they professed a resolution to adhere to her; (v. 10.) "Surely we will return with thee unto thy people, and take our lot with thee." It is a rare instance of affection to a mother-in-law, and an evidence that they had, for her sake, conceived a good opinion of the people of Israel. Even Orpah, who afterward went back to her gods, now seemed resolved to go forward with Naomi. The sad ceremony of parting, and the tears shed on that occasion, drew from her this protestation, but it did not hold. Strong passions, without a settled judgment, commonly produce weak resolutions.

4. Naomi sets herself to dissuade them from going along with her, v. 11. 13. If she had had any sons in Canaan, or any near kinsmen, whom she could have expected to marry the widows, to raise up seed to them that were gone, and to redeem the mortgaged estate of the family, it might have been some encouragement to them to hope for a comfortable settlement at Beth-lehem. But she had no sons, nor could she think of any near kinsman, likely to do the kinsman's part, and therefore argues that she was never likely to have any sons to be husbands for them, for she was too old to have a husband; it became her age to think of dying and going out of the world, not of marrying and beginning the world again. Or, if she had a husband, she could not expect to have children, nor, if she had sons, could she think that these young widows would stay unmarried, till her sons, that should yet be born, would grow up to be marriageable. Yet this was not all, she could not only not propose to herself to marry them like themselves, but she knew not how to maintain them like themselves. The greatest grievance of that poor condition to which she was reduced, was, that she was not in a capacity to do for them as she would. It grieveth me, more for your sakes than for my own, that the hand of the Lord is gone out against me. Observe, (1.) She judges herself chiefly aimed at in the affliction; that God's quarrel was principally with her, "The hand of the Lord is gone out against me. I am the sinner, it is with me that God has a controversy, it is with me that he is contending, I take it to myself." This will become us when we are under affliction; though many others share in the trouble, yet we must hear the voice of the rod, as if it spoke only against us, and to us, not billeting the rebukes of it at other people's houses, but taking them to ourselves. (2.) She laments most the trouble that redounded to them from it. She was the sinner, but they were the sufferers, It grieveth me much for your sakes. A gracious generous spirit can better bear its own burthen, than it can bear to see it a grievance to others, or others drawn any ways into trouble by it. Naomi could more easily want herself, than see her daughters want. "Therefore turn again, my daughters, for, alas! I am in no capacity to do you any kindness."

But did Naomi do well, thus to discourage her daughters from going with her, when, by taking them with her, she might save them from the idolatry of Moab, and bring them to the faith and worship of the God of Israel? Naomi, no doubt, desired to do that. But, [1.] If they did come with her, she would not have them to come upon her account; those that take upon them a profession of religion, only in complaisance to their relations, to oblige their friends, or for the sake of company, will be converts of small value, and of short continuance. [2.] If they did come with her, she would have them to make it their deliberate choice, and to sit down first and count the cost, as it concerns those to do that may take up a profession of religion. It is good for us to be told the worst; our Saviour took this course with him who, in the heat of zeal, spoke that bold word, Master, I will follow thee, whithersoever thou goest; "Come, come," says Christ, "canst thou fare as I fare? The Son of man has not where to lay his head; know that, and then consider whether thou canst find in thy heart to take thy lot with him," Matth. 8. 19, 20. Thus Naomi deals with her daughters-in-law. Thoughts ripened into resolves, by serious consideration, are likely to be kept always in the imagination of the heart; whereas what is soon ripe is soon rotten.

5. Orpah was easily persuaded to yield to her own corrupt inclination, and to go back to her country, her kindred, and her father's house, now when she stood fair for an effectual call from it. They both lifted up their voices and wept again, (v. 14.) being much affected with the tender things that Naomi had said; but it had a different effect upon them: to Orpah it was a savour of death unto death; the representation Naomi had made of the inconveniencies they must count upon, if they went forward to Canaan, sent her back to the country of Moab, and served her as an excuse for her apostasy. But, on the contrary, it strengthened Ruth's resolution, and her good affection to Naomi, with whose wisdom and goodness she was never so charmed as she was upon this occasion; thus to her it was a savour of life unto life. (1.) Orpah kissed her mother-in-law. that is, took an affectionate leave of her, bid her farewell for ever without any purpose to follow her hereafter, as he that said he would follow Christ when he had buried his father, or bidden them farewell that were at home. Orpah's kiss shewed she had an affection for Naomi, and was loath to part from her; yet she did not love her well enough to leave her country for her sake. Thus, many have a value and affection for Christ, and yet come short of salvation by him, because they cannot find in their hearts to forsake other things for him. They love him, and yet leave him, because they do not love him enough, but love other things better. Thus the young man that went away from Christ went away sorrowful, Matth. 19. 22. But, (2.) Ruth clave unto her. Whether, when she came from home, she was resolved to go forward with her or no, does not appear; perhaps she was before determined what to do, out of a sincere affection to the God of Israel, and to his law, of which, by the good instructions of Naomi, she had some knowledge.

6. Naomi persuades Ruth to go back, urging, as a further inducement, her sister's example; (v. 15.) Thy sister-in-law is gone back to her people, and therefore of course gone back to her gods; for, whatever she might have done while she lived with her mother-in-law, it would be next to impossible for her to shew any respect to the God of Israel, when she went to live among the worshippers of Chemosh. Those that forsake the communion of saints, and return to the people of Moab, will certainly break off their communion with God, and embrace the idols of Moab. Now, return thou after thy sister; that is, "If ever thou wilt return, return now. This is the greatest trial of thy constancy; stand this trial, and thou art mine for ever." Such offences as that of Orpah's revolt must needs come, that they which are perfect and sincere may be made manifest, as Ruth was upon this occasion.

7. Ruth puts an end to the debate, by a most solemn profession of her immoveable resolution never to forsake her, nor to return to her own country and her old relations again, v. 16, 17. Nothing could be said more fine, more brave, than this; she seems to have had another spirit, and another speech, now that her sister was gone, and it is an instance of the grace of God inclining the soul to the resolute choice of the better part. Draw me thus, and we will run after thee. Her mother's dissuasions make her the more resolute; as when Joshua said to the people, Ye cannot serve the Lord, they said it with the more vehemence Nay, but we will.

(1.) She begs of her mother-in-law to say no more against her going, "Entreat me not to leave thee, or to return from following thee; for all thy entreaties now cannot shake that resolution which thy instructions formerly have wrought in me; and therefore let me hear no more of them." Note, It is a great vexation and uneasiness to those that are resolved for God and religion, to be tempted and solicited to alter their resolution. They that would not think of it would not hear of it. Entreat me not. The margin reads it, Be not against me. Note, We are to reckon those against us, and really our enemies, that would hinder us in our way to the heavenly Canaan. Our relations they may be, but they cannot be our friends, that would dissuade us from, and discourage us in, the service of God and the work of religion.

(2.) She is very particular in her resolution to cleave to her, and never to forsake her; and she speaks the language of one resolved for God and heaven. She is so in love, not with her mother's beauty, or riches, or gaiety, (all those were withered and gone,) but with her wisdom, and virtue, and grace, which remained with her, even in her present poor and melancholy condition, that she resolves to cleave to her. [1.] She will travel with her; "Whither thou goest I will go, though to a country I never saw, and which I have been trained up in a low and ill opinion of; though far from my own country, yet with thee every road shall be pleasant." [2.] She will dwell with her; "Where thou lodgest I will lodge, though it be in a cottage, nay, though it be no better a lodging than Jacob had, when he had the stones for his pillow. Where thou settest up thy staff, I will set up mine, be it where it will." [3.] She will twist interests with her, Thy people shall be my people. From Naomi's character she concludes certainly, that that great nation was a wise and an understanding people; she judges of them all by her good mother, who, wherever she went, was a credit to her country, (as all those should study to be, who profess relation to the better country, that is, the heavenly,) and therefore she will think herself happy if she may be reckoned one of them. "Thy people shall be mine to associate with, to be comfortable to, and to be concerned for." [4.] She will join in religion with her; thus she determined to be her's usque ad aras—to the very altars, "Thy God shall be my God, and farewell to all the gods of Moab, which are vanity and a lie. I will adore the God of Israel, the only living and true God, trust in him alone, serve him, and in every thing be ruled by him;" this is to take the Lord for our God. [5.] She will gladly die in the same bed, Where thou diest will I die: she takes it for granted they must both die, and that, in all probability, Naomi, as the elder, would die first, and resolves to continue in the same house, if it might be, till her days also were fulfilled; intimating likewise a desire to partake of her happiness in death; she wishes to die in the same place, in token of her dying after the same manner, "Let me die the death of righteous Naomi, and let my last end be like her's." [6.] She will desire to be buried in the same grave, and to lay her bones by her's; There will I be buried; not desiring to have so much as her dead body carried back to the country of Moab, in token of any remaining kindness for it; but Naomi and she having joined souls, she desires they may mingle dust, in hopes of rising together, and being together for ever in the other world.

(3.) She backs her resolution to adhere to Naomi with a solemn oath; The Lord do so to me, and more also, (which was an ancient form of imprecation,) if aught but death part thee and me. An oath for confirmation was an end of this strife, and would leave a lasting obligation upon her, never to forsake that good way she was now making choice of. [1.] It is implied that death would separate between them for a time. She could promise to die, and be buried in the same place, but not at the same time: it might so happen, that she might die first, and that would part them. Note, Death parts those whom nothing else will part. A dying hour is a parting hour, and should be so thought of by us, and prepared for. [2.] It is resolved that nothing else should part them; not any kindness from her own family and people, nor any hope of preferment among them; nor any unkindness from Israel, nor the fear of poverty and di-grace among them, "No, I will never leave thee."

Now this is a pattern of a resolute convert to God and religion; thus must we be at a point. First, We must take the Lord for our God. "This God is my God for ever and ever; I have avouched him for mine." Secondly, When we take God for our God, we must take his people for our people in all conditions; though they be a poor despised people, yet, if they be his, they must be our's. Thirdly, Having cast in our lot among them, we must be willing to take our lot with them, and to fare as they fare. We must submit to the same yoke, and draw in it faithfully; take up the same cross, and carry it cheerfully; go where God would have us to go, though it should be into banishment, and to lodge where he would have us to lodge, though it be in a prison; die where he will have us die, and lay our bones in the graves of the upright, who enter into peace, and rest in their beds, though they be but the graves of the common people. Fourthly, We must resolve to continue and persevere; and herein our adherence to Christ must be closer than that of Ruth to Naomi: she resolved that nothing but death should separate them; but we must resolve that death itself shall not separate us from our duty to Christ, and then we may be sure that death itself shall not separate us from our happiness in Christ. Fifthly, We must bind our souls with a bond never to break these pious resolutions, and swear unto the Lord that we will cleave to him. Fast bind, fast find. He that means honestly, does not start at assurances.

Lastly, Naomi was hereby silenced, v. 18. When she saw that Ruth was steadfastly minded to go with her, (which was the very thing she aimed at in all that she had said, to make her of a steadfast mind in going with her,) when she saw that she had gained her point, she was well satisfied, and left off speaking to her. She could desire no more than that solemn protestation which Ruth had just now made. See the power of resolution, how it puts temptation to silence. Those that are unresolved, and go in religious ways without a steadfast mind, tempt the tempter, and stand like a door half open, which invites a thief; but resolution shuts and bolts the door, resists the devil, and forces him to flee.

The Chaldee paraphrase thus relates the debate between Naomi and Ruth. Ruth said, Entreat me not to leave thee, for I will be a proselyte; Naomi said, We are commanded to keep sabbaths, and good days, on which we may not travel above two thousand cubits; (a sabbath-day's journey;) Well, says Ruth, whither thou goest, I will go. Naomi said, We are commanded not to tarry all night with Gentiles; Well, says Ruth, where thou lodgest, I will lodge. Naomi said, We are commanded to keep six hundred and thirteen precepts; Well, says Ruth, whatever thy people keep, I will keep, for they shall be my people. Naomi said, We are forbidden to worship any strange god; Well, says Ruth, thy God shall be my God. Naomi said, We have four sorts of deaths for malefactors, stoning, burning, strangling, and slaying with the sword; Well, says Ruth, where thou diest, I will die. We have, said Naomi, houses of sepulchre; And there, said Ruth, will I be buried.

19. So they two went until they came to Beth-lehem. And it came to pass, when they were come to Beth-lehem, that all the city was moved about them, and they said, Is this Naomi? 20. And she said unto them, Call me not Naomi, call me Mara: for the Almighty hath dealt very bitterly with me. 21. I went out full, and the LORD hath brought me home again empty: why then call ye me Naomi, seeing the LORD hath testified against me, and the Almighty hath afflicted me? 22. So Naomi returned, and Ruth the Moabitess, her daughter-in-law, with her, which returned out of the country of Moab: and they came to Beth-lehem in the beginning of barley-harvest.

Naomi and Ruth, after many a weary step, (the fatigue of the journey, we may suppose, being somewhat relieved by the good instructions Naomi gave to her proselyte, and the good discourse they had together,) came at last to Beth-lehem. And they came very seasonably, in the beginning of the barley-harvest, which was the first of their harvests, that of wheat following after. Now Naomi's own eyes might convince her of the truth of what she had heard in the country of Moab, that the Lord had visited his people in giving them bread, and Ruth might see this good land in its best state; and now they had opportunity to provide for winter. Our times are in God's hands; both the events, and the time of them.

Notice is here taken,

I. Of the discomposure of the neighbours upon this occasion; (v. 19.) All the city was moved about them. Her old acquaintance gathered about her, to inquire concerning her state, and to bid her welcome to Beth-lehem again. Or, perhaps, they were moved about her, lest she should be a charge to the town, she looked so bare. By this it appears that she had formerly lived respectably, else there had not been so much notice taken of her. If those that have been in a high and prosperous condition, break, or fall into poverty or disgrace, their fall is the more remarkable; and they said, Is this Naomi? The women of the city said it, for the word is feminine. They with whom she had formerly been intimate, were surprised to see her in this condition; she was so much broken and altered with her afflictions, that they could scarcely believe their own eyes, or think that this was the same person whom they had formerly seen, so fresh, and fair, and gay; Is this Naomi? So unlike is the rose, when it is withered, to what it was when it was blooming. What a poor figure does Naomi make now, compared with what she made in her prosperity! If any asked this question in contempt, upbraiding her with her miseries, ("Is this she that could not be content to fare as her neighbours did, but must ramble to a strange country? See what she has got by it!") their temper was very base and sordid; nothing more barbarous than to triumph over those that are fallen. But we may suppose that the generality asked it in compassion and commiseration; "Is this she that lived so plentifully, and kept so good a house, and was so charitable to the poor? How is the gold become dim!" They that had seen the magnificence of the first temple wept when they saw the meanness of the second; so these here. Note, Afflictions will make great and surprising changes in a little time. When we see how sickness and old age alter people, change their countenance and temper, we may think of what the Beth-lehemites said, Is this Naomi? One would not take it to be the same person. God, by his grace, fit us for all such changes, especially the great change!

II. Of the composure of Naomi's spirit. If some upbraided her with her poverty, she was not moved against them, as she would have been if she had been poor and proud; but, with a great deal of pious patience, bore that and all the other melancholy effects of her affliction; (v. 20, 21.) Call me not Naomi, call me Mara, &c. "Naomi signifies pleasant or amiable; but all my pleasant things are laid waste; call me Mara, bitter, or bitterness, for I am now a woman of a sorrowful spirit." Thus does she bring her mind to her condition, which we all ought to do, when our condition is not in every thing to our mind. Observe,

1. The change of her state, and how that is described, with a pious regard to the divine providence, and without any passionate murmurings or complaints. (1.) It was a very sad and melancholy change. She went out full; so she thought herself when she had her husband with her, and two sons. Much of the fulness of our comfort in this world arises from agreeable relations. But she now came home again empty, a widow, and childless, and, probably, had sold her goods, and, of all the effects she took with her, brought home no more than the clothes on her back. So uncertain is all that which we call fulness in the creature, 1Sam. 2. 5. Even in the fulness of that sufficiency we may be in straits. But there is a fulness, a spiritual and divine fulness, which we can never be emptied of; a good part which shall not be taken from those that have it. (2.) She acknowledges the hand of God, his mighty hand, in the affliction. "It is the Lord that has brought me home again empty; it is the Almighty that has afflicted me." Note, Nothing conduces more to satisfy a gracious soul under an affliction, than the consideration of the hand of God in it; It is the Lord, 1Sam. 3. 18. Job, 1. 21.; especially to consider, that he who afflicts us, is Shaddai, the Almighty, with whom it is folly to contend, and to whom it is our duty and interest to submit. It is that name of God, by which he enters into covenant with his people, I am God Almighty, God all-sufficient, Gen. 17. 1. He afflicts as a God in covenant, and his all-sufficiency may be our support and supply under all our afflictions. He that empties us of the creature knows how to fill us with himself. (3.) She speaks very feelingly of the impression which the affliction had made upon her; He has dealt very bitterly with me. The cup of affliction is a bitter cup; and even that which afterward yields the peaceable fruit of righteousness, yet, for the present, is not joyous, but grievous, Heb. 12. 11. Job complains, Thou writest bitter things against me, Job, 13. 26. (4.) She owns the affliction to come from God as a controversy; The Lord hath testified against me. Note, When God corrects us, he testifies against us, and contends with us, (Job, 10. 17.) intimating that he is displeased with us. Every rod has a voice, the voice of a witness.

2. The compliance of her spirit with this change. "Call me not Naomi, for I am no more pleasant, either to myself, or to my friends, but call me Mara, a name more agreeable to my present state. Many that are debased and impoverished, yet affect to be called by the empty names and titles of honour they have formerly enjoyed. Naomi did not so; her humility regards not a glorious name in a dejected state; if God deal bitterly with her, she accommodates herself to the dispensation, and is willing to be called Mara, bitter. Note, It well becomes us to have our hearts humbled under humbling providences. When our condition is brought down, our spirits should be brought down with it. And then our troubles are sanctified to us, when we thus comport with them; for it is not an affliction itself, but an affliction rightly borne, that does us good. Perdidisti tot mala, si nondum misera esse didicisti—So many calamities have been lost upon you, if you have not yet learned how to suffer. Sen. ad Helv. Tribulation works patience.

CHAP. II.

There is scarcely any chapter in all the sacred history, that stoops so low as this, to take cognizance of so mean a person as Ruth, a poor Moabitish widow, so mean an action as her gleaning corn in a neighbour's field, and the minute circumstances thereof. But all this was in order to her being grafted into the line of Christ, and taken in among his ancestors, that she might be a figure of the espousals of the Gentile church to Christ, Isa. 54. 1. And this makes the story remarkable; and many of the passages of it are instructive, and very improbable. Here is, I. Ruth's humility and industry in gleaning corn, Providence directing her to Boaz's field, v. 1. 3. II. The great favour which Boaz shewed to her in many instances, v. 4. 16. III. The return of Ruth to her mother-in-law, v. 18. 23.

I. AND Naomi had a kinsman of her husband's, a mighty man of wealth, of the family of Elimelech; and his name was Boaz. 2. And Ruth the Moabitess said unto Naomi, Let me now go to the field, and glean ears of corn after him in whose sight I shall find grace. And she said unto her, Go, my daughter. 3. And she went, and came, and gleaned in the field after the reapers; and her hap was to light on a part of the field belonging unto Boaz, who was of the kindred of Elimelech.

Naomi had now gained a settlement in Bethlehem among her old friends; and here we have an account,

I. Of her rich kinsman, Boaz, a mighty man of wealth, v. 1. The Chaldee reads it, mighty in the law; if he was both, it was a most rare and excellent conjunction, to be mighty in wealth, and mighty in the scriptures too; those that are so are mighty indeed. He was grandson of Nahshon, that was prince of the tribe of Judah in the wilderness, and son of Salmon, probably, a younger son, by Rahab, the harlot of Jericho; he carries might in his name, Boaz, in him is strength; and he was of the family of Elimelech, that family which was now reduced and brought so low. Observe, 1. Boaz, though a rich and great man, had poor relations; every branch of the tree is not a top branch. Let not those that are great in the world, be ashamed to own their kindred that are mean and despised, lest they be found therein proud, scornful, and unnatural. 2. Naomi, though a poor contemptible widow, had rich relations, whom yet she neither boasted of, nor was burthensome to, nor expected any thing from, when she was returned to Bethlehem in distress. Those that have rich relations, while they themselves are poor, ought to know that it is the wise providence of God that makes the difference, (in which we ought to acquiesce,) and that to be proud of our relation to such, is a great sin, and to trust to it, is great folly.

II. Of her poor daughter-in-law, Ruth, 1. Her condition was very low and poor; which was a great trial to the faith and constancy of a young proselyte. The Bethlehemites had done well, if they had invited Naomi and her daughter-in-law first to one good house, and then to another; (it would have been a great support to an aged widow, and a great encouragement to a new convert;) but, instead of tasting the dainties of Canaan, they have no way of getting necessary food, but by gleaning corn; and otherwise, for aught that appears, they might have starved. Note, God has chosen the poor of this world: and poor they are like to be, for though God has chosen them, commonly men overlook them. 2. Her character, in this condition, was very good; (v. 2.) She said to Naomi, not, "Let me now go to the land of Moab again, for there is no living here; here there is want, but in my father's house there is bread enough;" no, she is not mindful of the country from which she came out, otherwise she had now a fair occasion to return; the God of Israel shall be her God, and though he slay her, yet will she trust in him, and never forsake him. But her request is, Let me go to the field, and glean ears of corn. Those that are well born, and have been well brought up, know not what straits they may be reduced to, nor what mean employments they may be obliged to get their bread by, Lam. 4. 5. When the case is thus melancholy, let Ruth be remembered, who is a great example,

(1.) Of humility; when Providence had made her poor, she did not say, "To glean, which is, in effect, to beg, I am ashamed;" but cheerfully stoops to the meanness of her circumstances, and accommodates herself to her lot. High spirits can more easily starve than stoop; Ruth was none of those. She does not tell her mother she was never brought up to live upon crumbs. Though she was not brought up to it, she is brought down to it, and is not uneasy at it. Nay, it is her own motion, not her mother's injunction; humility is one of the brightest ornaments of youth, and one of the best omens. Before Ruth's honour, was this humility. Observe how humbly she speaks of herself, in her expectation of leave to glean; "Let me glean after him in whose sight I shall find grace." She does not say, "I will go glean, and surely nobody will deny me the liberty;" but, "I will go glean, in the hope that some body will allow me the liberty." Note, Poor people must not demand kindness as a debt, but humbly ask it, and take it as a favour, though in ever so small a matter. It becomes the poor to use entreaties.

(2.) Of industry. She does not say to her mother-in-law, "Let me now go a visiting to the ladies of the town, or go a walking in the fields to take the air, and be merry, I cannot sit all day moping with you;" no, it is not sport but business that her heart is upon, "Let me go and glean ears of corn, and that will turn to some good account." She was one of those virtuous women that love not to eat the bread of idleness, she loved to take pains. This is an example to young people; let them learn betimes to labour, and what their hand finds to do, do it with their might: a disposition to diligence bodes well both for this world and the other. Love not sleep, love not sport, love not sauntering, but love business. It is also an example to poor people to work for their living, and not beg that which they are able to earn. We must not be shy of any honest employment, though it be mean, ἔργον ἕθεν ἀνείδος—No labour is a reproach. Sin is a thing below us, but we must not think any thing else so that Providence calls us to.

(3.) Of regard to her mother; though she was but her mother-in-law, and though, being loosed by death from the law of her husband, she might easily suppose herself thereby loosed from the law of her husband's mother, yet she is dutifully observant of her. She will not go out without letting her know, and asking her leave. This respect young people ought to shew to their parents and governors; it is part of the honour due to them. She did not say, "Mother, if you will go with me, I will go glean;" but, "Do you sit at home, and take your ease, and I will go abroad, and take pains." Juniores ad labores—Youth should work. Let young people take advice from the aged, but not put them upon toil.

(4.) Of dependence upon Providence; intimated in that, I will glean after him in whose sight I shall find grace. She knows not which way to go, nor whom to inquire for, but will trust Providence to raise her up some friend or other that will be kind to her. Let us always keep up good thoughts of the Divine Providence, and believe, that, while we do well, it will do well for us.

of Boaz, v.3. To her it seemed casta, she knew not whose field it was, nor had she any reason for going to that more than any other, and therefore it is said to be her hap; but Providence directed her steps to this field. Note, God wisely orders small events; and those that seem altogether contingent serve his own glory, and the good of his people. Many a great affair is brought about by a little turn, which seemed fortuitous to us, but was directed by Providence with design.

4. And, behold, Boaz came from Beth-lehem, and said unto the reapers, The LORD be with you. And they answered him, The LORD bless thee. 5. Then said Boaz unto his servant that was set over the reapers, Whose damsel is this? 6. And the servant that was set over the reapers answered and said, It is the Moabitish damsel that came back with Naomi out of the country of Moab: 7. And she said, I pray you, let me glean and gather after the reapers among the sheaves: So she came, and hath continued even from the morning until now that she tarried a little in the house. 8. Then said Boaz unto Ruth, Hearest thou not, my daughter? Go not to glean in another field, neither go from hence, but abide here fast by my maidens: 9. Let thine eyes be on the field that they do reap, and go thou after them: have I not charged the young men that they shall not touch thee? and when thou art athirst, go unto the vessels, and drink of that which the young men have drawn. 10. Then she fell on her face, and bowed herself to the ground, and said unto him, Why have I found grace in thine eyes, that thou shouldst take knowledge of me, seeing I am a stranger? 11. And Boaz answered and said unto her, It hath fully been shewed me, all that thou hast done unto thy mother-in-law since the death of thine husband: and how thou hast left thy father and thy mother, and the land of thy nativity, and art come unto a people which thou knewest not heretofore. 12. The LORD recompense thy work, and a full reward be given thee of the LORD God of Israel, under whose wings thou art come to trust. 13. Then she said, Let me find favour in thy sight, my lord; for that thou hast comforted me, and for that thou hast spoken friendly unto thine handmaid, though I be not like unto one of thine handmaidens. 14. And Boaz said unto her, At meal-time come thou hither, and eat of the bread, and dip thy morsel in the vinegar. And she sat beside the reapers: and he reached her parched corn, and she did eat, and was sufficed, and left. 15. And when she was risen up to glean, Boaz commanded his young men, saying, Let her glean even among the sheaves, and reproach her not: 16. And let fall also some of the handfuls of purpose for her, and leave them, that she may glean them, and rebuke her not.

Now Boaz appears, and a great deal of decency there appears in his carriage, both toward his own servants, and toward this poor stranger.

I. Toward his own servants, and those that were employed for him in reaping and gathering in his corn. Harvest-time is busy time, many hands must then be at work. Boaz that had much, being a mighty man of wealth, had much to do, and consequently many to work under him, and to live upon him; as goods are increased, they are increased that eat them; and what good has the owner thereof, save the beholding of them with his eyes? Boaz is here an example of a good master.

1. He had a servant that was set over the reapers, v.6. In great families, it is requisite there should be one to oversee the rest of the servants, and appoint to each their portion, both of work and meat. Ministers are such servants in God's house, and it is requisite that they be both wise and faithful, and shew their Lord all things, as he here, v.6.

2. Yet he came himself to his reapers, to see how the work went forward, if he found any thing amiss, to rectify it, and to give further orders what should be done. This was both for his own interest, (he that wholly leaves his business to others, will have it done by the halves; the master's eye makes a fat horse,) and it was also for the encouragement of his servants, who would go on the more cheerfully in their work, when their master countenanced them so far as to make them a visit. Masters that live at ease, should think with tenderness of those that toil for them, and bear the burthen and heat of the day.

3. Kind and pious salutations were interchanged between Boaz and his reapers. He said to them, The Lord be with you; and they replied, The Lord bless thee, v.4. Hereby they expressed, (1.) Their mutual respect to each other; he to them as good servants, and they to him as a good master. When he came to them, he did not fall a chiding them, as if he came only to find fault and exercise his authority, but he prayed for them; "The Lord be with you, prosper you, and give you health and strength, and preserve you from any disaster;" nor did they, as soon as ever he was out of hearing, fall a cursing him, as some ill-natur'd servants that hate their master's eye; but they returned his courtesy, "The Lord bless thee, and make our labours serviceable to thy prosperity." Things are likely to go on well in a house where there is such good-will as this between master and servants. (2.) Their joint dependence upon the Divine Providence; they expressed their kindness to each other by praying one for another. They show not only their courtesy, but their piety, and an acknowledgment that all good comes from the presence and blessing of God, which therefore we should value and desire above any thing else, both for ourselves and others. Let us from hence learn to use, [1.] Courteous salutations, as expressions of a sincere good-will to our friends. [2.] Pious ejaculations, lifting up our hearts to God for his favour, in such short prayers as these. Only, we must take heed that they do not degenerate into formality, lest in them we take the name of the Lord our God in vain; but if we be serious in them, we may in them keep up our communion with God, and fetch in mercy and grace from him. It appears to have been the usual custom, thus to wish reapers good speed, Ps. 129. 7, 8.

4. He took an account from his reapers concerning a stranger he met with in the field, and gave necessary orders concerning her, that they should not touch her, (v.9.) nor reproach her, v.15. Masters must take care, not only that they do no hurt themselves, but that they suffer not their servants and those under them to do hurt. He also ordered them to be kind to her, and let fall some of the handfuls on purpose for her; though it is fit that masters should restrain and rebuke their servants' wastefulness, yet they should not tie them up from being charitable, but give them allowance for that, with prudent directions.

II. Boaz was very kind to Ruth, and shewed her a great deal of favour, induced to it by the account he had of her, and what he observed concerning her, God also inclining his heart to countenance her. Coming among his reapers, he observed this stranger among them, and got intelligence from his steward who she was, and here is a very particular account of what passed concerning her.

1. The steward gave to Boaz a very fair account of her, proper to recommend her to his favour, v. 6, 7. (1.) That she was a stranger, and therefore one of those that by the law of God were to gather the gleanings of the harvest, Lev. 19. 9, 10. She is the Moabitish damsel. (2.) That she was allied to his family; she came back with Naomi, the wife of Elimelech, a kinsman of Boaz. (3.) That she was a proselyte, for she came out of the country of Moab to settle in the land of Israel. (4.) That she was very modest, and had not gleaned till she had asked leave. (5.) That she was very industrious, and had continued close to her work from morning even until now. And the poor, that are industrious and willing to take pains, are fit to be encouraged. Now, in the heat of the day, she tarried a little in the house or booth, that was set up in the field for shelter from the weather, to repose herself, and some suggest that it is probable she retired for her devotion. But she soon came back to her work, and, except that little intermission, kept close to it all day, though it was not what she was used to. Servants should be just in the character and reports they give to their masters, and take heed they do not misrepresent any person, nor without cause discourage their masters' charity.

2. Boaz was hereupon extremely civil to her in divers instances. (1.) He ordered her to attend his reapers in every field they gathered in, and not to glean in another field, for she should not need to go any where else to mend herself; (v. 8.) Abide here fast by my maidens; for those of her own sex were the fittest company for her. (2.) He charged all his servants to be very tender of her, and respectful to her, who, no doubt, would be so to one whom they saw their master kind to. She was a stranger, and, it is probable, her language, dress, and mien, differed much from their's; but he charged them that they should not in any thing affront her, or be abusive to her, as rude servants are too apt to be to strangers. (3.) He bid her welcome to the entertainment he had provided for his servants. He ordered her, not only to drink of the water which was drawn for them, (for that seems to be the liquor he means, v. 9.) drawn from the famous well of Beth-lehem, which was by the gate, the water of which David longed for, 2 Sam. 23. 15.) but at meal-time to come eat of their bread; (v. 14.) yea, and she should be welcome to their sauce too, Come, dip thy morsel in the vinegar, to make it savoury; for God allows us, not only nourishing but relishing food, not for necessity only, but for delight. And, for encouragement to her, and direction to the servants, he himself, happening to be present when the reapers sat down to meat, reached her parched corn to eat. It is no disparagement to the finest hand to be reached forth to the needy, (Prov. 31. 20.) and to be employed in serving the poor. Observe, Boaz was not scanty in his provision for his reapers, but sent them so much more than enough for themselves as would be entertainment for a stranger. Thus there is that scattereth, and yet increaseth. (4.) He commended her for her dutiful respect to her mother-in-law, which, though he did not know her by sight, yet he had heard of; (v. 11.) It has been fully shewed me all that thou hast done unto thy mother-in-law. Note, Those that do well ought to have the praise of it. But that which especially he commended her for, was, that she had left her own country, and was become a proselyte to the Jewish religion; for so the Chaldee expounds it; "Thou art come to be proselyted, and to dwell among a people which thou knowest not." Those that leave all, to embrace the true religion, are worthy of double honour. (5.) He prayed for her; (v. 12.) The Lord recompense thy work. Her strong affection to the commonwealth of Israel, to which she was, by birth, an alien, was such a work of the divine grace in her, as would certainly be crowned with a full reward by him under whose wings she was come to trust. Note, Those that by faith come under the wings of the divine grace, and have a full complacency and confidence in that grace, may be sure of a full recompence of reward for their so doing. From this expression, the Jews describe a proselyte to be one that is gathered under the wings of the Divine Majesty. Lastly, He encouraged her to go on in her gleanng, and did not offer to take her off from that: for the greatest kindness we can do our poor relations, is, to assist and encourage their industry. Boaz ordered his servants to let her glean among the sheaves, where other gleaners were not allowed to come, and not to reproach her, that is, not to call her thief, or to suspect her of taking more than was allowed her, v. 15. All this shews Boaz to have been a man of a generous spirit, and one that, according to the law, considered the heart of a stranger.

3. Ruth received his favours with a great deal of humility and gratitude, and conducted herself with as much propriety in her place, as he did in his, but little thinking that she should shortly be the mistress of that field she was now gleaning in. (1.) She paid all possible respect to him, and gave him honour, according to the usage of the country; (v. 10.) She fell on her face, and bowed herself to the ground. Note, Good breeding is a great ornament to religion; and we must render honour to whom honour is due. (2.) She humbly owned herself unworthy of his favours; I am a stranger, (v. 10.) and not like one of thy handmaids; (v. 13.) not so well dressed, nor so well taught; not so neat, nor so handy. Note, It well becomes us all to think meanly of ourselves, and to take notice of that in ourselves which is diminishing, esteeming others better than ourselves. (3.) She gratefully acknowledged his kindness to her; though it was no great expence to him, nor much more than what he was obliged to by the divine law, yet she magnifies and admires it, Why have I found grace in thine eyes? v. 10. (4.) She begs the continuance of his good will, Let me find favour in thy sight, (v. 13.) and owns that what he had said had been a cordial to her, Thou hast comforted me, for that thou hast spoken friendly to me. Those that are great, and in high places, know not how much good they may do to their inferiors with a kind look, or by speaking friendly to them; and so small an expence, one would think, they should not grudge, when it shall be put upon the score of their charity. (5.) When Boaz gave her her dinner with his reapers, she ate so much as would suffice her, and left the rest; and immediately rose up to glean, v. 14, 15. She did not, under pretence either of her want, or of her labour, eat more than was convenient for her, nor so much as to unfit her for work in the afternoon: temperance is a friend to industry; and we must eat and drink to strengthen us for business, and not to indispose us to it.

17. So she gleaned in the field until even, and beat out that she had gleaned: and it was about an ephah of barley. 18. And she took it up, and went into the city: and her mother-in-law saw what she had gleaned: and she brought forth, and gave to her that she had reserved after she was sufficed. 19. And her mother-in-law said unto her, Where hast thou gleaned to-day? and where wroughtest thou? blessed be he that did take knowledge of thee. And she shewed her mother-in-law with whom she had wrought, and said, The man's name with whom I wrought to-day is Boaz. 20. And Naomi said unto her daughter-in-law, Blessed be he of the LORD, who hath not left off his kindness to the living and to the dead. And Naomi said unto her, The man is near of kin unto us, one of our next kinsmen. 21. And Ruth the Moabitess said, He said unto me also, Thou shalt keep fast by my young men, until they have ended all my harvest. 22. And Naomi said unto Ruth her daughter-in-law, It is good, my daughter, that thou go out with his maidens, that they meet thee not in any other field. 23. So she kept fast by the maidens of Boaz, to glean unto the end of barley-harvest and of wheat-harvest; and dwelt with her mother-in-law.

Here,

I. Ruth finishes her day's work, v. 17. 1. She took care not to lose time, for she gleaned until even. We must not be weary of well-doin', because in due season we shall reap. She did not make an excuse to sit still, or go home, till the evening; let us work the works of him that sent us, while it is day. She scarcely used, much less did she abuse, the kindness of Boaz; for, though he ordered his servants to leave handfuls for her, she continued to glean the scattered ears. 2. She took care not to lose what she had gathered, but threshed it herself, that she might the more easily carry it home, and might have it ready for use. The slothful man roasteth not that which he took in hunting, and so loseth the benefit of it; but the substance of a diligent man is precious, Prov. 12. 27. Ruth had gathered it ear by ear, but, when she had put it all together, it was an ephah of barley, about four pecks. Many a little makes a great deal. It is an encouragement to industry, that in all labour, even that of gleanin', there is profit; but the talk of the lips tendeth only to penny. When she had got her corn into as little compass as she could, she took it up herself, and carried it into the city, though, had she asked them, it is likely some of Boaz's servants would have done that for her. We should study to be as little as possible troublesome to those that are kind to us. She did not think it either too hard or too mean a service, to carry her corn herself into the city, but was rather pleased with what she had gotten by her own industry, and careful to secure it; and let us thus take care that we lose not those things which we have wrought, which we have gained, 2 John, 8.

II. She paid her respects to her mother-in-law; went straight home to her, and did not go to converse with Boaz's servants; shewed her what she had gleaned, that she might see she had not been idle.

1. She entertained her with what she had left of the good dinner Boaz had given her. She gave to her that she had reserved, after she was sufficed, v. 18. which refers to v. 14. If she had any thing better than another, her mother should have part with her. Thus, having shewed industry abroad, she shewed piety at home; so children's maintaining of their parents is called, (1 Tim. 5. 4.) and it is part of the honour due to them by the fifth commandment, Matth. 15. 6.

2. She gave her an account of her day's work, and how a kind Providence had favoured her in it, which made it very comfortable to her; for the gleanings that a righteous man hath are better than the harvests of many wicked, Ps. 37. 16.

(1.) Naomi asked her where she had been; Where hast thou gleaned to-day? Note, Parents should take care to inquire into the ways of their children, how, and where, and in what company, they spend their time. This may prevent many extravagancies which children, left to themselves, run into, by which they bring both themselves and their parents to shame. If we are not our brethren's, yet surely we are our children's, keepers: and we know what a son Adonijah proved, that had never been chidden. Parents should examine their children, not to frighten or discourage them, so as to make them hate home, or tempt them to tell a lie, but to commend them, if they have done well, and, with mildness, to reprove and caution them, if they have done otherwise. It is a good question for us to ask ourselves in the close of every day, "Where have I gleaned to-day? What improvements have I made in knowledge and grace? What have I done or gotten, that will turn to a good account?"

(2.) Ruth gave her a particular account of the kindness she had received from Boaz, (v. 19.) and the hopes she had of further kindness from him, he having ordered her to attend his servants throughout all the harvest, v. 21. Note, Children should look upon themselves as accountable to their parents and to those that are over them, and not think it a disparagement to them to be examined; let them do that which is good, and they shall have praise of the same. Ruth told her mother what kindness Boaz had shewed her, that she might take some occasion or another to acknowledge it, and return him thanks; but she did not tell her how Boaz had commended her, v. 11. Humility teaches us, not only not to praise ourselves, but not to be forward to publish others' praises of us.

(3.) We are here told what Naomi said to it.

[1.] She prayed heartily for him that had been her daughter's benefactor, even before she knew who it was; (v. 19.) Blessed be he, whoever he was, that did take knowledge of thee; shooting the arrow of prayer at a venture; but more particularly, when she was told who it was; (v. 20.) Blessed be he of the Lord. Note, The poor must pray for those that are kind and liberal to them, and thus requite them, when they are not capable of making them any other requital. Let the loins of the poor bless those that refresh them, Job, 29. 13.—31. 20. And he that hears the cries of the poor against their oppressors, (Exod. 22. 27.) it may be hoped, will hear the prayers of the poor for their benefactors. She now remembered the former kindnesses Boaz had shewed to her husband and sons, and joins those to this; he has not left off his kindness to the living and to the dead. If we generously shew kindness, even to those that seem to have forgotten our former favours, perhaps it may help to revive the remembrance even of them which seem buried.

[2.] She acquainted Ruth with the relation their family was in to Boaz; The man is near of kin to us. It should seem she had been so long in Moab, that she had forgotten her kindred in the land of Israel, till, by this providence, God brought it to her mind. At least, she had not told Ruth of it, though it might have been some encouragement to a young proselyte. Unlike to humble Naomi are many, who, though fallen into decay themselves, are continually boasting of their great relations. Nay, observe the chain of thought here, and in it a chain of providences, bringing about what was designed concerning Ruth. Ruth names Boaz as one that had been kind to her; Naomi bethinks herself who that should be, and presently recollects herself; "The man is near of kin to us; now that I hear his name, I remember him very well." This thought brings in another; "He is our next kinsman; our Goel, that has the right to redeem our estate that was mortgaged, and therefore from him we may expect further kindness. That is the likeliest man in all Beth-lehem to set us up." Thus God brings things to our mind, sometimes of a sudden, that prove to have a wonderful tendency to our good.

[3.] She appointed Ruth to continue her attendance in the fields of Boaz; (v. 22.) "Let them not meet thee in any other field, for that will be construed a contempt of his courtesy." Our blessed Saviour is our Goel; it is he that has a right to redeem: if we expect to receive benefit by him, let us closely adhere to him, and his fields, and his family; let us not go to the world, and its fields, for that which is to be had with him only, and which he has encouraged us to expect from him. Has the Lord dealt bountifully with us? Let us not be found in any other field, nor seek for happiness and satisfaction in the creature. Tradesmen take it ill, if those that are in their books go to another shop. We lose divine favours, if we slight them. Some think Naomi gave her daughter-in-law a tacit rebuke; she had spoken (v. 21.) of keeping fast by the young men; "Nay," said Naomi, (v. 22.) "it is good that thou go out with his maidens, they are fitter company for thee than the young men." But they are too critical: Ruth spake of the young men, because they were the principal labourers, and to them Boaz had given directions concerning her; and Naomi takes it for granted, while she attended the young men, her society would be with the maidens, as was fit.

Ruth dutifully obeyed her mother's directions; she continued to glean, to the end, not only of barley-harvest, but of the wheat-harvest, which followed it, that she might gather food in harvest to serve for winter, Prov. 6. 6. . 8. She also kept fast by the maidens of Boaz, with whom she afterward cultivated an acquaintance, which might do her service, v. 23. But she constantly came to her mother at night in due time, as became a virtuous woman, that was for working-days, and not for merry nights. And, when the harvest was ended, (as Bishop Patrick expounds it,) she did not gad abroad, but kept her aged mother company at home. Dinah went out to see the daughters of the land, and we know what a disgrace her vanity ended in; Ruth kept at home, and helped to maintain her mother, and went out on no other errand than to get provision for her; and we shall find afterward what preferment her humility and industry ended in. Seest thou a man diligent in his business? Honour is before him.

CHAP. III.

We found it very easy, in the former chapter, to applaud the decency of Ruth's behaviour, and to shew what good use we may make of the account given us of it; but, in this chapter, we shall have much ado to vindicate it from the imputation of indecency, and to save it from having an ill use made of it; but the goodness of those times was such, as saves what is recorded here from being ill-done, and yet the badness of these times is such, as that it will not justify any now in doing the like. Here is, I. The direction Naomi gave to her daughter-in-law, how to claim Boaz for her husband, v.1..5. II. Ruth's punctual observance of these directions, v.6,7. III. The kind and honourable treatment Boaz gave her, v.8..15. IV. Her return to her mother-in-law, v.16..18.

1. THEN Naomi her mother-in-law said unto her, My daughter, shall I not seek rest for thee, that it may be well with thee? 2. And now, is not Boaz of our kindred, with whose maidens thou wast? Behold, he winnoweth barley to-night in the threshing floor. 3. Wash thyself therefore, and anoint thee, and put thy raiment upon thee, and get thee down to the floor: but make not thyself known unto the man, until he shall have done eating and drinking. 4. And it shall be, when he lieth down, that thou shalt mark the place where he shall lie, and thou shalt go in, and uncover his feet, and lay thee down; and he will tell thee what thou shalt do. 5. And she said unto her, All that thou sayest unto me I will do.

Here,

1. Naomi's care for her daughter's comfort, is, without doubt, very commendable, and is recorded for imitation. She had no thoughts of marrying herself, ch. 1. 12. But though she that was old had resolved upon a perpetual widowhood, yet she was far from the thoughts of confining her daughter-in-law to it, that was young. Age must not make itself a standard to youth. On the contrary, she is full of contrivance how to get her well married. Her wisdom projected that for her daughter, which her daughter's modesty forbade her to project for herself, v. 1. This she did, 1. In justice to the dead, to raise up seed to them that were gone, and so to preserve the family from being extinct. 2. In kindness and gratitude to her daughter-in-law, who had conducted herself very dutifully and respectfully to her. "My daughter," (said she, looking upon her in all respects as her own,) "shall I not seek rest for thee?" that is, "a settlement in the married state; shall I not get thee a good husband, that it may be well with thee?" that is, "that thou mayest live plentifully and pleasantly, and not spend all thy days in the mean and melancholy condition we now live in." Note, (1.) A married state is, or should be, a state of rest to young people; wandering affections are then fixed, and the heart must be at rest; it is at rest in the house of a husband, and in his heart, ch. 1. 9. Those are giddy indeed, that marriage does not compose. (2.) That which should be desired and designed by those that enter into the marriage state, is, that it may be well with them; in order to which, it is necessary that they choose well; otherwise, instead of being a rest to them, it may prove the greatest uneasiness. Parents, in disposing of their children, must have this in their eye, that it may be well with them. And be it always remembered. That is best for us which is best for our souls. (3.) It is the duty of parents to seek this rest for their children, and to do all that is fit for them to do, in due time, in order to it. And the more dutiful and respectful they are to them, though they can the worse spare them, yet they should the rather prefer them, and the better.

11. The course she took in order to her daughter's preferment was very extraordinary, and looks suspicious. If there was any thing improper in it, the fault must lie upon Naomi, who put her daughter upon it, and who knew, or should know, the laws and usages of Israel better than Ruth. 1. It was true that Boaz, being near of kin to the deceased, and (for aught that Naomi knew to the contrary) the nearest of all now alive, was obliged by the divine law to marry the widow of Mahlon, who was the eldest son of Elimelech, and was dead without issue, v. 2. "Is not Boaz of our kindred, and therefore bound in conscience to take care of our affairs? Why should we not remind him of his duty?" This may encourage us to lay ourselves by faith at the feet of Christ, that he is our near Kinsman, having taken our nature upon him, he is bone of our bone, and flesh of our flesh. 2. It was a convenient time to remind him of it, now that he had got so much acquaintance with Ruth, by her constant attendance on his reapers during the whole harvest, which was now ended; and he also, by the kindness he had shewed to Ruth in lesser matters, had encouraged Naomi to hope that he would not be unkind, much less unjust, in this greater. And she thought it was a good opportunity to apply to him, when he made a winnowing-feast at his threshing-floor, (v. 2.) then and there completing the joy of the harvest, and treating his workmen like a kind master; He winnoweth barley to-night, that is, he makes his entertainment to-night; as Nabal and Absalom had feasts at their sheep-shearing, so Boaz at his winnowing. 3. Naomi thought Ruth the most proper person to do it herself; and perhaps it was the usage in that country, that in this case the woman should make the demand, so much is intimated by the law, Deut. 25. 7. . 9. Naomi therefore orders her daughter-in-law to make herself clean and neat, not to make herself fine; (v. 3.) "Wash thyself and anoint thee, not paint thee, (as Jezebel,) put on thy raiment, but not the attire of the harlot, and go down to the floor," whither, it is probable, she was invited to the supper there made; but she must not make herself known, that is, not make her errand known, (she herself could not but be very well known among Boaz's reapers,) till the company was dispersed, and Boaz was retired. And, upon this occasion, she would have an easier access to him in private, than she could have at his own house. And thus far was well enough. But, 4. Her coming to lie down at his feet, when he was asleep in his bed, had such an appearance of evil, was such an approach towards it, and might have been such an occasion of it, that we know not well how to justify it. Many expositors think it unjustifiable, particularly the excellent Mr. Poole. We must not do evil that good may come. It is dangerous bringing the spark and the tinder together; for how great a matter may a little fire kindle! All agree that it is not to be drawn into a precedent; neither our laws nor our times are the same that were then: yet I am willing to make the best of it. If Boaz was, as they presumed, the next kinsman, she was his wife before God, (as we say,) and there needed but little ceremony to complete the nuptials; and Naomi did not intend that Ruth should approach to him any otherwise than as his wife; she knew Boaz to be not only an old man, (she would not have trusted to that alone in venturing her daughter-in-law so near him,) but a grave sober man, a virtuous and religious man, and one that feared God. She knew Ruth to be a modest woman, chaste, and a keeper at home, Tit. 2. 5. The Israelites had indeed been once debauched by the daughters of Moab, (Numb. 25. 1.) but this Moabitess was none of those daughters. Naomi herself designed nothing but what was honest and honourable, and her charity (which believeth all things, and hopeth all things) banished and forbade all suspicion that either Boaz or Ruth would offer any thing but what was likewise honest and honourable. If what she advised had been then as indecent and immodest (according to the usage of the country) as it seems now to us, we cannot think that if Naomi had had so little virtue, (which yet we have no reason to suspect,) that she should have had so little wisdom, as to put her daughter upon it, since that alone might have marred the match, and have alienated the affections of so grave and good a man as Boaz from her. We must therefore think that the thing did not look so ill then as it does now. Naomi referred her daughter-in-law to Boaz for further directions. When she had thus made her claim, Boaz, who was more learned in the laws, would tell her what she must do. Thus we must lay ourselves at the feet of our Redeemer, to receive from him our doom, Lord, what wilt thou have me to do? Acts, 9. 6.

We may be sure, if Ruth had apprehended any evil in that which her mother advised her to, she was a woman of too much virtue, and too much sense, to promise as she did, (v. 5.) All that thou sayest unto me I will do. Thus must the younger submit to the elder, and to their grave and prudent counsels, when they have nothing worth speaking of to object against it.

6. And she went down unto the floor, and did according to all that her mother-in-law bade her. 7. And when Boaz had eaten and drunk, and his heart was merry, he went to lie down at the end of the heap of corn: and she came softly, and uncovered his feet, and laid her down. 8. And it came to pass at midnight, that the man was afraid, and turned himself: and, behold, a woman lay at his feet. 9. And he said, Who art thou? And she answered, I am Ruth thine handmaid: spread therefore thy skirt over thine handmaid; for thou art a near kinsman. 10. And he said, Blessed be thou of the LORD, my daughter: for thou hast shewed more kindness in the latter end than at the beginning, inasmuch as thou followedst not young men, whether poor or rich. 11. And now, my daughter, fear not; I will do to thee all that thou requirest: for all the city of my people doth know that thou art a virtuous woman. 12. And now it is true that I am thy near kinsman: howbeit there is a kinsman nearer than I. 13. Tarry this night, and it shall be in the morning, that if he will perform unto thee the part of a kinsman, well; let him do the kinsman's part: but if he will not do the part of a kinsman to thee, then will I do the part of a kinsman to thee, as the LORD liveth; lie down until the morning.

Here is,

I. Boaz's good management of his common affairs; it is probable, according to the common usage, 1. When his servants winnowed, he was with them, and had his eye upon them, to prevent, not their stealing any of his corn, (he had no reason to fear that,) but their waste of it through carelessness in the winnowing of it. Masters may sustain great losses by servants that are heedless, though they be honest, which is a reason why men should be diligent to know the state of their own flocks, and look well to them. 2. When he had more than ordinary work to be done, he treated his servants with extraordinary entertainments, and, for their encouragement, did eat and drink with them. It well becomes those that are rich and great, to be generous to, and also to be familiar with, those that are under them, and employed for them. 3. When Boaz had supped with his workmen, and been a while pleasant with them, he went to bed in due time, so early, that by midnight he had his first sleep, (v. 8.) and thus he would be fit for his business betimes next morning. All that are good husbands will keep good hours, and not indulge themselves or their families in unseasonable mirth. The Chaldee paraphrase tells us, (v. 7.) that Boaz ate and drank, and his heart was good, (and so the Hebrew word is,) and he blessed the name of the Lord, who had heard his prayers, and taken away the famine from the land of Israel. So that he went sober to bed, his heart was in a good frame, and not overcharged with surfeiting and drunkenness. And he did not go to bed without prayer. Now that he had eaten, and was full, he blessed the Lord, and now that he was going to rest, he committed himself to the divine protection; it was well he did, for he had an unusual temptation before him, though he knew not of it. 4. He had his bed or couch laid at the end of the heap of corn; not because he had set his heart upon it, nor only that he might tend and keep it safe from thieves, but it was too late to go home to the city, and here he would be near his work, and ready for it next morning, and he would shew that he was not nice or curious in his lodging, neither took state, nor consulted his ease, but was, like his father Jacob, a plain man, that, when there was occasion, could make his bed in a barn, and, if need were, sleep contentedly in the straw.

II. Ruth's good assurance in the management of her affair. She observed her mother's orders, went and laid her down, not by his side, but overcross his bed's feet, in her clothes, and kept awake, waiting for an opportunity to tell her errand. When he awaked in the night, and perceived there was somebody at his feet, and inquired who it was, she told him her name, and then her errand, (v. 9.) that she came to put herself under his protection, as the person appointed by the divine law to be her protector. Thou art he that has a right to redeem a family and an estate from perishing, and therefore let this ruin be under thine hand: and spread thy skirt over me, be pleased to espouse me and my cause. Thus must we by faith apply ourselves to Jesus Christ as our next Kinsman, that is able to redeem us, come under his wings, as we are invited, (Matth. 23. 37.) and beg of him to spread his skirt over us. Lord Jesus, take me into thy covenant, and under thy care: I am oppressed, undertake for me.

III. The good acceptance Ruth gained with Boaz. What she did had no ill effect, either one way or other, so that Naomi was not mistaken in her good opinion of her kinsman. He knew her demand was just and honourable, and treated her accordingly, and did not deal with his sister as with a harlot, Gen. 34. 31. For, 1. He did not offer to violate her chastity, though he had all the opportunity that could be for it. The Chaldee paraphrase thus descants upon it, He subdued his concupiscence, and did not approach to her, but did as Joseph the Just, who would not come near to his Egyptian mistress, and as Phaltiel the Pious, who, when Saul had given him Michal, David's wife, (1 Sam. 25. 44.) put a sword between himself and her, that he might not touch her. Boaz knew it was not any sinful lust that brought her thither, and therefore bravely maintained both his own honour and her's. 2. He did not put any ill construction upon what she did, did not reproach her as an impudent woman, and unfit to make an honest man a wife; she having approved herself well in the fields, and all her conduct having been modest and decent, he would not, from this instance, entertain the least suspicion of her character, or seem to do so: perhaps blaming himself that he had not offered the service of a kinsman to these distressed widows, and saved her this trouble, and ready to say, as Judah concerning his daughter-in-law, She is more righteous than I.

But, on the contrary, (1.) He commended her, spoke kindly to her, called her his daughter, and spoke honourably of her, as a woman of eminent virtue. She had shewed in this instance more kindness to her mother-in-law, and to the family into which she had matched, than in any instance yet. It was very kind to leave her own country, and come along with her mother to the land of Israel, to dwell with her, and help to maintain her; for this he had blessed her; (ch. 2. 12.) but now he says, Thou hast shewed more kindness in the latter end, than at the beginning, (v. 10.) in that she consulted not her own fancy, but her husband's family, in marrying again. She received not the addresses of young men, (much less did she seek them,) whether poor or rich, but was willing to marry as the law directed, though it was to an old man, because it was for the honour and interest of the family into which she had matched, and for which she had an entire kindness. Young people must aim, in disposing of themselves, not so much to please their own eye, as to please God and their parents.

(2.) He promised her marriage; (v. 11.) "Fear not that I will slight thee, or expose thee; no, I will do all that thou requirest, for it is the same that the law requires, from the next of kin, and I have no reason to decline it, for all the city of my people doth know that thou art a virtuous woman," v. 11. Note, [1.] Exemplary virtue ought to have its due praise, (Phil. 4. 8.) and it will recommend both men and women to the esteem of the wisest and best. Ruth was a poor woman, and poverty often obscures the lustre of virtue: yet Ruth's virtues, even in a mean condition, were generally taken notice of, and could not be hid; nay, her virtues took away the reproach of her poverty; if poor people be but good people, they shall have honour from God and man. Ruth had been remarkable for her humility, which paved the way to this honour; the less she proclaimed her own goodness, the more did her neighbours take notice of it. [2.] In the choice of yoke-fellows, virtue should especially be regarded, known approved virtue; let religion determine the choice, and it will certainly crown the choice and make it comfortable. Wisdom is better than gold; and when it is said to be good with an inheritance, the meaning is, that an inheritance is worth little without it.

(3.) He made his promise conditional, and could not do otherwise, for it seems there was a kinsman that was nearer than he, to whom the right of redemption did belong, v. 12. This he knew, but we may reasonably suppose Naomi (who had been long abroad, and could not be exact in the pedigree of her husband's family) was ignorant of it, otherwise she would never have sent her daughter to make her claim of Boaz. Yet he does not bid her go herself to this other kinsman, that had been to put too great a hardship upon her. But he promises, [1.] That he would himself propose it to the other kinsman, and know his mind. The Hebrew word for a widow, signifies one that is dumb; Boaz will therefore open his mouth for the dumb, (Prov. 31. 8.) and will say that for this widow, which she knew not how to say for herself. [2.] That if the other kinsman refused to do the kinsman's part, he would do it; would marry the widow, redeem the land, and so repair the family. This promise he backs with a solemn oath, for it was a conditional contract of marriage; (v. 13.) As the Lord liveth. Thus keeping the matter in suspense, he bade her wait till morning. Bishop Hall thus sums up this matter in his contemplations. "Boaz, instead of touching her as a wanton, blesseth her as a father, encourageth her as a friend, promiseth her as a kinsman, rewards her as a patron, and sends her away laden with hopes and gifts, no less chaste, more happy, than she came. O admirable temperance, worthy the progenitor of Him in whose lips and heart there was no guile!"

14. And she lay at his feet until the morning: and she rose up before one could know another. And he said, Let it not be known that a woman came into the floor. 15. Also he said, Bring the vail that thou hast upon thee, and hold it. And when she held it, he measured six measures of barley, and laid it on her: and she went into the city. 16. And when she came to her mother-in-law, she said, Who art thou, my daughter? And she told her all that the man had done to her. 17. And she said, These six measures of barley gave he me; for he said to me, Go not empty unto thy mother-in-law. 18. Then said she, Sit still, my daughter, until thou know how the matter will fall: for the man will not be in rest, until he have finished the thing this day.

We are here told,

I. How Ruth was dismissed by Boaz. It had not been safe for her to go home in the dead of the night, therefore she lay at his feet (not by his side) until morning; but as soon as ever the day broke, that she had light to go home by, she got away, before one could know another, that if she were seen, yet she might not be known to be abroad so unseasonably. She was not shy of being known to be a gleaner in the field, nor ashamed of that mark of her poverty; but she would not willingly be known to be a night-walker, for her virtue was her greatest honour, and that which she most valued.

Boaz dismissed her, 1. With a charge to keep counsel; (v. 14.) Let it not be known that a woman came into the floor, and lay all night so near to Boaz; not that they needed to care much what people said of them, while they were both conscious to themselves of an unspotted purity, but because few could have come so near the fire as they did, and not have been scorched. Had it been known, it would have occasioned suspicions in some, and reflections from others; good people would have been troubled, and bad people would have triumphed, and therefore let it not be known. Note, We must always take care, not only to keep a good conscience, but to keep a good name: either we must not do that, which, though innocent, is liable to be misinterpreted, or if we do, we must not let it be known. We must avoid, not only sin, but scandal. There was likewise a particular reason for concealment here; if this matter should take wind, it might prejudice the freedom of the other kinsman's choice, and he would make this his reason for refusing Ruth, that Boaz and she had been together. 2. He dismissed her with a good present of corn, which would be very acceptable to her poor mother at home, and an evidence for her, that he had not sent her away in dislike, which Naomi might have suspected, if he had sent her away empty. He gave it her in her vail, or apron, or mantle: gave it her by measure; like a prudent corn-master, he kept an account of all he delivered out; it was six measures, that is, six omers, as is supposed, ten of which made an ephah; whatever the measure was, it is probable that he gave her as much as she could well carry, v. 15. And the Chaldee says, Strength was given her from the Lord to carry it; and adds, that now it was told her by the spirit of prophecy, That from her should descend six of the most righteous men of their age, namely, David, Daniel, his three companions, and the King Messiah.

II. How she was welcomed by her mother-in-law. She asked her, "Who art thou, my daughter? Art thou a bride or no? Must I give thee joy?" So Ruth told her how the matter stood, v. 16, 17. Whereupon her mother, 1. Advised her to be satisfied in what was done; Sit still, my daughter, till thou know how the matter will fall, v. 18. How it is decreed in heaven, so the Chaldee reads it, for marriages are made there. She had done all that was fit for her to do, and now she must patiently wait the issue, and not be perplexed about it. Let us learn hence to cast our care upon providence, to follow that and attend the motions of it, composing ourselves into an expectation of the event, with a resolution to acquiesce in it, whatever it be; sometimes that proves best done for us, that is least our own doing; "Sit still therefore, and see how the matter will fall, and say, Let it fall how it will, I am ready for it." 2. She assured her, that Boaz, having undertaken this matter, would approve himself a faithful careful friend; He will not be at rest, till he have finished the matter. Though it was a busy time with him in the fields and his floor, yet, having undertaken to serve his friend, he would not neglect the business. Naomi believes Ruth has won his heart, and therefore he will not be easy till he knows whether she be his or no. This she gives as a reason why Ruth should sit still and not perplex herself about it, that Boaz had undertaken it, and he would be sure to manage it well. Much more reason have good Christians to be careful for nothing, but cast their care on God, because he has promised to care for them; and what need have we to care, if he do? "Sit still, and see how the matter will fall, for the Lord will perfect that which concerns thee, and will make it to work for good to thee," La. 37. 4, 5.—138. 8. Your strength is to sit still, Isa. 30. 7.

CHAP. IV.

In this chapter, we have the wedding between Boaz and Ruth, in the circumstances of which there was something uncommon, which is kept upon record, for the illustration, not only of the law concerning the marrying of a brother's widow, (Deut. 25. 5, &c. for cases help to expound laws,) but of the gospel too, for from this marriage descended David, and the Son of David, whose espousals to the Gentile church were hereby typified. We are here told, I. How Boaz got clear of his rival, and fairly shook him off, v. 1. . 3. II. How his marriage with Ruth was publicly solemnized, and attended with the good wishes of his neighbours, v. 9. . 12. III. The happy issue that descended from this marriage. Obed, the grandfather of David, v. 13. . 17. And so the book concludes with the pedigree of David, v. 18. . 22. Perhaps it was to oblige him, that the blessed Spirit directed the inserting of this story into the sacred canon, he being desirous that the virtues of his great-grandmother, Ruth, together with her Gentile extraction, should be transmitted to posterity, and the singular providence that attended her.

1. THEN went Boaz up to the gate, and sat him down there: and, behold, the kinsman of whom Boaz spake came by; unto whom he said, Ho! such a one! turn aside, sit down here. And he turned aside, and sat down. 2. And he took ten men of the elders of the city, and said, Sit ye down here. And they sat down. 3. And he said unto the kinsman; Naomi, that is come again out of the country of Moab, selleth a parcel of land, which was our brother Elimelech's: 4. And I thought to advertise thee, saying, Buy it before the inhabitants, and before the elders of my people. If thou wilt redeem it, redeem it; but if thou wilt not redeem it, then tell me, that I may know: for there is none to redeem it beside thee; and I am after thee. And he said, I will redeem it. 5. Then said Boaz, What day thou buyest the field of the hand of Naomi, thou must buy it also of Ruth the Moabitess, the wife of the dead, to raise up the name of the dead upon his inheritance. 6. And the kinsman said, I cannot redeem it for myself, lest I mar mine own inheritance: redeem thou my right to thyself; for I cannot redeem it. 7. Now this was the manner in former time in Israel concerning redeeming and concerning changing, for to confirm all things; a man plucked off his shoe, and gave it to his neighbour: and this was a testimony in Israel. 8. Therefore the kinsman said unto Boaz, Buy it for thee. So he drew off his shoe.

Here,

1. Boaz calls a court immediately. It is probable he was himself one of the elders (or aldermen) of the city, for he was a mighty man of wealth; perhaps he was father of the city, and sat chief, for he seems here to have gone up to the gate, as one having authority, and not as a common person; like Job, ch. 29. 7, &c. We cannot suppose him less than a magistrate in his city, who was grandson to Nahshon, prince of Judah; and his lying at the end of a heap of corn in the threshing-floor, the night before, was not at all inconsistent, in those days of plainness, with the honour of his sitting judge in the gate. But why was Boaz so hasty, why so fond of the match? Ruth was not rich, but lived upon alms; not honourable, but a poor stranger; she was never said to be beautiful; if ever she had been so, we may suppose that weeping, and travelling, and gleaning, had withered her lilies and roses. But that which made Boaz in love with her, and solicitous to expedite the affair, was, that all her neighbours agreed she was a virtuous woman; this set her price with him far above rubies, Prov. 31. 10. And therefore he thinks, if, by marrying her, he might do her a real kindness, he should also do himself a very great kindness; he will therefore bring it to a conclusion immediately. It was not court-day, but he got ten men of the elders of the city to meet him in the town-hall over the gate, where public business used to be transacted, v. 2. So many, it is probable, by the custom of the city, made a full court. Boaz, though a judge, would not be a judge in his own cause, but desired the concurrence of other elders. Honest intentions dread not a public cognizance.

2. He summons his rival to come and hear the matter that was to be proposed to him; (v. 1.) "Ho, such a one, sit down here." He called him by his name, no doubt, but the divine historian thought not fit to record it; for, because he refused to raise up the name of the dead, he deserved not to have his name preserved to future ages in this history. Providence favoured Boaz in ordering it so, that this kinsman should come by this opportunity, just when the matter was ready to be proposed to him. Great affairs are sometimes much furthered by small circumstances, which facilitate and expedite them.

3. He proposes to the other kinsman the redemption of Naomi's land, which, it is probable, had been mortgaged for money to buy bread with, when the famine was in the land; (v. 3.) "Naomi has a parcel of land to sell, namely, the equity of the redemption of it out of the hands of the mortgagee, which she is willing to part with;" or, as some think, it was her jointure for life, and, wanting money, for a small matter she would sell her interest to the heir at law, who was the fittest to be a purchaser. This he gives the kinsman legal notice of, (v. 4.) that he might have the refusal of it. Whoever had it must pay for it, and Boaz might have said, "My money is as good as my kinsman's; if I have a mind to it, why may I not buy it privately, since I had the first proffer of it, and say nothing to my kinsman?" No; Boaz, though fond enough of the purchase, would not do so mean a thing, as to take a bargain over another man's head, that was nearer a-kin to it; and we are taught by his example, to be not only just and honest, but fair and honourable, in all our dealings, and to do nothing which we are unwilling should see the light, but be above-board.

4. The kinsman seemed forward to redeem the land, till he was told, that, if he did that, he must marry the widow, and then he flew off. He liked the land well enough, and, probably, caught at that the more greedily, because he hoped that the poor widow being under the necessity of selling, he might have so much the better bargain; "I will redeem it" (said he) "with all my heart;" thinking it would be a fine addition to his estate, v. 4. But Boaz told him there was a young widow in the case, and if he have the land, he must take her with it, Terra transit cum onere—The estate passes with this incumbrance; either the divine law or the usage of the country would oblige him to it, or Naomi insisted upon it that she should not sell the land, but upon this condition, v. 5. Some think this does not relate to that law of marrying the brother's widow, (for that seems to oblige only the children of the same father, (Deut. 25. 5.) unless by custom it was afterward made to extend to the next of kin,) but it refers to the law of redemption of inheritances, Lev. 25. 24, 25.) for it is a Goel, a redeemer, that is here inquired for; and if so, it was not by the law, but by Naomi's own resolution, that the purchaser was to marry the widow. However it was, this kinsman, when he heard the conditions of the bargain, refused it; (v. 6.) "I cannot redeem it for myself, I will not meddle with it upon these terms, lest I mar my own inheritance;" the land, he thought, would be an improvement of his inheritance, but not the land with the woman, that would mar it. Perhaps he thought it would be a disparagement to him to marry such a poor widow that was come from a strange country, and almost lived upon alms; he fancied it would be a blemish to his family, it would mar his blood, and disgrace his posterity; her eminent virtues were not sufficient in his eye to balance this. The Chaldee paraphrase makes his reason for this refusal to be, that he had another wife, and if he should take Ruth, it might occasion strife and contention in his family, and that would mar the comfort of his inheritance. Or, he thought she might bring him a great many children, and they would all expect shares out of his estate, which would scatter it into too many hands, so that his family would make the less figure. This makes many shy of the great redemption, they are not willing to espouse religion; they have heard well of it, and have nothing to say against it; they will give it their good word, but at the same time they will give their good word with it, they are willing to part with it, and cannot be bound to it, for fear of marring their own inheritance in this world. Heaven they could be glad of, but holiness they can dispense with; it will not agree with the lusts they have already espoused, and therefore, let who will purchase heaven at that rate, they cannot.

5. The right of redemption is fairly resigned to Boaz; if this nameless kinsman lost a good bargain, a good estate, and a good wife too, he may thank himself for not considering it better, and Boaz will thank him for making his way clear to that which he valued and desired above any thing. In those ancient times it was not the usage to pass estates by writings, as afterward, (Jer. 32. 10, &c.) but by some sign or ceremony, as with us by livery and seisin, as we commonly call it; that is, the delivery of seisin, seisin of a house by giving the key, of land by giving turf and a twig. The ceremony here used, was, he that surrendered plucked off his shoe, (the Chaldee says, it was the glove of his right hand,) and gave it to him to whom he made the surrender, intimating thereby, that, whatever right he had to tread or go upon the land, he conveyed and transferred it, upon a valuable consideration, to the purchaser; this was a testimony in Israel; (v. 7.) and it was done in this case, v. 8. If this kinsman was obliged by the law to have married Ruth, and his refusal had been a contempt of that law, Ruth must have plucked off his shoe, and spit in his face, Deut. 25. 9. But though his relation should in some measure oblige him to the duty, yet the distance of his relation might serve to excuse him from the penalty, or Ruth might very well dispense with it, since his refusal was all she desired from him. But Bishop Patrick, and the best interpreters, think this had no relation to that law, and that the drawing off of the shoe was not any disgrace, as there, but a confirmation of the surrender, and an evidence that it was not fraudulently or surreptitiously obtained. Note, Fair and open dealing in all matters of contract and commerce, is what all those must make conscience of that would approve themselves Israelites indeed, without guile. How much more honourably and honestly does Boaz come by this purchase, than if he had secretly undermined his kinsman, and privately struck up a bargain with Naomi, unknown to him. Honesty will be found the best policy.

9. And Boaz said unto the elders, and unto all the people, Ye are witnesses this day, that I have bought all that was Elimelech's, and all that was Chilion's and Mahlon's, of the hand of Naomi. 10. Moreover Ruth the Moabitess, the wife of Mahlon, have I purchased to be my wife, to raise up the name of the dead upon his inheritance, that the name of the dead be not cut off from among his brethren, and from the gate of his place; ye are witnesses this day. 11. And all the people that were in the gate, and the elders, said, We are witnesses. The LOR make the woman that is come unto thine house like Rachel and like Leah, which two did build the house of Israel: and do thou worthily in Ephrath, and be famous in Bethlehem: 12. And let thy house be like the house of Pharez, whom Tamar bare unto Judah, of the seed which the LORD shall give thee of this young woman.

Boaz now sees his way clear, and therefore delays not to perform his promise made to Ruth, that he would do the kinsman's part, but, in the gate of his city, before the elders and all the people, publishes a marriage-contract between himself and Ruth the Moabitess, and therewith the purchase of all the estate that belonged to the family of Elimelech. If he had not been (ch. 2. 1.) a mighty man of wealth, he could not have compassed his redemption, nor done this service to his kinsman's family. What is a great estate good for, but that it enables a man to do so much the more good in his generation, and especially to those of his own household, if he have but a heart to use it so?

Now, concerning this marriage, it appears,

I. That it was solemnized, or at least published, before many witnesses; (v. 9, 10.) "Ye are witnesses," 1. "That I have bought the estate; whoever has it, or any part of it, mortgaged to them, let him come to me and he shall have money, according to the value of the land," which was computed by the number of years to the year of jubilee, (Lev. 25. 15.) when it would have returned of course to Elimelech's family. The more public the sales of estates are, the better they are guarded against frauds. 2. "That I have purchased the widow to be my wife; he had no portion with her; what jointure she had was incumbered, and he could not have it without giving as much for it as it was worth, and therefore he might well say he purchased her, and yet, being a virtuous woman, he reckoned he had a good bargain. House and riches are the inheritance of fathers, but a prudent wife is more valuable, is from the Lord as a special gift. He designed, in marrying her, to preserve the memory of the dead, that the name of Mahlon, though he left no son to bear it up, might not be cut off from the gate of his place, but by this means might be preserved, that it should be inserted in the public register, that Boaz married Ruth the widow of Mahlon, the son of Elimelech, which posterity, whenever they had occasion to consult the register, would take particular notice of. And this history being preserved for the sake of that marriage and the issue of it, that proved an effectual means to perpetuate the name of Mahlon, even beyond the thought or intention of Boaz, to the world's end. And observe, that because Boaz did this honour to the dead, as well as this kindness to the living, God did him the honour to bring him into the genealogy of the Messiah, by which his family was dignified above all the families of Israel; while the other kinsman, that was so much afraid of diminishing himself and marring his inheritance, by marrying the widow, has his name, family, and inheritance, buried in oblivion and disgrace. A tender and generous concern for the honour of the dead, and the comfort of poor widows and strangers, neither of which can return the kindness, (Luke, 14. 14.) is what God will be well pleased with, and will surely recompense. Our Lord Jesus is our God, our Redeemer, our everlasting Redeemer; he looked, like Boaz, with compassion on the deplorable state of fallen mankind; at a vast expence he redeemed the heavenly inheritance for us, which by sin was mortgaged, and forfeited into the hands of divine justice, and which we could never have been able to redeem. He likewise purchased a peculiar people, whom he would espouse to himself, though strangers and foreigners, like Ruth, poor, and despised, that the name of that dead and buried race might not be cut off for ever. He ventured the marring of his own inheritance, to do this, for though he was rich, yet for our sakes he became poor; but he was abundantly recompensed for it by his Father, who, because he thus humbled himself, hath highly exalted him, and given him a name above every name. Let us own our obligations to him, make sure our contract with him, and study all our days how to do him honour.

Boaz, by making a public declaration of this marriage and purchase, not only secured his title against all pretenders, as it were by a line with proclamations, but put honour upon Ruth, shewed that he was not ashamed of her, and her parentage, and poverty, and left a testimony against clandestine marriages. It is only that which is evil that hates the light, and comes not to it. Boaz called witnesses to what he did, for it was what he could justify, and would never disown; and such regard was then had, even to the contemned crowd, that not only the elders, but all the people that were in the gate, passing and re-passing, were appealed to, (v. 9.) and hearkened to, (v. 11.) when they said, We are witnesses.

II. That it was attended with many prayers. The elders and all the people, when they witnessed to it, wished well to it, and blessed it, v. 11, 12. Ruth, it should seem, was now sent for, for they speak of her, (v. 12.) as present, this young woman; and he having taken her to wife, they look upon her as already come into his house. And very heartily they pray for the new-married couple. The senior elder, it is likely, made this prayer, and the rest of the elders, with the people, joined in it, and therefore it is spoken of as made by them all, for in public prayers, though but one speaks, we must all pray. Observe, 1. Marriages ought to be blessed, and accompanied with prayer, because every creature and every condition are that to us, and no more, that God makes them to be. It is civil and friendly to wish all happiness to those who enter into that condition; and what good we desire, we should pray for from the Fountain of all good. The minister who gives himself to the word and prayer, as he is the fittest person to exhort, so he is the fittest to bless, and pray for, those that enter into this relation. 2. We ought to desire and pray for the welfare and prosperity one of another, so far from envying or grieving at it. Now here,

(1.) They pray for Ruth; The Lord make the woman that is come into thine house, like Rachel and Leah; that is, "God make her a good wife, and a fruitful mother." Ruth was a virtuous woman, and yet needed the prayers of her friends, that by the grace of God she might be made a blessing to the family she was come into. They pray she might be like Rachel and Leah, rather than like Sarah and Rebekah; for Sarah had but one son, and Rebekah but one that was in covenant; the other was Esau, who was rejected; but Rachel and Leah did build up the house of Israel; all their children were in the church, and their offspring was numerous. "May she be a flourishing, fruitful, faithful vine by thy house side.

(2.) They pray for Boaz, that he might continue to do worthily in the city, to which he was an ornament, and might there be more and more famous. They desire that the wife might be a blessing, in the private affairs of the house, and the husband a blessing, in the public business of the town; that she in her place, and he in his, might be wise, virtuous, and successful. Observe, The way to be famous, is to do worthily. Great reputation must be got by great merits. It is not enough not to do unworthily, to be harmless and inoffensive, but we must do worthily, be useful and serviceable to our generation; they that would be truly illustrious, must in their places shine as lights.

(3.) They pray for the family; Let thy house be like the house of Pharez; that is, "Let it be very numerous, let it greatly increase and multiply, as the house of Pharez did." The Bethlehemites were of the house of Pharez, and knew well how numerous it was; in the distribution of the tribes, that grandson of Jacob had the honour, which none of the rest had but Manasseh and Ephraim, that his posterity was subdivided into two distinct families, Hezron and Hamul, Numb. 26. 21. Now they pray that the family of Boaz, which was one branch of that stock, might in process of time become as numerous and great as the whole stock ~~now~~ was.

13. So Boaz took Ruth, and she was his wife: and when he went in unto her, the LORD gave her conception, and she bare a son. 14. And the women said unto Naomi, Blessed be the LORD, which hath not left thee this day without a kinsman, that his name may be famous in Israel. 15. And he shall be unto thee a restorer of thy life, and a nourisher of thine old age: for thy daughter-in-law, which loveth thee, which is better to thee than seven sons, hath born him. 16. And Naomi took the child, and laid it in her bosom, and became nurse unto it. 17. And the women her neighbours gave it a name, saying, There is a son born to Naomi; and they called his name Obed: he is the father of Jesse, the father of David. 18. Now these are the generations of Pharez: Pharez begat Hezron, 19. And Hezron begat Ram, and Ram begat Amminadab, 20. And Amminadab begat Nahshon, and Nahshon begat Salmon, And Salmon begat Boaz, and Boaz begat Obed, 22. And Obed begat Jesse, and Jesse begat David.

Here is,

1. Ruth a wife; Boaz took her, with the usual solemnities, to his house, and she became his wife, v. 13. All the city, no doubt, congratulating the preferment of a virtuous woman, purely for her virtues. We have reason to think that Orpah, who returned from Naomi to her people, and her gods, was never half so well preferred as Ruth was. He that forsakes all for Christ, shall find more than all with him; it shall be recompensed a hundred-fold in this present time. Now Orpah wished she had gone with Naomi too; but she, like the other kinsman, stood in her own light. Boaz had prayed that this pious proselyte might receive a full reward of her courage and constancy from the God of Israel, under whose wings she was come to trust; and now he became an instrument of that kindness, which was an answer to his prayer, and helped to make his own words good. Now she had the command of those servants with whom she had associated, and of those fields in which she had gleaned. Thus sometimes God raiseth up the poor out of the dust to set them with princes, Ps. 113. 7, 8.

2. Ruth a mother; the Lord gave her conception, for the fruit of the womb is his reward, Ps. 127. 3. It is one of the keys he hath in his hand; and he sometimes makes the barren woman, that had been long so, to be a joyful mother of children, Ps. 113. 9. Isa. 54. 1.

3. Ruth still a daughter-in-law, and the same that she always was, to Naomi, who was so far from being forgotten, that she was a principal sharer in these new joys. The good women that were at the labour when this child was born, congratulated Naomi upon it, more than either Boaz or Ruth, because she was the match-maker; and it was the family of her husband that was hereby built up. See here, as before, what an air of devotion there was then attending the common expressions of civility among the Israelites! Prayer to God attended the marriage, (v. 11.) and praise to him attended the birth of the child. What pity it is that such pious language should either be disused among Christians, or degenerate into a formality. "Blessed be the Lord that has sent thee this grandson," v. 14, 15. (1.) Who was the preserver of the name of her family, and who, they hoped, would be famous, because his father was so. (2.) Who would be hereafter dutiful and kind to her; so they hoped, because his mother was so. If he would but take after her, he would be a comfort to his aged grandmother, a restorer of her life, and, if there should be occasion, would have wherewithal to be the nourisher of her old age. It is a great comfort to those that are going into years, to see of those that descend from them, growing up, that are likely, by the blessing of God, to be a stay and support to them, when the years come wherein they will need such, and of which they will say, they have no pleasure in them. Observe, They say of Ruth, that she loved Naomi, and therefore was better to her than seven soas. See how God, in his providence, sometimes makes up the want and loss of those relations from whom we expected most comfort, in those from whom we expected least. The bonds of love prove stronger than those of nature, and there is a friend that sticks closer than a brother; so here there was a daughter-in-law better than an own child. See what wisdom and grace will do.

Now here, [1.] The child is named by the neighbours, v. 17. The good women would have it called Obed, a servant, either in remembrance of the meanness and poverty of the mother, or in prospect of his being hereafter a servant, and very serviceable to his grandmother. It is no dishonour to those that are ever so well born, to be servants to God, their friends, and their generation. The motto of the prince of Wales, is, Ich dien—I serve. [2.] The child is nursed by the grandmother, that is, dry nursed, when the mother had weaned him from the breast, v. 16. She laid it in her bosom, in token of her tender affection to it, and care of it. Grandmothers are often most fond.

4. Ruth is hereby brought in among the ancestors of David and Christ, which was the greatest honour. The genealogy is here drawn from Pharez, through Boaz and Obed, to David, and so leads toward the Messiah, and therefore not an endless genealogy.

AN

WITH

Practical Observations,

OF THE FIRST BOOK OF

S A M U E L.

This book, and that which follows it, bear the name of Samuel in the title, not because he was the penman of them, (except of so much of them as fell within his own time, to the twenty-fifth chapter of the first book, in which we have an account of his death,) but because the first book begins with a large account of him, his birth and childhood, his life and government; and the rest of these two volumes that are denominated from him contains the history of the reigns of Saul and David, who were both anointed by him. And because the history of these two kings takes up the greatest part of these books, the vulgar Latin calls them the first and second Books of the Kings; and the two that follow, the third and fourth, which the titles in our English Bibles take notice of with an alias, otherwise called the first Book of the Kings. The LXX call them the first and second Book of the Kingdoms. It is needless to contend about it, but there is no occasion to vary from the Hebrew verity. These two books contain the history of the two last of the judges, Eli and Samuel, who were not, as the rest, men of war, but priests; and so much of them is an entrance upon the history of the kings. They contain a considerable part of the sacred history, are sometimes referred to in the New Testament, and often in the title of David's Psalms, which, if placed in their order, would fall in, in these books. It is uncertain who was the penman of them; it is probable that Samuel wrote the history of his own time, and that, after him, some of the prophets that were with David, (Nathan, as likely as any,) continued it. The first book gives us a full account of Eli's fall, and Samuel's rise and good government, ch. 1..8. Of Samuel's resignation of the government, and Saul's advancement and male-administration, ch. 9..15. The choice of David, his struggles with Saul, Saul's ruin at last, and the opening of the way for David to the throne, ch. 16..31. And these things are written for our learning.

CHAP. I.

The history of Samuel here begins as early as that of Samson did, even before he was born, as afterward the history of John the Baptist and our blessed Saviour. Some of the scripture-worthies drop out of the clouds, as it were, and their first appearance is in their full growth and lustre. But others are accounted for from the birth, and from the womb, and from the conception. It is true of all, what God says of the prophet Jeremiah, Before I formed thee in the belly, I knew thee, Jer. 1. 5. But some great men were brought into the world with more observation than others, and were more early distinguished from common persons, as Samuel for one. God, in this matter, acts as a free agent. The story of Samson introduces him as a child of promise, Judg. 13. But the story of Samuel introduces him as a child of prayer. Samson's birth was foretold by an angel to his mother; Samuel was asked of God by his mother; both together intimate what wonders are produced by the word and prayer. Samuel's mother was Hannah, the principal person concerned in the story of this chapter. I. Here is her affliction, she was childless, and this affliction aggravated by her rival's insolence, but in some measure balanced by her husband's kindness, v. 1. .8. II. The prayer and vow she made to God under this affliction, in which Eli the high priest at first censured her, and afterward encouraged her, v. 9. .18. III. The birth and nursing of Samuel, v. 19. .23. IV. The presenting of him to the Lord, v. 24. .28.

1. NOW there was a certain man of Ramathaim-zophim, of mount Ephraim, and his name was Elkanah, the son of Jeroham, the son of Elihu, the son of Tohu, the son of Zuph, an Ephrathite: 2. And he had two wives; the name of the one was Hannah, and the name of the other Peninnah: and Peninnah had children, but Hannah had no children. 3. And this man went up out of his city yearly to worship and to sacrifice unto the LORD of hosts in Shiloh. And the two sons of Eli, Hophni and Phinehas, the priests of the LORD, were there. 4. And when the time was that Elkanah offered, he gave to Peninnah his wife, and to all her sons and her daughters, portions: 5. But unto Hannah he gave a worthy portion; for he loved Hannah: but the LORD had shut up her womb. 6. And her adversary also provoked her sore, for to make her fret, because the LORD had shut up her womb. 7. And as he did so year by year, when she went up to the house of the LORD, so she provoked her; therefore she wept, and did not eat. 8. Then said Elkanah her husband to her, Hannah, why weepest thou? and why eatest thou not? and why is thy heart grieved? am not I better to thee than ten sons?

We have here an account of the state of the family into which Samuel the prophet was born. His father's name was Elkanah, a Levite, and of the family of the Kohathites, (the most honourable house of that tribe,) as appears, 1 Chron. 6. 33, 34. His ancestor Zuph was an Ephrathite, that is, of Beth-lehem-judah, which was called Ephrathah, Ruth, 1. 2. There this family of the Levites was first seated, but one branch of it, in process of time, removed to mount Ephraim, from which Elkanah descended: Micah's Levite came from Beth-lehem to mount Ephraim, Judg. 17. 8. Ministers' families are as moveable as any. Perhaps notice is taken of their being originally Ephrathites, to shew their alliance to David. This Elkanah lived at Ramah, or Ramathaim, which signifies the double Ramah, the higher and lower town, the same with Arimathea, of which Joseph was, here called Ramathaim-zophim. Zophim signifies watchmen; probably, they had one of the schools of the prophets there, for prophets are called watchmen; the Chaldee paraphrase calls Elkanah a disciple of the prophets. But it seems to me that it was in Samuel that prophecy revived; before his time, there being, for a great while, no open vision, ch. 3. 1. Nor is there any mention of a prophet of the Lord from Moses to Samuel, except Judg. 6. 8. So that we have no reason to think that there was any nursery or college of prophets here, till Samuel himself found one, ch. 19. 19, 20. This is the account of Samuel's parentage, and the place of his nativity.

Let us now take notice of the state of the family.

I. It was a devout family. All the families of Israel should be so, but Levites' families in a particular manner. Ministers should be patterns of family religion. Elkanah went up at the solemn feasts to the tabernacle at Shiloh, to worship and to sacrifice to the Lord of hosts. I think this is the first time in scripture that God is called the Lord of hosts, Jehovah Sabaoth, a name by which he was afterward very much called and known. Probably, Samuel the prophet was the first that used this title of God, for the comfort of Israel, when, in his time, their hosts were few and feeble, and those of their enemies many and mighty; then it would be a support to them, to think that the God they served was Lord of hosts, of all the hosts both of heaven and earth; of them he has a sovereign command, and makes what use he pleases of them. Elkanah was a country Levite, and, for aught that appears, had not any place or office which required his attendance at the tabernacle, but he went up as a common Israelite, with his own sacrifices, to encourage his neighbours, and set them a good example. When he sacrificed, he worshipped, joining prayers and thanksgivings with his sacrifices. In this course of religion he was constant, for he went up yearly.

And that which made it the more commendable in him, was, 1. That there was a general decay and neglect of religion in the nation; some among them worshipped other gods, and the generality were remiss in the service of the God of Israel; and yet Elkanah kept his integrity; whatever others did, his resolution was, that he and his house should serve the Lord. 2. That Hophni and Phinehas, the sons of Eli, were the men that were now chiefly employed in the service of the house of God; and they were men that conducted themselves very ill in their place, as we shall find afterward; yet Elkanah went up to sacrifice. God had then tied his people to one place and one altar, and forbidden them, under any pretence whatsoever, to worship elsewhere, and therefore, in pure obedience to that command, he attended at Shiloh; if the priests did not do their duty, he would do his. Thanks be to God, we, under the gospel, are not tied to any one place or family; but the pastors and teachers, whom the exalted Redeemer has given to his church, are those only whose ministration tends to the perfecting of the saints, and the edifying of the body of Christ, Eph. 4. 11, 12. None have dominion over our faith; but our obligation is to those that are the helpers of our holiness and joy, not to any, that, by their scandalous immoralities, like Hophni and Phinehas, make the sacrifices of the Lord to be abhorred; though still the validity and efficacy of the sacraments depend not on the purity of him that administers them.

II. Yet it was a divided family, and the divisions of it carried with them both guilt and grief. Where there is piety, it is pity but there should be unity. The joint devotions of a family should put an end to divisions in it.

1. The original cause of this division, was, Elkanah's marrying two wives, which was a transgression of the original institution of marriage, to which our Saviour reduces it, Matth. 19. 5, 8. From the beginning it was not so. It made mischief in Abraham's family, and Jacob's, and here in Elkanah's: how much better does the law of God provide for our comfort and ease in this world than we should, if we were left to ourselves! It is probable, that Elkanah married Hannah first, and, because he had no children by her so soon as he hoped, he married Peninnah, who bare him children indeed, but was in other things a vexation to him. Thus are men often beaten with rods of their own making.

2. That which followed upon this error, was, that the two wives could not agree. They had different blessings; Peninnah, like Leah, was fruitful, and had many children, which should have made her easy and thankful, though she was but a second wife, and was less beloved; Hannah, like Rachel, was childless indeed, but she was very dear to her husband, and he took all occasions to let both her and others know that she was so, and many a worthy portion he gave her; (v. 5.) and this should have made her easy and thankful. But they were of different tempers; Peninnah could not bear the blessing of fruitfulness, but she grew haughty and insolent; Hannah could not bear the affliction of barrenness, but she grew melancholy and discontented: and Elkanah had a difficult part to act between them.

(1.) Elkanah kept up his attendance at God's altar, notwithstanding this unhappy difference in his family, and took his wives and children with him, that, if they could not agree in other things, they might agree to worship God together. If the devotions of a family prevail not to put an end to its divisions, yet let not the divisions put a stop to the devotions.

(2.) He did all he could to encourage Hannah, and to keep up her spirits under her affliction, v. 4, 5. At the feasts, he offered peace-offerings, to supplicate for peace in his family; and when he and his family were to eat their share of the sacrifice, in token of their communion with God and his altar, though he carved to Peninnah and her children competent portions, yet to Hannah he gave a worthy portion, the choicest piece that came to the table, the piece (whatever it was) that used to be given on such occasions to those that were most valued; this he did, in token of his love to her, and to give all possible assurances of it. Observe, [1.] Elkanah loved his wife never the less for her being barren. Christ loves his church, notwithstanding her infirmities, her barrenness; and so ought men to love their wives, Eph. 5. 25. To abate our just love to any relations, for the sake of any infirmity which they cannot help, and which is not their sin, but their affliction, is to make God's providence quarrel with his precept, and, very unkindly, to add affliction to the afflicted. [2.] He studied to shew his love so much the more, because she was afflicted, insulted, and low-spirited. It is wisdom and duty to support the weakest, and to hold up those that are run down. [3.] He shewed his great love to her, by the share he gave her of his peace-offerings. Thus we should testify our affection to our friends and relations, by abounding in prayer for them. The better we love them, the more room let us give them in our prayers.

(3.) Peninnah was extremely peevish and provoking. [1.] She upbraided Hannah with her affliction, despised her because she was barren, and gave her taunting language, as one whom Heaven did not favour. [2.] She envied the interest she had in the love of Elkanah, and the more kind he was to her, the more was she exasperated against her; which was all over base and barbarous. [3.] She did this most when they went up to the house of the Lord, perhaps, because then they were more together than at other times, or, because then Elkanah shewed his affection most to Hannah. But, it was very sinful at such a time to shew her malice, when pure hands were to be lifted up at God's altar without wrath and quarrelling. It was, likewise, very unkind at that time to vex Hannah, not only because then they were in company, and others would take notice of it, but then Hannah was to mind her devotions, and desired to be most calm and composed, and free from disturbance. The great adversary to our purity and peace is then most industrious to ruffle us, when we should be most composed. When the sons of God come to present themselves before the Lord, Satan will be sure to come among them, Job. 1. 6. [4.] She continued to do this from year to year, not once or twice, but it was her constant practice; neither deference to her husband, nor compassion to Hannah, could break her of it; and, Lastly, That which she designed, was, to make her fret; perhaps, in hopes to break her heart, that she might possess her husband's heart solely. Or, because she took a pleasure in her uneasiness; nor could Hannah gratify her more than by fretting. Note, It is an evidence of a bad disposition, to delight in grieving those that are melancholy and of a sorrowful spirit, and in putting those out of humour, that are apt to fret and be uneasy. We ought to bear one another's burthens, not add to them.

(4.) Hannah (poor woman) could not bear the provocation, she wept, and did not eat, v. 7. It made her uneasy to herself and to all her relations. She did not eat of the feast, her trouble took away her appetite, made her unfit for any company, and a jar in the harmony of family-joy. It was of the feast upon the sacrifice that she did not eat, for they were not to eat of the holy things in their mourning, Deut. 26. 14. Lev. 10. 19. Yet, it was her infirmity, so far to give way to the sorrow of the world, as to unfit herself for holy joy in God. Those that are of a fretful spirit, and are apt to lay provocations too much to heart, are enemies to themselves, and strip themselves very much of the comforts both of life and godliness. We find that God took notice of this ill effect of discontents and disagreements in the conjugal relation; the parties aggrieved, covered the altar of the Lord with tears, insomuch that he regarded not the offering, Mal. 2. 13.

(5.) Elkanah said what he could to her, to comfort her. She did not upbraid him with his unkindness in marrying another wife, as Sarah did, nor did she render to Peninnah railing for railing, but took the trouble wholly to herself, which made her an object of much compassion. Elkanah shewed himself extremely grieved at her grief; (v. 8.) Hannah, why weepest thou? [1.] He is much concerned to see her thus overwhelmed with sorrow. They that by marriage are made one flesh, ought, thus far, to be of one spirit too, to share in each other's troubles, so that one cannot be easy while the other is uneasy. [2.] He gives her a loving reproof for it. Why weepest thou? And why is thy heart grieved? As many as God loves, he rebukes, and so should we. He puts her upon inquiring into the cause of her grief; though she had just reason to be troubled, yet, let her consider whether she had reason to be troubled to such a degree; especially so much as to be taken off by it from eating of the holy things. Note, Our sorrow upon any account is then sinful and inordinate, when it diverts us from our duty to God, and embitters our comfort in him; when it makes us unthankful for the mercies we enjoy, and distrustful of the goodness of God to us in further mercies; when it casts a damp upon our joy in Christ, and hinders us from doing the duty, and taking the comfort, of our particular relations. [3.] He intimates that nothing should be wanting on his part to balance her grief. "Am not I better to thee than ten sons?" Thou knowest thou hast my affection entire, and let that comfort thee." Note, We ought to take notice of our comforts, to keep us from grieving excessively for our crosses; for, our crosses we deserve, but our comforts we have forfeited. If we would keep the balance even, we must look at that which is for us, as well as that which is against us, else we are unjust to Providence, and unkind to ourselves. God hath set the one over against the other, (Ecl. 7. 14.) and so should we.

9. So Hannah rose up after they had eaten in Shiloh, and after they had drunk. Now Eli the priest sat upon a seat by a post of the temple of the LORD. 10. And she was in bitterness of soul, and prayed unto the LORD, and wept sore. 11. And she vowed a vow, and said, O LORD of hosts, if thou wilt indeed look on the affliction of thine handmaid, and remember me, and not forget thine handmaid, but wilt give unto thine handmaid a man child, then I will give him unto the LORD all the days of his life, and there shall no razor come upon his head. 12. And it came to pass, as she continued praying before the LORD, that Eli marked her mouth. 13. Now Hannah, she spake in her heart; only her lips moved, but her voice was not heard: therefore Eli thought she had been drunken. 14. And Eli said unto her, How long wilt thou be drunken? put away thy wine from thee. 15. And Hannah answered and said, No, my lord, I am a woman of a sorrowful spirit: I have drunk neither wine nor strong drink, but have poured out my soul before the Lord. 16. Count not thine handmaid for a daughter of Belial: for out of the abundance of my complaint and grief have I spoken hitherto. 17. Then Eli answered and said, Go in peace: and the God of Israel grant thee thy petition that thou hast asked of him. 18. And she said, Let thine handmaid find grace in thy sight. So the woman went her way, and did eat, and her countenance was no more sad.

Elkanah had gently reproved Hannah for her inordinate grief, and here we find the good effect of the reproof.

I. It brought her to her meat. She ate and drank, v. 9. She did not harden herself in sorrow, nor grow sullen when she was reproved for it; but, when she perceived her husband uneasy that she did not come and eat with them, she cheered up her own spirits as well as she could, and came to table. It is as great a piece of self-denial to controul our passions, as it is to controul our appetites.

II. It brought her to her prayers. It put her upon considering, "Do I well to be angry? Do I well to fret? What good does it do me? Instead of binding the burthen thus upon my own shoulders, had I not better ease myself of it, and cast it upon the Lord by prayer?" Elkanah had said, Am not I better to thee than ten sons? Which, perhaps, occasioned her to think within herself, "Whether he be so or no, God is, and, therefore, to him will I apply myself, and before him will I pour out my complaint, and try what relief that will give me." If ever she will make a more solemn address than ordinary to the throne of grace upon this errand, now is the time. They are at Shiloh, at the door of the tabernacle, where God had promised to meet his people, and which was the house of prayer. They had lately offered their peace-offerings, to obtain the favour of God, and all good, and in token of their communion with him; and, taking the comfort of their being accepted of him, they had feasted upon the sacrifice, and now it was proper to put up her prayer in virtue of that sacrifice; for the peace-offerings typified Christ's mediation, as well as the sin-offerings, for by it, not only atonement is made for sin, but the audience and acceptance of our prayers, and an answer of peace to them, are obtained for us: to that Sacrifice, in all our supplications, we must have an eye.

Now, concerning Hannah's prayer, we may observe,

1. The warm and lively devotion there was in it; which appeared in several instances, for our direction in prayer.

(1.) She improved the present grief and trouble of her spirit, for the exciting and quickening of her pious affection in prayers. Being in bitterness of soul, she prayed, v. 10. This good use we should make of our afflictions, they should make us the more lively in our addresses to God. Our blessed Saviour himself, being in an agony, prayed more earnestly, Luke, 22. 44.

(2.) She mingled tears with her prayers. It was not a dry prayer; she wept sore; like a true Israelite, she wept and made supplication, (Mos. 12. 4.) with an eye to the tender mercy of our God, who knows the troubled soul; the prayer came from her heart, as the tears from her eyes.

(3.) She was very particular, and yet very modest in her petition. She begged a child, a man-child, that it might be fit to serve in the tabernacle. God gives us leave, in prayer, not only to ask good things in general, but to mention that special good thing which we most need and desire. Yet she says not, as Rachel, Give me children, Gen. 30. 1. She will be very thankful for one.

(4.) She made a solemn vow, or promise, that if God would give her a son, she would give him up to God, v. 11. He would be, by birth, a Levite, and so, devoted to the service of God; but he should be, by her vow, a Nazarite, and his very childhood should be sacred. It is probable she had acquainted Elkanah with her purpose before, and had his consent and approbation. Note, [1.] Parents have a right to dedicate their children to God, as living sacrifices, and spiritual priests; and, an obligation is thereby laid upon them to serve God faithfully all the days of their life. [2.] It is very proper, when we are in pursuit of any mercy, to bind our own souls with a bond, that, if God give it us, we will devote it to his honour, and cheerfully use it in his service. Not that hereby we can pretend to merit the gift, but thus we are qualified for it, and for the comfort of it. In hope of mercy, let us promise duty.

(5.) She spoke all this so softly, that none could hear her. Her lips moved, but her voice was not heard, v. 13. Hereby she testified her belief of God's knowledge of the heart and its desires. Thoughts are words with him, nor is he one of those gods that must be cried aloud to, 1 Kings, 18. 27. It was, likewise, an instance of her humility and holy shame-facedness in her approach to God; she was none of those that made her voice to be heard on high, Isa. 58. 4. It was a secret prayer, and therefore, though made in a public place, yet was thus made secretly, and not, as the Pharisees prayed, to be seen of men. It is true, prayer is not a thing we have reason to be ashamed of, but we must avoid all appearances of ostentation. Let what passes between God and our souls be kept to ourselves.

2. The hard censure she fell under for it. Eli was now high priest, and judge in Israel; he sat upon a seat in the temple, to oversee what was done there, v. 9. The tabernacle is here called the temple, because it was now fixed, and served all the purposes of a temple. There Eli sat to receive addresses and give direction, and somewhere, (it is probable,) in a private corner, he espied Hannah at her prayers, and, by her unusual manner, fancied she was drunken, and spoke to her accordingly; (v. 14.) How long wilt thou be drunken?—the very imputation that Peter and the apostles fell under, when the Holy Ghost gave them utterance, Acts, 2. 13. Perhaps, in this degenerate age, it was no strange thing to see drunken women at the door of the tabernacle; for, otherwise, one would think the vile lust of Hophni and Phinehas could not have found so easy a prey there, ch. 2. 22. Eli took Hannah for one of these. It is one bad effect of the abounding of iniquity, and its becoming fashionable, that it often gives occasion to suspect the innocent. When a disease is epidemical, every one is suspected to be tainted with it.

Now, (1.) This was Eli's fault; and a great fault it was, to pass so severe a censure without better observation or information. If his own eyes were already waxen dim, he should have employed those about him to inquire. Drunkards are commonly noisy and turbulent, but this poor woman was silent and composed. His fault was the worse, that he was the priest of the Lord, who should have had compassion on the ignorant, Heb. 5. 2. Note, It ill becomes us to be rash and hasty in the censures of others, and to be forward to believe people guilty of bad things, while either the matter of fact on which the censure is grounded is doubtful and unproved, or is capable of a good construction. Charity commands us to hope the best concerning all, and forbids censoriousness. Paul had very good information, when he did but partly believe, (1 Cor. 11. 18.) hoping it was not so. Especially we ought to be cautious how we censure the devotion of others, lest we call that hypocrisy, enthusiasm, or superstition, which is really the fruit of an honest zeal, and is accepted of God.

(2.) It was Hannah's affliction; and a great affliction it was, added to all the rest; vinegar to the wounds of her spirit. She had been reproved by Elkanah, because she would not eat and drink; and now, to be reproached by Eli, as if she had eaten and drunk too much, was very hard. Note, It is no new thing for those that do well, to be ill thought of, and we must not think it strange if at any time it be our lot.

3 Hannah's humble vindication of herself from this crime with which she was charged. She bore it admirably well; she did not retort the charge, and upbraid him with the debauchery of his own sons; did not bid him look at home, and restrain them; did not tell him how ill it became one in his place thus to abuse a poor sorrowful worshipper at the throne of grace. When we are at any time unjustly censured, we have need to set a double watch before the door of our lips, that we do not recriminate, and return censure for censure. Hannah thought it enough to vindicate herself, and so must we, v. 15, 16. (1.) In justice to herself, she expressly denies the charge; speaks to him with all possible respect; calls him, My lord; intimates how very desirous she was to stand well in his opinion, and how loath to lie under his censure. "No, my lord, it is not as you suspect; I have drunk neither wine nor strong drink, nor any at all," (though it was proper enough to be given to one of such a heavy heart, Prov. 31.6.) "much less to any excess; therefore count not thy handmaid for a daughter of Belial." Note, Drunkards are children of Belial, women-drunkards particularly; children of the wicked one; children of disobedience; children that will not endure the yoke, (else they would not be drunk;) they are more especially what has just been stated when actually drunk. They that cannot govern themselves, will not bear that any one else should. Hannah owns the crime had been very great, if she had indeed been guilty of it, and he might justly have shut her out of the courts of God's house; but the very manner of her speaking in her own defence was sufficient to demonstrate that she was not drunk. (2.) In justice to him, she accounts for the manner which had given occasion to his suspicion. "I am a woman of a sorrowful spirit, dejected, and discomposed, and that is the reason I do not look as other people; the eyes are red, not with wine, but with weeping. And at this time I have not been talking to myself, as drunkards and fools do, but I have been pouring out my soul before the Lord, who hears and understands the language of the heart, and this out of the abundance of my complaint and grief." She had been, more than usual, fervent in prayer to God, and that, she tells him, was the true reason of the disorder she seemed to be in. Note, When we are unjustly censured, we should endeavour, not only to clear ourselves, but to satisfy our brethren, by giving them a just and true account of that which they misapprehended.

4. The atonement Eli made for his rash unfriendly censure, by a kind and fatherly benediction, v. 17. He did not (as many are apt to do in such a case) take it for an affront to have his mistake rectified, and to be convinced of his error, nor did it put him out of humour; but, on the contrary, he now encouraged Hannah's devotions, as much as before he had discountenanced them; not only intimated that he was satisfied of her innocency, by those words, Go in peace, but, being high priest, as one having authority, he blessed her, in the name of the Lord; and though he knew not what the particular blessing was that she had been praying for, yet he puts his Amen to it, so good an opinion had he now conceived of her prudence and piety. The God of Israel grant thee thy petition, whatever it is, that thou hast asked of him. Note, By our meek and humble carriage toward those that reproach us, because they did not know us, we may perhaps make them our friends, and turn their censures of us into prayers for us.

5. The great satisfaction of mind with which Hannah now went away, v. 18. She begged the continuance of Eli's good opinion of her, and his good prayers for her, and then she went her way, and did eat of what remained of the peace-offerings, (none of which was to be left until the morning,) and her countenance was no more sad; no more, as it had been, giving marks of inward trouble and discomposure; but she looked pleasant and cheerful, and all was well. Whence came this sudden happy change? She had, by prayer, committed her case to God, and left it with him, and now she was no more perplexed about it. She had prayed for herself, and Eli had prayed for her, and she believed that God would either give her the mercy she had prayed for, or make up the want of it to her some other way. Note, Prayer is heart's-ease to a gracious soul; the seed of Jacob have often found it so, being confident that God will never say unto them, Seek ye me, in vain. See Phil. 4.6, 7. Prayer will smooth the countenance; it should do so.

19. And they rose up in the morning early, and worshipped before the LORD, and returned, and came to their house to Ramah: and Elkanah knew Hannah his wife; and the LORD remembered her. 20. Wherefore it came to pass, when the time was come about after Hannah had conceived, that she bare a son, and called his name Samuel, saying, Because I have asked him of the LORD. 21. And the man Elkanah, and all his house, went up to offer unto the LORD the yearly sacrifice, and his vow. 22. But Hannah went not up; for she said unto her husband, I will not go up until the child be weaned, and then I will bring him, that he may appear before the LORD, and there abide for ever. 23. And Elkanah her husband said unto her, Do what seemeth thee good; tarry until thou have weaned him; only the LORD establish his word. So the woman abode, and gave her son suck until she weaned him. 24. And when she had weaned him, she took him up with her, with three bullocks, and one ephah of flour, and a bottle of wine, and brought him unto the house of the LORD in Shiloh: and the child was young. 25. And they slew a bullock, and brought the child to Eli. 26. And she said, O my lord, as thy soul liveth, my lord, I am the woman that stood by thee here, praying unto the LORD. 27. For this child I prayed; and the LORD hath given me my petition which I asked of him: 28. Therefore also I have lent him to the LORD; as long as he liveth he shall be lent to the LORD. And he worshipped the LORD there.

Here is,

I. The return of Elkanah and his family to their own habitation, when the days appointed for the feast were over, v. 19. Observe how they improved their time at the tabernacle; every day they were there, even that which was fixed for their journey home, they worshipped God; and they rose up early to do it. It is good to begin the day with God. Let him that is the first, have the first. They had a journey before them, and a family of children to take with them, and yet they would not stir till they had worshipped God together. Prayer and provender do not hinder a journey. They had spent several days now in religious worship, and yet they attended once more. We should not be weary of well-doing.

II. The birth and name of this desired son. At length the Lord remembered Hannah; the very thing she desired; (v. 11.) and more she needed not desire, that was enough, for then she conceived, and bare a son. Though God seem long to forget his people's burthens, troubles, cares, and prayers, yet he will at length make it to appear that they are not out of his mind. This son the mother called Samuel, v. 20. Some make the etymology of it to be much the same with that of Ishmael, heard of God, because the mother's prayers were remarkably heard, and he was an answer to them. Others, because of the reason she gives for the name, make it to signify asked of God; it comes nearly to the same; she designed by it to perpetuate the remembrance of God's favour to her &c.

answering her prayers. Thus she designed, upon every mention of his name, to take the comfort to herself, and to give God the glory of that gracious condescension. Note, Mercies, in answer to prayer, are to be remembered with peculiar expressions of thankfulness, as Ps. 116. 1, 2. How many seasonable deliverances and supplies may we call Samuel, asked of God; and whatever is so we are in a special manner engaged to devote to him. Hannah intended, by this name, to put her son in mind of the obligation he was under to be the Lord's, in consideration of this, that he was asked of God, and was at the same time dedicated to him. A child of prayer is, in a special manner, bound to be a good child. Lemuel's mother reminds him that he was the son of her vows, Prov. 31. 2.

III. The close attendance Hannah gave to the nursing of him, not only because he was dear to her, but because he was devoted to God, and for him she nursed him. She therefore nursed him herself, and did not hang him on another's breast. We ought to take care of our children, not only with an eye to the law of nature, as they are our's, but with an eye to the covenant of grace, as they are given up to God. See Ezek. 16. 20, 21. This sanctifies the nursing of them, when it is done as unto the Lord.

Elkanah went up every year to worship at the tabernacle, and particularly to perform his vow; perhaps some vow he had made, distinct from Hannah's, if God would give him a son by her, v. 21. But Hannah, though she felt a warm regard for the courts of God's house, begged leave of her husband to stay at home; for the women were not under any obligation to go up to the three yearly feasts, as the men were. However, Hannah had been accustomed to go, but now desired to be excused, 1. Because she would not be so long absent from her nursery. Can a woman forget her sucking child? We may suppose she kept constant at home, for, if she had gone any whither, she would have gone to Shiloh. Note, God will have mercy, and not sacrifice. Those that are detained from public ordinances, by the nursing and tending of little children, may take comfort from this instance, and believe, that, if they do that with an eye to God, he will graciously accept them therein; and, though they tarry at home, they shall divide the spoil. 2. Because she would not go up to Shiloh till her son was big enough, not only to be taken thither, but to be left there; for, if once she took him thither, she thought she could never find in her heart to bring him back again. Those who are steadfastly resolved to pay their vows, may yet see good cause to defer the payment of them. Every thing is beautiful in its season. No animal was accepted in sacrifice till it had been for some time under the dam, Lev. 22. 27. Fruit is best when it is ripe. Elkanah agrees to what she proposes; (v. 23.) Do what seemeth thee good. So far was he from delighting to cross her, that he referred it entirely to her. Behold, how good and pleasant a thing it is when yoke-fellows thus draw even in the yoke, and accommodate themselves to one another, each thinking well of what the other does, especially in works of piety and charity. He adds a prayer, Only the Lord establish his word; that is, "God preserve the child through the perils of his infancy, that the solemn vow which God signified his acceptance of, by giving us the child, may be performed in its season, and so the whole matter may be accomplished." Note, Those that have, in sincerity, devoted their children to God, may with comfort pray for them, that God will establish the word sealed to them, at the same time that they were sealed for him.

IV. The solemn entering of this child into the service of the sanctuary. We may take it for granted that he was presented to the Lord at forty days old, as all the first-born were; (Luke, 2. 22, 23.) but that is not mentioned, because there was nothing in it singular; but now, that he was weaned, he was presented, not to be redeemed. Some think it was as soon as he was weaned from the breast, which, the Jews say, was not till he was three years old; it is said, She gave him suck till she had weaned him, v. 23. Others think it was not till he was weaned from childish things, at eight or ten years old. But I see no inconvenience in admitting such an extraordinary child as this into the tabernacle, at three years old, to be educated among the children of the priests. It is said, (v. 24.) The child was young; but, being intelligent above his years, he was no trouble. None can begin too soon to be religious. The child was a child, so the Hebrew reads it, in his learning age. For, whom shall he teach knowledge, but them that are newly weaned from the milk, and drawn from the breasts? Isa. 28. 9.

Observe how she presented her child.

1. With a sacrifice; no less than three bullocks, with a meat-offering for each; (v. 24.) a bullock, perhaps, for each year of the child's life; or, one for a burnt-offering, another for a sin-offering, and the third for a peace-offering. So far was she from thinking, that, by presenting her son to God, she made God her Debtor, that she thought it requisite, by these slain offerings, to seek God's acceptance of her living sacrifice. All our covenants with God for ourselves, and our's, must be made by sacrifice, the great Sacrifice.

2. With a grateful acknowledgment of God's goodness in answer to prayer. This she makes to Eli, because he had encouraged her to hope for an answer of peace; (v. 26, 27.) For this child I prayed. (Here it was obtained by prayer, and here it is resigned to the prayer-hearing God.) "You have forgotten me, my lord; but I, who now appear so cheerful, am the woman, the very same, that, three years ago, stood by thee here, weeping and praying, and this was the child I prayed for." Answers of prayer may thus be humbly triumphed in, to the glory of God. Here is a living testimony for God, "I am his witness that he is gracious." See Ps. 66. 16. 19. "For this mercy, this comfort, I prayed, and the Lord has given me my petition." See Ps. 34. 2, 4, 6. Hannah does not remind Eli of it, by adverting to the suspicion he had formerly expressed; she does not say, "I am the woman whom you passed that severe censure upon; what do you think of me now?" Good men ought not to be upbraided with their infirmities and oversights; they have themselves repented of them, let them hear no more of them.

3. With a full surrender of all her interest in this child unto the Lord; (v. 28.) I have lent him to the Lord as long as he liveth. And she repeats it, because she will never revoke it, he shall be (a deadand) lent, or given, to the Lord; not that she designed to call for him back, as we do what we lend, but she uses this word, Shaal, he lent, because it is the same word that she had used before, (v. 20. I asked him of the Lord), only in another conjugation. And, (v. 27.) the Lord gave me the petition which I asked, (Shalti, in Kal,) therefore I have lent him; (Hishilti, the same word in Hiphil;) and so it gives another etymology of his name, Samuel, not only asked of God, but lent to God. And observe, (1.) Whatever we give to God, it is what we have first asked and received from him. All our gifts to him were first his gifts to us. Of thine own, Lord, have we given thee, 1 Chron. 29. 14, 16. (2.) Whatever we give to God may, upon this account, be said to be lent to him; that though we may not recall it, as a thing lent, yet he will certainly repay it, with interest, to our unspeakable advantage, particularly what is given to his poor, Prov. 19. 17. When, by baptism, we dedicate our children to God, let us remember that they were his before by a sovereign right, and that they are our's still, so much the more to our comfort. Hannah resigns him to the Lord, not for a certain term of years, as children are sent apprentices, but durante vita—as long as he liveth, he shall be lent unto the Lord; a Nazarite for life. Such must our covenant with God be, a marriage-covenant; as long as we live, we must be his, and never forsake him.

Lastly, The child Samuel did his part beyond what could have been expected from one of his years; for of him that seems to be spoken, He worshipped the Lord there; that is, he said his prayers. He was, no doubt, extraordinarily forward, (we have known children that have discovered some sense of religion very young,) and his mother, designing him for the sanctuary, took particular care to train him up to that which was to be his work in the sanctuary. Note, Little children should learn betimes to worship God. Their parents should instruct them in it, and bring them to it; put their upon doing it as well as they can, and God will graciously accept them, and teach them to do better.

CHAP. II.

In this chapter, we have, I. Hannah's song of thanksgiving to God, for his favour to her, in giving her Samuel, v. 1. .10. II. Their return to their family, with Eli's blessing, v. 11. 20. The increase of their family, (v. 21.) Samuel's growth and improvement, (v. 11, 18, 21, 26.) and the care Hannah took to clothe him, v. 19. III. The great wickedness of Eli's sons, v. 12. .17, 22. IV. The over-mild reproof that Eli gave them for it, v. 23. .25. V. The justly-dreadful message God sent him by a prophet, threatening the ruin of his family, for the wickedness of his sons, v. 27. .36.

1. AND Hannah prayed, and said, My heart rejoiceth in the LORD, mine horn is exalted in the LORD; my mouth is enlarged over mine enemies; because I rejoice in thy salvation. 2. There is none holy as the LORD: for there is none beside thee: neither is there any rock like our God. 3. Talk no more so exceeding proudly; let not arrogancy come out of your mouth: for the LORD is a God of knowledge, and by his actions are weighed. 4. The bows of the mighty men are broken, and they that stumbled are girded with strength. 5. They that were full have hired out themselves for bread; and they that were hungry ceased: so that the barren hath born seven; and she that hath many children is waxed feeble. 6. The LORD killeth, and maketh alive; he bringeth down to the grave, and bringeth up. 7. The LORD maketh poor, and maketh rich: he bringeth low, and lifteth up. 8. He raiseth up the poor out of the dust, and lifteth up the beggar from the dunghil, to set them among princes, and to make them inherit the throne of glory: for the pillars of the earth are the LORD's, and he hath set the world upon them. 9. He will keep the feet of his saints, and the wicked shall be silent in darkness; for by strength shall no man prevail. 10. The adversaries of the LORD shall be broken to pieces; out of heaven shall he thunder upon them: the LORD shall judge the ends of the earth; and he shall give strength unto his king, and exalt the horn of his anointed.

We have here Hannah's thanksgiving, dictated, not only by the spirit of prayer, but by the spirit of prophecy. Her petition for the mercy she desired, we had before, (ch. 1. 11.) and here her return of praise; in both, out of the abundance of a heart deeply affected, (in the former with her own wants, and in the latter with God's goodness,) her mouth spake.

Observe, in general, 1. When she had received mercy from God, she owned it, with thankfulness to his praise. Not like the nine lepers, Luke, 17. 17. Praise is our rent, our tribute; we are unjust if we do not pay it. 2. The mercy she had received was an answer to prayer, and therefore she thought herself especially obliged to give thanks for it. What we win by prayer, we may wear with comfort, and must wear with praise. 3. Her thanksgiving is here called a prayer; Hannah prayed; for thanksgiving is an essential part of prayer. In every address to God, we must express a grateful regard to him as our Benefactor. Nay, and thanksgiving for mercies received shall be accepted as a petition for further mercy. 4. From this particular mercy, which she had received from God, she takes occasion, with an elevated and enlarged heart, to speak glorious things of God, and of his government of the world, for the good of his church. Whatever, at any time, gives rise to our praises, in this manner they should be raised. 5. Her prayer was mental, her voice was not heard; but in her thanksgiving she spake, that all might hear her. She made her supplication with groanings, that could not be uttered, but now her lips were opened to shew forth God's praise. 6. This thanksgiving is here left upon record, for the encouragement of those of the weaker sex to attend the throne of grace; God will regard their prayers and praises. The virgin Mary's song has great affinity with this of Hannah, Luke, 1. 46.

Three things we have in this thanksgiving.

1. Hannah's triumph in God, in his glorious perfections, and the great things he had done for her, v. 1. .3. Observe,

1. What great things she says of God. She takes little notice of the particular mercy she was now rejoicing in, does not commend Samuel for the prettiest child, the most toward and sensible of his age, or that she ever saw, as fond parents are apt to do; no, she overlooks the gift, and praises the Giver; whereas most forget the Giver, and fasten only on the gift. Every stream should lead us to the Fountain; and the favours we receive from God should raise our admiration of the infinite perfections there are in God. There may be other Samuels, but no other Jehovah. There is none beside thee. Note, God is to be praised as a peerless Being, and of unparalleled perfection; this glory is due unto his name, to own, not only that there is none like him, but that there is none beside him. All others were pretenders, Ps. 13. 31.

Four of God's glorious attributes Hannah here celebrates the glory of. (1.) His unspotted purity. This is that attribute which is most praised in the upper world, by those that always behold his face, Isa. 6. 3. Rev. 4. 8. When Israel triumphed over the Egyptians, God was praised as glorious in holiness, Exod. 15. 11. So here, in Hannah's triumph, There is none holy as the Lord. It is the rectitude of his nature, his infinite agreement with himself, and the equity of his government and judgment, in all the administrations of both. At the remembrance of this we ought to give thanks. (2.) His almighty power. Neither is there any rock (or any strength, for so the word is sometimes rendered) like our God. Hannah had experienced a mighty support by staying herself upon him, and therefore speaks as she had found, and seems to refer to that of Moses, Deut. 32. 31. (3.) His unsearchable wisdom. The Lord, the Judge of all, is a God of knowledge; he clearly and perfectly sees into the character of every person, and the merits of every cause, and he gives knowledge and understanding to those that seek it of him. (4.) His unerring justice. By his actions are weighed. His own are so, in his eternal counsels; the actions of the children of men are so, in the balances of his judgment; so that he will render to every man according to his work, and is not mistaken in what any man is, or does.

2. How she solaces herself in these things. What we give God the glory of, we may take the comfort of; Hannah does so, (1.) In holy joy. My heart rejoiceth in the Lord; not so much in her son as in her God; he is to be the Gladness of our joy, (Ps. 43. 4.) and our joy must not terminate in any thing short of him. I rejoice in thy salvation; not only in this particular favour to me, but in the salvation of thy people Israel, those salvations especially which this child will be an instrument of, and that, above all, by Christ, which those are but the types of. (2.) In holy triumph. "My horn is exalted; not only my reputation saved, by my having a son, but greatly raised, by having such a son." We read of some of the singers whom David appointed to lift up the horn, an instrument of music, in praising God; (1 Chron. 25. 5.) so that, My horn is exalted, means this, "My praises are very much elevated to an unusual strain." Exalted in the Lord; God is to have the honour of all our exaltations, and in him must we triumph. My mouth is enlarged; that is, "Now I have wherewith to answer them that reproached me;" he that has his quiver full of arrows, his house full of children, shall not be ashamed to speak with the enemy in the gate, Ps. 127. 5.

3. How she herewith silences those that set up themselves as rivals with God, and rebels against him; (v. 3.) Talk no more exceeding proudly. Let not Peninnah and her children upbraid her any more with her confidence in God, and praying to him; at length she found it not in vain. See Mic. 7. 10. Then she that is mine enemy shall see it, and shame shall cover her that said, Where is my God? Or, perhaps, it was below her to take so much notice of Peninnah, and her malice, in this song; but this is intended as a check to the insolence of the Philistines, and other enemies of God and Israel, that set their mouth against the heavens, Ps. 73. 9. "Let this put them to silence and shame; he that has thus judged for me against my adversary, will judge for his people against all theirs."

II. The notice she takes of the wisdom and sovereignty of the divine providence, in its disposal of the affairs of the children of men; such are the vicissitudes of them, and such the strange and sudden turns and revolutions of them, that it is often found a very short step between the height of prosperity and the depth of adversity: God has not only set the one over against the other, (Ecl. 7. 14.) but the one very near the other, and no gulf fixed between them, that we may rejoice as though we rejoiced not, and weep as though we wept not.

1. The strong are soon weakened, and the weak are soon strengthened, when God pleases, v. 4. On the one hand, if he speak the word, the bows of the mighty men are broken, they are disarmed, disabled to do as they have done, and as they have designed; they have been worsted in battle who seemed, upon all accounts, to have had the advantage on their side, and thought themselves sure of victory. See Ps. 46. 9.—37. 15, 17. Particular persons are soon weakened by sickness and age, and they find that the bow does not long abide in strength; many a mighty man, who has gloried in his might, has found it a deceitful bow, that failed him when he trusted to it. On the other hand, if the Lord speak the word, they who stumbled through wickedness, who were so feeble that they could not go straight or steady, are girded with strength, in body and mind, and are able to bring great things to pass. They who are weakened by sickness, return to their vigour; (Job, 33. 25.) by sorrow, shall recover their comfort; which will confirm the weak hands and the feeble knees, Isa. 35. 3. Victory turns in favour of that side that was given up for gone, and even the lame take the prey, Isa. 33. 23.

2. The rich are soon impoverished, and the poor strangely enriched of a sudden, v. 5. Providence sometimes does so blast men's estates, and cross their endeavours, and, with a fire not blown, consume their increase, that they who were full (their barns full, and their bags full, their houses full of good things, Job, 22. 18. and their bellies full of these hid treasures, Ps. 17. 14.) have been reduced to such straits and extremities, as to want the necessary supports of life, and to hire out themselves for bread, and they must dig, since to beg they are ashamed. Riches flee away, (Prov. 23. 5.) and leave those miserable, who, when they had them, placed their happiness in them. To them that have been full and free, poverty and slavery must needs be doubly grievous. But, on the other hand, sometimes Providence so orders it, that they who were hungry, ceased, that is, ceased to hire out themselves for bread, as they had done; having, by God's blessing on their industry, got beforehand in the world, and enough to live upon at ease, they shall hunger no more, nor thirst any more. This is not to be ascribed to fortune, nor merely to men's wisdom or folly; Riches are not to men of understanding, nor favour to men of skill; (Ecl. 9. 11.) nor is it always men's own fault that they become poor, but, (v. 7.) The Lord maketh some poor, and maketh others rich; the impoverishing of one is the enriching of another, and it is God's doing. To some he gives power to get wealth, from others he takes away power to keep the wealth they have. Are we poor? God made us poor, which is a good reason why we should be content, and reconcile ourselves to our condition. Are we rich? God made us rich, which is a good reason why we should be thankful, and serve him cheerfully, in the abundance of good things he gives us. It may be understood of the same person; those that were rich, God makes poor, and, after a while, makes rich again, as Job; he gave, he takes away, and then gives again. Let not the rich be proud and secure, for God can soon make them poor; let not the poor despond and despair, for God can in due time enrich them again.

3. Empty families are replenished, and numerous families diminished and made few. This is the instance that comes close to the occasion of the thanksgiving. The barren hath born seven, meaning herself, for though, at present, she had but one son, yet that one being a Nazarite, devoted to God, and employed in his immediate service, he was to her as good as seven. Or, it is the language of her faith; now that she has one, she hopes for more, and was not disappointed, she had five more; (v. 21.) so that, if we reckon Samuel but for two, as we may well, she has the number she promised herself; the barren hath born seven, while, on the other hand, she that hath many children is waxed feeble, and hath left bearing; she says no more, Peninnah is now mortified, and crest-fallen. The tradition of the Jews, is, that when Hannah bore one child, Peninnah buried two. There are many instances both of the increase of families that were inconsiderable, and the extinguishing of families that made a figure, Job, 22. 23. Ps. 107. 38, &c.

4. God is the sovereign Lord of life and death; (v. 6.) The Lord killeth and maketh alive. Understand it, (1.) Of God's sovereign dominion and universal agency, in the lives and deaths of the children of men. He presides in births and burials. Whenever any die, it is God that directs the arrows of death; the Lord killeth, death is his messenger, strikes whom and when he bids; none are brought to the dust, but it is he that brings them down, for in his hand are the keys of death and the grave, Rev. 1. 18. Whenever any are born, it is he that makes them alive; none knows what is the way of the Spirit; but this we know, that it comes from the Father of spirits. Whenever any are recovered from sickness, and delivered from imminent perils, it is God that bringeth up, for to him belong the issues from death. (2.) Of the distinction he makes between some and others; he killeth some, and maketh (that is, keepeth) others alive, that were in the same danger, in war, suppose, or pestilence. Two in a bed together, it may be; one taken by death, and the other yet alive; even so, Father, because it seemed good in thine eyes. Some, that were most likely to live, brought down to the grave, and others, that were as likely to die, brought up; for living and dying do not go by likelihoods. God's providences toward some are killing, ruining, to their comforts; and towards others, at the same time, reviving. (3.) Of the change he makes with one and the same person. He killeth and bringeth down to the grave; that is, he brings even to death's doors, and then revives and raises up, when even life was despaired of, and a sentence of death received, 2 Cor. 1. 8, 9. He turns to destruction, and then says, Return, Ps. 90. 3. Nothing is too hard for God to do, no not the quickening of the dead, and putting life into dry bones.

5. Advancement and abasement are both from him. He brings some low, and lifts up others; (v. 7.) humbles the proud, and gives grace and honour to the lowly; lays those in the dust that would vie with the God above them, and trample upon all about them; (Job, 40. 12, 13.) but lifts up those with his salvation that humble themselves before him, Jam. 4. 10. Or, it may be understood of the same persons; those whom he had brought low, when they are sufficiently humbled, he lifteth up. This is enlarged upon, (v. 8.) He raiseth up the poor out of the dust, a low and mean condition, nay, from the dunghill, a base and servile condition, loathed, and despised, to set them among princes. See Ps. 113. 7, 8. Promotion comes not by chance, but from the counsel of God, which often prefers those that were very unlikely, and that men thought very unworthy. Joseph and Daniel, Moses and David, were thus strangely advanced, from a prison to a palace, from a sheep-hook to a sceptre. The princes they are set among may be tempted to disdain them, but God can establish the honour which he gives thus surprisingly, and make them even to inherit the throne of glory. Let not those whom Providence has thus preferred be upbraided with the dust and dunghill they are raised out of, for the meaner their beginnings were, the more are they favoured, and God glorified, in their advancement, if it be by lawful and honourable means.

Lastly, A reason is given for all these dispensations, which obliges us to acquiesce in them, how surprising soever they are, for the pillars of the earth are the Lord's. (1.) If we understand it literally, it bespeaks God's almighty power, which cannot be controlled. He upholds the whole creation, founded the earth, and still sustains it by the word of his power. What cannot he do in the affairs of families and kingdoms, far beyond our conception and expectation, who hangs the earth upon nothing? Job, 26. 7. But, (2.) If we understand it figuratively, it bespeaks his incontestable sovereignty, which cannot be disputed. The princes and great ones of the earth, the directors of states and governments, are the pillars of the earth, Ps. 75. 3. On these hinges the affairs of the world seem to turn, but they are the Lord's, Ps. 47. 9. From him they have their power, and therefore he may advance whom he pleases; and who may say, What dost thou?

III. A prediction of the preservation and advancement of all God's faithful friends, and the destruction of all his and their enemies. Having testified her joyful triumph in what God had done, and is doing, she concludes with joyful hopes of what he would do, v. 9, 10. Pious affections (says Bishop Patrick) in those days rose up many times to the height of prophecy, whereby God continued in that nation his true religion, in the midst of their idolatrous inclinations. This prophecy may refer, 1. More immediately to the government of Israel by Samuel, and David, whom he was employed to anoint. The Israelites, God's saints, should be protected and delivered; the Philistines, their enemies, should be conquered and subdued, and particularly by thunder, ch. 7. 10. Their dominion should be enlarged, king David strengthened and greatly exalted, and Israel (that in the time of the judges had made so small a figure, and had much ado to subsist) should now shortly become great and considerable, and give law to all its neighbours. An extraordinary change that was, and the birth of Samuel was, as it were, the dawning of that day. But, 2. We have reason to think that this prophecy looks farther, to the kingdom of Christ, and the administration of that kingdom of grace of which she now comes to speak, having spoken so largely of the kingdom of providence. And here is the first time that we meet with the name Messiah, or his Anointed. The ancient expositors, both Jewish and Christian, make it to look beyond David to the Son of David; glorious things are here spoken of the kingdom of the Mediator, both before and since his incarnation; for the method of the administration of it, both by the eternal Word, and by that Word made flesh, is much the same.

Concerning that kingdom we are here assured,

(1.) That all the loyal subjects of it shall be carefully and powerfully protected; (v. 9.) He will keep the feet of his saints. There are a people in the world that are God's saints, his select and sanctified ones; and he will keep their feet, that is, all that belongs to them shall be under his protection, down to their very feet, the lowest part of the body. If he will keep their feet, much more their head and hearts: or, he will keep their feet, that is, he will secure the ground they stand on, and establish their goings; he will set a guard of grace upon their affections and actions, that their feet may neither wander out of the way, nor stumble in the way. When their feet are ready to slip, (Ps. 73. 2.) his mercy holdeth them up, (Ps. 94. 18.) and keepeth them from falling, Jude, 24. While we keep God's ways, he will keep our feet. See Ps. 37. 23, 24.

(2.) That all the powers engaged against it shall not be able to effect the ruin of it. By strength no man shall prevail. God's strength is engaged for the church; and while it so, man's strength shall not prevail against it. The church seems destitute of strength, her friends few and feeble; but prevalency does not go by human strength; (Ps. 33. 16.) God neither needs it for him, (Ps. 147. 10.) nor dreads it against him.

(3.) That all the enemies of it will certainly be broken and brought down, The wicked shall be silent in darkness; (v. 9.) they shall be struck both blind and dumb, not be able to see their way, nor have any thing to say for themselves. Damned sinners are sentenced to utter darkness, and in it they will be for ever speechless, Matth. 22. 12, 13. The wicked are called, The adversaries of the Lord, and it is foretold, (v. 10.) that they shall be broken to pieces. Their designs against his kingdom among men will all be dashed, and they themselves destroyed; how can they speed better, that are in arms against Omnipotence? See Luke, 19. 27. God has many ways of doing it, and, rather than fail, from heaven shall he thunder upon them, and so, not only put them in terror and consternation, but bring them to destruction. Who can stand before God's thunderbolt's?

(4.) That the conquests and commands of this kingdom shall extend themselves to distant regions: The Lord shall judge the ends of the earth. David's victories and dominions reached far, but the utmost parts of the earth are promised to the Messiah for his possession, (Ps. 2. 8.) to be either reduced to his golden sceptre, or ruined by his iron rod. God is judge of all, and he will judge for his people, against his and their enemies, Ps. 110. 5, 6.

(5.) That the power and honour of Messiah the Prince shall grow and increase more and more. He shall give strength unto his King, for the accomplishing of his great undertaking, (1s. 89. 24, and see Luke, 22. 43.) strengthen him to go through the difficulties of his humiliation, and in his exaltation he will lift up the head, (Ps. 110. 7.) lift up the horn, the power and honour of his Anointed, and make him higher than the kings of the earth, Ps. 89. 27. This crowns the triumph, and is, more than any thing, the matter of her exaltation. Her horn is exalted, (v. 1.) because she foresees the horn of the Messiah will be so. This secures the hope; the subjects of Christ's kingdom will be safe, and the enemies of it will be ruined, for the Anointed, the Lord Christ, is girt with strength, and is able to save and destroy unto the uttermost.

11. And Elkanah went to Ramah to his house. And the child did minister unto the LORD before Eli the priest. 12. Now the sons of Eli were sons of Belial; they knew not the LORD: 13. And the priest's custom with the people was, that, when any man offered sacrifice, the priest's servant came, while the flesh was in seething, with a flesh-hook of three teeth in his hand; 14. And he struck it into the pan, or kettle, or caldron, or pot; all that the flesh-hook brought up the priest took for himself. So they did in Shiloh, unto all the Israelites that came thither. 15. Also before they burnt the fat, the priest's servant came, and said to the man that sacrificed, Give flesh to roast for the priest; for he will not have sodden flesh of thee, but raw. 16. And if any man said unto him, Let them not fail to burn the fat presently, and then take as much as thy soul desireth; then he would answer him, Nay; but thou shalt give it me now: and if not, I will take it by force. 17. Wherefore the sin of the young men was very great before the LORD: for men abhorred the offering of the LORD. 18. But Samuel ministered before the LORD, being a child, girded with a linen ephod. 19. Moreover his mother made him a little coat, and brought it to him from year to year, when she came up with her husband to offer the yearly sacrifice. 20. And Eli blessed Elkanah and his wife, and said, The LORD give thee seed of this woman for the loan which is lent to the LORD. And they went unto their own home. 21. And the LORD visited Hannah, so that she conceived and bare three sons and two daughters. And the child Samuel grew before the LORD. 22. Now Eli was very old, and heard all that his sons did unto all Israel; and how they lay with the women that assembled at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation. 22. And he said unto them, Why do ye such things? for I hear of your evil dealings by all this people. 24. Nay, my sons: for it is no good report that I hear: ye make the LORD's people to transgress. 15. If one man sin against another, the judge shall judge him: but if a man sin against the LORD, who shall entreat for him? Notwithstanding, they hearkened not unto the voice of their father, because the LORD would slay them. 26. And the child Samuel grew on, and was in favour both with the LORD, and also with men.

In these verses we have the good character and posture of Elkanah's family, and the bad character and posture of Eli's family; the account of these two is observably interwoven throughout this whole paragraph; as if the historian intended to set the one over against the other, that they might set off one another. The devotion and good order of Elkanah's family aggravated the iniquity of Eli's house; while the wickedness of Eli's sons made Samuel's early piety shine the more bright and illustrious.

I. Let us see how well things went in Elkanah's family, and how much better than formerly.

1. Eli dismissed them from the house of the Lord, when they had entered their little son there, with a blessing, v. 20. He blessed as one having authority; The Lord give thee more children of this woman, for the loan that is lent to the Lord. If Hannah had then had many children, it had not been such a generous piece of piety to part with one out of many for the service of the tabernacle; but when she had but one, an only one, whom she loved, her Isaac, to present him to the Lord, was such an act of heroic piety as should by no means lose its reward. As when Abraham had offered Isaac, he received the promise of a numerous issue, (Gen. 22. 16, 17.) so did Hannah, when she had presented Samuel unto the Lord a living sacrifice. Note, What is lent to the Lord, will certainly be repaid with interest, to our unspeakable advantage, and oftentimes in kind. Hannah resigns one child to God, and is recompensed with five, for Eli's blessing took effect, (v. 21.) she bare three sons and two daughters. There is nothing lost by lending to God, or losing for him; it shall be repaid a hundred-fold, Matth. 19. 29.

2. They returned to their own habitation; this is twice mentioned; (v. 11. and again v. 20.) it was very pleasant to attend at God's house, to bless him, and to be blessed of him. But they have a family at home that must be looked after, and thither they return, cheerfully leaving the dear little one behind them, knowing they left him in a good place; and it does not appear that he cried after them, but was as willing to stay as they were to leave him, so soon did he put away childish things, and behave like a man.

3. They kept up their constant attendance at the house of God, with their yearly sacrifice, v. 19. They did not think that their son's ministering there would excuse them, or that that offering must serve instead of other offerings, but, having found the benefit of drawing near to God, they would omit no appointed season for it; and now they had one loadstone more in Shiloh to draw them thither. We may suppose they went thither to see their child oftener than once a year, for it was not ten miles from Ramah; but their annual visit is taken notice of, because then they brought their yearly sacrifice; and then Hannah fitted up her son (and some think oftener than once a year) with a new suit of clothes, a little coat, (v. 19.) and every thing belonging to it. She undertook to find him in clothes during his apprenticeship at the tabernacle, and took care he should be well provided, that he might appear the more decent and sightly in his ministration, and to encourage him in his towardly beginnings. Parents must take care that their children want nothing that is fit for them, whether they are with them or from them; but those that are dutiful and hopeful, and minister to the Lord, must be thought worthy of double care and kindness.

4. The child Samuel did very well. Four several times he is mentioned in these verses, and two things we are told of.

(1.) The service he did to the Lord. He did well indeed, for he ministered to the Lord, (v. 11, 18.) according as his capacity was; he learnt his catechism, and was constant to his devotions; soon learnt to read, and took a pleasure in the book of the law, and thus he ministered to the Lord. He ministered before Eli, that is, under his inspection, and as he ordered him, not before Eli's sons; all parties were agreed that they were unfit to be his tutors. Perhaps, he attended immediately on Eli's person, was ready to him to fetch and bring as he had occasion, and that is called ministering to the Lord. Some little services perhaps he was employed in about the altar, though much under the age appointed by the law for the Levites' ministration. He could light a candle, or hold a dish, or run on an errand, or shut a door; and because he did this with a pious disposition of mind, it is called ministering to the Lord, and great notice is taken of it. After a while, he did his work so well that Eli appointed that he should minister with a linen ephod, as the priests did, (though he was no priest,) because he saw that God was with him. Note, Little children must learn betimes to minister to the Lord; parents must train them up to it, and God will accept them; particularly, let them learn to pay respect to their teachers, as Samuel to Eli. None can begin too soon to be religious. See Ps. 8. 2. and Matth. 21. 15, 16.

(2.) The blessing he received from the Lord. He grew before the Lord, as a tender plant, (v. 21.) grew on (v. 26.) in strength and stature, and especially in wisdom and understanding, and fitness for business. Note, Those young people that serve God as well as they can, he will enable to improve, that they may serve him better. They that are planted in God's house shall flourish, Ps. 92. 13. He was in favour with the Lord and with man. Note, It is a great encouragement to children to be tractable, and virtuous, and good betimes, that if they be, both God and man will love them. Such children are the darlings both of heaven and earth. What is here said of Samuel is said of our blessed Saviour, that great Example, Luke, 2. 52.

II. Let us now see how ill things went in Eli's family, though seated at the very door of the tabernacle. The nearer the church, the further from God.

1. The abominable wickedness of Eli's sons; (v. 12.) The sons of Eli were sons of Belial. It is emphatically expressed. Nothing appears to the contrary, but that Eli himself was a very good man, and, no doubt, had educated his sons well, giving them good instructions, setting them good examples, and putting up many a good prayer for them; and yet, when they grew up, they proved sons of Belial, profane wicked men, and arrant rakes; They knew not the Lord. They could not but have a notional knowledge of God and his law, a form of knowledge; (Rom. 2. 20.) yet, because their practice was not accordingly, they are spoken of as wholly ignorant of God; they lived as if they knew nothing at all of God. Note, Parents cannot give grace to their children, nor does it run in the blood. Many that are sincerely pious themselves, live to see those that come from them notoriously impious and profane, for the race is not to the swift. Eli was high priest and judge in Israel; his sons were priests by their birth; their character was sacred and honourable, and obliged them, for their reputation's sake, to observe decorum; they were resident at the fountain-head both of magistracy and ministry, and yet they were sons of Belial, and their honour, power, and learning, made them so much the worse. They did not go to serve other gods, as those did that lived at a distance from the altar, for from the house of God they had their wealth and dignity; but, which was worse, they managed the service of God as if he had been one of the dunghill-deities of the heathen. It is hard to say which dishonours God more, idolatry or profaneness, especially the profaneness of the priests.

Let us see the wickedness of Eli's sons; and it is a sad sight:

(1.) They profaned the offerings of the Lord, and made a gain to themselves, or rather a gratification of their own luxury, out of them. God had provided competently for them out of the sacrifices; the offerings of the Lord made by fire were a considerable branch of their revenue, but that did not please them, they served not Israel, but their own bellies; (Rom. 16. 18.) such as the prophet calls greedy dogs that can never have enough, Isa. 56. 11. [1.] They robbed the offerers, and seized for themselves some of their part of the sacrifice of the peace-offerings. The priests had for their share the wave-breast and the heave-shoulder, (Lev. 7. 34.) but that did not content them; when the flesh was boiling, for the offerer to feast upon religiously with his friends, they sent a servant with a flesh-hook of three teeth, a trident, and that must be struck into the pot, and whatever that brought up the priest must have; (v. 13, 14.) and the people, out of their great veneration, suffered this to grow into a custom, so that, after a while, prescription was pleaded for this manifest wrong. [2.] They stepped in before God himself, and encroached upon his right too; as if it were a small thing to weary men, they wearied my God also, Isa. 7. 13. Be it observed, to the honour of Israel, that though the people tamely yielded to their unwarrantable demands from them, yet they were very solicitous that God should not be robbed; Let them not fail to burn the fat presently, v. 16. Let the altar have its due, for that is the main matter; unless God have the fat, they can feast with little comfort upon the flesh; it was a shame that the priests should need to be thus admonished by the people of their duty; but they regarded not the admonition, the priest will be served first, and will take what he thinks fit of the fat too, for he is weary of boiled meat, he must have roast, and, in order to that, they must give it him raw; and, if the offerer dispute it, though not in his own favour, (let him take what he pleases of his part,) but in favour of the altar, (let them be sure to burn the fat first,) even the priest's servant was grown so very imperious, that he would either have it now, or take it by force; than which there could not be a greater affront to God, or a greater abuse to the people. The effect was, First, That God was displeased; The sin of the young men was very great before the Lord, v. 17. Nothing is more provoking to God than the profanation of sacred things, and men serving of their lusts with the offerings of the Lord. Secondly, That religion suffered by it; Men abhorred the offerings of the Lord. All good men abhorred their management of the offerings, and too many insensibly fell into a contempt of the offerings themselves, for their sakes. It was the people's sin to think the worse of God's institutions, but it was the much greater sin of the priests that gave them occasion to do so. Nothing brings a greater reproach upon religion, than ministers' covetousness, sensuality, and imperiousness. In the midst of this sad story, comes in the repeated mention of Samuel's devotion, But Samuel ministered before the Lord, as an instance of the power of God's grace, in preserving him pure and pious, in the midst of this wicked crew; and that helped to keep up the sinking credit of the sanctuary in the minds of the people, who, when they had said all they could against Eli's sons, could not but admire Samuel's seriousness, and speak well of religion, for his sake.

(2.) They debauched the women that came to worship at the door of the tabernacle; (v. 22.) they had wives of their own, but were like fed horses, Jer. 5. 8. To have gone to the harlots houses, the common prostitutes, had been abominable wickedness; but to use the interests which, as priests, they had in those women that had devout dispositions, and were religiously inclined, and to bring them to commit this wickedness, was such horrid impiety, as one can scarcely think it possible that men, who called themselves priests, should ever be guilty of. Be astonished, O heavens, at this, and tremble, O earth! No words can sufficiently express the villany of such practices as these.

(1.) That it was very just and rational. That which he said was very proper. [1.] He tells them, that the matter of fact was too plain to be denied, and too public to be concealed; "I hear of your evil dealings by all this people", v. 23. It is not the surmise of one or two, but the avowed testimony of many, all your neighbours cry out shame on you, and bring their complaints to me, expecting that I should redress the grievance." [2.] He shews them the bad consequences of it, that they not only sinned, but made Israel to sin, and would have the people's sin to answer for, as well as their own; "You that should turn men from iniquity, (Mal. 2. 6.) you make the Lord's people to transgress, and corrupt the nation, instead of reforming it; you tempt people to go serve other gods, when they see the God of Israel so ill served." [3.] He warns them of the danger they brought themselves into by it; (v. 25.) he intimates to them what God afterward told him, that the iniquity would not be purged with sacrifice nor offering, ch. 3. 14. If one man sin against another, the judge, that is, the priest, who was appointed to be the judge in many cases, (Deut. 17. 9.) shall judge him, shall undertake his cause, arbitrate the matter, and make atonement for the offender; but if a man sin against the Lord, that is, if a priest profane the holy things of the Lord, if a man that deals with God for others, do himself affront him, who shall entreat for him? Eli was himself a judge and had often made intercession for transgressors, but, says he, "You that sin against the Lord," that is, "against the law and honour of God, in those very things which immediately pertain to him, and by which reconciliation is to be made, how can I entreat for you?" Their condition was deplorable indeed, when their own father could not speak a good word for them, nor could have the face to appear as their advocate. Sins against the remedy, the atonement itself, are most dangerous; treading under foot the blood of the covenant; for then there remains no more sacrifice, Heb. 10. 26.

But, (2.) It was too mild and gentle. He should have rebuked them sharply, their crimes deserved it, their temper needed it; the softness of his dealing with them would but harden them the more. The animadversion was too easy, when he said, It is no good report: he should have said, "It is a shameful scandalous thing, and not to be suffered!" Whether it was because he loved them, or because he feared them, that he dealt thus tenderly with them, it was certainly an evidence of his want of zeal for the honour of God and his sanctuary. He bound them over to God's judgment, but he should have taken cognizance of their crimes himself, as high priest and judge, and have restrained and punished them. What he said was right, but it was not enough. Note, It is sometimes necessary that we put an edge upon the reproofs we give. There are those that must be saved with fear, Jude, 23.

3. Their obstinacy against this reproof: his lenity did not at all work upon them; they hearkened not to their father, though he was also a judge; they had no regard either to his authority, or to his affection, which was to them an evident token of perdition; it was because the Lord would slay them. They had long hardened their hearts, and now God, in a way of righteous judgment, hardened their hearts, and seared their consciences, and withheld from them the grace they had resisted and forfeited. Note, Those that are deaf to the reproofs of wisdom are manifestly marked for ruin.

The Lord has determined to destroy them, 2 Chron. 25. 16. See Prov. 29. 1. Immediately upon this, Samuel's tractableness is again mentioned, (v. 26.) to shame their obstinacy; the child Samuel grew. God's grace is his own; he denied it to the sons of the high priest, and gave it to the child of an obscure country Levite.

27. And there came a man of God unto Eli, and said unto him, Thus saith the LORD, Did I plainly appear unto the house of thy father, when they were in Egypt in Pharaoh's house? 28. And did I choose him out of all the tribes of Israel to be my priest, to offer upon mine altar, to burn incense, to wear an ephod before me? and did I give unto the house of thy father all the offerings made by fire of the children of Israel? 29. Wherefore kick ye at my sacrifice, and at mine offering, which I have commanded in my habitation; and honourest thy sons above me, to make yourselves fat with the chiefest of all the offerings of Israel my people? 30. Wherefore the LORD God of Israel saith, I said indeed that thy house, and the house of thy father, should walk before me for ever: but now the LORD saith, Be it far from me; for them that honour me I will honour, and they that despise me shall be lightly esteemed. 31. Behold, the days come, that I will cut off thine arm, and the arm of thy father's house, that there shall not be an old man in thine house. 32. And thou shalt see an enemy in my habitation, in all the wealth which God shall give Israel: and there shall not be an old man in thine house for ever. 33. And the man of thine, whom I shall not cut off from mine altar, shall be to consume thine eyes, and to grieve thine heart: and all the increase of thine house shall die in the flower of their age. 34. And this shall be a sign unto thee, that shall come upon thy two sons, on Hophni and Phinehas; in one day they shall die both of them. 35. And I will raise me up a faithful priest, that shall do according to that which is in mine heart and in my mind: and I will build him a sure house; and he shall walk before mine anointed for ever. 36. And it shall come to pass, that every one that is left in thine house shall come and crouch to him for a piece of silver and a morsel of bread, and shall say, Put me, I pray thee, into one of the priests' offices, that I may eat a piece of bread.

Eli reprov'd his sons too gently, and did not threaten them as he should, and therefore God sent a prophet to him to reprove him sharply, and to threaten him, because, by his indulgence of them, he had strengthened their hands in their wickedness. If good men be wanting in their duty, and by their carelessness and remissness contribute any thing to the sin of sinners, they must expect both to hear it, and to smart for it. Eli's family was now nearer to God than all the families of the earth, and therefore he will punish them, Amos, 3. 2. The message is sent to Eli himself, because God would bring him to repentance, and save him; not to his sons, whom he had determined to destroy. And it might have been a means of awakening him to do his duty at last, and so to have prevented the judgment, but we do not find it had any great effect upon him.

The message this prophet delivers from God, is very close.

I. He reminds him of the great things God had done for the house of his fathers, and for his family. He appeared to Aaron in Egypt, (Exod. 4. 27.) in the house of bondage, as a token of further favour which he designed for him, v. 28. He advanced him to the priesthood, entailed it upon his family, and thereby dignified it above any of the families of Israel. He intrusted him with honourable work, to offer on God's altar, to burn incense, and to wear that ephod in which was the breast-plate of judgment. He settled upon him an honourable maintenance, a share out of all the offerings made by fire, v. 28. What could he have done more for them, to engage them to be faithful to him? Note, The distinguishing favours we have received from God, especially those of the spiritual priesthood, are great aggravations of sin, and will be remembered against us in the day of account, if we profane our crown, and betray our trust, Deut. 32. 6. 2 Sam. 12. 7, 8.

II. He exhibits a high charge against him and his family; his children did wickedly, and he connived at it, and thereby involved himself in the guilt; the indictment therefore runs against them all, v. 29. 1. His sons had impiously profaned the holy things of God; "Ye kick at my sacrifice which I have commanded; not only trample upon the institution as a mean thing, but spurn at it as a thing you hate to be tied up to." They did the utmost despite imaginable to the offerings of the Lord, when they committed all that outrage and rapine, about them, that we read of, and violently plundered the pots on which, in effect, Holiness to the Lord was written, (Zech. 14. 20.) and took that fat to themselves, which God had appointed to be burned on his altar. 2. Eli had bolstered them up in it, by not punishing their insolence and impiety; "Thou for thy part honourest thy sons above me;" that is, "Thou hadst rather see my offerings disgraced, by their profanation of them, than see thy sons disgraced by a legal censure upon them for so doing, which ought to have been inflicted, even to suspension and deprivation ab officio et beneficio—of their office and its emoluments." Those that allow and countenance their children in any evil way, and do not use their authority to restrain and punish them, do in effect honour them more than God, being more tender of their reputation than of his glory, and more desirous to humour them than to honour him. 3. They had all shared in the gains of the sacrilege. It is to be feared, that Eli himself, though he disliked and reprov'd the abuses they committed, yet did not forbear to eat of the roast meat they sacrilegiously got; (v. 15.) he was a fat heavy man; (ch. 4. 18.) and therefore it is charged upon the whole family, (though Hophni and Phinehas were principally guilty,) Ye make yourselves fat with the chiefest of all the offerings. God gave them sufficient to feed them, but that would not suffice, they made themselves fat, and served their lusts, with that which God was to be served with. See Hosea, 4. 8.

III. He declares the cutting off of the entail of the high priesthood from his family; (v. 30.) "The Lord God of Israel, who is jealous for his own honour and Israel's, says, and lets thee know it, that thy commission is revoked and superseded." I said, indeed, that thy house, and the house of thy father Ithamar, (for from that younger son of Aaron, Eli was descended,) should walk before me for ever. Upon what occasion the dignity of the high priesthood was transferred from the family of Eleazar to that of Ithamar, does not appear; but it seems it had been done, and Eli stood fair to have that honour perpetuated to his posterity; but observe, the promise carried its own condition along with it, They shall walk before me for ever; that is, They shall have the honour, provided they faithfully do the service; walking before God is the great condition of the covenant, Gen. 17. 1. Let them set me before their face, and I will set them before my face continually; (Ps. 41. 12.) otherwise not. But now the Lord says, Be it far from me: "Now that you cast me off, you can expect no other than that I should cast you off; you will not walk before me as you should" and therefore you shall not;" such wicked and abusive servants God will discard, and turn out of his service. Some think there is a further reach in this recall of the grant, and that it was not only to be fulfilled shortly in the deposing of the posterity of Eli, when Zadok, who descended from Eleazar, was put in Abiathar's room, but it was to have its complete accomplishment at length in the total abolishing of the Levitical priesthood by the priesthood of Christ.

IV. He gives a good reason for this revocation, taken from a settled and standing rule of God's government, according to which all must expect to be dealt with; (like that by which Cain was tried, Gen. 4. 7.) Them that honour me I will honour; and they that despise me, shall be lightly esteemed. Observe, in general, 1. That God is the Fountain of honour and dishonour; he can exalt the meanest, and put contempt upon the greatest. 2. As we deal with God, we must expect to be dealt with by him, and yet, more favourably than we deserve. See Ps. 13. 25, 26. Particularly, be it spoken, (1.) To the everlasting reputation of religion and serious godliness, that it gives honour to God, and puts honour upon men. By it we seek and serve the glory of God, and he will be behind-hand with none that do so, but here and hereafter will secure their glory. The way to be truly great, is to be truly good. If we humble and deny ourselves in any thing to honour God, and have a single eye to him in it, we may depend upon this promise, he will put the best honour upon us. See John, 12. 26. (2.) Be it spoken to the everlasting reproach of impiety and profaneness, that this does dishonour to God, (depises the greatest and best of beings, whom angels adore,) and will bring dishonour upon men, for they that do so shall be lightly esteemed; not only God will lightly esteem them, (that, perhaps, they will not regard, as they that honour him value his honour, of whom therefore it is said, I will honour them,) but they shall be lightly esteemed by all the world, the very honour they are proud of shall be laid in the dust; they shall see themselves despised by all mankind, their names a reproach; when they are gone, their memory shall rot, and when they rise again, it shall be to everlasting shame and contempt. The dishonour which their impotent malice puts upon God and his omnipotent justice, will return upon their own heads, Ps. 79. 12.

V. He foretells the particular judgments which should come upon his family, to its perpetual ignominy. A curse should be entailed upon his posterity, and a terrible curse it is, and shews how jealous God is in the matters of his worship, and how ill he takes it, when those who are obliged by their character and profession to preserve and advance the interests of his glory, are false to their trust, and betray them. If God's ministers be vicious and profane, how much sorer punishment will they be thought worthy of, here and for ever, than other sinners! Let such read the doom here passed on Eli's house, and tremble. It is threatened,

1. That their power should be broken; (v. 31.) I will cut off thine arm, and the arm of thy father's house; they should be stripped of all their authority, should be deposed, and have no influence upon the people as they had had: God would make them contemptible and base. See Mal. 2. 8, 9. The sons had abused their power to oppress the people and encroach upon their rights, and the father had not used his power, as he ought to have done, to restrain and punish them, and therefore it is justly threatened, that the arm should be cut off, which was not stretched out as it should have been.

2. That their lives should be shortened: he was himself an old man; but instead of using the wisdom, gravity, experience, and authority, of his age, for the service of God and the support of religion, he had suffered the infirmities of age to make him more cool and remiss in his duty, and therefore it is here threatened, that none of his posterity should live to be old; (v. 31, 32.) it is twice spoken; There shall not be an old man in thy house for ever; and again, (v. 33.) All the increase of thine house, from generation to generation, shall die in the flower of their age, when they are in the midst of the years of their service; so that though the family should not be extinct, yet it should never be considerable, nor should any of it come to be eminent in their day. Bishop Patrick relates it, out of some of the Jewish writers, that, long after this, there being a family in Jerusalem, none of which commonly lived above eighteen years, upon search, it was found that they descended to the houses of Eli, on which this sentence was passed.

3. That all their comforts should be embittered. (1.) The comfort they had in the sanctuary, in its wealth and prosperity; Thou shalt see an enemy in my habitation. This was fulfilled in the Philistines' invasions, and the mischiefs they did to Israel, by which the country was impoverished, (ch. 13. 19.) and, no doubt, the priests' incomes were thereby very much impaired. The captivity of the ark was such an act of hostility, committed upon God's habitation, as broke Eli's heart. As it is a blessing to a family to see peace upon Israel, (Ps. 128. 5, 6.) so the contrary is a sore judgment upon a family, especially a family of priests. (2.) The comfort of their children. "The man of thine, whom I shall not cut off by an untimely death, shall live to be a blot and burthen to the family, a scandal and vexation to his relations; he shall be to consume thine eyes, and grieve thine heart, either for his foolishness, or his sickness, or his wickedness, or his poverty." Grief for a dead child is great, but for a bad child often greater.

4. That their substance should be wasted, and they should be reduced to extreme poverty; (v. 36.) "He that is left alive in thy house shall have little joy of his life, for want of a livelihood; he shall come and crouch to the succeeding family for a subsistence." (1.) He shall beg for the smallest alms, a piece of silver, and the word signifies the least piece, and a morsel of bread. See how this answered the sin. Eli's sons must have the best pieces of flesh, but their sons will be glad of a morsel of bread. Note, Want is the just punishment of wantonness. Those who could not be content without dainties and varieties, are brought, they or their's, to want necessaries, and the Lord is righteous in it. (2.) He shall beg for the meanest office; Put me into somewhat belonging to the priesthood, as it is in the original, make me as one of the hired servants; the fittest place for a prodigal. Plenty and power are forfeited, when they are abused. They should not be able to pretend to any good preferment, not to any place at the altar, but should petition for some poor employment, be the work ever so hard, and the wages ever so small, so they might but get bread. This, it is probable, was fully accomplished, when Abiathar, who was of Eli's race, was deposed by Solomon for treason, and he and his turned out of office in the temple, (1 Kings, 2. 26, 27.) by which it is easy to think his posterity were reduced to the extremities here described.

5. That God would shortly begin to execute these judgments in the death of Hophni and Phinehas, the sad tidings of which Eli himself should live to hear; This shall be a sign to thee, v. 34. When thou hearest it, say, "Now the word of God begins to operate; here is one threatening fulfilled, from which I infer that all the rest will be fulfilled in their order." Hophni and Phinehas had many a time sinned together, and it is here foretold that they should die together both in one day. Bind these tares in a bundle for the fire. It was fulfilled, ch. 4. 11.

Lastly, In the midst of all these threatenings against the house of Eli, here is mercy promised to Israel; (v. 35.) I will raise me up a faithful priest. 1. This was fulfilled in Zadok, of the family of Eleazar, who came into Abiathar's place, in the beginning of Solomon's reign, and was faithful to his trust; and the high priests were of his posterity as long as the Levitical priesthood continued. Note, The wickedness of ministers, though it destroy themselves, yet it shall not destroy the ministry. How bad soever the officers are, the office shall continue always to the end of the world. If some falsify their trust, yet others shall be raised up that will be true to it. God's work shall never fall to the ground for want of hands to carry it on. The high priest is here said to walk before God's anointed, that is, David and his seed, because he wore the breast-plate of judgment, which he was to consult, not in common cases, but for the king, in the affairs of state. Note, Notwithstanding the degeneracy we see and lament in many families, God will secure to himself a succession: If some grow worse than their ancestors, others, to balance that, shall grow better. 2. It has its full accomplishment in the priesthood of Christ, that merciful and faithful High Priest, whom God raised up when the Levitical priesthood was thrown off, who in all things did his Father's mind, and for whom God will build a sure house, build it on a rock, so that the gates of hell cannot prevail against it.

CHAP. III.

In the foregoing chapter, we had Samuel a young priest, though by birth a Levite only, for he ministered before the Lord in a linen ephod; in this chapter we have him a young prophet, which was more; God, in an extraordinary manner, revealing himself to him, and in him reviving, if not commencing, prophecy in Israel. Here is, I. God's first manifestation of himself in an extraordinary manner to Samuel, v. 1. .10. II. The message he sent by him to Eli, v. 11. .14. III. The faithful delivery of that message to Eli, and his submission to the righteousness of God in it, v. 15. .18. IV. The establishment of Samuel to be a prophet in Israel, v. 19. .21.

1. AND the child Samuel ministered unto the LORD before Eli. And the word of the LORD was precious in those days; there was no open vision. 2. And it came to pass at that time, when Eli was laid down in his place, and his eyes began to wax dim, that he could not see; 3. And ere the lamp of God went out in the temple of the LORD, where the ark of God was, and Samuel was laid down to sleep; 4. That the LORD called Samuel; and he answered, Here am I. 5. And he ran unto Eli, and said, Here am I; for thou calledst me. And he said, I called not; lie down again. And he went and lay down. 6. And the LORD called yet again, Samuel. And Samuel arose and went to Eli, and said, Here am I; for thou didst call me. And he answered, I called not, my son; lie down again. 7. Now Samuel did not yet know the LORD, neither was the word of the LORD yet revealed unto him. 8. And the LORD called Samuel again the third time. And he arose, and went to Eli, and said, Here am I; for thou didst call me. And Eli perceived that the LORD had called the child. 9. Therefore Eli said unto Samuel, Go, lie down, and it shall be, if he call thee, that thou shalt say, Speak, LORD; for thy servant heareth. So Samuel went and lay down in his place. 10. And the LORD came, and stood, and called as at other times, Samuel, Samuel. Then Samuel answered, Speak; for thy servant heareth.

To make way for the account of God's revealing himself first to Samuel, we are here told, (v. 1.) 1. How industrious Samuel was in serving God, according as his place and capacity were; (v. 1.) The child Samuel, though but a child, ministered unto the Lord before Eli. It was an aggravation of the wickedness of Eli's sons, that the child Samuel shamed them. They rebelled against the Lord, but Samuel ministered to him; they slighted their father's admonitions, but Samuel was observant of them, he ministered before Eli, under his eye and direction. It was the praise of Samuel, that he was so far from being influenced by their bad example, that he did not in the least fall off, but improved and went on. And it was a preparative for the honours God intended him; he that was thus faithful in a little, was soon after intrusted with much more. Let those that are young be humble and diligent, and they will find that the surest way to preferment. Those are fittest to rule, that have learnt to obey. 2. How scarce a thing prophecy then was, which made the call of Samuel to be the greater surprise to himself, and the greater favour to Israel; The word of the Lord was precious in those days. Now and then a man of God was employed, as a messenger upon an extraordinary occasion; (as ch. 2. 27.) but there were no settled prophets, to whom the people might have recourse for counsel, nor from whom they might expect the discoveries of the divine will. And the rarity of prophecy made it the more precious in the account of all those that knew how to put a right value upon it. It was precious, for what there was, (it seems,) was private, there was no open vision, that is, there were none that were publicly known to have visions. Perhaps, the impiety and impurity that prevailed in the tabernacle, and, no doubt, corrupted the whole nation, had provoked God, as a token of his displeasure, to withdraw the Spirit of prophecy; till the decree was gone forth for the raising up of a more faithful priest, and then, as an earnest of that, this faithful prophet was raised up.

The manner of God's revealing himself to Samuel is here related very particularly, for it was uncommon.

I. Eli was retired; Samuel had waited on him to his bed, and the rest that attended the service of the sanctuary were gone, we may suppose, to their several apartments; (v. 2.) Eli was laid down in his place, he went to bed betimes, being unfit for business, and soon weary of it, and perhaps loving his ease too well. Probably, he kept his chamber much, which gave his sons the greater liberty. And he sought retirement the more, because his eyes began to wax dim, an affliction which came justly upon him for winking at his sons' faults.

II. Samuel was laid down to sleep, in some closet near to Eli's room, as his page of the back-stairs, ready within call, if the old man should want any thing in the night, perhaps to read to him, if he could not sleep. He chose to take Samuel into this office rather than any of his own family, because of the towards disposition he observed in him. When his own sons were a grief to him, his little servitor was his joy. Let those that are afflicted in their children, thank God, if they have any about them in whom they are comforted. Samuel was laid down ere the lamp of God went out; (v. 3.) it should seem he lay somewhere so near the holy place, that he went to bed with that light, before any of the lamps in the branches of the candlestick went out, (for the main lamp never went out), which, probably, was toward midnight; till that time, Samuel had been employing himself in some good exercise or other, reading and prayer, or perhaps cleaning or making ready the holy place; and then went softly to his bed. Then we may expect God's gracious visits, when we are constant and diligent in our duty.

III. God called him by name, and he took it for Eli's call, and ran to him, v. 4, 5. Samuel lay awake in his bed, his thoughts, no doubt, well employed, (as David's, Ps. 63. 6.) when the Lord called to him, Bishop Patrick thinks, out of the most holy place; and so the Chaldee paraphrase reads it, A voice was heard out of the temple of the Lord, but Eli, though it is likely he lay nearer, heard it not; yet, possibly, it might come some other way. Hereupon, we have an instance, 1. Of Samuel's industry, and readiness to wait on Eli; supposing it was he that called him, he hastened out of his warm bed, and ran to him, to see if he wanted any thing, and perhaps fearing he was not well. "Here am I," said he. A good example to servants, to come when they are called; and to the younger, not only to submit to the elder, but to be careful and tender of them. 2. Of his infirmity, and unacquaintedness with the visions of the Almighty, that he took that to be only Eli's call, which was really the call of God. Such mistakes as these we make oftener than we think of. God calls to us by his word, and we take it to be only the call of the minister, and answer it accordingly; calls to us by his providences, and we look only at the instruments. His voice cries, and it is but here and there a man of wisdom that understands it to be his voice. Eli assured him he did not call him, yet did not chide him for disturbing him with being over officious; did not call him a fool, and tell him he dreamed, but mildly bade him lie down again, he had nothing for him to do. If servants must be ready at their masters' call, masters also must be tender of their servants' comfort; that thy vain-servant, and thy maid-servant, may rest as well as thou. So Samuel went and lay down. God calls many by the ministry of the word, and they say, as Samuel did, "Here am I;" but, not looking at God, nor discerning his voice in the call, the impressions of it are soon lost; they lie down again, and their convictions come to nothing.

IV. The same call was repeated, and the same mistake made, a second and third time, v. 6. .9. 1. God continued to call the child: yet again, (v. 6.) and again the third time, v. 8. Note, The call which divine grace designs to make effectual, shall be repeated till it is so; that is, till we come at the call: for the purpose of God, according to which we are called, shall certainly stand. 2. Samuel was still ignorant that it was the Lord that called him; (v. 7.) Samuel did not yet know the Lord. He knew the written word, and was acquainted with the mind of God in that, but he did not yet apprehend the way in which God reveals himself to his servants the prophets, especially by a still small voice; this was altogether new and strange to him; perhaps he had been sooner aware of a divine revelation, had it come in a dream or a vision; but this was a way he had not only not known himself, but not heard of. Those that have the greatest knowledge of divine things, must remember the time when they were as babes, unskilful in the word of righteousness. When I was a child, I understood as a child. Yet let us not despise the day of small things; Thus did Samuel, (so the margin reads it,) before he knew the Lord, and before the word of the Lord was revealed unto him; thus he blundered one time after another, but afterward he understood better. The witness of the Spirit in the hearts of the faithful is often thus mistaken, by which means they lose the comfort of it; and the strivings of the Spirit with the consciences of sinners are likewise often mistaken, and so the benefit of their convictions is lost: God speaketh once, yea twice, but man perceiveth it not, Job, 33. 14. 3. Samuel went to Eli this second and third time, the voice perhaps resembling his, and the child being very near to him: and he tells him with great assurance, "Thou didst call me; (v. 6. .8.) it could be no one else." Samuel's disposition to come when he was called, though but by Eli, proving him dutiful and active, qualified him for the favour now to be shewed him; God chooses to employ such. But there was a special providence in it, that he should go thus often to Eli; for hereby, at length, Eli perceived that the Lord had called the child, v. 8. And, (1.) This would be a mortification to him, and he would apprehend it to be a step toward his family's being degraded, that, when God had something to say, he should choose to say it to the child Samuel, his servant that waited on him, and not to him. And it would humble him the more, when afterward he found it was a message to himself, and yet sent him by a child. He had reason to look upon this as a further token of God's displeasure. (2.) This would put him upon inquiring what it was that God said to Samuel, and would abundantly satisfy him of the truth and certainty of what should be delivered, and no room would be left for him to suggest that it was but a fancy of Samuel's; for, before the message was delivered, he himself perceived that God was about to speak to him, and yet must not know what it is, till he had it from Samuel himself. Thus even the infirmities and mistakes of those whom God employs, are over-ruled by infinite wisdom, and made serviceable to his purposes.

V. At length, Samuel was put into a posture to receive a message from God, not to be lodged with himself and go no further, but, that he might be a complete prophet, to be published and made an open vision. 1. Eli, perceiving that it was the voice of God that Samuel heard, gave him instructions what to say, v. 9. This was honestly done; that though it was a disgrace to him for God's call to pass him by, and be directed to Samuel, yet he put him in a way how to entertain it. Had he been envious of this honour done to Samuel, he would have done what he could to deprive him of it, and, since he did not perceive it himself, would have bidden him lie down and sleep, and never heed it, it was but a dream; but he was of a better spirit than to act so; he gave him the best advice he could, for the forwarding of his advancement. Thus the elder should, without grudging, do their utmost to assist and improve the younger that are rising up, though they see themselves likely to be darkened and eclipsed by them. Let us never be wanting to inform and instruct those that are coming after us, even such as will soon be preferred before us, John, 1. 30. The instruction Eli gave him, was, when God called the next time, to say, Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth. He must call himself God's servant, must desire to know the mind of God. "Speak, Lord, speak to me, speak now;" and he must prepare to hear, and promise to attend, thy servant heareth. Note, Then we may expect that God will speak to us, when we set ourselves to hearken to what he says, Ps. 85. 8. Hab. 2. 1. When we come to read the word of God, and to attend on the preaching of it, we should come thus disposed, submitting our souls to the commanding light and power of it; Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth. 2. It should seem that God spake the fourth time, in a way somewhat different from the other; though the call was, at other times, a call to him by name, yet now he stood and called; which intimates, that there was now some visible appearance of the divine glory to Samuel, a vision that stood before him, like that before Eliphaz, though he could not discern the form thereof, Job, 4. 16. This satisfied him that it was not Eli that called, for he now saw the voice that spake with him, as it is expressed, Rev. 1. 12. Now also the call was doubled, Samuel, Samuel, as if God delighted in the mention of his name; or to intimate that now he should be made to understand who spoke to him. God hath spoken once, twice have I heard this, Ps. 62. 11. It was an honour to him, that God was pleased to know him by name; (Exod. 33. 12.) and then his call was powerful and effectual, when he called him by name, and so brought it particularly to him, as Saul, Saul. Thus God called to Abraham by name, Gen. 22. 1. 3. Samuel said as he was taught, Speak, for thy servant heareth. Note, Good words should be put into children's mouths betimes, and apt expressions of pious and devout affections, by which they may be prepared for a better acquaintance with divine things, and trained up to a converse with them. Teach young people what they shall say, for they cannot order their speech by reason of darkness. Samuel did not now rise and run as before, when he thought Eli called, but lay still and listened. The more sedate and composed our spirits are, the better prepared they are for divine discoveries. Let all tumultuous thoughts and passions be kept under, and every thing be quiet and serene in the soul, and then we are fit to hear from God. All must be silent, when he speaks. But observe, Samuel left out one word; he did not say, Speak, Lord, but only, Speak, for thy servant heareth; perhaps, as Bishop Patrick suggests, out of uncertainty whether it was God that spoke to him or no. However, by this answer, Speak, for thy servant heareth, way was made for the message he was now to receive, and Samuel was brought acquainted with the words of God, and visions of the Almighty; and this, ere the lamp of God went out, (v. 3.) in the temple of the Lord, which some of the Jewish writers put a mystical sense upon: before the fall of Eli, and the eclipsing of the Urim and Thummim for some time thereby, God called Samuel, and made him an oracle; whence they have an observation among their doctors, That the sun riseth, and the sun goeth down; (Eccl. 1. 5.) that is, say they, Ere God maketh the sun of one righteous man to set, he makes the sun of another righteous man to rise. Smith, ex Kimchi.

11. And the LORD said to Samuel, Behold, I will do a thing in Israel, at which both the ears of every one that heareth it shall tingle. 12. In that day I will perform against Eli all things which I have spoken concerning his house: when I begin, I will also make an end. 13. For I have told him that I will judge his house for ever for the iniquity which he knoweth; because his sons made themselves vile, and he restrained them not. 14. And therefore I have sworn unto the house of Eli, that the iniquity of Eli's house shall not be purged with sacrifice nor offering for ever. 15. And Samuel lay until the morning, and opened the doors of the house of the LORD. And Samuel feared to shew Eli the vision. 16. Then Eli called Samuel, and said, Samuel, my son. And he answered, Here am I. 17. And he said, What is the thing that the LORD hath said unto thee? I pray thee hide it not from me: God do so to thee, and more also, if thou hide any thing from me of all the things that he said unto thee. 18. And Samuel told him every whit, and hid nothing from him. And he said, It is the LORD: let him do what seemeth him good.

Here is,

I. The message which, after all this introduction, God delivered to Samuel concerning Eli's house. God did not come to him now, to tell him how great a man he should be in his day, what a figure he should make, and what a blessing he should be in Israel. Young people have commonly a great curiosity to be told their fortune, but God came to Samuel, not to gratify his curiosity, but to employ him in his service, and send him on an errand to another person, which was much better; and yet the matter of this first message, which, no doubt, made a very great impression upon him, might be of good use to him afterward, when his own sons proved, though not so bad as Eli's, yet not so good as they should have been, ch. 8. 3.

The message is short, not near so long as that which the man of God brought; (ch. 2. 27.) for Samuel being a child, it could not be expected he should remember a long message, and God considered his frame. The memories of children must not be overcharged, no not with divine things. But it is a sad message, a message of wrath, to ratify the message in the former chapter, and to build on the sentence there pronounced, because perhaps Eli did not give so much regard to that as he ought to have done. Divine threatenings, the less they are heeded, the surer they will come, and the heavier they will fall. Reference is here had to what was there said concerning both the sin and the punishment.

1. Concerning the sin, it is the iniquity that he knoweth, v. 13. The man of God told him of it, and many a time his own conscience had told him of it. Oh what a great deal of guilt and corruption is there in us, concerning which we may say, "It is the iniquity which our own heart knoweth; we are conscious to ourselves of it! In short, the iniquity was this, his sons made themselves vile, and he restrained them not. Or, as it is in the Hebrew, he frowned not upon them. If he did shew his dislike of their wicked courses, yet not to that degree that he ought to have done; he did reprove them, but he did not punish them, for the mischief they did, nor deprive them of their power to do mischief, which as a father, high priest, and judge, he might have done. Note, (1.) Sinners do by their own wickedness make themselves vile. They debauch themselves, for every man is tempted, when he is drawn aside of his own lusts; (Jam. 1. 14.) and thereby they debase themselves, and make themselves not only mean, but odious to the holy God, and holy men and angels. Sin is a vile thing, and vilifies men more than any thing, Ps. 15. 4. Eli's sons made light of God, and made his offerings vile in the people's eyes; but the shame returned into their own bosom, they made themselves vile. (2.) Those that do not restrain the sins of others, when it is in the power of their hand to do it, make themselves partakers of the guilt, and will be charged as accessaries. Those in authority will have a great deal to answer for, if they make not the sword they bear a terror to evil workers.

2. Concerning the punishment, it is that which I have spoken concerning his house; (v. 12. and v. 13.) I have told him, that I will judge his house for ever; that is, that a curse should be entailed upon his family from generation to generation. The particulars of this curse we had before; they are not here repeated, but it is added,

(1.) That when that sentence began to be executed, it would be very dreadful and amazing to all Israel; (v. 11.) Both the ears of every one that hears it shall tingle. Every Israelite would be struck with terror and astonishment, to hear of the slaying of Eli's sons, the breaking of Eli's neck, and the dispersion of Eli's family. Lord, how terrible art thou in thy judgments! If this be done in a green tree, what shall be done in the dry? Note, God's judgments upon others should affect us with a holy fear, Ps. 119. 120.

(2.) That these direful first-fruits of the execution would be certain earnest of the progress and full accomplishment of it. "When I begin, I will proceed, and make an end of all I have threatened," v. 12. It is intimated that it might, possibly, be some time before he would begin, but let them not call that forbearance an acquittance, nor that reprieve a pardon; for when at length he does begin, he will make thorough work of it, and though he stay long, he will strike home.

(3.) That no room should be left for hope that this sentence might be reversed, and the execution stayed or mitigated, v. 14. [1.] God would not revoke the sentence, for he backed it with an oath; I have sworn to the house of Eli; and God will not go back from what he has sworn, either in mercy or judgment. [2.] He would never come to a composition for the forfeiture. The iniquity of Eli's house shall not be purged with sacrifice nor offering for ever. No atonement shall be made for the sin, nor any abatement of the punishment. This was the imperfection of the legal sacrifices, that there were iniquities which they did not reach, which they would not purge; but the blood of Christ cleanses from sin, and secures all those that by faith are interested in it, from that eternal death which is the wages of sin.

II. The delivery of this message to Eli. Observe,

1. Samuel's modest concealment of it, v. 15. (1.) He lay till the morning, and we may well suppose he lay awake pondering on what he had heard, repeating it to himself, and considering what use he must make of it. After we have received the spiritual food of God's word, it is good to compose ourselves, and give it time to digest. (2.) He opened the doors of the house of the Lord, in the morning, as he used to do, being up first in the tabernacle. That he should do so at other times, was an instance of extraordinary towardliness in a child, but that he should do so this morning, was an instance of great humility. God had highly honoured him above all the children of his people, yet he was not proud of the honour, nor puffed up with it; did not think himself too great and too good to be employed in these mean and servile offices, but, as cheerfully as ever, went and opened the doors of the tabernacle. Note, Those whom God manifests himself to, he makes and keeps low in their own eyes, and willing to stoop to any thing by which they may be serviceable to his glory, though but as door-keepers in his house. One would have expected that Samuel should have been so full of his vision, as to forget his ordinary service; that he should have gone among his companions, as one in ecstasy, to tell them what converse he had had with God this night; but he modestly keeps it to himself, tells the vision to no man, but silently goes on in his business. Our secret communion with God is not to be proclaimed upon the house-tops. (3.) He feared to shew Eli the vision. If he was afraid that Eli would be angry with him, and chide him, it will give us cause to suspect that Eli used to be as severe with this towardsly child, as he was indulgent to his own wicked sons, and that will bear hard upon him. But we will suppose it was rather because he was afraid to grieve and trouble the good old man, that he was so shy. If he had run immediately with the tidings to Eli, it would have looked as if he desired the woeful day, and hoped to build his own family upon the ruin of Eli's, therefore it became him not to be forward to do it; no good man can take pleasure in bringing evil tidings, especially not Samuel to Eli, the pupil to the tutor whom he loves and honours.

2. Eli's careful inquiry into it; (v. 16, 17.) as soon as ever he heard Samuel stirring, he called for him, probably, to his bedside; and, having perceived before that God had spoken to him, he obliged him, not only by importunity, I pray thee, hide it not from me, but, finding him timorous and backward, by an adjuration likewise, God do so to thee, and more also, if thou hide any thing from me! He had reason enough to fear that the message prophesied no good concerning him, but evil; and yet, because it was a message from God, he could not contentedly be ignorant of it. A good man desires to be acquainted with all the will of God, whether it make for him, or against him. His adjuration, God do so to thee, if thou hide any thing from me, may intimate the fearful doom of unfaithful watchmen; if they warn not sinners, they bring upon themselves that wrath and curse, which they should have denounced, in God's name, against those that go on still in their trespasses.

3. Samuel's faithful delivery of his message at last; (v. 18.) He told him every whit; when he saw that he must tell him, he never minced the matter, nor offered to make it better than it was, to blunt that which was sharp, or to gild the bitter pill, but delivered the message as plainly and fully as he received it, not shunning to declare the whole counsel of God. Christ's ministers must deal thus faithfully.

4. Eli's pious acquiescence in it: he did not question Samuel's integrity, was not cross with him, nor had he any thing to object against the equity of the sentence; he did not complain of the punishment, as Cain did, that it was greater than either he deserved or could bear, but patiently submitted, and accepted the punishment of his iniquity; It is the Lord, let him do what seemeth him good. He understood the sentence to intend only a temporal punishment, and the entail of disgrace and poverty upon his posterity, and not a final separation of them from the favour of God, and therefore he cheerfully submitted; did not repine, because he knew the demerits of his family; nor did he now intercede for the reversing of the sentence, because God had ratified it with a solemn oath, of which he would not repent; he therefore composes himself into a humble resignation to God's will, as Aaron, in a case not much unlike; (Lev. 10. 3.) He held his peace. In a few words, (1.) He lays down this satisfying truth, "It is the Lord; it is he that pronounces the judgment, from whose bar there lies no appeal, and against whose sentence there lies no exception. It is he that will execute the judgment, whose power cannot be resisted, or justice arraigned, or sovereignty contested. It is the Lord, who will thus sanctify and glorify himself, and it is highly fit he should. It is the Lord, with whom there is no unrighteousness, who never did nor ever will do any wrong to any of his creatures, nor exact more than their iniquity deserves." (2.) He infers from it this satisfying conclusion, "Let him do what seemeth him good; I have nothing to say against his proceedings; he is righteous in all his ways, and holy in all his works, and therefore his will be done. I will bear the indignation of the Lord, because I have sinned against him." Thus we ought to quiet ourselves under God's rebukes, and never to strive with our Maker.

19. And Samuel grew, and the LORD was with him, and did let none of his words fall to the ground. 20. And all Israel from Dan even to Beer-sheba knew that Samuel was established to be a prophet of the LORD. 21. And the LORD appeared again in Shiloh: for the LORD revealed himself to Samuel in Shiloh by the word of the LORD.

Samuel being thus brought acquainted with the visions of God, we have here an account of the further honour done him as a prophet.

1. God did him honour. Having begun to favour him, he carried on and crowned his own work in him; (v. 19.) Samuel grew, for the Lord was with him. All our increase in wisdom and grace is owing to the presence of God with us; it is all in all to our growth. God honoured Samuel, (1.) By further manifestations of himself to him. Samuel had faithfully delivered the messages he was intrusted with, and therefore God employed him again in his service; (v. 21.) The Lord revealed himself again to Samuel in Shiloh. Note, God will graciously repeat his visits to those that receive them aright. (2.) By fulfilling what he spake by him; (v. 19.) God did let none of his words fall to the ground: whatever Samuel said, as a prophet, it proved true, and was accomplished in its season. Probably, there were some remarkable instances of the truth of Samuel's predictions, that happened soon after, which confirmed those that were afterward to be fulfilled, and gave general satisfaction as to his mission. God will confirm the word of his servants, and perform the counsel of his messengers, (Isa. 44. 26.) and will do what he hath said.

2. Israel did him honour. They all knew, and owned, that Samuel was established to be a prophet, v. 20. (1.) He grew famous; all that came up to Shiloh to worship, took notice of him, and admired him, and talked of him when they came home. Early piety will be the greatest honour of young people, and bring them, as much as any thing, and as soon, into reputation. Them that honour God he will honour. (2.) He grew useful and very serviceable to his generation. He that began betimes to be good, soon came to do good. His established commission from God, and established reputation with the people, gave him a great opportunity of shining as a light in Israel. When old Eli was rejected, young Samuel was established; for God will never leave himself without a witness, nor his church without a guide.

CHAP. IV.

The predictions in the foregoing chapters, concerning the ruin of Eli's house here begin to be fulfilled; how long after does not appear; but it was not long. Such sinners God often makes quick work with. Here is, I. The disgrace and loss Israel sustained in an encounter with the Philistines, v. 1, 2. II. Their foolish project to fortify themselves, by bringing the ark of God into their camp upon the shoulders of Hophni and Phinehas, (v. 3, 4.) which made them secure, (v. 5.) and struck a fear into the Philistines, but such a fear as roused them, v. 6, 9. III. The fatal consequences of it; Israel was beaten, and the ark taken prisoner, v. 10, 11. IV. The tidings of this brought to Shiloh, and the sad reception of those tidings. 1. The city was put into confusion, v. 12, 13. 2. Eli fainted away, fell, and broke his neck, v. 14, 18. 3. His daughter-in-law fell in labour upon it, bore a son, but died immediately, v. 19, 22. These were the things which would make the ears of those that heard them to tingle.

1. AND the word of Samuel came to all Israel. Now Israel went out against the Philistines to battle, and pitched beside Eben-ezer: and the Philistines pitched in Aphek. 2. And the Philistines put themselves in array against Israel: and when they joined battle, Israel was smitten before the Philistines: and they slew of the army in the field about four thousand men. 3. And when the people were come into the camp, the elders of Israel said, Wherefore hath the LORD smitten us to-day before the Philistines? Let us fetch the ark of the covenant of the LORD out of Shiloh unto us, that, when it cometh among us, it may save us out of the hand of our enemies. 4. So the people sent to Shiloh, that they might bring from thence the ark of the covenant of the LORD of hosts, which dwelleth between the cherubims: and the two sons of Eli. Hophni and Phinehas, were there with the ark of the covenant of God. 5. And when the ark of the covenant of the Lord came into the camp, all Israel shouted with a great shout, so that the earth rang again. 6. And when the Philistines heard the noise of the shout, they said, What meaneth the noise of this great shout in the camp of the Hebrews? And they understood that the ark of the Lord was come into the camp. 7. And the Philistines were afraid, for they said, God is come into the camp. And they said, Woe unto us! for there hath not been such a thing hertofore. 8. Woe unto us! who shall deliver us out of the hand of these mighty Gods? these are the Gods that smote the Egyptians with all the plagues in the wilderness. 9. Be strong, and quit yourselves like men, O ye Philistines, that ye be not servants unto the Hebrews, as they have been to you: quit yourselves like men, and fight.

The first words, which relate to Samuel, that his word came to all Israel, seem not to have any reference to the following story, as if it was by any direction of his, that the Israelites went out against the Philistines: had they consulted him, though but newly initiated as a prophet, it might have stood them in more stead than the ark did; but perhaps the princes of Israel despised his youth, and would not have recourse to him as an oracle, and he did not as yet interpose in public affairs; nor do we find any mention of his name from henceforward, till some years after; (ch. 7. 3.) only his word came to all Israel; that is, people from all parts, that were piously disposed, had recourse to him as a prophet, and advised with him. Perhaps it is meant of his prophecy against the house of Eli, that was generally known and talked of, and all that were serious and observing, compared the events here related, when they came to pass, with that prophecy, and saw it accomplished in them.

Here is,

I. A war entered into with the Philistines, v. 1. It was an attempt to throw off the yoke of their oppression, and would have succeeded better, if they had first repented and reformed, and so begun their work at the right end. It is computed that this was about the middle of the forty years' dominion that the Philistines had over Israel, (Judg. 13. 1.) and soon after the death of Samson; so Bishop Patrick, who thinks the slaughter he made at his death might encourage this attempt: but Dr. Lightfoot reckons it forty years after Samson's death, for so long Eli judged, v. 18.

II. The defeat of Israel in that war, v. 2. Israel, who were the aggressors, were smitten, and had four thousand men killed upon the spot. God had promised that one of them should chase a thousand; but now it was quite contrary, Israel is smitten before the Philistines. Sin, the accursed thing, was in the camp, and gave their enemies all the advantage against them they could wish for.

III. The measures they concerted for another engagement; a council of war was called, and, instead of resolving to fast and pray, and amend their lives, so ill taught were they, (and no wonder, when they had such teachers,) that, 1. They quarrelled with God for appearing against them; (v. 2.) Wherefore has the Lord smitten us? If they meant this as an inquiry into the cause of God's displeasure, they needed not go far to find that out; it was plain enough Israel had sinned, though they were not willing to see it and own it; but it rather seems that they expostulate boldly with God about it, are displeased at what God had done, and dispute it with him. They own the hand of God in their trouble, (so far was right,) "It is the Lord that has smitten us:"

but, instead of submitting to it, they quarrel with it, and speak as those that were angry at him and his providence, and not aware of any just provocation they had given him. "Wherefore shall we, that are Israelites, be smitten before the Philistines? How absurd and unjust is it!" Note, The foolishness of man perverts his way, and then his heart frets against the Lord, (Prov. 19. 3.) and finds fault with him. 2. They imagined that they could oblige him to appear for them the next time, by bringing the ark into their camp. The elders of Israel were so ignorant and foolish as to propose it, (v. 3.) and the people soon put it in execution; (v. 4.) they sent to Shiloh for the ark, and Eli had not courage enough to oppose it, but sent his ungodly sons, Hophni and Phinehas, along with it, at least, permitted them to go, though he knew, that, wherever they went, the curse of God went along with them. Now see here, (1.) The profound veneration they had for the ark. "Oh send for that, and that will do wonders for us." The ark was, by institution, a visible token of God's presence. God had said that he would dwell between the cherubims, which were over the ark, and were carried along with it; now they thought, that, by paying a great respect to this sacred chest, they should prove themselves to be Israelites indeed, and effectually engage God Almighty to appear in their favour. Note, It is common for those that have estranged themselves from the vitals of religion, to discover a great fondness for the ritua's and external observance of it; for those that even deny the power of godliness, not only to have, but to have in admiration, the form of it. The temple of the Lord is cried up, and the ark of the Lord stickled for, with a great deal of seeming zeal, by multitudes that have no regard at all for the Lord of the temple, and the God of the ark; as if a fiery concern for the name of Christianity would atone for a profane contempt of the thing. And yet indeed they did but make an idol of the ark, and looked upon it to be as much an image of the God of Israel, as those which the heathen worshipped were of their gods. To worship the true God, and not to worship him as God, is, in effect, not to worship him at all. (2.) Their egregious folly in thinking that if they had that in their camp it would certainly save them out of the hand of their enemies, and bring victory back to their side. For, [1.] When the ark set forward, Moses prayed, Rise up, Lord, and let thine enemies be scattered; well knowing that it was not the ark moving with them, but God appearing for them, that must give them success; and here were no proper means used to engage God to favour them with his presence; what good then would the ark do them, the shell without the kernel? [2.] They were so far from having God's leave to remove his ark, that he had plainly enough intimated to them, in his law, that when they were settled in Canaan, his ark should be settled in the place that he should choose, (Deut. 12. 5, 11.) and that they must come to it, and not it to them. How then could they expect any advantage by it, when they had not a just and legal possession of it, nor any warrant to stir it from its place? Instead of honouring God by what they did, they really affronted him. Nay, [3.] If there had been nothing else to invalidate their expectations from the ark, how could they expect it should bring a blessing, when Hophni and Phinehas were the men that brought it? It would have given too much countenance to their villany, if the ark had done any kindness to Israel, while it was in the hands of those graceless priests.

IV. The great joy that was in the camp of Israel, when the ark was brought into it; (v. 5.) they shouted, so that the earth rang again. Now they thought themselves sure of victory, and therefore gave a triumphant shout before the battle, as if the day was without fail their own, intending by this mighty shout to animate themselves and their own forces, and to intimidate their adversaries. Note, Carnal people triumph much in the external privileges and performances of religion, and build much upon them, as if those would infallibly save them; and as if the ark, God's throne in the camp, would bring them to heaven, though the world and the flesh be upon the throne in the heart.

V. The consternation which the bringing of the ark into the camp of Israel put the Philistines into. The two armies lay so near encamped, that the Philistines heard the shout the Israelites gave on this great occasion. They soon understood what it was they triumphed in, (v. 6.) and were afraid of the consequences. For, 1. It had never been done before in their days. God is come into their camp, and therefore woe unto us; (v. 7.) and again, woe unto us, v. 8. The name of the God of Israel was formidable even to those that worshipped other gods, and some apprehensions even the infidels had of the danger of contending with him. Natural conscience suggests this, that those are in a woeful condition who have God against them; yet see what gross notions they had of the divine presence, as if the God of Israel was not as much in the camp before the ark came thither; which may very well be excused in them, since the notions the Israelites themselves had of that presence were no better. "Oh," say they, "this is a new design upon us, more frightful than all their stratagems, for there has not been such a thing heretofore; this was the most effectual course they could take to dispirit our men, and weaken their hands." 2. When it had been done in the days of old, it had wrought wonders; (v. 8.) These are the gods that smote the Egyptians with all the plagues in the wilderness. Here they were as much out in their history as in their divinity; the plagues of Egypt were inflicted before the ark was made, and before Israel came into the wilderness; but some confused traditions they had of wonders wrought by or for Israel, when this ark was carried before them, which they attributed, not to Jehovah, but to the ark. Now, say they, Who shall deliver us out of the hand of these mighty gods? Taking the ark for God, as well they might, when the Israelites themselves idolized it. Yet it should seem they scarcely believed themselves, when they spoke thus formidably of these mighty gods, but only bantered; for, instead of retreating, or proposing conditions of peace, which they would have done, had they been really convinced of the power of Israel's God, they stirred up one another to fight so much the more stoutly; this surprising difficulty did but sharpen their resolution; (v. 9.) Be strong, and quit yourselves like men; the commanders inspiring bold and generous thoughts into the minds of their soldiers, when they bid them remember how they had lorded it over Israel, and what an intolerable grief and shame it would be, if they flinched now, and suffered Israel to lord it over them.

10. And the Philistines fought, and Israel was smitten, and they fled every man into his tent: and there was a very great slaughter; for there fell of Israel thirty thousand footmen. 11. And the ark of God was taken; and the two sons of Eli, Hophni and Phinehas, were slain.

Here is a short account of the issue of this battle.

I. Israel was smitten, the army dispersed, and totally routed, not retiring into the camp, as before, (v. 2.) when they hoped to rally again, but returning to their tents, every man shifting for his own safety, and making the best of his way home, despairing to make head any more; and thirty thousand were slain in the field of battle, v. 10. Israel was put to the worse, 1. Though they had the better cause, were the people of God, and the Philistines were uncircumcised; they stood up in necessary defence of their just rights and liberties against invaders, and yet they failed of success, for their Rock had sold them. A good cause often suffers for the sake of the bad men that undertake it. 2. Though they had the greater confidence, and put a better heart on it. They shouted while the Philistines trembled, and yet, when God pleased so to order it, the Philistines' terrors were turned into triumphs, and Israel's shouts into lamentations. 3. Though they had the ark of God with them. External privileges will secure none that abuse them, and do not live up to them. The ark in the camp will add nothing to its strength, when there is an Achan in it.

II. The ark itself was taken by the Philistines; and Hophni and Phinehas, who, it is likely, kept close to it, and, when it was in danger, ventured far in the defence of it, because by it they got their living, were both slain, v. 11. To this sad event the psalmist refers; (Ps. 78. 61, 61.) He delivered his strength into captivity, and his glory into the enemy's hands. Their priests fell by the sword. 1. The slaughter of the priests, considering their bad character, was no great loss to Israel, but it was a dreadful judgment upon the house of Eli. The word which God had spoken was fulfilled in it; (ch. 2. 34.) This shall be a sign unto thee, an earnest of the judgments threatened, thy two sons shall die both in one day, and so shall all the increase of thy house die in the flower of their age, v. 33. If Eli had done his duty, and put them, as polluted, from the priesthood, (Neh. 7. 61.) they might have lived, though in disgrace; but now God takes the work into his own hands, and chases them out of the world by the sword of the uncircumcised; The Lord is known by those judgments which he executeth. It is true the sword devours one as well as another, but these were waited for of the sword, marked for vengeance. They were out of their place; what had they to do in the camp? When men leave the way of their duty, they shut themselves out of God's protection. But this was not all; they had betrayed the ark, by bringing it into danger, without a warrant from God, and this filled the measure of their iniquities. But, 2. The taking of the ark was a very great judgment upon Israel, and a certain token of God's hot displeasure against them. Now they are made to see their folly in trusting to their external privileges, when they had, by their wickedness, forfeited them, and fancying that the ark would save them, when God was departed from them. Now they are made to reflect, with the utmost regret, upon their own rashness and presumption, in bringing the ark into the camp, and so exposing it; and wish a thousand times they had left it where God had fixed it. Now they are convinced that God will not be prescribed to by vain and foolish men, and that though he has bound us to his ark, he has not bound himself to it, but will rather deliver it into the hands of his sworn enemies, than suffer it to be profaned by his false friends, and countenance their superstition. Let none think to shelter themselves from the wrath of God, under the cloak of a visible profession, for there will be those cast into utter darkness that have eaten and drunken in Christ's presence.

12. And there ran a man of Benjamin out of the army, and came to Shiloh the same day with his clothes rent, and with earth upon his head. 13. And when he came, lo, Eli sat upon a seat by the wayside, watching: for his heart trembled for the ark of God. And when the man came into the city, and told it, all the city cried out. 14. And when Eli heard the noise of the crying, he said, What meaneth the noise of this tumult? And the man came in hastily, and told Eli. 15. Now Eli was ninety and eight years old; and his eyes were dim, that he could not see. 16. And the man said unto Eli, I am he that came out of the army, and I fled to-day out of the army. And he said, What is there done, my son? 17. And the messenger answered and said, Israel is fled before the Philistines, and there hath been also a great slaughter among the people, and thy two sons also, Hophni and Phinehas, are dead, and the ark of God is taken. 18. And it came to pass, when he made mention of the ark of God, that he fell from off the seat backward by the side of the gate, and his neck brake, and he died: for he was an old man, and heavy. And he had judged Israel forty years.

Tidings are here brought to Shiloh of the fatal issue of their battle with the Philistines. Ill news flies fast. This soon spread through all Israel, every man that fled to his tent brought it, with too plain a proof of it, to his neighbours: but no place was so nearly concerned as Shiloh, thither therefore an express posted away immediately; it was a man of Benjamin, the Jews fancy it was Saul; he rent his clothes, and put earth upon his head; by these signs to proclaim to all that saw him as he ran, the sorrowful news, and to shew how much himself was affected with it, v. 12. He went straight to Shiloh with it; and here we are told,

1. How the city received it. Eli sat in the gate, (v. 13, 18.) but the messenger was loath to tell him first, and therefore passed him by, and told it in the city, with all the aggravating circumstances; and now both the ears of every one that heard it tingled, as was foretold; (ch. 3. 11.) their hearts trembled, and every face gathered blackness. All the city cried out, (v. 13.) and well they might; for, besides that this was a calamity to all Israel, it was a particular loss to Shiloh, and the ruin of that place. For though the ark was soon rescued out of the hands of the Philistines, yet it never returned to Shiloh again; their candlestick was removed out of its place, because they had left their first love, and their city dwindled, and sunk, and came to nothing. Now God forsook the tabernacle of Shiloh, they having driven him from them; and the tribe of Ephraim, which had for three hundred and forty years been blessed with the presence of the ark in it, lost the honour, (Ps. 78. 60, 67.) and, some time after, it was transferred to the tribe of Judah, the mount Zion which he loved, as it follows there, (v. 68.) because the men of Shiloh knew not the day of their visitation. This abandoning of Shiloh, Jerusalem is long after reminded of, and bid to take warning by; (Jer. 7. 12.) Go see what I did to Shiloh. From this day, this fatal day, let the desolations of Shiloh be dated; they had therefore reason enough to cry out, when they heard that the ark was taken.

II. What a fatal blow it was to old Eli. Let us see,

1. With what fear he expected the tidings. Though old, and blind, and heavy, yet he could not keep his chamber, when he was sensible the glory of Israel lay at stake, but placed himself by the way-side, to receive the first intelligence; for his heart trembled for the ark of God, v. 13. His careful thoughts represented to him, What a dishonour it would be to God, and what an irreparable loss to Israel, if the ark fall into the Philistines' hands; with what profane triumphs it would be told in Gath, and published in the streets of Ashkelon. He also apprehends what imminent danger there was of it; Israel had forfeited the ark, (his own sons especially,) and the Philistines would aim at it; and now the threatening comes to his mind, that he should see an enemy in God's habitation; (ch. 2. 32.) and perhaps his own heart reproached him for not using his authority, to prevent the carrying of the ark into the camp; all these things made him tremble. Note, All good men lay the interest of God's church nearer their hearts, than any secular interest or concern of their own, and cannot but be in pain and fear for them, if, at any time, they are in peril. How can we be easy, if the ark be not safe?

2. With what grief he received the tidings. Though he could not see, he could hear the tumult and crying of the city, and perceived it to be the voice of lamentation, and mourning, and woe; like a careful magistrate, he asks, What means the noise of this tumult? v. 14. He is told, there is an express come from the army, who relates the story to him very distinctly, and with great confidence, having himself been an eye witness of it, v. 16, 17. The account of the defeat of the army, and the slaughter of a great number of the soldiers, was very grievous to him as a judge; the tidings of the death of his two sons, of whom he had been so indulgent, and who, he had reason to fear, died impenitent, touched him in a tender part, as a father; yet it was not for these that his heart trembled, there is a greater concern upon his spirit, which swallows up the lesser; he does not interrupt the narrative with any passionate lamentations for his sons, like David for Absalom, but waits for the end of the story, not doubting but that the messenger, being an Israelite, would, without being asked, say something of the ark; and if he could but have said, "Yet the ark of God is safe, and we are bringing that home," his joy for that would have overcome his grief for all the other disasters, and have made him easy; but when the messenger concludes his story with, The ark of God is taken, he is struck to the heart, his spirits fail, and, it should seem, he swooned away, fell off his seat, and, partly with the fainting, and partly with the fall, he died immediately, and never spoke a word more. His heart was broken first, and then his neck. So fell the high priest and judge of Israel, so fell his heavy head, when he had lived within two of a hundred years; so fell the crown from his head, when he had judged Israel about forty years: thus did his sun set under a cloud, thus were the folly and wickedness of those sons of his, whom he had indulged, his ruin at last. Thus does God sometimes set marks of his displeasure upon good men in this life, who have miscondacted themselves, that others may hear, and fear, and take warning. A man may die miserably, and yet not die eternally; may come to an untimely end, and yet the end be peace. Dr. Lightfoot observes, that Eli died the death of an unredeemed ass, whose neck was to be broken, Exod. 13. 13. Here we must observe, to Eli's praise, that it was the loss of the ark that was his death, not the slaughter of his sons. He does, in effect, say, "Let me fall with the ark;" for what pious Israelite can live with any comfort when God's ordinances are removed? Farewell all in this world, even life itself, if the ark be gone.

19. And his daughter-in-law, Phinehas' wife, was with child, near to be delivered: and when she heard the tidings that the ark of God was taken, and that her father-in-law and her husband were dead, she bowed herself and travailed; for her pains came upon her. 20. And about the time of her death, the women that stood by her said unto her, Fear not; for thou hast born a son. But she answered not, neither did she regard it. 21. And she named the child I-chabod, saying, The glory is departed from Israel: because the ark of God was taken, and because of her father-in-law and her husband. 22. And she said, The glory is departed from Israel: for the ark of God is taken.

We have here another melancholy story, that carries on the desolations of Eli's house, and the sorrowful feeling which the tidings of the ark's captivity excited. It is concerning the wife of Phinehas, one of those ungracious sons of Eli, that had brought all this mischief on Israel. It cost her her life, though young, as well as her father-in-law, that was old; for many a green head, as well as many a hoary head, has been brought by sorrow to the grave: it worketh death.

By what is here related of her, it appears,

I. That she was a woman of a very tender spirit. Providence so ordered it, that, just at this time, she was near her time; and our Saviour hath said, Woe to them that are with child, or give suck, in such days as these, Matth. 24. 19. So little joy will there then be in the birth, even of a man child, that it will be said, Blessed are the wombs that bare not, Luke, 23. 29. The amazing news coming at this unhappy juncture, it put her into labour, as great frights or other strong passions sometimes do. When she heard of the death of her father-in-law, whom she revered, and her husband, whom, bad as he was, she loved, but especially of the loss of the ark, she travailed, for her pains came thick upon her; (v. 19.) and the tidings so seized her spirits, at a time when they needed all possible supports, that though she had strength to bear the child, she, soon after, fainted and died away, being very willing to let life go, when she had lost the greatest comforts of her life. Those who are drawing near to that useful hour, have need to treasure up for themselves comforts from the covenant of grace, to balance, not only the usual sorrows, but any thing extraordinary that may add to the grief which they do not foresee. Faith, at such a time, will keep from fainting, Ps. 27. 13.

II. That she was a woman of a very gracious spirit, though matched to a wicked husband. Her concern for the death of her husband, and father-in-law, was an evidence of her natural affection; but her much greater concern for the loss of the ark, was an evidence of her pious and devout affection to God and sacred things. The former helped to hasten her travail, but it appears, by her dying words, that the latter lay nearer her heart; (v. 22.) She said, The glory is departed from Israel; not lamenting so much the sinking of that particular family to which she was related, as the general calamity of Israel in the captivity of the ark. This, this was it, that was her grief, that was her death.

1. This made her regardless of her child. The women that attended her, who, it is likely, were some of the first rank in the city, encouraged her, and, thinking that her concern was mostly about the issue of her pains, when the child was born, said unto her, Fear not, now the worst is past, for thou hast born a son, (and perhaps it was her first-born,) but she answered not, wither did she regard it. The sorrows of her travail, if she had had no other, would have been forgotten, for joy that a man-child was born into the world, John, 16. 21. But what is that joy, (1.) To one that feels herself dying? No joy, but that which is spiritual and divine, will stand us in any stead then; death is too serious a thing to admit the relish of any earthly joy, it is all flat and sapless then. (2.) What is it to one that is lamenting the loss of the ark? Small comfort could she have of a child born in Israel, in Shiloh, when the ark is gone, and is a prisoner in the land of the Philistines. What pleasure can we take in our creature-comforts and enjoyments, if we want God's word and ordinances, especially if we want the comfort of his gracious presence, and the light of his countenance? As vinegar upon nitre, so is he that sings songs to such heavy hearts.

2. This made her give her child a name which should perpetuate the remembrance of the calamity, and her sense of it. She has nothing to say to the child, only it being her province, now that her husband was dead, to name the child, she orders them to call it I-chabod, that is, Where is the glory? Or, Alas for the glory! or, There is no glory; (v. 21.) which she thus explains with her dying lips, (v. 22.) "The glory is departed from Israel; for the ark of God is taken. Call the child inglorious, for so he is; the beauty of Israel is gone, and there appears no hope of ever retrieving it; never let the name of an Israelite, much less a priest, carry glory in it any more, now that the ark is taken." Note, (1.) The purity and plenty of God's ordinances, and the tokens of his presence in them, are the glory of any people, much more so than their wealth, and trade, and interest, among the nations. (2.) Nothing is more cutting, more killing, to a faithful Israelite, than the want and loss of these. If God go, the glory goes, and all good goes. Woe unto us, if he depart!

CHAP. V.

It is now time to inquire what is become of the ark of God; we cannot but think that we shall hear more of that sacred treasure. I should have thought the next news would have been, that all Israel, from Dan to Beersheba, had gathered together as one man, with a resolution to bring it back, or die in the attempt: but we find not any motion made of that kind, so little was there of zeal or courage left among them. Nay, we do not find that they desired a treaty with the Philistines about the ransom of it, or offered any thing in lieu of it; "It is gone, and let it go." Many have softness enough to lament the loss of the ark, that have not hardness enough to take one step toward the recovery of it, any more than Israel here. If the ark will help itself, it may, for they will not help it. Unworthy they were of the name of Israelites, that could thus tamely part with the glory of Israel. God would therefore take the work into his own hands, and plead his own cause, since men would not appear for him. We are told in this chapter, I. How the Philistines triumphed over the ark, (v. 1, 2.) and, II. How the ark triumphed over the Philistines. 1. Over Dagon their god, v. 3, 4, 5. 2. Over the Philistines themselves, who were sorely plagued with emerods, and made weary of the ark; the men of Ashdod first, (v. 6, 7.)

then the men of Gath, (v. 8, 9.) and, lastly, those of Ekron, which forced them at length upon a resolution to send the ark back to the land of Israel; for, when God judges, he will overcome.

1. AND the Philistines took the ark of God, and brought it from Eben-ezer unto Ashdod. 2. When the Philistines took the ark of God, they brought it into the house of Dagon, and set it by Dagon. 3. And when they of Ashdod arose early on the morrow, behold, Dagon was fallen upon his face to the earth before the ark of the LORD. And they took Dagon, and set him in his place again. 4. And when they arose early on the morrow morning, behold, Dagon was fallen upon his face to the ground before the ark of the LORD; and the head of Dagon and both the palms of his hands were cut off upon the threshold; only the stump of Dagon was left to him. 5. Therefore neither the priests of Dagon, nor any that come into Dagon's house, tread on the threshold of Dagon in Ashdod unto this day.

Here is,

I. The Philistines' triumph over the ark, which they were the more pleased, the more proud, to be now masters of, because, before the battle, they were possessed with a great fear of it, ch. 4. 7. When they had it in their hands, God restrained them, that they did not offer any violence to it; did not break it to pieces, as the Israelites were ordered to do by the idols of the heathen, but shewed some respect to it, and carefully carried it to a place of safety. Whether the curiosity led them to open it, and to read what was written with the finger of God on the two tables of stone that were in it, we are not told; perhaps they looked no further than the golden outside, and the cherubims that covered it, like children that are more affected with the fine binding of their Bibles than with the precious matter contained in them. They carried it to Ashdod, one of their five cities, and that in which Dagon's temple was; there they placed the ark of God, by Dagon, v. 2. Either, 1. As a sacred thing, which they designed to pay some religious respect to, in conjunction with Dagon; for the gods of the heathen were never looked upon as averse to partners. Though the nations would not change their gods, yet they would multiply them, and add to them. But they were mistaken in the God of Israel, when, in putting his ark by Dagon's image, they intended to do him honour; for he is not worshipped at all, if he be not worshipped alone. The Lord our God is one Lord. Or, rather, 2. They placed it there as a trophy of victory, in honour of Dagon their god, to whom, no doubt, they intended to offer a great sacrifice, as they had done when they had taken Samson; (Judg. 16. 23, 24.) boasting, that as then they had triumphed over Israel's champion, so now over Israel's God. What a reproach was this to God's great name! What a disgrace to the throne of his glory! Shall the ark, the symbol of God's presence, be a prisoner to Dagon, a dunghill deity? So it is, because God will shew of how little account the ark of the covenant is, if the covenant itself be broken and neglected; even sacred signs are not things that either he is tied to, or we can trust to. So it is for a time, that God may have so much the more glory, in reckoning with those that thus affront him, and get him honour upon them. Having punished Israel that betrayed the ark, by giving it into the hands of the Philistines, he will now deal with those that abused it, and will fetch it out of their hands again. Thus even the wrath of man shall praise him; and he is bringing about his own glory, even then when he seems to neglect it, Ps. 76. 10. Out of the eater shall come forth meat.

II. The ark's triumph over Dagon. Once and again, Dagon was made to fall before it. If they designed to do honour to the ark, God hereby shewed that he valued not their honour, nor would he accept it, for he will be worshipped, not with any god, but alone all gods. He owes a shame (as Bishop Hall expresses it) to those who will be making matches betwixt himself and Belial. But they really designed to affront it; and though, for some hours, Dagon stood by the ark, and, it is likely, stood above it, (the ark at its footstool,) yet, the next morning, when the worshippers of Dagon came to pay their devotions to his shrine, they found their triumphing short, Job, 20. 5.

1. Dagon, that is, the image, for that was all the god, was fallen upon his face to the earth before the ark, v. 3. God had seemed to forget his ark; but see how the psalmist speaks of his appearing, at last, to vindicate his own honour. When he had delivered his strength into captivity, and all seemed going to ruin, then the Lord awaked as one out of sleep, and like a mighty man that shouteth by reason of wine, Ps. 78. 65. And therefore he prevented the utter desolations of the Jewish church, because he feared the wrath of the enemy, Deut. 32. 26, 27. Great care was taken in setting up the images of their gods, to fix them; (the prophet takes notice of it, Isa. 41. 7. He fastened it with nails, that it should not be moved; and again, ch. 46. 7.) and yet Dagon's fastenings stood him in no stead; the ark of God triumphs over him upon his own dunghill, in his own temple; down he comes before the ark, directly towards it, (though the ark was set on one side of him,) as it were, pointing to the conqueror, to whom he is constrained to yield and do obeisance. Note, The kingdom of Satan will certainly fall before the kingdom of Christ, error before truth, profaneness before godliness, and corruption before grace in the hearts of the faithful. When the interests of religion seem to be run down, and ready to sink, yet even then we may be confident that the day of their triumph will come. Great is the truth, and will prevail. Dagon, by falling prostrate before the ark of God, which was a posture of adoration, did, as it were, direct his worshippers to pay their homage to the God of Israel, as greater than all gods. See Exod. 18. 11.

2. The priests, that found their idol on the floor, make all the haste they can, before it be known, to set him in his place again. A sorry silly thing to make a god of, which, when he was down, wanted help to get up again; and sottish wretches those were, that could pray for help from that idol that needed, and, in effect, implored, their help. How could they attribute their victory to the power of Dagon, when Dagon himself cannot keep his own ground before the ark? But they are resolved Dagon shall be their god still, and therefore set him up in his place. Bishop Hall observes hence, It is just with God, that those who want grace shall want wit too; and it is in the power of superstition to turn men into the stocks and stones they worship. They that make them are like unto them. What is it that the great upholders of the anti-christian kingdom are doing at this day, but heaving Dagon up, and labouring to set him in his place again, and healing the deadly wound that has been given to the beast? but if the reformation be the cause of God, before which it has begun to fall, it shall not prevail, but shall surely fall before it.

3. The next night, Dagon fell the second time, v. 4. They rose early, either, as usual, to make their addresses to their god, or earlier than usual, being impatient to know whether Dagon had kept his standing this night; and, to their great confusion, they find his case now worse than before; whether the matter of which the image was made was apt to break or no, so it was, that the head and hands were cut off upon the threshold. So that nothing remained but the stump, or, as the margin reads it, the fishy part of Dagon; for (as many learned men conjecture) the upper part of this image was in a human shape, the lower, in the shape of a fish; as mermaids are painted. Such strong delusions were idolaters given up to, so vain were they in their imaginations, and so wretchedly darkened were their foolish hearts, as to worship the images, not only of creatures, but of nonentities, the mere figments of fancy. Well, the mishapen monster is by this fall made to appear, (1.) Very ridiculous, and worthy to be despised. An admirable figure Dagon made now, when the fall had anatomized him, and shewed how the human part and the fishy part were artificially put together, which, perhaps, the ignorant devotees had been made to believe was done by miracle. (2.) Very impotent, and unworthy to be prayed to, or trusted to; for his losing of his head and hands proved him utterly destitute both of wisdom and power, and for ever disabled either to advise or act for them. This they got by setting Dagon in his place again; they had better have let him alone when he was down. But they can speed no better that contend with God, and will set up that which he is throwing down, Mal. 1. 4. God, by this, magnified his ark and made it honourable, then when they vilified and made it contemptible. He also shewed what will be the end of all that which is set up in opposition to him; Gird yourselves, but ye shall be broken to pieces, Isa. 8. 9.

4. The threshold of Dagon's temple was ever after looked upon as sacred, and not to be trodden on, v. 5. Some think that reference is had to this superstitious usage of Dagon's worshippers, (Zeph. 1. 9.) where God threatens to punish those who, in imitation of them, leaped over the threshold. One would have thought that this incontestable proof of the ark's victory over Dagon, should have convinced the Philistines of their folly in worshipping such a senseless thing, and that from henceforward they should have paid their homage to the Conqueror; but, instead of being reformed, they were hardened in their idolatry, and, as evil men and seducers are wont to do, became worse and worse, 2 Tim. 3. 13. Instead of despising Dagon, for the threshold's sake that beheaded him, they are almost ready to worship the threshold, because it was the block on which he was beheaded; and will never set their feet on that on which Dagon lost his head; shaming those who tread under foot the blood of the covenant, and trample on things truly sacred. Yet this piece of superstition would help to perpetuate the remembrance of Dagon's disgrace; for, with the custom, the reason would be transmitted to posterity, and the children that should be born, inquiring why the threshold of Dagon's temple must not be trodden on, would be told, that Dagon fell before the ark of the Lord. Thus God would have honour, even out of their superstition. We are not told that they repaired the broken image; it is probable that they got the ark of God away first, and then they patched it up again, and set it in its place; for, it seems, they cannot deliver their souls, nor say, Is there not a lie in our right hand? Isa. 44. 20.

6. But the hand of the LORD was heavy upon them of Ashdod and he destroyed them, and smote them with emerods, even Ashdod and the coasts thereof. 7. And when the men of Ashdod saw that it was so, they said, The ark of the God of Israel shall not abide with us: for his hand is sore upon us, and upon Dagon our god. 8. They sent therefore and gathered all the lords of the Philistines unto them, and said, What shall we do with the ark of the God of Israel? And they answered, Let the ark of the God of Israel be carried about unto Gath. And they carried the ark of the God of Israel about thither. 9. And it was so, that, after they had carried it about, the hand of the LORD was against the city with a very great destruction: and he smote the men of the city, both small and great, and they had emerods in their secret parts. 10. Therefore they sent the ark of God to Ekron. And it came to pass, as the ark of God came to Ekron, that the Ekronites cried out, saying, They have brought about the ark of the God of Israel to us, to slay us and our people. 11. So they sent and gathered together all the lords of the Philis-times, and said, Send away the ark of the God of Israel, and let it go again to his own place, that it slay us not, and our people; for there was a deadly destruction throughout all the city; the hand of God was very heavy there. 12. And the men that died not were smitten with the emerods; and the cry of the city went up to heaven.

The downfall of Dagon (if the people had made a good use of it, and had been brought by it to repent of their idolatries, and to humble themselves before the God of Israel, and seek his face) might have prevented the vengeance which God here proceeds to take upon them for the indignities done to his ark, and their obstinate adherence to their idol, in defiance of the plainest conviction: Lord, when thy hand is lifted up, they will not see, but they shall see, Isa. 26. 11. And if they will not see the glory, they shall feel the weight, of God's hand, for so the Philistines did; The hand of the Lord was heavy upon them; (v. 6.) and he not only convinced them of their folly, but severely chastised their insolence.

1. He destroyed them, that is, cut many of them off by sudden death, those, we may suppose, that had most triumphed in the captivity of the ark. This is distinguished from the disease with which others were smitten. At Gath, it is called a great destruction, (v. 9.) a deadly destruction, v. 11. And it is expressly said, (v. 12.) that those who were smitten with the emerods were the men that died not by the other destruction, which, probably, was the pestilence. They boasted of the great slaughter which their sword had made among the Israelites, ch. 4. 10. But God lets them know, that though he does not see fit to draw Israel's sword against them, (they were unworthy to be employed,) yet God had a sword of his own, with which he could make a no less dreadful execution among them, which if he whet, and his hand take hold on judgment, he will render vengeance to his enemies, Deut. 32. 41, 42. Note, Those that contend with God, his ark, and his Israel, will infallibly be ruined by it at last. If conviction conquer not, destruction shall.

2. Those that were not destroyed he smote with emerods, (v. 6.) in their secret parts, (v. 9.) so grievous, that (v. 12.) the cry went up to heaven; that is, it might be heard a great way off; and perhaps, in the extremity of their pain and misery, they cried, not to Dagon, but to the God of heaven. The psalmist, speaking of this sore judgment upon the Philistines, describes it thus, that God smote his enemies in the hinder parts, and put them to a perpetual reproach, Ps. 78. 66. God threatens the emerods among the judgments that would be the fruit of the curse, Deut. 28. 27. It was both a painful and shameful disease; a vile disease for vile deserts; by it God would humble their pride, and put contempt upon them, as they had done upon his ark. The disease was epidemical, and, perhaps, among them, a new disease. Ashdod was smitten, and the coasts thereof; the country round. For contempt of God's ordinances, many are weak and sick, and many sleep, 1 Cor. 11. 30.

3. The men of Ashdod were soon aware that it was the hand of God, the God of Israel, v. 7. Thus they were constrained to acknowledge his power and dominion, and themselves within his jurisdiction, and yet they would not renounce Dagon, and submit to him; but rather, now that he touched their bone and their flesh, and in a tender part, they were ready to curse him to his face; and, instead of making their peace with him, and courting the stay of his ark upon better terms, they desired to get clear of it, as the Gadarenes, who, when they had lost their swine, desired Christ to depart out of their coasts. Carnal hearts, when they smart under the judgments of God, would rather, if it were possible, put him far from them, than enter into covenant and communion with him, and make him their friend. Thus the men of Ashdod resolve, The ark of the God of Israel shall not abide with us.

4. It is resolved to change the place of its imprisonment. A great council was called, and the question proposed to all the lords was, "What shall we do with the ark?" And, at last, it was agreed that it should be carried to Gath, v. 8. Some superstitious conceit they had, that the fault was in the place, and that the ark would be better pleased with another lodging, further off from Dagon's temple; and therefore, instead of returning it, as they should have done, to its own place, they contrive to send it to another place. Gath is pitched upon, a place famed for a race of giants, but their strength and stature are no fence against the pestilence and the emerods; the men of that city were smitten, both small and great, (v. 9.) both dwarfs and giants; all alike to God's judgments; none so great as to over-top them, none so small as to be over-looked by them.

5. They were all, at last, weary of the ark, and very willing to be rid of it. It was sent from Gath to Ekron, and, coming by order of council, the Ekronites could not refuse it, but were much exasperated against their great men for sending them such a fatal present; (v. 10.) They have sent it to us, to slay us and our people. The ark had the tables of the law in it; and nothing more welcome to faithful Israelites than the word of God; to them it is a savour of life unto life: but to uncircumcised Philistines, that persist in enmity to God, nothing more dreadful or unwelcome; to them it is a savour of death unto death. A general assembly is instantly called, to advise about sending the ark again to its own place, v. 11. While they are consulting about it, the hand of God is doing execution; and their contrivances to evade the judgment do but spread it; many drop down dead among them, many more are raging ill of the emerods, v. 12. What shall they do? Their triumphs in the captivity of the ark are soon turned into lamentations, and they are as eager to quit it as ever they had been to seize it. Note, God can easily make Jerusalem a barthesome stone to all that heave at it, Zech. 12. 3. Those that fight against God, will soon have enough of it, and, first or last, will be made to know that none ever hardened their hearts against him, and prospered. The wealth that is got by fraud and injustice, especially by sacrilege, that is, robbing God, though swallowed greedily, and rolled under the tongue as a sweet morsel, must be vomited up again; for, till it be, the sinner shall not feel quietness in his belly, Job, 20. 15. . 20.

CHAP. VI.

In this chapter we have the return of the ark to the land of Israel, whither we are now gladly to attend it, and observe, I. How the Philistines dismissed it, by the advice of their priests, (v. 1. . 11.) with rich presents to the God of Israel, to make an atonement for their sin, (v. 3. . 5.) and yet with a project to bring it back, unless Providence directed the line, contrary to their inclination, to go to the land of Israel, v. 8, 9. II. How the Israelites entertained it. 1. With great joy, and sacrifices of praise, v. 12. . 18. 2. With an over-bold curiosity to look into it, for which many of them were struck dead, the terror of which moved them to send it forward to another city, v. 19. . 21.

1. AND the ark of the LORD was in the country of the Philistines seven months. 2. And the Philistines called for the priests and the diviners, saying, What shall we do to the ark of the LORD? tell us wherewith we shall send it to his place. 3. And they said, If ye send away the ark of the God of Israel, send it not empty; but in any wise return him a trespass-offering: then ye shall be healed, and it shall be known to you why his hand is not removed from you. 4. Then said they, What shall be the trespass-offering which we shall return to him? They answered, Five golden emerods, and five golden mice, according to the number of the lords of the Philistines: for one plague was on you all, and on your lords. 5. Wherefore ye shall make images of your emerods, and images of your mice that mar the land; and ye shall give glory unto the God of Israel: peradventure he will lighten his hand from off you, and from off your gods, and from off your land. 6. Wherefore then do ye harden your hearts, as the Egyptians and Pharaoh hardened their hearts? when he had wrought wonderfully among them, did they not let the people go, and they departed? 7. Now therefore make a new cart, and take two milch-kine, on which there hath come no yoke, and tie the kine to the cart, and bring their calves home from them: 8. And take the ark of the LORD, and lay it upon the cart; and put the jewels of gold which ye return him for a trespass-offering, in a coffer by the side thereof; and send it away, that it may go. 9. And see, if it goeth up by the way of his own coast to Beth-shemesh, then he hath done us this great evil: but if not, then we shall know that it is not his hand that smote us; it was a chance that happened to us.

The first words of the chapter tell us how long the captivity of the ark continued—it was in the country of the Philistines seven months. In the field of the Philistines; so it is in the original; from which some gather, that, having tried it in all their cities, and found it a plague to the inhabitants of each, at length, they sent it into the open fields, upon which, mice sprang up out of the ground in great multitudes, and destroyed the corn, which was now nearly ripe, and marred the land. With that judgment they were plagued, (v. 5.) and yet it is not mentioned in the foregoing chapter; so God let them know, that, wherever they carried the ark, so long as they carried it captive, they should find it a curse to them. Cursed shalt thou be in the city, and cursed in the field, Deut. 23. 16. But most take it to signify, as we render it, The country of the Philistines. Now, 1. Seven months Israel was punished with the absence of the ark, that special token of God's presence. How bare did the tabernacle look without it! How was the holy city now a desolation, and the holy land a wilderness! A melancholy time, no doubt it was, to the good people among them, particularly to Samuel; but they had this to comfort themselves with, as we have in the like distress, when we are deprived of the comfort of public ordinances, that, wherever the ark is, the Lord is in his holy temple, the Lord's throne is in heaven, and by faith and prayer we may have access with boldness to him there. We may have God nigh unto us, when the ark is at a distance. 2. Seven months the Philistines were punished with the presence of the ark; so long it was a plague to them, because they would not send it home sooner. Note, Sinners lengthen out their own misery, by obstinately refusing to part with their sins. Egypt's plagues had been fewer than ten, if Pharaoh's heart had not been hardened not to let the people go.

But at length it is determined the ark must be sent back, there is no remedy, they are undone if they detain it.

1. The priests and the diviners are consulted about it, v. 2. They were supposed to be best acquainted both with the rules of wisdom, and with the rites of worship and atonement. And the Israelites being their neighbours, and famed above all people for the institutions of their religion, they had, no doubt, the curiosity to acquaint themselves with their laws and usages; and therefore it was proper to ask them, What shall we do to the ark of Jehovah? All nations have had a regard to their priests, as the men whose lips keep knowledge. Had the Philistines diviners?

We have divines, of whom we should inquire, wherewith we shall come before the Lord, and bow ourselves before the most high God.

II. They give their advice very fully, and seem to be very unanimous in it. It was a wonder they did not, as friends to their country, give it, ex officio—officially, before they were asked.

1. They urge it upon them, that it was absolutely necessary to send the ark back, from the example of Pharaoh and the Egyptians, v. 6. Some, it may be, were loath to yield, and were willing to try it out with the ark a while longer, and to them they apply themselves; Wherefore do ye harden your hearts, as the Egyptians and Pharaoh did? It seems they were well acquainted with the Mosaic history, and could cite precedents out of it. This good use we should make of the remaining records of God's judgments upon obstinate sinners, we should by them be warned not to harden our hearts as they did. It is much cheaper learning by other people's experience than by our own. The Egyptians were forced at last to let Israel go, therefore let the Philistines yield in time to let the ark go.

2. They advise, that, when they sent it back, they should send a trespass-offering with it, v. 3. Whatever the gods of other nations were, they knew the God of Israel was a jealous God, and how strict he was in his demands of sin-offerings, and trespass-offerings, from his own people; and therefore, since they found how highly he resented the affront of holding his ark captive, they with whom he had such a quarrel must in any wise return him a trespass-offering; and they could not expect to be healed upon any other terms. Injured justice demands satisfaction; so far natural light instructed men; but when they began to contrive what that satisfaction should be, they became wretchedly vain in their imaginations. But those who, by wilful sin, have imprisoned the truth in unrighteousness, (as the Philistines did the ark,) Rom. 1. 18. may conclude that there is no making of their peace with him whom they have thus injured, but by a sin-offering; and we know but one that can take away sin.

3. They direct, that this trespass-offering should be an acknowledgment of the punishment of their iniquity; by which they might take shame to themselves as conquered and yielding, and guilty before God, and might give glory to the God of Israel, as their mighty Conqueror, and most just Avenger, v. 5. They must make images of the emerods, that is, of the swellings and sores of which they had been afflicted; so making the reproach of that shameful disease perpetual by their own act and deed; (Ps. 78. 66.) also images of the mice that had marred the land, owning thereby the almighty power of the God of Israel, who could chastise and humble them, even in the day of their triumph, by such small and despicable animals. These images must be made of gold, the most precious metal, to intimate that they would gladly purchase their peace with the God of Israel at any rate, and would not think it bought too dear with gold, with much fine gold. The golden emerods must be, in number, five, according to the number of the lords, who, it is likely, were all afflicted with them, and were content thus to own it: it was advised that the golden mice should be five too, but, because the whole country was infested with them, it should seem, upon second thoughts, they sent more of them, according to the number both of the fenced cities and of country villages, v. 18. Their priests reminded them, that one plague was on them all; they could not blame one another, for they were all guilty, which they were plainly told, by being all plagued. Their proposal to offer a trespass-offering for their offence, was conformable enough to divine revelation at that time; but to send such things as these for trespass-offerings, was very foreign, and shewed them grossly ignorant of the methods of reconciliation appointed by the law of Moses; for there it appears all along, that it is blood, and not gold, that makes atonement for the soul.

4. They encourage them to hope that thereby they would take an effectual course to get rid of the plague, Ye shall be healed, v. 3. For, it seems, the disease obstinately resisted all the methods of cure their physicians had prescribed; "Let them therefore send back the ark, and then," say they, "it shall be known to you, why his hand is not removed from you; that is, by this it will appear whether it is for your detaining of the ark that you are thus plagued; for, if it be, upon your delivering of it up, the plague will cease." God has sometimes put his people upon making such a trial, whether their reformation would not be their relief; Prove me now herewith, saith the Lord of hosts, Mal. 3. 10. Hag. 2. 19. Yet they speak doubtfully, (v. 5.) Peradventure he will lighten his hand from off you; as if now they began to think that the judgment might come from God's hand, and yet not be removed immediately upon the restitution of the ark; however, that was the likeliest way to obtain mercy. Take away the cause, and the effect will cease.

5. Yet they put them in a way to make a further trial, whether it was the hand of the God of Israel that had smitten them with these plagues, or no. They must, in honour of the ark, put it on a new cart or carriage, to be drawn by two milch-cows, that had calves daily sucking them, (v. 7.) unused to draw, and inclined to home, both for the sake of the crib where they were fed, and of the calves they nourished, and, besides, altogether unacquainted with the road that led toward the land of Israel; they must have no one to lead or drive them, but must take their own way, which, in all reason, one might expect, would be home again; and yet, unless the God of Israel, after all the other miracles he has wrought, will work one more, and by an invisible power lead these cows, contrary to their natural instinct and inclination, to the land of Israel, and particularly to Beth-shemesh, they will retract their former opinion, and will believe it was not the hand of God that smote them, but it was a chance that happened to them, v. 8, 9. Thus did God suffer himself to be tempted and prescribed to, after he had been otherwise affronted, by these uncircumcised Philistines. Would they have been content that the honour of Dagon, their god, should have been put upon such an issue as this? See how willing bad men are to shift off their convictions of the hand of God upon them, and to believe, when they are in trouble, it is a chance that happens to them; and if so, the rod has no voice which they are concerned to hear or heed.

10. And the men did so; and took two milch-kine, and tied them to the cart, and shut up their calves at home: 11. And they laid the ark of the LORD upon the cart, and the coffer with the mice of gold, and the images of their emerods. 12. And the kine took the straight way to the way of Beth-shemesh, and went along the high-way, lowing as they went, and turned not aside to the right-hand or to the left; and the lords of the Philistines went after them unto the border of Beth-shemesh. 13. And they of Beth-shemesh were reaping their wheat-harvest in the valley: and they lifted up their eyes, and saw the ark, and rejoiced to see it. 14. And the cart came into the field of Joshua, a Beth-shemite, and stood there, where there was a great stone: and they clave the wood of the cart, and offered the kine a burnt-offering unto the LORD. 15. And the Levites took down the ark of the LORD, and the coffer that was with it, wherein the jewels of gold were, and put them on the great stone: and the men of Beth-shemesh offered burnt-offerings and sacrificed sacrifices the same day unto the LORD. 16. And when the five lords of the Philistines had seen it, they returned to Ekron ~~on~~ some day. 17. And these are the golden emerods which the Philistines returned for a trespass-offering unto the LORD; for Ashdod one, for Gaza one, for Askelon one, for Gath one, for Ekron one: 18. And the golden mice, according to the number of all the cities of the Philistines belonging to the five lords, both of fenced cities, and of country villages, even unto the great stone of Abel, whereon they set down the ark of the LORD: which stone remaineth unto this day in the field of Joshua, the Beth-shemite.

We are here told,

I. How the Philistines dismissed the ark; (v. 10, 11.) they were made as glad to part with it, as ever they had been to take it; as God had fetched Israel out of the house of bondage, so now he fetched the ark out of its captivity, in such a manner as that Egypt was glad when they departed, Ps. 105. 38. 1. They received no money or price for the ransom of it, as they hoped to have done, even beyond a king's ransom. Thus it is prophesied of Cyrus, (Isa. 45. 13.) He shall let go my captives, not for price nor reward. Nay, 2. They gave jewels of gold, as the Egyptians did to the Israelites, to be rid of it. Thus, the ark that was carried into the land of the Philistines, a trophy of their victory, carried back with it trophies of its own, and lasting monuments of the disgrace of the Philistines. Note, God will be no loser in his glory, at last, by the successes of the church's enemies against his ark, but will get him honour from those that seek to do dishonour to him.

II. How the kine brought it to the land of Israel, v. 12. They took the straight way to Beth-shemesh, the next city of the land of Israel, and a priests' city, and turned not aside. This was a wonderful instance of the power of God over the brute-creatures, and, all things considered, no less than a miracle. That cattle unaccustomed to the yoke should draw so even, so orderly, and still go forward; that, without any driver, they should go from home, to which all tame creatures have a natural inclination, and from their own calves, to which they had a natural affection; that, without any director, they should go the straight road to Beth-shemesh, a city eight or ten miles off, never miss the way, never turn aside into the fields to feed themselves, nor turn back home to feed their calves; they went on lowing for their young ones, by which it appeared that they had not forgotten them, but that nature was sensible of the grievance of going from them; the power of the God of nature therefore appeared so much the greater, in over-ruling one of the strongest instincts of nature. These two kine, says Dr. Lightfoot, knew their Owner, their great Owner, (Isa. 1. 3.) whom Hophni and Phinehas knew not; to which I may add, they brought home the ark, to shame the stupidity of Israel that made no attempt to fetch it home. God's providence is conversant about the motions even of brute-creatures, and serves its own purposes by them. The lords of the Philistines, with a suitable retinue, no doubt, went after them, wondering at the power of the God of Israel; and thus they, who thought to triumph over the ark, were made to go like menial servants after it.

III. How it was welcomed to the land of Israel. The men of Beth-shemesh were reaping their wheat-harvest, v. 13. They were going on with their worldly business, and were in no care about the ark, made no inquiries what was become of it; if they had, it is likely they might have had private intelligence beforehand of its coming, and would have gone to meet it, and conduct it into their own border. But they were as careless as the people that ceiled their own houses, and let God's house lie waste. Note, God will, in his own time, effect the deliverance of his church, not only though it be fought against by its enemies, but though it be neglected by its friends. Some observe, that the returning ark found the men of Beth-shemesh, not idling or sporting in the streets of the city, but busy, reaping their corn in the fields, and well-employed: thus the tidings of the birth of Christ were brought to the shepherds, when they were keeping their flock by night. The devil visits idle men with his temptations; God visits industrious men with his favours.

The same invisible hand that directed the kine to the land of Israel, brought them into the field of Joshua, and in that field they stood; some think, for the owner's sake, on whom, being a very good man, they suppose God designed to put this honour. I rather think, it was for the sake of the great stone in that field, which was convenient to put the ark upon, and which is spoken of, v. 14, 15, 18.

Now, 1. When the reapers saw the ark, they rejoiced; (v. 13.) their joy for that was greater than the joy of harvest, and therefore they left their work to bid it welcome. When the Lord turned again the captivity of his ark, they were like men that dream, then was their mouth filled with laughter, Ps. 126. 1, 2. Though they had not zeal and courage enough to attempt the rescue or ransom of it, yet, when it did come, they bid it heartily welcome. Note, The return of the ark, and the revival of holy ordinances, after days of restraint and trouble, cannot but be matter of great joy to every faithful Israelite.

3. They offered up the kine for a burnt-offering, to the honour of God, and made use of the wood of the cart for fuel, (v. 14.) probably, the Philistines intended these, when they sent them, to be a part of their trespass-offering, to make atonement, v. 3, 7. However, the men of Beth-shemesh looked upon it as proper to make this use of them, because it was by no means fit that ever they should be put to any other use; never shall that cart carry any common thing, that has once carried that sacred symbol of the divine presence: and the kine had been under such an immediate guidance of heaven, that God had, as it were, already laid claim to them; they were servants to him, and therefore must be sacrifices to him; and, no doubt, were accepted, though females, whereas, in strictness, every burnt-offering was to be a male.

3. They deposited the ark, with the chest of jewels that the Philistines presented, upon the great stone in the open field; a cold lodging for the ark of the Lord, and a very mean one; yet better so than in Dagon's temple, or in the hands of the Philistines. It is desirable to see the ark in its habitation, in all the circumstances of solemnity and splendour, but better have it upon a great stone, and in the fields of the wood, than be without it. The intrinsic grandeur of instituted ordinances ought not to be diminished in our eyes by the meanness and poverty of the place where they are administered. As the burning of the cart and cows that brought home the ark, might be construed to signify their hopes that it should never be carried away again out of the land of Israel, so the setting it upon a great stone might signify their hopes that it should be established again upon a firm foundation. The church is built upon a Rock.

4. They offered the sacrifices of thanksgiving to God, some think, upon the great stone, more probably, upon an altar of earth made for the purpose, v. 15. And the case being extraordinary, the law for offering at the altar in the court of the tabernacle was dispensed with, and the more easily, because Shiloh was now dismantled; God himself had forsaken it, and the ark, which was its chief glory, they had met with them here. Beth-shemesh, though it lay within the lot of the tribe of Dan, yet belonged to Judah, so that this accidental bringing of the ark hither was an indication of its designed settlement there, in process of time; for when God refused the tabernacle of Joseph, he chose the tribe of Judah, Ps. 78. 67, 68. It was one of those cities which were assigned out of the lot of Judah to the sons of Aaron, Josh. 21. 16. Whither should the ark go but to a priests' city? And it was well they had those of that sacred order ready, (for though they are here called Levites, (v. 15.) yet it should seem they were priests,) both to take down the ark, and to offer the sacrifices.

5. The lords of the Philistines returned to Ekron, much affected, we may suppose, with what they had seen of the glory of God, and the zeal of the Israelites, and yet not reclaimed from the worship of Dagon; for how seldom has a nation changed their gods, though they were no gods? Jer. 2. 11. Though they cannot but think the God of Israel glorious in holiness, and fearful in praises, yet they are resolved they will think Baal-zehub, the god of Ekron, at least as good as he, and to him they will cleave, however, because he is their's.

Lastly, Notice is taken of the continuance of the great stone in the same place; there it is unto this day; (v. 18.) because it remained a lasting memorial of this great event, and served to support the traditional history, by which it was transmitted to posterity. The fathers would say to the children, "This is the stone upon which the ark of God was set, when it came out of the Philistines' hands; a thing never to be forgotten."

19. And he smote the men of Beth-shemesh, because they had looked into the ark of the LORD, even he smote of the people fifty thousand and threescore and ten men: and the people lamented, because the LORD had smitten many of the people with a great slaughter. 20. And the men of Beth-shemesh said, Who is able to stand before this holy LORD God? and to whom shall he go up from us? 21. And they sent messengers to the inhabitants of Kirjath-jearim, saying, The Philistines have brought again the ark of the LORD; come ye down, and fetch it up to you.

Here is, 1. The sin of the men of Beth-shemesh, They looked into the ark of the Lord, v. 19. Every Israelite had heard great talk of the ark, and had been possessed with a profound veneration for it, but they had been told, that it was lodged within a veil, and even the high priest himself might not look upon it but once a year, and then through a cloud of incense. Perhaps, this made many say, (as we are apt to covet that which is forbidden,) what a great deal they would give for a sight of it. Some of these Beth-shemites, we may suppose, for that reason rejoiced to see the ark, (v. 13.) more than for the sake of the public. Yet this did not content them, they might see it, but they would go further, they would take off the covering, which, it is likely, was nailed or screwed on, and look into it; under pretence of seeing whether the Philistines had not taken the two tables out of it, or some way damaged them; but really to gratify a sinful curiosity of their own, which intruded into those things that God had thought fit to conceal from them. Note, It is a great affront to God, for vain men to pry into, and meddle with, the secret things which belong not to them, Deut. 29. 29. Col. 2. 18. We were all ruined by an ambition of forbidden knowledge. That which made this looking into the ark a great sin, was, that it proceeded from a very low and mean opinion of the ark. The familiarity they had with it upon this occasion, bred contempt and irreverence. Perhaps, they presumed upon their being priests, but the dignity of the ministerial office will be so far from excusing, that it will aggravate, a careless and irreverent treatment of holy things. They should, by their example, have taught others to keep their distance, and look upon the ark with a holy awe. Perhaps they presumed upon the kind entertainment they had given the ark, and the sacrifices they had now offered to welcome it home with; for this, they thought the ark was indebted to them, and they might be allowed to repay themselves with the satisfaction of looking into it. But let no man think that his service done for God, will justify him in any instance of disrespect or irreverence toward the things of God. Or, it may be, they presumed upon the present mean circumstances the ark was in, newly come out of captivity, and unsettled; now that it stood upon a cold stone, they thought they might make free with it; they should never have such another opportunity of being familiar with it. It is an offence to God, if we think meanly of his ordinances, because of the meanness of the manner of their administration. Had they looked with an understanding eye upon the ark, and not judged purely by outward appearance, they would have thought that the ark never shone with greater majesty than it did now; it had triumphed over the Philistines, and come out of its house of bondage (like Christ out of the grave) by its own power; had they considered this, they would not have looked into it thus, as a common chest.

2. Their punishment for this sin; He smote the men of Beth-shemesh, many of them, with a great slaughter. How jealous is God for the honour of his ark! He will not suffer it to be profaned; be not deceived, God is not mocked. They that will not fear his goodness, and reverently use the tokens of his grace, shall be made to feel his justice, and sink under the tokens of his displeasure. They that pry into what is forbidden, and come too near to holy fire, will find it is at their peril. He smote fifty thousand and seventy men. This account of their numbers smitten, is expressed in a very unusual manner in the original, which, besides the improbability that there should be so many guilty, and so many slain, occasions many learned men to question, whether we take the matter right. In the original it is, He smote in (or among) the people, threescore and ten men; fifty thousand men. The Syriac and Arabic read it, five thousand and seventy men. The Chaldee reads it, seventy men of the elders, and fifty thousand of the common people. Seventy men as valuable as fifty thousand, so some, because they were priests. Some think the seventy men were the Beth-shemites that were slain for looking into the ark, and the fifty thousand were those that were slain by the ark, in the land of the Philistines. He smote seventy men, that is, fifty out of a thousand; which was one in twenty, a half decimation; so some understand it. The Septuagint read it much as we do, he smote seventy men, and fifty thousand men. Josephus says only seventy were smitten.

3. The terror that was struck upon the men of Beth-shemesh by this severe stroke. They said, as well they might, Who is able to stand before this holy Lord God? v. 20. Some think it bespeaks their murmuring against God, as if he had dealt hardly and unjustly with them. Instead of quarrelling with themselves and their own sins, they quarrelled with God and his judgments; as David was displeased, in a case not much unlike, 2 Sam. 6. 8, 9. I rather think it bespeaks their awful and reverent adoration of God, as the Lord God, as a holy Lord God, and as a God before whom none is able to stand. This they infer from that tremendous judgment, "Who is able to stand before the God of the ark?" To stand before God to worship him, blessed be his name, is not impossible; we are through Christ invited, encouraged, and enabled to do it, but to stand before God, to contend with him, we are not able. Who is able to stand before the throne of his immediate glory, and look full upon it? 1 Tim. 6. 16. Who is able to stand before the tribunal of his inflexible justice, and make his part good there? Ps. 130. 3.—143. 2. Who is able to stand before the arm of his provoked power, and either resist or bear the strokes of it? Ps. 76. 7.

4. Their desire, hereupon, to be rid of the ark; they asked, To whom shall he go up from us? v. 20. They should rather have asked, "How may we make our peace with him, and recover his favour?" Mic. 6. 6, 7. But they begin to be as weary of the ark as the Philistines had been, whereas, if they had treated it with due reverence, who knows, but it might have taken up its residence among them, and they had all been blessed for the ark's sake? But thus, when the word of God works with terror on sinners' consciences, they, instead of taking the blame and shame to themselves, quarrel with the word, and put that from them, Jer. 6. 10. They sent messengers to the elders of Kirjath-jearim, a strong city further up in the country, and begged of them to come and fetch the ark up thither, v. 21. They durst not touch it, to bring it thither themselves, but stood aloof from it as a dangerous thing. Thus do foolish men run from one extreme to the other, from presumptuous boldness to slavish shiness. Kirjath-jearim, that is, the city of woods, belonged to Judah: (Josh. 15. 9, 60.) it lay in the way from Beth-shemesh to Shiloh; so that when they sent to them to fetch it, we may suppose they intended that from thence the elders of Shiloh should fetch it, but God intended otherwise.

Thus was it sent from town to town, and no care taken of it by the public; a sign that there was no king in Israel.

CHAP. VII.

In this chapter, we have, I. The eclipsing of the glory of the ark, by its privacy in Kirjath-jearim for many years, v. 1, 2. II. The appearing of the glory of Samuel, in his public services for the good of Israel, to whom he was raised up to be a judge, and he was the last that bore that character. This chapter gives us all the account we have of him, when he was in the prime of his time; for what we had before was in his childhood, (ch. 2, and 3.) what we have of him after was in his old age, ch. 8. 1. We have him here active, 1. In the reformation of Israel from their idolatry, v. 3, 4. 2. In the reviving of religion among them, v. 5, 6. 3. In praying for them against the invading Philistines, (v. 7, 8, 9.) over whom God, in answer to his prayer, gave them a glorious victory, v. 10, 11. 4. In erecting a thankful memorial of that victory, v. 12. 5. In the improvement of that victory, v. 13, 14. 6. In the administration of justice, v. 15, 17. And these were the things for which God was preparing and designing him, in the early vouchsafements of his grace to him.

1. AND the men of Kirjath-jearim came, and fetched up the ark of the LORD, and brought it into the house of Abinadab in the hill, and sanctified Eleazar his son, to keep the ark of the LORD. 2. And it came to pass, while the ark abode in Kirjath-jearim, that the time was long; for it was twenty years: and all the house of Israel lamented after the LORD.

Here we must attend the ark to Kirjath-jearim, and then leave it there, to hear not a word more of it, till David fetched it thence, above forty years after, (1 Chron. 13. 6.) except once.

I. We are very willing to attend it thither, for the men of Beth-shemesh have, by their own folly, made that a burthen which might have been a blessing; and gladly would we see it among those to whom it will be a savour of life unto life, for in every place where it has been of late, it has been a savour of death unto death.

Now, 1. The men of Kirjath-jearim cheerfully bring it among them; (v. 1.) They came, at the first word, and fetched up the ark of the Lord. Their neighbours, the Beth-shemites, were no better pleased to be rid of it, than they were to receive it, knowing very well that what slaughter the ark had made at Beth-shemesh was not an act of arbitrary power, but necessary justice, and they that suffered by it must blame themselves, not the ark; we may depend upon the word which God hath said, (Jer. 25. 6.) Provoke me not, and I will do you no hurt. Note, The judgments of God on those who profane his ordinances, should not make us afraid of the ordinances, but of profaning them, and making an ill use of them.

2. They carefully provide for its decent entertainment among them; as a welcome guest, with true affection, and as an honourable guest, with respect and reverence. (1.) They provide a proper place to receive it. They had no public building to adorn with it, but they lodged it in the house of Abinadab, which stood upon the highest ground, and, probably, was the best house in their city; or, perhaps, the master of it was the most eminent man they had for piety, and best affected to the ark. The men of Beth-shemesh left it exposed upon a stone in the open field, and though it was a city of priests, none of them received it into his house; but the men of Kirjath-jearim, though common Israelites, gave it house-room, and, no doubt, the best-furnished room in the house to which it was brought. Note, [1.] God will find out a resting-place for his ark; if some thrust it from them, yet the hearts of others shall be inclined to receive it. [2.] It is no new thing for God's ark to be thrust into a private house. Christ, and his apostles, preached from house to house, when they could not have public places at command. [3.] Sometimes priests are ashamed and out-done in religion by common Israelites. [2.] They provide a proper person to attend it; They sanctified Eleazar his son to keep it; not the father, either because he was aged and infirm, or because he had the affairs of his house and family to attend, from which they would not take him off; but the son, who, it is probable, was a very pious devout young man, and zealously affected toward the best things; his business was to keep the ark, not only from being seized by malicious Philistines, but from being touched or looked into by too curious Israelites. He was to keep the room clean and decent, in which the ark was, that, though it was in an obscure place, it might not look like a neglected thing, which no man looked after. It does not appear that this Eleazar was of the tribe of Levi, much less of the house of Aaron, nor was it needful that he should, for here was no altar either for sacrifice or incense, only we may suppose that some devout Israelites would come and pray before the ark, and those that did so, he was there ready to attend and assist. For this purpose, they sanctified him, that is, by his own consent, they obliged him to make this his business, and to give a constant attendance to it; they set him apart for it in the name of all their citizens. This was irregular, but it was dispensed with, by reason of the present distress. When the ark is but newly come out of captivity, we cannot expect it to be of a sudden in its usual solemnity, but must take things as they are, and make the best of them.

II. Yet we are very loath to leave it here, wishing it well at Shiloh again, but that is made desolate, (Jer. 7. 14.) however, wishing it at Nob, or Gibeon, or wherever the tabernacle and the altars are; but, it seems, it must lie by the way, for want of some public-spirited men, to bring it to its proper place.

1. The time of its continuance here was long, very long; above forty years it lay in these fields of the wood, a remote obscure private place, unfrequented and almost unregarded; (v. 2.) The time that the ark abode in Kirjath-jearim was long, even till David fetched it thence. It was very strange, that, all the time that Samuel governed, the ark was never brought to its place in the holy of holies, an evidence of the decay of holy zeal among them. God suffered it to be so, to punish them for their neglect of the ark when it was in its place; and to shew that the great stress which the institution laid upon the ark was but typical of Christ, and those good things to come, which cannot be moved, Heb. 9. 23.—12. 27. It was a just reproach to the priests, that not one of their order was sanctified to keep the ark.

2. Twenty years of this time were passed before the house of Israel was sensible of the want of the ark. The Septuagint read it, somewhat more clearly than we do; And it was twenty years, and (that is, when) the whole house of Israel looked up again after the Lord. So long the ark remained in obscurity, and the Israelites were not sensible of the inconvenience, nor ever made any inquiry after it, what was become of it; though, while it was absent from the tabernacle, the token of God's special presence was wanting, nor could they keep the day of atonement, as it should be kept. They were content with the altars without the ark; so easily can formal professors rest satisfied in a road of external performances, without any tokens of God's presence or acceptance. But at length they bethought themselves, and began to lament after the Lord, stirred up to it, it is probable, by the preaching of Samuel, with which an extraordinary working of the Spirit of God set in. A general disposition to repentance and reformation now appears throughout all Israel, and they begin to look unto him whom they had slighted, and to mourn, Zecl. 12. 10. Dr. Lightfoot thinks this was a matter and time as remarkable as almost any we read of in scripture; and that that great conversion, Acts, 2, and 3. is the only parallel to it. Note, (1.) Those that know how to value God's ordinances, cannot but reckon it a very lamentable thing to want them. (2.) True repentance and conversion begin in lamenting after the Lord; we must be sensible that by sin we have provoked him to withdraw, and are undone if we continue in a state of distance from him; and be restless till we have recovered his favour, and obtained his gracious returns. It was better with the Israelites, when they wanted the ark, and were lamenting after it, than when they had the ark, and were crying into it, or priding themselves in it. Better see people longing in the scarcity of the means of grace, than loathing in the abundance of them.

3. And Samuel spake unto all the house of Israel, saying, If ye do return unto the LORD with all your hearts, then put away the strange gods and Ashtaroth from among you, and prepare your hearts unto the LORD, and serve him only: and he will deliver you out of the hand of the Philistines. 4. Then the children of Israel did put away Baalim and Ashtaroth, and served the LORD only. 5. And Samuel said, Gather all Israel to Mizpeh, and I will pray for you unto the LORD. 6. And they gathered together to Mizpeh, and drew water, and poured it out before the LORD, and fasted on that day, and said there, We have sinned against the LORD. And Samuel judged the children of Israel in Mizpeh.

We may well wonder where Samuel was, and what he was doing all this while, for we have not had him so much as named, till now, since ch. 4. 1. Not as if he were unconcerned, but his labours among his people are not mentioned, till there appear the fruit of them. When he perceived that they began to lament after the Lord, he struck while the iron was hot, and two things he endeavoured to do for them, as a faithful servant of God, and a faithful friend to the Israel of God.

I. He endeavoured to separate between them and their idols, for there reformation must begin. He spake to all the house of Israel, (v. 3.) going, as it should seem, from place to place, an itinerant preacher; (for we find not that they were gathered together till v. 5.) and, wherever he came, this was his exhortation, "If you do indeed return to the Lord, as you seem inclined to do, by your lamentation for your departure from him, and his from you, then know," 1. "That you must renounce and abandon your idols, put away the strange gods, for your God will admit no rival; put them away from you, each one for himself, nay, and put them from among you, do what you can, in your places, to rid them out of the country. Put away Baalim, the strange gods, and Ashtaroth the strange goddesses," for they had of them too. Or, Ashtaroth is particularly named, because it was the best-beloved idol, and that which they were most wedded to. Note, True repentance strikes at the darling sin, and will, with a peculiar zeal and resolution, put away that; the sin which most easily besets us. 2. "That you must make a solemn business of returning to God, and do it with a serious consideration and a steadfast resolution, for both are included in preparing the heart, directing, disposing, establishing the heart unto the Lord." 3. "That you must be entire for God, for him and no other, serve him only, else you do not serve him at all, so as to please him." 4. "That this is the only way, and a sure way, to prosperity and deliverance. Take this course, and he will deliver you out of the hand of the Philistines; for it was because you forsook him, and served other gods, that he delivered you into their hands. This was the purport of Samuel's preaching, and it had a wonderfully good effect; (v. 4.) They put away Baalim and Ashtaroth; not only quitted the worship of them, but destroyed their images, demolished their altars, and quite abandoned them; What have we to do any more with idols? Hos. 14. 3. Isa. 30. 22.

II. He endeavoured to engage them for ever to God and his service. Now that he had them in a good mind, he did all he could to keep them in it.

1. He summons all Israel, at least by their elders, as their representatives, to meet them at Mizpeh, (v. 5.) and there he promised to pray for them. And it was worth while for them to come from the remotest part of the country, to join with Samuel in seeking God's favour. Note, Ministers should pray for those to whom they preach, that God by his grace would make the preaching effectual. And when we come together in religious assemblies, we must remember, that it is as much our business there to join in public prayers, as it is to hear a sermon. He would pray for them, that, by the grace of God, they might be parted from their idols, and that then, by the providence of God, they might be delivered from the Philistines. Ministers would profit their people more, if they did but pray more for them.

2. They obey his summons, and not only come to the meeting, but conform to the intentions of it, and appear there very well disposed, v.6. (1.) They drew water, and poured it out before the Lord; signifying, [1.] Their humiliation and contrition for sin; owing themselves as water spilt upon the ground, which cannot be gathered up again; (2 Sam. 14. 14.) so mean, so miserable, before God, Ps. 22. 14. The Chaldee reads it, They poured out their hearts in repentance before the Lord. They wept rivers of tears, and sorrowed after a godly sort; for it was before the Lord, and with an eye to him. [2.] Their earnest prayers and supplications to God, for mercy. The soul is, in prayer, poured out before God, Ps. 62. 8. [3.] Their universal reformation; they thus expressed their willingness to part with all their sins, and to retain no more of the relish or savour of them than the vessel does of the water that is poured out of it. They were free and full in their confession, and fixed in their resolution to cast away from them all their transgressions. Israel is now baptized from their idols: so Dr. Lightfoot. [4.] Some think it signifies their joy in the hope of God's mercy, which Samuel had assured them of. This ceremony was used with that signification at the feast of tabernacles, John, 7. 37, 38. and see Isa. 12. 3. Taking it in this sense, it must be read, They drew water after they had fasted. In the close of their humiliation they thus expressed their hope of pardon and reconciliation. (2.) They fasted, abstained from food, afflicted their souls; so expressing repentance, and exciting devotion. (3.) They made a public confession, We have sinned against the Lord; so giving glory to God, and taking shame to themselves. And if we thus confess our sins, we shall find our God faithful and just to forgive us our sins.

3. Samuel judged them at that time at Mizpeh; that is, he assured them, in God's name, of the pardon of their sins, upon their repentance, and that God was reconciled to them. It was a judgment of absolution. Or, he received informations against those that did not leave their idols, and proceeded against them, according to law. Those that would not judge themselves, he judged. Or, now he settled courts of justice among them, and appointed the terms and circuits, which he observed afterward, v. 16. Now he set those wheels a-going; and whereas, before, he acted only as a prophet, now he began to act as a magistrate; to prevent their relapsing to those sins which now they seemed to have renounced.

7. And when the Philistines heard that the children of Israel were gathered together to Mizpeh, the lords of the Philistines went up against Israel. And when the children of Israel heard it, they were afraid of the Philistines. 8. And the children of Israel said to Samuel, Cease not to cry unto the LORD our God for us, that he will save us out of the hand of the Philistines. 9. And Samuel took a sucking lamb, and offered it for a burnt-offering wholly unto the LORD: and Samuel cried unto the LORD for Israel, and the LORD heard him. 10. And as Samuel was offering up the burnt-offering, the Philistines drew near to battle against Israel: but the LORD thundered with a great thunder on that day upon the Philistines, and discomfited them; and they were smitten before Israel. 11. And the men of Israel went out of Mizpeh, pursued the Philistines, and smote them, until they came under Beth-car. 12. Then Samuel took a stone, and set it between Mizpeh and Shem, and called the name of it Eben-ezer, saying, Hitherto hath the LORD helped us.

Here,

I. The Philistines invaded Israel, (v. 7.) taking umbrage from that general meeting for repentance and prayer, as if it had been a rendezvous for war; and if so, they thought it prudence to keep the war out of their own country. They had no just cause for this suspicion: but those that seek to do mischief to others, will be forward to imagine that others design mischief to them. Now see here, 1. How evil sometimes seems to come out of good. The religious meeting of the Israelites at Mizpeh brought trouble upon them from the Philistines, which, perhaps, tempted them to wish they had staid at home, and to blame Samuel for calling them together. But we may be in God's way, and yet meet with distress; nay, when sinners begin to repent and reform, they must expect that Satan will muster all his force against them, and set his instruments on work to the utmost, to oppose and discourage them. But, 2. How good is, at length, brought of that evil. Israel could never be threatened more seasonably than at this time, when they were repenting and praying, nor could they have been better prepared to receive the enemy; nor could the Philistines have acted more impolitically for themselves, than to make war upon Israel at this time, when they were making their peace with God: but God permitted them to do it, that he might have an opportunity immediately of crowning his people's reformation with tokens of his favour, and of confirming the words of his messenger, who had assured them that, if they repented, God would deliver them out of the hand of the Philistines. Thus he makes man's wrath to praise him, and serves the purposes of his grace to his people, even by the malicious designs of their enemies against them, Mic. 4. 11, 12.

II. Israel cleaves close to Samuel, as their best friend, under God, in this distress, though he was no military man, nor ever celebrated as a mighty man of valour; yet, being afraid of the Philistines, for whom they thought themselves an unequal match, they engaged Samuel's prayers for them; (v. 8.) Cease not to cry unto the LORD our God for us. They were here unarmed, unprepared for war, come together to fast and pray, not to fight; prayers and tears therefore being all the weapons many of them are now furnished with, to these they have recourse. And knowing Samuel to have a great interest in heaven, they earnestly beg of him to improve it for them. They had reason to expect it, because he had promised to pray for them, (v. 5.) had promised them deliverance from the Philistines; (v. 3.) and they had been observant of him, in all that which he had spoken to them from the LORD. Thus they who sincerely submit to Christ, as their Lawgiver and Judge, need not doubt of their interest in his intercession. They were very solicitous that Samuel should not cease to pray for them; what military preparations were to be made, they would undertake them, but let him continue instant in prayer; perhaps remembering, that when Moses did but let down his hand ever so little, Amalek prevailed. Oh what a comfort it is to all believers, that our great Intercessor above never ceases, is never silent, for he always appears in the presence of God for us!

III. Samuel intercedes with God for them, and does it by sacrifice, v. 9. He took a sucking lamb, and offered it for a burnt-offering, a whole burnt-offering, to the LORD, and while the sacrifice was in burning, with the smoke of it his prayers ascended up to heaven for Israel. Observe, 1. He made intercession with a sacrifice. Christ intercedes in the virtue of his satisfaction, and in all our prayers we must have an eye to his great oblation, depending upon that for audience and acceptance. Samuel's sacrifice without his prayer had been an empty shadow, his prayer without the sacrifice had not been so prevalent, but both together teach us, what great things we may expect from God, in answer to those prayers which are made with faith in Christ's sacrifice. 2. It was a burnt-offering, which was offered purely for the glory of God, so intimating, that the great plea he relied on, in this prayer, was taken from the honour of God. "Lord, help thy people now, for thy name's sake." When we endeavour to give glory to God, we may hope he will, in answer to our prayers, work for his own glory. 2. It was but one sucking lamb that he offered; for it is the integrity and intention of the heart that God looks at, more than the bulk or number of the offerings. The one lamb (typifying the Lamb of God) was more acceptable than thousands of rams or bullocks would have been, without faith and prayer. Samuel was no priest, but he was a Levite and a prophet: the case was extraordinary, and what he did was by special direction, and therefore was accepted of God. And justly was this reproach put upon the priests, because they had corrupted themselves.

IV. God gave a gracious answer to Samuel's prayer; (v. 9.) The Lord heard him. He was himself a Samuel, asked of God, and many a Samuel, many a mercy, in answer to prayer, God gave him. Sons of prayer should be famous for praying, as Samuel was among them that call upon his name, Ps. 99. 6. The answer was a real answer, The Philistines were discomfited, (v. 10, 11.) totally routed, and that in such a manner as highly magnified the prayer of Samuel, the power of God, and the valour of Israel. 1. The prayer of Samuel was honoured, for at the very time when he was offering up his sacrifice, and his prayer with it, the battle began, and turned immediately against the Philistines. Thus while he was yet speaking God heard, and answered in thunder, Isa. 65. 24. God shewed that it was Samuel's prayer and sacrifice that he had respect to, and hereby let Israel know, that, as in a former engagement with the Philistines, he had justly chastised their presumptuous confidence in the presence of the ark, on the shoulders of two profane priests, so now he graciously accepted their humble dependence upon the prayer of faith, from the mouth and heart of a pious prophet. 2. The power of God was greatly honoured; for he took the work into his own hand, and discomfited them, not with great hail-stones, which would kill them, (as Josh. 10. 11.) but with a great thunder which frightened them, and put them into such terror and consternation that they fainted away, and became a very easy prey to the sword of Israel, before whom, being thus confounded, they were smitten. Josephus adds, that the earth quaked under them when first they made the onset, and in many places opened and swallowed them up; and that, beside the terror of the thunder, their faces and hands were burnt with lightning, which obliged them to shift for themselves by flight. And being thus driven to their heels by the immediate hand of God, (whom they feared not so much as they had feared his ark, ch. 4. 7.) then, 3. Honour was put upon the hosts of Israel; they were made use of for the completing of the victory, and had the pleasure of triumphing over their oppressors; they pursued the Philistines, and smote them. How soon did they find the benefit of their repentance, and reformation, and return to God! Now that they have thus engaged him for them, none of their enemies can stand before them.

V. Samuel erected a thankful memorial of this victory, to the glory of God, and for the encouragement of Israel; (v. 12.) he set up an Eben-ezer, the stone of help. If ever the people's hard hearts should lose the impressions of this providence, this stone would either revive the remembrance of it, and make them thankful, or remain a standing witness against them for their unthankfulness. 1. The place where this memorial was set up, was the same where, twenty years before, the Israelites were smitten before the Philistines, for that was beside Eben-ezer, ch. 4. 1. The sin which procured that defeat formerly, being pardoned upon their repentance, the pardon was sealed by this glorious victory in the very same place where they then suffered loss; see Hos. 1. 10. 2. Samuel himself took care to set up this monument; he had been instrumental by prayer to obtain the mercy, and therefore he thought himself in a special manner obliged to make this grateful acknowledgment of it. 3. The reason he gives for the name is, Hitherto hath the Lord helped us: in which he speaks thankfully of what was past, giving the glory of the victory to God only, who had added this to all his former favours; and yet he speaks somewhat doubtfully for the future: "Hitherto things have done well, but what God may yet do with us, we know not, that we refer to him; but let us praise him for what he has done." Note, The beginnings of mercy and deliverance are to be acknowledged by us with thankfulness, so far as they go, though they be not completely finished; nay, though the issue seem uncertain. Having obtained help from God, I continue hitherto, says blessed Paul. Acts, 26. 22.

13. So the Philistines were subdued, and they came no more into the coast of Israel: and the hand of the LORD was against the Philistines all the days of Samuel. 14. And the cities which the Philistines had taken from Israel were restored to Israel, from Ekron even unto Gath, and the coasts thereof did Israel deliver out of the hands of the Philistines. And there was peace between Israel and the Amorites. 15. And Samuel judged Israel all the days of his life. 16. And he went from year to year in circuit to Beth-el, and Gilgal, and Mizpeh, and judged Israel in all those places. 17. And his return was to Ramah; for there was his house; and there he judged Israel; and there he built an altar unto the LORD.

We have here a short account of the further good services that Samuel did to Israel. Having parted them from their idols, and brought them home to their God, he had put them into a capacity of receiving further benefits by his ministry. Having prevailed in that, he becomes, in other instances, a great blessing to them; yet, writing it himself, he is brief in the relation. We are not told here, but it appears, 2 Chron. 35. 18. that, in the days of Samuel the prophet, the people of Israel kept the ordinance of the passover with more than ordinary devotion, notwithstanding the distance of the ark and the desolations of Shiloh. Many good offices, no doubt, he did for Israel; but here we are only told how instrumental he was,

1. In securing the public peace; (v. 13.) In his days the Philistines came no more into the coast of Israel, made no inroads or incursions upon them, perceiving that God now fought for Israel, and that his hand was against the Philistines; this kept them in awe, and restrained the remainder of their wrath. Samuel was a protector and deliverer to Israel, not by dint of sword, as Gideon, nor by strength of arm, as Samson, but by the power of prayer to God, and carrying on a work of reformation among the people. Religion and piety are the best securities of a nation.

2. In recovering the public rights, v. 14. By his influence, Israel had the courage to demand the cities which the Philistines had unjustly taken from them, and had long detained; and the Philistines, not daring to contend with one that had so great an interest in heaven, tamely yielded to the demand, and restored (some think) even Ekron and Gath, two of their capital cities, though afterward they retook them; others think, some small towns that lay between Ekron and Gath, which were forced out of the Philistines' hands. This they got by their reformation and religion; they got ground of their enemies, and got forward in their affairs. It is added, There was peace between Israel and the Amorites, that is, the Canaanites, the remains of the natives. Not that Israel made any league with them, but they were quiet, and not so mischievous to Israel as they had sometimes been. Thus, when a man's ways please the Lord, he maketh even his enemies to be at peace with him, and give him no disturbance, Prov. 16. 7.

3. In administering public justice; (v. 15, 16.) He judged Israel: as a prophet, he taught them their duty, and reproved them for their sins, for that is called judging, Ezek. 20. 4.—22. 2. Moses judged Israel, when he made them know the statutes of God, and his laws; (Exod. 18. 16.) and thus Samuel judged them to the last, even after Saul was made king: so he promised them, then, when Saul was inaugurated, ch. 12. 23. I will not cease to teach you the good and right way. As a magistrate, he received appeals from the inferior courts, and gave judgment upon them; tried causes, and determined them; tried prisoners, and acquitted or condemned them, according to the law. This he did all his days, till he grew old and past service, and resigned to Saul; and afterward he exercised authority, when application was made to him; nay, he judged even Agag, and Saul himself. But when he was in his prime he rode the circuit, for the convenience of the country, at least of that part of it which lay most under his influence. He kept courts at Beth-el, Gilgal, and Mizpeh, all in the tribe of Benjamin; but his constant residence was at Ramah, his father's city, and there he judged Israel, whither they resorted to him from all parts with their complaints, v. 17.

4. In keeping up the public exercises of religion; for there, where, he lived he built an altar to the Lord, not in contempt of the altar that was at Nob, or Gibeon, or wherever the tabernacle was; but, divine justice having laid Shiloh waste, and no other place being yet chosen for them to bring their offerings to, (Deut. 12. 11.) he looked upon the law, which confined them to one place, to be for the present suspended, and therefore, being a prophet, and under divine direction, he did as the patriarchs did, he built an altar where he lived, both for the use of his own family, and for the good of the country that resorted to it. Great men should use their wealth, power, and interest, for the keeping up of religion in the places where they live.

CHAP. VIII.

Things went so very well with Israel, in the chapter before, under Samuel's administration, that, methinks, it is pity to find him so quickly, as we do in this chapter, old, and going off, and things working towards a revolution. But so it is; Israel's good days seldom continue long. We have here, I. Samuel decaying, v. 1. II. His sons degenerating, v. 2, 3. III. Israel discontented with the present government, and anxious to see a change. For, 1. They petition Samuel to set a king over them, v. 1, 5. 2. Samuel brings the matter to God, v. 6. 3. God directs him what answer to give them by way of reproof, (v. 7, 8.) and by way of remonstrance, setting forth the consequences of a change of the government, and how uneasy they would soon be under it, v. 9, 18. 4. They insist upon their petition, v. 19, 20. 5. Samuel promises them, from God, that they shall shortly be gratified, v. 21, 22. Thus hard it is for people to know when they are well off.

1. AND it came to pass, when Samuel was old, that he made his sons judges over Israel. 2. Now the name of his first born was Joel; and the name of his second, Abiah: they were judges in Beer-sheba. 3. And his sons walked not in his ways, but turned aside after lucre, and took bribes, and perverted judgment.

Two sad things we find here, but not strange things.

1. A good and useful man growing old, and unfit for service, v. 1. Samuel was old, and could not judge Israel as he had done. He is not reckoned to be past sixty years of age now, perhaps not so much; but he was a man betimes, was full of thoughts and cares when he was a child, which, perhaps, hastened the infirmities of age upon him: the fruits that are first ripe, keep the worst. He had spent his strength and spirits in the fatigue of public business, and now, if he think to shake himself as at other times, he finds he is mistaken, old age has cut his hair. Those that are in the prime of their time ought to be busy in doing the work of life; for as they go into years they will find themselves less disposed to $&$, and less able for it.

2. The children of a good man going to naught, and not treading in his steps. Samuel had giving his sons so good an education, and they had given him such good hopes of their doing well, and gained such a reputation in Israel, that he made them judges, assistants to him a while, and afterward deputies under him at Beer-sheba, which lay remote from Ramah, v. 2. Probably, the southern counties petitioned for their residence there, that they might not be necessitated to travel far with their causes: we have reason to think that Samuel gave them their commissions, not because they were his sons, (he had no ambition to entail the government upon his family, any more than Gideon had,) but because, for aught that yet appeared, they were men very fit for the trust; and none so proper to ease the aged judge, and take some of the burthen off him, as (cæteris paribus—other things being equal) his own sons, who, no doubt, were respected for their good father's sake, and, having such an advantage at setting out, might soon have been great, if they had been but good. But, alas! his sons walked not in his ways; (v. 3.) and when their character was the reverse of his, their relation to so good a man, which otherwise had been their honour, was really their disgrace. Degeneranti genus opprobrium—A good extraction is a reproach to him that degenerates from it. Note, Those that have the most grace themselves cannot give grace to their children. It has often been the grief of good men, to see their posterity, instead of treading in their steps, trampling upon them, and, as Job speaks, marring their path. Nay, many that have begun well, promised fair, and set out in the right paths, so that their parents and friends have had great hopes of them, yet afterwards have turned aside to by-paths, and been the grief of those of whom they should have been the joy. When Samuel's sons were made judges, and settled at a distance from him, then they discovered themselves. Thus, (1.) Many that have been well educated, and have conducted themselves well while they were under their parents' eye, when they have gone abroad into the world, and set up for themselves, have proved bad. Let none therefore be secure, either of themselves or their's, but depend on divine grace. (2.) Many that have done well in a state of meanness and subjection, have been spoiled by preferment and power. Honours change men's minds, and, too often, for the worse. It does not appear that Samuel's sons were so profane and vicious as Eli's sons; but, whatever they were in other respects, they were corrupt judges, they turned aside after lucre, after the mammon of unrighteousness, so the Chaldee reads it. Note, The love of money is the root of all evil. It is pernicious in any, but especially in judges. Samuel had taken no bribes, (ch. 12. 3.) but his sons did, though, no doubt, he warned them against it when he made them judges; and then they perverted judgment, in determining controversies, had an eye to the bribe, not to the law, and inquired who bid highest, not who had right on his side. It is sad with a people, when the public justice, that should do them right, being perverted, does them the greatest wrong.

4. Then all the elders of Israel gathered themselves together, and came to Samuel unto Ramah, 5. And said unto him, Behold, thou art old, and thy sons walk not in thy ways: now make us a king to judge us like all the nations. 6. But the thing displeased Samuel, when they said, Give us a king to judge us. And Samuel prayed unto the LORD. 7. And the LORD said unto Samuel, Hearken unto the voice of the people in all that they say unto thee: for they have not rejected thee, but they have rejected me, that I should not reign over them. 8. According to all the works which they have done since the day that I brought them up out of Egypt even unto this day, wherewith they have forsaken me, and served other gods, so do they also unto thee. 9. Now therefore hearken unto their voice: howbeit yet protest solemnly unto them, and shew them the manner of the king that shall reign over them. 10. And Samuel told all the words of the LORD unto the people that asked of him a king. 11. And he said, This will be the manner of the king that shall reign over you: He will take your sons, and appoint them for himself, for his chariots, and to be his horsemen; and some shall run before his chariots. 12. And he will appoint him captains over thousands, and captains over fifties; and will set them to ear his ground, and to reap his harvest, and to make his instruments of war, and instruments of his chariots. 13. And he will take your daughters to be confectionaries, and to be cooks, and to be bakers. 14. And he will take your fields, and your vineyards, and your olive-yards, even the best of them, and give them to his servants. 15. And he will take the tenth of your seed, and of your vineyards, and give to his officers, and to his servants. 16. And he will take your men-servants, and your maid-servants, and your goodliest young men, and your asses, and put them to his work. 17. He will take the tenth of your sheep: and ye shall be his servants. 18. And ye shall cry out in that day because of your king which ye shall have chosen you; and the LORD will not bear you in that day. 19. Nevertheless the people refused to obey the voice of Samuel; and they said, Nay; but we will have a king over us; 20. That we also may be like all the nations; and that our king may judge us, and go out before us, and fight our battles. 21. And Samuel heard all the words of the people, and he rehearsed them in the ears of the LORD. 22. And the LORD said to Samuel, Harken unto their voice, and make them a king. And Samuel said unto the men of Israel, Go ye every man unto his city.

We have here the starting of a matter perfectly new and surprising, which was, the setting up of kingly government in Israel. Perhaps the thing had been often talked of among them by those that were given to change, and affected that which looked great: but we do not find that it was ever till now publicly proposed and debated. Abimelech was little better than a titular king, though he is said to reign over Israel; (Judg. 9. 22.) and perhaps his fall had for a great while rendered the title of king odious in Israel, as that of Tarquinius did among the Romans; but if it had, by this time the odium was worn off, and some bold steps are here taken toward so great a revolution as that amounted to. Here is,

I. The address of the elders of Samuel in this matter, v. 4, 5. They gathered themselves together, by common consent, and not in a riotous tumultuous manner, but with respect due to his character: they came to him to his house at Ramah with their address, which contained,

1. A remonstrance of their grievances; in short, Thou art old, and thy sons walk not in thy ways. Many a fairer occasion that people had had to ask a king, when they were oppressed by their neighbours, or embroiled at home, for want of a king in Israel; but a small thing will serve factious spirits for a colour to desire a change. (1.) It was true that Samuel was old; but if that made him less able to ride the circuit, and sit long on the bench, yet it made him the more wise and experienced, and, upon that account, the fitter to rule. If he was old, was he not grown old in their service? And it was very unkind, ungrateful, nay, and unjust, to cast him off when he was old, who had spent his days in doing them good. God had saved his youth from being despicable, (ch. 3. 20.) yet they make his old age so, which should have been counted worthy of double honour. If old people be upbraided with their infirmities, and laid aside for them, let them not think it strange; Samuel himself was so. (2.) It was true that his sons did not walk in his ways, the more was his grief, but they could not say it was his fault: he had not, like Eli, indulged them in their badness, but was ready to receive complaints against them. And if that had been the thing desired, we may well suppose, upon the making out of the charge of bribery against them, he would have superseded their commissions, and punished them. But this would not content the elders of Israel, they had another project in their head.

2. A petition for the redress of these grievances, by setting a king over them: Make us a king to judge us like all the nations. Thus far it was well, that they did not rise up in rebellion against Samuel, and set up a king for themselves, vi et armis—by force; but they applied themselves to Samuel, God's prophet, and humbly begged of him to do it. But it appears, by what follows, that it was a bad motion, and ill made, and was displeasing to God. God designed them a king, a man after his own heart, when Samuel was dead; but they would anticipate God's counsel, and would have one, now that Samuel was old. They had a prophet to judge them, that had immediate correspondence with heaven, and therein they were great and happy above any nation, none having God so nigh unto them as they had. Deut. 4. 7. But this would not serve, they must have a king to judge them with external pomp and power, like all the nations. A poor prophet in a mantle, though conversant in the visions of the Almighty, looked mean in their eyes, who judged by outward appearance: but a king in a purple robe, with his guards and officers of state, would look great; and such a one they must have. They knew it was in vain to court Samuel to take upon him the title and dignity of a king, but he must appoint them one. They do not say, "Give us a king that is wise and good, and will judge better than thy sons do," but, "Give us a king," any body that will but make a figure. Thus foolishly do they forsake their own mercies, and, under pretence of advancing the dignity of their nation to that of their neighbours, did really thrust themselves down from their own excellency, and profane their crown, by casting it to the ground.

II. Samuel's resentment of this address, v. 6. Let us see how he took it: 1. It cut him to the heart. Probably, it was a surprise to him, and he had not any intimation before of their design, which made it the more grievous. The thing displeased Samuel; not when they upbraided him with his own infirmities and his children's irregularities, he could patiently bear what reflected on himself and his own family, but it displeased him when they said, Give us a king to judge us, because that reflected upon God and his honour. 2. It drove him to his knees; he gave them no answer for the present, but took some time to consider of what they proposed, and prayed unto the Lord for direction what to do, spreading the case before him, and leaving it with him, and so making himself easy. Samuel was a man much in prayer, and we are encouraged in every thing to make our requests known to God, Phil. 4. 6. When any thing disturbs us, it is our interest, as well as duty, to shew God our trouble, and he gives us leave to be humbly free with him.

III. The instruction God gave him concerning this matter. They that in straits seek to God, shall find him nigh unto them, and ready to direct them. He tells him,

1. That which would be an allay to his displeasure. Samuel was much disturbed at the motion, it troubled him greatly to see his prophetic office thus slighted, and all the good turns he had done to Israel thus ungratefully returned; but God tells him he must not think it either hard or strange. (1.) He must not think it hard that they had put this slight upon him, for they had herein put a slight upon God himself; "They have not rejected thee only, but they have rejected me; I share with thee in the affront," v. 7. Note, If God interest himself in the indignities that are done us, and the contempts that are put upon us, we may well afford to bear them patiently; nor need we think the worse of ourselves, if, for his sake, we bear reproach, (Ps. 69. 7.) but rather rejoice, and count it an honour, Col. 1. 24. Samuel must not complain that they were weary of his government, though just and gentle, for really they were weary of God's government, that was it they disliked; They have rejected me, that I should not reign over them. God reigns over the heathen, (Ps. 47. 8.) over all the world, but the government of Israel had hitherto been, in a more peculiar manner than ever any government was, a theocracy, a divine government; their judges had their call and commission immediately from God, the affairs of their nation were under his peculiar conduct. As the constitution, so the administration, of their government, was by, Thus saith the Lord; this method they were weary of, though it was their honour and safety, above any thing, so long as they kept in with God; they were indeed so much the more exposed to calamities, if they provoked God to anger by sin, and found they could not transgress at so cheap a rate as other nations could, which, perhaps, was the true reason why they desired to stand upon the same terms with God that other nations did. (2.) He must not think it strange, nor marvel at the matter, for they do as they always have done; (v. 8.) According to all the works which they have done, since the day that I brought them out of Egypt, so do they into thee. They had, at first, been so very respectful and obsequious to Samuel, that he began to hope they were cured of their old stubborn disposition; but now he found himself deceived in them, and must not be surprised at it. They had always been rude to their governors, witness Moses and Aaron; nay, They have forsaken me, and served other gods; the greatness of their crime, in affecting new gods, may make this crime, of affecting new governors, seem little. Samuel might expect they would deal treacherously, for they were called transgressors from the womb, Isa. 48. 8. This had been their manner from their youth up, Jer. 22. 21.

2. He tells him that which would be an answer to their demand. Samuel would not have known what to say, if God had not instructed him. Should he oppose the motion, it would bespeak a greater fondness of power and dominion than did become a prophet, and an indulgence of his sons. Should he yield to the motion, it would look like the betraying of his trust, and he would become accessory to all the bad consequences of a change. Aaron sinned in gratifying the people, when they said, Make us gods; he dares not therefore comply with them, when they say, Make us a king, but he gives them, with assurance, the answer God sent them.

(1.) He must tell them, that they shall have a king. Hearken to the voice of the people, (v. 7.) and again, v. 9. Not that God was pleased with their request, but as sometimes he crosses us, in love, so at other times he gratifies us, in wrath; he did so here. When they said, Give us a king, and princes, he gave them a king, in his anger. See Hos. 13. 10, 11. as he gave quails, Ps. 106. 15.—78. 29. God bade Samuel humour them in this matter, [1.] That they might be beaten with their own rod, and might feel, to their cost, the difference between his government and the government of a king. See 2 Chron. 12. 8. It soon appeared how much worse their condition was, in all respects, under Saul, than it had been under Samuel. [2.] To prevent something worse. If they were not gratified, they would either rise in rebellion against Samuel, or universally revolt from their religion, and admit the gods of the nations, that they might have kings like them. Rather than so, let them have a king. [3.] God knows how to bring glory to himself out of it, and serve his own wise purposes, even by their foolish counsels.

(2.) But he must tell them withal, that, when they have a king, they will soon have enough of him, and will, when it is too late, repent of their choice. This he must protest solemnly to them, (v. 9.) that, if they would have a king to rule them, as the eastern kings ruled their subjects, they would find the yoke exceedingly heavy. They looked only at the pomp and magnificence of a king, and thought that would make their nation great and considerable among its neighbours, and would strike a terror upon their enemies; but he must bid them consider how they would like to bear the charges of that pomp, and how they would endure that arbitrary power which the neighbouring kings assumed. Note, Those that set their hearts inordinately upon any thing in this world, for the moderating of their desires, ought to consider the inconveniencies, as well as conveniencies, that will attend it, and to set the one over against the other in their thoughts. Those that submit themselves to the government of the world and the flesh, are told plainly what hard masters they are, and what a tyranny the dominion of sin is; and yet they will exchange God's government for it.

IV. Samuel's faithful delivery of God's mind to them; (v. 10.) He told them all the words of the Lord, how ill he resented it; that he construed it into a rejecting of him, and compared it with their serving other gods; that he would grant their request, if they insisted on it; but, withal, had ordered him to represent to them the certain consequences of their choice, that they would be such as, if they had any reason left them, and would allow themselves to consult their own interest, would make them withdraw their petition, and beg to continue as they were. Accordingly, he lays before them, very particularly, what would be, not the right of a king in general, but the manner of the king that should reign over them, according to the pattern of the nations, v. 11. Samuel does not speak (as Bishop Patrick expounds it) of a just and honest right of a king to do these things, for his right is quite otherwise described in that part of Moses's law which concerns the king's duty, but such a right as the kings of the nations had then acquired. This shall be the manner of the king; that is, 1. "Thus he must support his dignity, at the expence of that which is dearest to you." 2. "Thus he will abuse his power, as those that have power are apt to do; and, having the militia in his hand, you will be under a necessity of submitting to him."

If they will have such a king as the nations have, let them consider,

(1.) That a king must have a great retinue, abundance of servants to wait on him, grooms to look after his chariots and horses, gentlemen to ride about with him, and footmen to run before his chariots. This is the chief grandeur of princes, and the imaginary glory of great men, to have a multitude of attendants. And whence must he have those? "Why, he will take your sons, who are free-born, have a liberal education, and whom you now have at your own disposal, and will appoint them for himself," v. 11. They must wait upon him, and be at his beck; they that used to work for their parents and themselves must work for him, eat his ground, and reap his harvest, (v. 12.) and count it their preferment too," v. 16. This would be a great change.

(2.) "He must keep a great table; he will not be content to dine with his neighbours upon a sacrifice, as Samuel used to do, (ch. 9. 13.) but he must have variety of dainty dishes, forced-meats, and sweet-meats, and delicate sauces. And who must prepare him these? Why, he will take your daughters, the most ingenious and handy of them, whom you hoped to prefer to houses and tables of their own, and, whether you be willing or no, they must be his confectionaries, and cooks, and bakers, and the like."

(3.) "He must needs have a standing army, for guards and garrisons; and your sons, instead of being elders of your cities, and living in quiet and honour at home, must be captains over thousands, and captains over fifties, and must be disposed of at the pleasure of the sovereign."

(4.) "You may expect that he will have great favourites, whom, having dignified and ennobled, he must enrich, and give them estates suitable to their honour; and which way can he do that, but out of your inheritances? v. 14. He will take your fields and vineyards, which descended to you from your ancestors, and which you hoped to have left to your posterity after you, even the best of them; and will not only take them to himself, (you could hear that the better,) but he will give them to his servants, who will be your masters, and bear rule over that for which you have laboured. How will you like that?"

(5.) "He must have great revenues, to maintain his grandeur and power with; and whence must he have them, but from you? He will take the tenth of the fruits of your ground, (v. 15.) and your cattle, v. 17. You think the tenths, the double tenths, which the law of God has appointed for the support of the church, grievous enough, and grudge the payment of them; but, if you have a king, there must issue another tenth out of your estates, which will be levied with more rigour, for the support of the royal dignity. Consider the expence with the magnificence, and whether it will quit cost."

These would be their grievances; and, [1.] They would have none but God to complain to. Once they complained to the prince himself, and were answered, according to the manner of the king, Your yoke is heavy, and I will add to it, 1 Kings, 12. 11. [2.] When they complained to God, he would not hear them; (v. 18.) nor could they expect that he should, both because they had been deaf to his calls and admonitions, and this trouble, in particular, they had brought upon themselves, by rejecting him, and would not believe, when he told them what would come of it. Note, When we bring ourselves into distress, by our own irregular desires and projects, we justly forfeit the comfort of prayer, and the benefit of divine aids, and, if God be not better to us than we deserve, must have our relief in our own hands, and then it is bad with us.

V. The people's obstinacy in their demand, v. 19, 20. One would think such a representation of the consequences, as this was, coming from God himself, who can neither deceive by his word, nor be deceived in his knowledge, should have prevailed with them to waive their request; but their hearts were upon it, right or wrong, good or evil; "We will have a king over us, whatever God or Samuel say to the contrary; we will have a king, whatever it costs us, and whatever inconvenience we bring upon ourselves or our posterity by it." See their folly. 1. They were quite deaf to reason, and blind to their own interest. They could not answer Samuel's arguments against it, nor deny the force of them, and yet they grow more violent in their request, and more insolent. Before it was, "Pray make us a king;" now it is, "Nay, but we will have a king; yea, that we will, because we will; nor will we bear to have any thing said against it." See the absurdity of inordinate desires, and how they rob men of their reason. 2. They could not stay God's time. God had intimated to them in the law, that, in due time, Israel should have a king, (Deut. 17. 14, 15.) and perhaps they had some intimation that the time was at hand; but they are all in haste, "We, in our day, will have this king over us." Could they but have waited ten or twelve years longer, they had had David, a king of God's giving in mercy, and all the calamities that attended the setting up of Saul had been prevented. Sudden resolves and hasty desires make work for a long and leisurely repentance. 3. That which they aimed at, in desiring a king, was, not only, as before, that they might be like the nations, and levelled with them, above whom God had so far advanced them, but that they might have one to judge them, and to go out before them when they took the field, and to fight their battles. Foolish people, and unwise! Could they ever desire a battle better fought for them than the last was, by Samuel's prayer, and God's thunder? ek. 7. 10. Was victory hereby too sure to them? and were they fond of trying the chance of war, at the same uncertainty that others did? So sick, it seems, were they of their privileges: and what was the issue? Their first king was slain in battle, which none of their judges ever were; so was Josiah, one of the last and best.

VI. The dismissing of them, with an intimation, that, very shortly, they should have what they asked. 1. Samuel rehearsed all their words in the ears of the Lord, v. 21. Not but that God perfectly knew it, without Samuel's report; but thus he dealt faithfully between God and Israel, as a prophet, returning the answer to him that sent him; and thus he waited on God for further direction. God is fully acquainted with the state of the case we are in care and doubt about, but he will know it from us. His rehearsing it in the ears of the Lord, intimates that it was done in private; for the people were not disposed to join with him in prayer to God, for direction in this matter; also it bespeaks a holy familiarity, to which God graciously admits his people; they speak in the ears of the Lord, as one friend whispers with another; their communion with God is meat they have to eat, which the world knows not of, John, 4. 32. 2. God gave direction that they should have a king, since they were so inordinately set upon it; (v. 22.) "Make them a king, and let them make the best of him, and thank themselves if that very pomp and power, which they are so eager to see their sovereign in, be their plague and burthen. So he gave them up to their own hearts' lust. Samuel told them this, but sent them home for the present, every man to his city; for the designation of the person must be left to God, they had now no more to do. When God saw fit to notify the choice to Samuel, they should hear further from him; in the mean time, let them keep the peace, and expect the issue.

CHAP. IX.

*Samuel had promised Israel, from God, that they should have a king; it is strange that the next news is not of candidates setting up for the government, making an interest in the people, or recommending themselves to Samuel, and, by him, to God, to be put in nomination. Why does not the prince of the tribe of Judah, whoever he is, look about him now, remembering Jacob's entail of the sceptre on that tribe? Is there never a bold aspiring man in Israel to say, "I will be king, if God will choose me?" No, none appears; whether it is owing to a culpable mean spiritedness, or a laudable humility, I know not, but sure it is what can scarcely be paralleled in the history of any kingdom—a crown, such a crown, set up, and nobody bids for it. Most governments began in the ambition of the prince to rule, but Israel's in the ambition of the people to be ruled. Had any of those elders which petitioned for a king, afterward petitioned to be king, I should have suspected that person's ambition to have been at the bottom of the motion; but now (let them have the praise of what was good in them) it was not so, God having, in the law, undertaken to choose their king; (Deut. 17. 15.) they all sit still, till they hear from heaven, and that they do in this chapter, which begins the story of Saul, their first king, and, by strange steps of Providence, brings him to Samuel, to be anointed privately, and so to be prepared for an election by lot, and a public commendation to the people, which follows in the next chapter. Here is, I. A short account of Saul's parentage and person, v. 1, 2. II. A large and particular account of the bringing of him to Samuel, to whom he had been before altogether a stranger. 1. God, by revelation, had bid Samuel expect him v. 15, 16. 2. God, by providence, led him to Samuel. (1.) Being sent to seek his father's asses, he was at a loss, v. 3. .5. (2.) By the advice of his servant, he determined to consult Samuel, v. 6. .10. (3.) By the direction of the young maidens, he found him out, v. 11. .14. (4.) Samuel, being informed of God concerning him, (v. 17.) treated him with respect in the gate, (v. 18. .21.) in the dining-room, (v. 22. .24.) and, at length, in private, where he prepared him to hear the surprising news, that he must be king, v. 25. .27. And these beginnings had been very hopeful and promising, if it had not been that the sin of the people was the spring of this great affair.*

1. NOW there was a man of Benjamin, whose name was Kish, the son of Abiel, the son of Zeror, the son of Bechorath, the son of Aphiah, a Benjamite, a mighty man of power. 2. And he had a son, whose name was Saul, a choice young man, and a goodly: and there was not among the children of Israel a goodlier person than he: from his shoulders and upward he was higher than any of the people.

We are here told,

1. What a good family Saul was of, v. 1. He was of the tribe of Benjamin; so was the New-Testament Saul, who also was called Paul, and he mentions it as his honour, for Benjamin was a favourite, Rom. 11. 1. Phil. 3. 5. That tribe had been reduced to a very small number by the fatal war with Gibeah, and much ado there was to provide wives for those six hundred men that were the poor remains of it out of that diminished tribe, which is here called, with good reason, the smallest of the tribes of Israel, v. 21. Saul sprang as a root out of a dry ground. That tribe, though fewest in number, was first in dignity, God giving more abundant honour to that part which lacked, 1 Cor. 12. 24. His father was Kish, a mighty man of power, or, as the margin reads it, in substance; in spirit stout, in body strong, in estate wealthy. The whole lot of the tribe of Benjamin coming to be distributed among six hundred men, we may suppose their inheritances were much larger than their's who were of other tribes—an advantage which somewhat helped to balance the disadvantage of the smallness of their number.

2. What a good figure Saul made, v. 2. No mention is here made of his wisdom or virtue, his learning or piety, or any of the accomplishments of his mind, but that he was a tall, proper, handsome man, that had a good face, a good shape, and a good presence, graceful, and well proportioned; among all the children of Israel, there was not a goodlier person than he; and, as if nature had marked him for pre-eminence and superiority, he was taller, by the head and shoulders, than any of the people, the fitter to be a match for the giants of Gath, the companions of the Philistines. When God chose a king after his own heart, he pitched upon one that was not at all remarkable for the height of his stature, nor any thing in his countenance, but the innocency and sweetness that appeared there; (ch. 16. 7, 12.) but, when he chose a king after the people's heart, who aimed at nothing so much as stateliness and grandeur, he pitched upon this huge tall man, who, if he had no other good qualities, yet would look great. It does not appear that he excelled in strength so much as he did in stature; Samson did, and him they slighted, bound, and betrayed into the hands of the Philistines; justly therefore are they now put off with one, who, though of uncommon height, is weak as other men. They would have a king like the nations, and the nations commonly chose portly men for their kings.

3. And the asses of Kish, Saul's father, were lost. And Kish said to Saul his son, Take now one of the servants with thee, and arise, go seek the asses. 4. And he passed through mount Ephraim, and passed through the land of Shalisha, but they found them not: then they passed through the land of Shalim, and there they were not: and he passed through the land of the Benjamites, but they found them not. 5. And when they were come to the land of Zuph, Saul said to his servant that was with him, Come, and let us return; lest my father leave caring for the asses, and take thought for us. 6. And he said unto him, Behold now, there is in this city a man of God, and he is an honourable man; all that he saith cometh surely to pass: now let us go thither; peradventure he can shew us our way that we should go. 7. Then said Saul to his servant, But, behold, if we go, what shall we bring the man? for the bread is spent in our vessels, and there is not a present to bring to the man of God: what have we? 8. And the servant answered Saul again, and said, Behold, I have here at hand the fourth part of a shekel of silver, that will I give to the man of God, to tell us our way. 9. (Before-time in Israel, when a man went to inquire of God, thus he spake, Come, and let us go to the seer: for he that is now called a Prophet was before-time called a Seer.) 10. Then said Sa I to his servant, Well said; come, let us go. So they went unto the city where the man of God was.

Here is,

I. A great man rising from small beginnings. It does not appear that Saul had any preferment at all, or was in any post of honour or trust, till he was chosen king of Israel. Most that are advanced rise gradually; but Saul, from the level with his neighbours, stepped at once into the throne, according to that of Hannah, He raiseth up the poor out of the dust, to set them among princes, ch. 2. 8. Saul, it should seem, though he was himself married, and had children grown up, yet lived in his father's house, and was subject to him. Promotion comes not by chance nor human probabilities, but God is the Judge.

II. A great event rising from small occurrences. How low does the history begin! Begin to trace Saul to the crown, we find him first employed as meanly as any we meet with called out to preferment.

1. Saul's father sends him, with one of his servants, to seek some asses that he had lost. It may be they had no way then to give public notice of such a number of asses strayed or stolen out of the grounds of Kish the Benjamite. A very good law they had to oblige men to bring back an ox or an ass that went astray, but, it is to be feared, that was, as other good laws, neglected and forgotten. It is easy to observe here, that they who have most expect to lose; that it is wisdom to look after what is lost; that no man should think it below him to know the state of his flocks; that children should be forward to serve their parents' interests; Saul readily went to seek his father's asses, v. 3, 4. His taking care of the asses is to be ascribed, not so much to the humility of his spirit, as to the plainness and simplicity of those times. But his obedience to his father in it was very commendable. Seest thou a man diligent in his business, and dutiful to his superiors, willing to stoop, and willing to take pains? he does, as Saul, stand fair for preferment. The servant of Kish would be faithful only as a servant, but Saul as a son, in his own business, and therefore he sent him with him. Saul and his servant travelled far on foot, it is likely, in quest of the asses, but in vain, they found them not. He missed of what he sought, but had no reason to complain of the disappointment, for he met with the kingdom, which he never dreamed of.

2. When he could not find them, he determined to return to his father, (v. 5.) in consideration of his father's tender concern for him, being apprehensive, that, if they stayed out any longer, his aged father would begin to fear, as Jacob concerning Joseph, that an evil beast had devoured them, or some mischief had befallen them; "He will leave caring for the asses, as much as he was in care about them, and will take thought for us." Children should take care that they do nothing to grieve or frighten their parents, but be tender of their tenderness.

3. His servant moved, (for it should seem he had more religion in him than his master,) that, since they were now at Ramah, they should call on Samuel, and take his advice in this important affair. Observe here,

(1.) They were close by the city where Samuel lived, and that put it into their heads to consult him; (v. 6.) There is in this city a man of God. Note, Wherever we are, we should improve our opportunities of acquainting ourselves with those that are wise and good. But there are many that will consult a man of God, if he comes in their way, that would not go a step out of their way to get wisdom.

(2.) The servant spoke very respectfully concerning Samuel, though he had no personal knowledge of him, but by common fame only; He is a man of God, and an honourable man. Note, Men of God are honourable men, and should be so in our eyes. Acquaintance with the things of God, and serviceableness to the kingdom of God, put true honour upon men, and make them great. This was the honour of Samuel, as a man of God, that all he saith comes surely to pass. This was observed concerning him, when he was a prophet, (ch. 3. 19.) God did let none of his words fall to the ground; and still it held true.

(3.) They agreed to advise with him concerning the way that they should go; Peradventure he can shew us. All the use they would make of the man of God, was, to be advised by him, whether they should return home, or, if there was yet any hopes of finding the asses, which way they must go next—a poor business to employ a prophet about! Had they said, “Let us give up the asses for lost, and now, that we are so near the man of God, let us go and learn from him the good knowledge of God, let us consult him how we may order our conversations aright, and inquire the law at his mouth, since we may not have such another opportunity, and then we shall not lose our journey,” the proposal had been such as became Israelites; but, to make prophecy, that glory of Israel, serve so mean a turn as this, discovered too much what manner of spirit they were of. Note, Most people would rather be told their fortune than told their duty; how to be rich, than how to be saved. If it were the business of the men of God to direct for the recovery of lost asses, they would be consulted much more than they are, now that it is their business to direct for the recovery of lost souls—so preposterous is the care of most men!

(4.) Saul was thoughtful, what present they should bring to the man of God, what fee they should give him for his advice; (v. 7.) What shall we bring the man? They could not present him, as Jeroboam's wife did Abijah, with loaves and cakes, (1 Kings, 14. 3.) for their bread was spent; but the servant bethought himself that he had in his pocket the fourth part of a shekel, (about sevenpence halfpenny in value,) and that he would give to the man of God, to direct them, v. 8. “That will do,” says Saul, let us go, v. 10. Some think, that, when Saul talked of giving Samuel a fee, he measured him by himself, or by his sons, as if he must be hired to do an honest Israelite a kindness, and were like the false prophets, that divined for money, Mic. 3. 11. He came to him as a fortune-teller rather than as a prophet, and therefore thought the fourth part of a shekel was enough to give him. But it rather seems to be agreeable to the general usage of these times, as it is to natural equity, that those who sowed spiritual things should reap not only eternal things from Him that employs them, but temporal things from those for whom they are employed. Samuel needed not their money, nor would he have denied them his advice, if they had not brought it; (it is probable, when he had it, he gave it to the poor;) but they brought it to him, as a token of their respect, and the value they put upon his office; nor did he refuse it, for they were able to give it, and, though it was but little, it was the widow's mite. But Saul, as he never thought of going to the man of God, till the servant proposed it, so, it should seem, he mentioned the want of a present as an objection against their going; he would not own that he had money in his pocket, but when the servant generously offered to be at the charge, then, “Well said,” says Saul, “come, let us go.” Most people love a cheap religion, and like it best, when they can devolve the expence of it on others.

(5.) The historian here takes notice of the name then given to the prophets; they called them Seers, or seeing men; (v. 9.) not but that the name prophet was then used, and applied to such persons, but that of seers was more in use. Note, Those that are prophets, must first be seers; they who undertake to speak to others of the things of God, must have an insight into those things themselves.

11. And as they went up the hill to the city, they found young maidens going out to draw water, and said unto them, Is the seer here? 12. And they answered them, and said, He is; behold, he is before you: make haste now, for he came to-day to the city; for there is a sacrifice of the people to-day in the high place. 13. As soon as ye be come into the city, ye shall straightway find him, before he go up to the high place to eat: for the people will not eat until he come, because he doth bless the sacrifice, and afterward they eat that he bidden. Now therefore get you up; for about this time ye shall find him. 14. And they went up into the city: and when they were come into the city, behold, Samuel came out against them, for to go up to the high place. 15. Now the LORD had told Samuel in his ear, a day before Saul came, saying, 16. To-morrow, about this time, I will send thee a man out of the land of Benjamin, and thou shalt anoint him to be captain over my people Israel, that he may save my people out of the hand of the Philistines: for I have looked upon my people, because their cry is come unto me. 17. And when Samuel saw Saul, the LORD said unto him, Behold the man whom I spake to thee of! this same shall reign over my people.

Here,

1. Saul, by an ordinary inquiry, is directed to Samuel, v. 11, 14. Gibeah of Saul was not twenty miles from Ramah, where Samuel dwelt, and was near to Mizpeh, where he often judged Israel; and yet, it seems, Saul had lived so very privately, and had taken so little notice of public affairs, that he had never seen Samuel; for, when he met him, (v. 18.) he did not know him, so that there was no cause to suspect any secret complaint or collusion between them in this matter. I knew him not, says John Baptist, concerning Christ, John, 1. 31. Yet I do not think it any commendation to Saul, that he was a stranger to Samuel. However, the maid-servants of Ramah, whom they met with at the places of drawing water, could give him and his servant intelligence concerning Samuel; and very particular they were in their directions, v. 12, 13. We should always be ready to give what assistance we can to those that are inquiring after God's prophets, and further them in their inquiries.

Even the maid-servants could tell them, 1. That there was a sacrifice that day in the high place, it being either an ordinary festival, or an extraordinary day of prayer and thanksgiving, with which sacrifices were joined. The tabernacle being deprived of the ark, the altar there had not now the reputation it formerly had, nor were they tied to it, as they would be, when God had again chosen a place to put his name in; and therefore now other places were allowed. Samuel had built an altar at Ramah, (ch. 7. 17.) and here we have him making use of that altar. 2. That Samuel came that day to the city, either from his circuit or from his country seat. He was such a public person, that his motions were generally known. 3. That this was just the time of their meeting to feast before the Lord upon the sacrifice; “About this time you will find him in the street, going up to the high place.” They knew the hour of the solemn feast. 4. That the people would not eat till Samuel came, not only because he was the worthiest person, and they ought, in good manners, to stay for him, and he was, as some think, the maker of the feast, the sacrifice being offered at his charge, and upon his account, but because, as a man of God, whoever made the feast, he must bless the sacrifice, that is, those parts of the sacrifice which they feasted upon; which may be considered, (1.) As a common meal; and so this is an instance of that great duty of craving a blessing upon our meat before we partake of it. We cannot expect benefit from our food without that blessing, and we have no reason to expect that blessing, if we do not pray for it. Thus we must give glory to God as our Benefactor, and own our dependence upon him, and our obligations to him. Or, (2.) As a religious assembly. When the sacrifice was offered, which was the ceremony, Samuel blessed it; that is, he prayed over it, and offered up spiritual sacrifices with it, which were the substance; and afterward, when the holy duties were performed, they did eat. Let the soul first be served. The feast upon the sacrifice being a sacred rite, it was requisite that it should in a particular manner be blessed, as is the Christian eucharist. They feasted, in token of their reconciliation to God by virtue of the sacrifice, and their participation of the benefits of it; and Samuel blessed it, that is, he prayed to God to grace the solemnity with his special presence, that it might answer those great ends.

Bishop Hall observes, what a particular account these maid-servants could give of the usages of those sacred feasts, and infers from it, That, "where there is practice and example of piety in the better sort, there will be a reflection of it upon the meanest. It is no small advantage to live in religious places; for we shall be much to blame if all goodness fall beside us."

Saul and his servant followed the directions given them, and very opportunely met Samuel going to the high place, the synagogue of the city, v. 14. This seemed purely accidental, but the Divine Providence ordered it for the forwarding of this great event. The wise God serves very great and certain purposes, by very small and casual occurrences. A sparrow falls not to the ground without our Father.

II. Samuel, by an extraordinary revelation, is informed concerning Saul. He was a seer, and therefore must see this in a way peculiar to himself.

1. God had told him, the day before, that he would, at this time, send him the man that should serve the people of Israel for such a king as they wished to have, like all the nations, v. 15, 16. He told him in his ear; that is, privately, by a secret whisper to his mind; or, perhaps, by a still small voice, some soft and gentle sounds conveyed to his ear, probably, when he was praying in secret for direction in that and other affairs of the nation. He had spoken in the ears of the Lord, (ch. 8. 21.) and now God spoke in his ear, in token of friendship and familiarity; for he revealeth his secret to his servants the prophets, as secrets in their ear, Amos, 3. 7. God told him before, that it might not be a surprise to him; and, perhaps, it was in expectation of it, that he appointed the feast and the sacrifice, for the imploring of God's blessing upon this great and important affair, though he might keep the particular occasion in his own breast, God having only told it him in his ear. The Hebrew phrase is, He uncovered the ear of Samuel; to which some allude, for the explication of the way of God's revealing himself to us; he not only speaks, but uncovers our ear. We have naturally a covering on our ears, so that we perceive not what God says; (Job, 33, 14.) but when God will manifest himself to a soul, he uncovers the ear, says, Ephphatha, Be opened; he takes the vail from off the heart, 2 Cor. 3. 16.

Though God had, in displeasure, granted their request for a king, yet here he speaks tenderly of Israel; for even in wrath he remembers mercy. (1.) He calls them again and again his people; though a peevish and provoking people, yet mine still. (2.) He sends them a man to be captain over them, that they might not be a body without a head, and to save them out of the hand of the Philistines, which, perhaps, was more than many of them aimed at in desiring a king. (3.) He does it with a gracious respect to them and to their cry, I have looked upon my people, and their cry is come unto me. He gratified them with what they cried for, as the tender mother humours the froward child, lest it should break its heart. And (as Bishop Patrick observes) though he would not hear their cry, to relieve them against the oppression of their kings, (ch. 8. 18.) yet he was so gracious as to make those kings instruments of their deliverance from the oppression of their neighbours; which was more than they had reason to expect.

2. When Saul came up toward him in the street, God again whispered Samuel in the ear; (v. 17.) Behold the man whom I spake to thee of! Saul being a man of unusual stature, it is natural to think that Samuel fixed his eye upon him at a distance, and perhaps, looked the more wistfully toward him, because the hour was now come when God would send him the man that should be king of Israel, and he fancied this might be he; but, that he might be fully satisfied, God told him expressly, That is the man that shall restrain, (for magistrates are heirs of restraint,) in my people Israel.

18. Then Saul drew near to Samuel in the gate, and said, Tell me, I pray thee, where the seer's house is. 19. And Samuel answered Saul, and said, I am the seer: go up before me unto the high place; for ye shall eat with me to-day, and to-morrow I will let thee go, and will tell thee all that is in thine heart. 20. And as for thine asses that were lost three days ago, set not thy mind on them; for they are found. And on whom is all the desire of Israel? Is it not on thee, and on all thy father's house? 21. And Saul answered and said, Am not I a Benjamite, of the smallest of the tribes of Israel? and my family the least of all the families of the tribe of Benjamin? wherefore then speakest thou so to me? 22. And Samuel took Saul and his servant, and brought them into the parlour, and made them sit in the chiefest place among them that were bidden, which were about thirty persons. 23. And Samuel said unto the cook, Bring the portion which I gave thee, of which I said unto thee, Set it by thee. 24. And the cook took up the shoulder, and that which was upon it, and set it before Saul. And Samuel said, Behold that which is left! set it before thee, and eat: for unto this time hath it been kept for thee, since I said, I have invited the people. So Saul did eat with Samuel that day. 25. And when they were come down from the high place into the city, Samuel communed with Saul upon the top of the house. 26. And they arose early: and it came to pass about the spring of the day, that Samuel called Saul to the top of the house, saying, Up, that I may send thee away. And Saul arose, and they went out both of them, he and Samuel, abroad. 27. And as they were going down to the end of the city, Samuel said to Saul, Bid the servant pass on before us, (and he passed on,) but stand thou still a while, that I may shew thee the word of God.

Providence having at length brought Samuel and Saul together, we have here an account of what passed between them in the gate, at the least, and in private.

I. In the gate of the city; passing through that, Saul found him, (v. 18.) and, little thinking that he was Samuel himself, asked him the way to Samuel's house; Tell me where the seer's house is; for there he expected to find him. See how mean a figure Samuel made, though so great a man; he took not any state, had no attendants, no ensigus of honour carried before him, nor any distinguishing habit, no not when he went to church, but appeared, in all respects, so much a common person, that Saul, though he was told he should meet him, never suspected that it was he, but as if he looked more like a porter than a prophet, asked him the way to the seer's house. Thus is great worth oftentimes hid under a very despicable appearance. Samuel knew that it was not the house, but the man, that he wanted, and therefore answered him, "I am the seer, the person you inquire for," v.19. Samuel knew him before he knew Samuel; thus, though all that are called to the kingdom of glory are brought to know God, yet first they were known of him, Gal. 4. 9.

Now, 1. Samuel obliges him to stay with him till the next day; the greatest part of this day had been spent in sacrificing, and the rest of it was to be spent in holy feasting, and therefore, "To-morrow I will let thee go, and not sooner; now go up before me to the high place; let us pray together, and then we will talk together." Saul had nothing in his mind but to find his asses; but Samuel would take him off from that care, and dispose him to the exercises of piety; and therefore bids him go to the high place, and go before him, because, it may be, some business obliged Samuel to call by the way. 2. He satisfies him about his asses; (v.20.) "Set not thy mind on them, be not in further care about them, they are found." By this, Saul might perceive that he was a prophet, that he could give him an answer to the inquiry which he had not yet made, and tell him what he thought; and from thence might infer, If a man of God could do this, much more doth God himself understand our thoughts afar off. 3. He surprises him with an intimation of preferment before him; "On whom is all the desire of Israel? Is it not a king that they are set upon? and there is never a man in Israel that will suit them so as thou wilt?" It does not appear that the country had as yet an eye upon him for the government, because they had left it wholly to God to choose for them; but such a one as he they wished for; and his advancement would be the advancement of his family and relations, as Abner, and others.

To this strange intimation Saul returns a very modest answer, v.21. Samuel, he thought, did but banter him, because he was a tall man, but a very unlikely man to be a king; for though the historian says (v.1.) his father was a mighty man of power, yet he himself speaks diminishingly of his tribe and family. "Benjamin, the youngest of Jacob's sons, when grown up to be a man, was called a little one, (Gen. 41. 20.) that tribe diminished by the war of Gibeab, and I am a Benjamite; my family the least;" probably, a younger house; not in any place of honour or trust, no not in their own tribe. Gideon had expressed himself thus, Judg. 6. 15. A humble disposition is a good presage of preferment.

II. At the public feast; thither Samuel took him and his servant. Though the advancing of Saul would be the deposing of Samuel, yet that good prophet was so far from envying him, or bearing him any ill-will for it, that he was the first and forwardest man to do him honour, in compliance with the will of God. If this be the man whom God has chosen, though he be none of Samuel's particular friends or confidants, yet he is heartily welcome to his table, nay, to his bosom. We may suppose it was no unseasonable kindness to Saul, to give him a meal's meat, for it seems, by what he said, (v.7.) that all their meat and money were spent. But this was not all, Samuel treats him not as a common person, but a person of quality and distinction, to prepare both him and the people for what was to follow. Two marks of honour he put upon him.

1. He set him in the best place, as more honourable than any other of the guests, to whom he said, Give this man place, Luke, 14. 9. Though we may suppose the magistrates were there, who in their own city would claim precedency, yet the master of the feast made Saul and his servant too (who, if he were a king, must be respected as his prime minister of state) sit in the chiefest place, v. 22. Note, Civil respects must be paid to those who, in civil things, have the precedency given them by the Divine Providence.

2. He presented him with the best dish; which having had notice from heaven the day before of his coming, (v.16.) he had designed for him, and ordered the cook to secure for him, when he gave orders for inviting the guests, and making preparation for them. And what should this precious dish be, which was so very carefully reserved for the king-elect? One would expect it should be something very nice and delicate; no, it was a plain shoulder of mutton: (v.23, 24.) the right shoulder of the peace-offering was to be given to the priests, who were God's receivers; (Lev. 7. 32.) the next in honour to that was the left shoulder, which, probably, was always allotted to those that sat at the upper end of the table, and was wont to be Samuel's mess at other times; so that his giving it to Saul, now, was an implicit resignation of his place to him. Some observe a significancy in this dish; the shoulder denotes strength, and the breast, which, some think, went with it, denotes affection: he that was king had the government upon his shoulder, for he must bear the weight of it; and the people in his bosom, for they must be dear to him.

III. What passed between them in private; both that evening and early the next morning, Samuel communed with Saul upon the flat roof of the house, v.25, 26. We may suppose Samuel now told him the whole story of the people's desire of a king, the grounds of their desire, and God's grant of it; to all which, Saul, living very private, was perhaps a stranger; he satisfied him that he was the person God had pitched upon for the government; and whereas Saul would object, that Samuel was in possession, and he would not for all the world take it out of his hands, Samuel, we may suppose, gave him all the assurance he could desire, of his willingness to resign. Early in the morning, he sent him toward home, brought him part of the way, bade him send his servant before, that they might be private, (v.27.) and there, as we find in the beginning of the next chapter, he anointed him, and therein shewed him the word of the Lord; that is, gave him full satisfaction that he was the person chosen to be king, for he would not jest with that sacred rite. It is by the unction of the Holy Ghost, that Christ; the great Prophet, shews us the word of the Lord; (1 John, 2. 27.) the same anointing teacheth you of all things.

CHAP. X.

We left Samuel and Saul walking together, probably some private way over the fields down from Ramah, perhaps in the paths of the vineyards, and Saul expecting to hear from Samuel the word of God. Now here we have, I. The anointing of Saul, then and there, v. 1. The signs Samuel gave him, (v. 2. .6.) and instructions, v. 7, 8. II. The accomplishment of those signs to the satisfaction of Saul, v. 9. .13. III. His return to his father's house, v. 14. .16. IV. His public election by lot, and solemn inauguration, v. 17. .25. V. His return again to his own city, v. 26, 27. It is a great work that is here a doing, the setting up not only of a monarch, but of monarchy itself, in Israel; and therefore, in all the advances towards it, much of God is seen.

1. THEN Samuel took a vial of oil, and poured it upon his head, and kissed him, and said, Is it not because the LORD hath anointed thee to be captain over his inheritance? 2. When thou art departed from me to-day, then thou shalt find two men by Rachel's sepulchre in the border of Benjamin at Zelzah; and they will say unto thee, The asses which thou wentest to seek are found; and, lo, thy father hath left the care of the asses, and sorroweth for you, saying, What shall I do for my son? 3. Then shalt thou go on forward from thence, and thou shalt come to the plain of Tabor, and there shall meet the three men going up to God to Beth-el, one carrying three kids, and another carrying three loaves of bread, and another carrying a bottle of wine: 4. And they will salute thee, and give thee two loaves of bread; which thou shalt receive of their hands. 5. After that, thou shalt come to the hill of God, where is the garrison of the Philistines: and it shall come to pass, when thou art come thither to the city, that thou shalt meet a company of prophets coming down from the high place, with a psaltery, and a tabret, and a pipe, and a harp, before them; and they shall prophesy: 6. And the Spirit of the Lord will come upon thee, and thou shalt prophesy with them, and shalt be turned into another man. 7. And let it be, when these signs are come unto thee, that thou do as occasion shall serve thee; for God is with thee. 8. And thou shalt go down before me to Gilgal; and, behold, I will come down unto thee, to offer burnt-offerings, and to sacrifice sacrifices of peace-offerings: seven days shalt thou tarry, till I come to thee, and shew thee what thou shalt do.

Samuel is here executing the office of a prophet, giving Saul full assurance from God that he should be king, as he was afterward, according to these prophecies which went before of him.

I. He anointed him, and kissed him, v. 1. This was not done in a solemn assembly, but, being done by divine appointment, that made up the want of all external solemnities, nor was it ever the less valid for its being done in private, under a hedge, or, as the Jews say, by a fountain. God's institutions are great and honourable, though the circumstances of their administration be ever so mean and despicable. 1. Samuel, by anointing Saul, assured him that it was God's act to make him king, Is it not because the Lord hath anointed thee? And, in token of that, the high priest was anointed to his office, which signified the conferring of those gifts upon him that were requisite for the discharge of his office; and the same was intimated in the anointing of kings; for, whom God calls he qualifies, and that is a good proof of a commission. These sacred unctions, then used, pointed at the great Messiah, or anointed One, the King of the church, and High Priest of our profession, who was anointed with the oil of the Spirit, not by measure, but without measure, and above all the priests and princes of the Jewish church. It was common oil, no doubt, which Samuel used, and we read not of his blessing it, or praying over it. But it was only a vial of oil that he anointed him with; the vessel brittle, because his kingdom would soon be cracked and broken; and the quantity small, because he had but little of the Spirit conferred upon him, to what David had, who was therefore anointed with a horn of oil, and so were Solomon and Jehu with a box of oil. 2. By kissing him, he assured him of his own approbation of the choice; not only his consent to it, but his complacency in it, though it abridged his power and eclipsed his glory, and the glory of his family. "God has anointed thee," says Samuel, "to be king, and I am satisfied and very well pleased, in pledge of which, take this kiss." It was likewise a kiss of homage and allegiance; hereby he not only owns him to be king, but his king; and in this sense we are commanded to kiss the Son, Ps. 2. 12. God has anointed him, and therefore we must thus acknowledge him, and do homage to him. In Samuel's explication of the ceremony, he reminds him, (1.) Of the nature of the government to which he is called; he was anointed to be captain, a commander indeed, which bespeaks honour and power, but a commander in war, which bespeaks care, and toil, and danger. (2.) Of the original of it; The Lord hath anointed thee. By him he ruled, and therefore must rule for him, in dependence on him, and with an eye to his glory. (3.) Of the end of it; it is over his inheritance, to take care of that, protect it, and order all the affairs of it for the best, as a steward whom a great man sets over his estate, to manage it for his service, and give an account of it to him.

II. For his further satisfaction, he gives him some signs, which should come to pass immediately, this very day; and they were such as would not only confirm the word of Samuel in general, and prove him a true prophet, but would confirm this word to Saul in particular, that he should be king.

1. He should presently meet with some that would bring him intelligence from home, of the care his father's house was in concerning him; (v. 2.) these he would meet hard by Rachel's sepulchre. The first place he directed him to was a sepulchre, the sepulchre of one of his ancestors, for Rachel died in travail with Benjamin; there he must read a lecture of his own mortality, and, now that he had a crown in his eye, must think of his grave, in which all his honour would be laid in the dust. Here two men would meet him, perhaps sent on purpose to look after him, and would tell him the asses were found, and his father was in pain concerning him, saying, What shall I do for my son? He would reckon it happened well that he met with these messengers; and it is good to eye Providence in favourable conjunctures, (though the matter be minute,) and to be encouraged to trust it in greater matters.

2. He should next meet with others going to Bethel, where, it should seem, there was a high place for religious worship, and these men were bringing their sacrifices thither, v. 3, 4. It was a token for good to one that was designed for the government of Israel, wherever he came, to meet with people going to worship God. It is supposed that those kids and loaves, and the bottle of wine, which the three men had with them, were designed for sacrifice, with the meat-offerings and drink-offerings that were to attend the sacrifice: yet Samuel tells Saul they would give him two of their loaves, and he must take them. This would look to us now like the relieving of a beggar. Saul must hereafter remember the time when he received alms, and must therefore be humble and charitable to the poor. But, perhaps, it would then be construed a fit present for a prince; and, as such, Saul must receive it, the first present that was brought him, by such as knew not what they did, nor why they did it, but God put it into their hearts, which made it the more fit to be a sign to him. These two loaves, which were the first tribute paid to this new-anointed king, might serve for an admonition to him, not to spend the wealth of his crown in luxury, but still to be content with plain food. Bread is the staff of life.

3. The most remarkable sign of all would be his joining with a company of prophets that he should meet with, under the influence of a spirit of prophecy, which should at that time come upon him. What God works in us by his Spirit, serves much more for the confirming of faith, than any thing wrought for us by his providence. He here tells him, v. 5, 6. (1.) Where this would happen; at the hill of God, where there was a garrison of the Philistines; which is supposed to be near Gibeah, his own city, for there was the Philistines' garrison, ch. 13. 3. Perhaps, it was one of the articles of Samuel's agreement with them, that they should have a garrison there, or rather, after they were subdued in the beginning of his time, they got ground again, so far as to force this garrison into that place, and thence God raised up the man that should chastise them. There was a place that was called the hill of God, because one of the schools of the prophets was built upon it; and such respect did even Philistines themselves pay to religion, that a garrison of their soldiers suffered a school of God's prophets to live peaceably by them, and did not only not dislodge them, but not restrain or disturb the public exercises of their devotion. (2.) Upon what occasion; he should meet a company of prophets with music before them, prophesying, and with them he should join himself. These prophets were not (as it should seem) divinely inspired to foretell things to come, nor did God reveal himself to them by dreams and visions, but they employed themselves in the study of the law, in instructing their neighbours, and in the acts of piety, especially in praising God, wherein they were wonderfully assisted and enlarged by the Spirit of God. It was happy for Israel, that they had not only prophets, but companies of prophets, who gave them good instructions, and set them good examples, and helped very much to keep up religion among them. Now the word of the Lord was not precious, as it had been when

Samuel was first raised up, who had been instrumental in founding these colleges, or religious houses, whence, it is probable, the synagogues took their rise. What pity was it that Israel should be weary of the government of such a man, who, though he had not, as a man of war, expelled the Philistines, yet (which was a greater kindness to Israel) had, as a man of God, settled the schools of the prophets! Music was then used as a proper means to dispose the mind to receive the impressions of the good Spirit, as it did Elisha's; (2 Kings, 3.15.) but we have no reason to look for the same benefit by it now, unless we saw it as effectual as it was then, in Saul's case, to drive away the evil spirit. These prophets had been at the high place, probably, offering sacrifice, and now they came back singing psalms. We should come from holy ordinances with our hearts greatly enlarged in holy joy and praise. See Ps. 138. 5. Saul should find himself strongly moved to join with them, and should be turned thereby into another man from what he had been while he lived in a private capacity. The Spirit of God, by his ordinances, changes men, wonderfully transforms them; Saul, by praising God in the communion of saints, became another man, but whether a new man or no, may be questioned.

III. He directs him to proceed in the administration of his government, as Providence should lead him, and as Samuel should advise him. 1. He must follow Providence in ordinary cases; (v. 7.) "Do as occasion shall serve thee. Take such measures as thine own prudence shall direct thee." But, 2. In an extraordinary strait, that would hereafter befall him at Gilgal, and would be the most critical juncture of all other, when he would have special need of divine aids, he must wait for Samuel to come to him, and must tarry seven days in expectation of him, v. 8. How his failing in this matter proved his fall we find afterward, ch. 13. 11. It was a plain intimation to him, that he was upon his good behaviour, and, though a king, must act under the direction of Samuel, and do as he should order him. The greatest of men must own themselves in subjection to God and his word.

9. And it was so, that when he had turned his back to go from Samuel, God gave him another heart: and all those signs came to pass that day. 10. And when they came thither to the hill, behold, a company of prophets met him; and the Spirit of God came upon him, and he prophesied among them. 11. And it came to pass, when all that knew him beforetime saw that, behold, he prophesied among the prophets, then the people said one to another, What is this that is come unto the son of Kish? Is Saul also among the prophets? 12. And one of the same place answered and said, But who is their father? Therefore it became a proverb, Is Saul also among the prophets? 13. And when he had made an end of prophesying, he came to the high place. 14. And Saul's uncle said unto him and to his servant, Whither went ye? And he said, To seek the asses: and when we saw that they were no where, we came to Samuel. 15. And Saul's uncle said, Tell me, I pray thee, what Samuel said unto you. 16. And Saul said unto his uncle, He told us plainly that the asses were found. But of the matter of the kingdom, whereof Samuel spake, he told him not.

Saul has now taken his leave of Samuel, much amazed, we may well suppose, at what had been done to him, almost ready to question whether he was awake or no, and whether it be not all a dream. Now here we are told,

I. What occurred by the way, v. 9. Those signs which Samuel had given him, came to pass very punctually; but that which gave him the greatest satisfaction of all, was this, he found immediately that God had given him another heart. A new fire was kindled in his breast, such as he had never before been acquainted with; seeking his asses is quite out of his mind, and he thinks of nothing but fighting the Philistines, redressing the grievances of Israel, making laws, administering justice, and providing for the public safety: these are the things that now fill his head. He finds himself raised to such a pitch of boldness and bravery, as he never thought he should have been conscious of. He has no longer the heart of a husbandman, that is low, and mean, and narrow, and concerned only about his corn and cattle; but the heart of a statesman, a general, a prince. Whom God calls to service he will make fit for it. If he advance to another station, he will give another heart to those who sincerely desire to serve him with their power.

II. What occurred when he came near home; they came to the hill, (v. 10.) that is, to Gibeah, or Geba, which signifies a hill; and so the Chaldee here takes it as a proper name; he met with the prophets as Samuel had told him, and the Spirit of God came upon him; strongly and suddenly, so the word signifies; but not so as to rest and abide upon him. It came on, so as to go off quickly: however, for the present, it had a strange effect upon him; for he immediately joined with the prophets, in their devotion, and that with as much decorum, and as great a transport of affection, as any of them; He prophesied among them.

Now, 1. His prophesying was publicly taken notice of, v. 11, 12. He was now among his acquaintance, who, when they saw him among the prophets, called one another to come and see a strange sight. This would prepare them to accept of him as a king, though one of themselves, when they had seen how God had advanced him to the honour of a prophet. The seventy elders prophesied before they were made judges, Numb. 11. 25. Now, (1.) They all wondered to see Saul among the prophets. What is this that is come to the son of Kish? Though this school of the prophets was near his father's house, yet he had never associated with them, nor shewed them any respect, perhaps had sometimes spoken slightly of them; and now to see him prophesying among them was a surprise to them, as it was long after, when his namesake, in the New Testament, preached that gospel which he had before persecuted, Acts, 9, 21. Where God gives another heart, it will soon shew itself. (2.) One of them, that was wiser than the rest, asked, "Who is their father, or instructor? Is it not God? Are they not all taught of him? Do they not all owe their gifts to him? And is he limited? Cannot he make Saul a prophet, as well as any of them, if he pleases?" Or, "Is not Samuel their father?" Under God, he was so; and Saul had now lately been with him, which, by his servant, he might know. No marvel for him to prophesy, who lay, last night, under Samuel's roof. (3.) It became a proverb, commonly used in Israel, when they would express their wonder at a bad man's either becoming good, or, at least, being found in good company, Is Saul among the prophets? Note, Saul among the prophets, is a wonder, to a proverb. Let not the worst be despaired of, yet let not an external shew of devotion, and a sudden change for the present, be too much relied on; for Saul, among the prophets, was Saul still.

But, 2. His being anointed was kept private. When he had done prophesying, (1.) It should seem he uttered all his words before the Lord, and recommended the affair to his favour; for he went straight to the high place, (v. 13.) to give God thanks for his mercies to him, and to pray for the continuance of those mercies. But, (2.) He industriously concealed it from his relations. His uncle, who met with him either at the high place, or as soon as he came home, examined him, v. 14. Saul owned, for his servant knew it, that they had been with Samuel, and that he told them the asses were found, but said not a word of the kingdom, v. 14, 15. This was an instance, [1.] Of his humility; many a one would have been so elevated with this surprising elevation, as to proclaim it upon the house-top. But Saul, though he might please himself with it, in his own breast, did not pride himself in it among his neighbours. The heirs of the kingdom of glory are well enough pleased that the world knows them not, 1 John, 3. 1. [2.] Of his prudence. Had he been forward to proclaim it, he would have been envied, and he knew not what difficulty that might have created him. Samuel had communicated it to him as a secret, and he knows how to keep counsel. Thus it appears that he had another heart, a heart fit for government. [3.] Of his dependence upon God. He does not go about to make an interest for himself, but leaves it to God to carry on his own work by Samuel, and, for his own part, sits still to see how the matter will fall.

17. And Samuel called the people together unto the Lord to Mizpeh: 18. And said unto the children of Israel, Thus saith the Lord God of Israel, I brought up Israel out of Egypt, and delivered you out of the hand of the Egyptians, and out of the hand of all kingdoms, and of them that oppressed you: 19. And ye have this day rejected your God, who himself saved you out of all your adversities and your tribulations; and ye have said unto him, Nay, but set a king over us. Now therefore present yourselves before the Lord by your tribes, and by your thousands. 20. And when Samuel had caused all the tribes of Israel to come near, the tribe of Benjamin was taken. 21. When he had caused the tribe of Benjamin to come near by their families, the family of Matri was taken, and Saul the son of Kish was taken: and when they sought him, he could not be found. 22. Therefore they inquired of the Lord further, if the man should yet come thither. And the Lord answered, Behold, he hath hid himself among the stuff. 23. And they ran and fetched him thence: and when he stood among the people, he was higher than any of the people from his shoulders and upward. 24. And Samuel said to all the people, See ye him whom the Lord hath chosen, that there is none like him among all the people? And all the people shouted, and said, God save the king. 25. Then Samuel told the people the manner of the kingdom, and wrote it in a book, and laid it up before the Lord. And Samuel sent all the people away, every man to his house. 26. And Saul also went home to Gibeah: and there went with him a band of men, whose hearts God had touched. 27. But the children of Belial said, How shall this man save us? And they despised him, and brought him no presents. But he held his peace.

Saul's nomination to the throne is here made public, in a general assembly of the elders of Israel, the representatives of their respective tribes, at Mizpeh. It is probable that this convention of the states was called as soon as conveniently it might, after Saul was anointed, for, if there must be a change in their government, the sooner the better: it might be of bad consequence to be long in the doing. The people being met in a solemn assembly, in which God was, in a peculiar manner, present, (and therefore it is said, they were called together unto the Lord, v. 17.) Samuel acts for God among them.

I. He reproves them for casting off the government of a prophet, and desiring that of a captain. He shews them (v. 18.) how happy they had been under the divine government; when God ruled them, he delivered them out of the hand of them that oppressed them, and what would they desire more? Could the mightiest man of valour do that for them which the Almighty God had done? He likewise shews them (v. 19.) what an affront they had put upon God, (who had himself saved them out of all their tribulations, by his own power, and by such as he had immediately called and qualified,) in desiring a king to save them. He tells them, in plain terms, "Ye have this day rejected your God, ye have, in effect, done it, so he construes it, and he might justly, for your so doing, reject you." They that can live better by sense than by faith, that stay themselves upon an arm of flesh rather than upon the Almighty arm, forsake a fountain of living waters for broken cisterns. And some make their obstinacy in this matter to be a presage of their rejecting Christ, in casting off whom, they cast off God, that he should not reign over them.

II. He puts them upon choosing their king by lot; he knew whom God had chosen, and had already anointed him, but he knew also the peevishness of that people, and that there were those among them who would not acquiesce in the choice, if it depended upon his single testimony; and therefore that every tribe, and every family of the chosen tribe, might please themselves with having a chance for it, he calls them to the lot, v. 19. Benjamin is taken out of all the tribes, (v. 20.) and out of that tribe Saul, the son of Kish, v. 21. By this method, it would appear to the people, as it already appeared to Samuel, that Saul was appointed of God to be king, for the disposal of the lot is of the Lord. It would also prevent all disputes and exceptions, for the lot couseth contention to cease, and parteth between the mighty. When the tribe of Benjamin was taken, they might easily foresee that they were setting up a family that would soon be put down again, for dying Jacob had, by the spirit of prophecy, entailed the dominion upon Judah; that is the tribe that must rule as a lion, Benjamin shall only ravin as a wolf, Gen. 49. 10, 27. Those therefore that knew the scriptures, could not be very fond of the doing of that which they foresaw must, ere long, be undone again.

III. It is with much ado, and not without further inquiries of the Lord, that Saul is at length produced. When the lot fell upon him, every one expected he should answer to his name at the first call, but, instead of that, none of his friends could find him, (v. 21.) he had hid himself among the stuff, v. 22. So little fond was he now of that power, which yet, when he was in possession of, he could not, without the utmost indignation, think of parting with. He withdrew, in hopes that, upon his not appearing, they would proceed to another choice; or thus to express his modesty, for, by what had already passed, he knew he must be the man. We may suppose he was at this time really averse to take upon him the government, 1. Because he was conscious to himself of unfitness for so great a trust. He had not been bred up to books, or arms, or courts, and feared he should be guilty of some fatal blunder. 2. Because it would expose him to the envy of his neighbours that were ill affected toward him. 3. Because he understood, by what Samuel had said, that the people sinned in asking a king, and it was in anger that God granted their request. 4. Because the affairs of Israel were at this time in a bad posture: the Philistines were strong, the Ammonites threatening, and he must be bold indeed that will set sail in a storm.

But the congregation, believing that choice well made, which God himself made, would leave no way untried to find him out on whom the lot fell. They inquired of the Lord, either by the high priest, and his breast-plate of judgment, or by Samuel, and his spirit of prophecy; and the Lord directed them where they should find him, hid among the carriages, and thence they fetched him, v. 23. Note, None will be losers at last by their humility and modesty. Honour, like the shadow, follows those that flee from it, but flees from those that pursue it.

IV. Samuel presents him to the people, and they accept of him. He needed not mount the bench or scaffold, to be seen; when he stood upon even ground with the rest, he topt them all, was seen above them all, for he was taller than any of them by head and shoulders, v. 23. "Look you," said Samuel, "what a king God has chosen for you, just such a one as you wished for; there is none like him among all the people, that has so much majesty in his countenance, and such a graceful stateliness in his mien; he is in the crowd like a cedar among the shrubs. Let your own eyes be judges, is he not a brave and gallant man?" The people hereupon signified their approbation of the choice, and their acceptance of him; they shouted and said, Let the king live; that is, "Let him long reign over us, in health and prosperity." Subjects were wont to testify their affection and allegiance to their prince, by their good wishes, and those turned (as our translation does this) into addresses to God, Ps. 72. 15. Prayer shall be made for him continually, Ps. 20. 1. Samuel had told them, they would soon be weary of their king, but, in the mind they are now in, they will never be so: Let him live.

V. Samuel settles the original contract between them, and leaves it upon record, v. 25. He had before told them the manner of the king, (ch. 8. 11.) how he would abuse his power; now he tells them the manner of the kingdom, or rather, the law, or judgment, or constitution, of it; what power the prince might challenge, and the utmost of the property the subject might claim. He fixed the land-marks between them, that neither might encroach upon the other; let them rightly understand one another at first, and let the agreement remain in black and white, and that will preserve a good understanding between them ever after. The learned Bishop Patrick thinks he now repeated and registered what he had told them, (ch. 8. 11.) of the arbitrary power their kings would assume; that it might hereafter be a witness against them, that they had drawn the calamity upon themselves, for they were warned what it would come to, and yet they would have a king.

VI. The convention was dissolved, when the solemnity was over; Samuel sent every man to his house. Here were no votes past, nor, for aught that appears, so much as a motion made, for the raising of money to support the dignity of their new-elected king; if therefore he afterward think fit to take what they do not think fit to give, (which yet it was necessary that he should have,) they must thank themselves. They went every man to his house, pleased with the name of a king over them, and Saul also went home to Gibeah, to his father's house, not puffed up with the name of a kingdom under him. At Gibeah he had no palace, no throne, no court, yet thither he goes. If he must be a king, as one mindful of the rock out of which he was hewn, he will make his own city the royal city, nor will he be ashamed (as too many are, when they are preferred) of his mean relations. Such a humble spirit as this puts a beauty and lustre upon great advancements. The condition rising, and the mind not rising with it, behold, how good and pleasant it is!

But how did the people stand affected to their new king? The generality of them, it should seem, did not shew themselves much concerned, they went every man to his own house, their own domestic affairs lay nearer their hearts than any interests of the public; this was the general temper. But, 1. There were some so faithful as to attend him, (v. 26.) a band of men whose hearts God had touched. Not the body of the people, but a small company, who, either because they were fond of their own choice of a king, or because they were pleased with God's choice of this king, or because they have so much more sense than their neighbours, as to conclude, that if he were a king, he ought to be respected accordingly, went with him to Gibeah, as his life-guard. They were those whose hearts God had touched, in this instance, to do their duty. Note, Whatever good there is in us, or is done by us, at any time, it must be ascribed to the grace of God. If the heart bend at any time the right way, it is because he has touched it. One touch is enough, when it is divine. 2. There were others so spiteful as to affront him; children of Belial, men that would endure no yoke, that would be pleased with nothing that either God or Samuel did; they despised him, (v. 27.) for the meanness of his tribe and family, the smallness of his estate, and privacy of his education; and they said, How shall this man save us? Yet they did not propose any man more likely; nor, whomsoever they had, must their salvation come from the man, but from God. They would not join with their neighbours in testifying an affection to him and his government, by bringing him presents, or addressing him upon his accession to the crown. Perhaps, those discontented spirits were most earnest for a king, and yet, now that they had one, they quarrelled with him, because he was not altogether such a one as themselves. It was reason enough for them not to like him, because others did. Thus differently are men affected to our exalted Redeemer. God hath set him King upon the holy hill of Zion. There is a remnant that submit to him, rejoice in him, bring him presents, and follow him wherever he goes; and they are such whose hearts God has touched, whom he has made willing in the day of his power. But there are others who despise him, who ask, How shall this man save us? They are offended in him, stumble at his external meanness, and they will be broken by it.

Lastly, How did Saul resent the bad conduct of those that were disaffected to the government? He held his peace; margin, He was as though he had been deaf. He was so far from resenting it, that he seemed not to take notice of it. Which was an evidence both of his humility and modesty, and the mercifulness of his disposition, and also, that he was well satisfied with his title to the crown; for those are commonly most jealous of their honour, and most revengeful of affronts, that gain their power by improper means. Christ held his peace when he was affronted, for it was the day of his patience; but there is a day of recompence coming.

CHAP. XI.

In this chapter, we have the first fruits of Saul's government, in the glorious rescue of Jabesh-gilead out of the hands of the Ammonites. Let not Israel thence infer that therefore they did well to ask a king, God could and would have saved them without one; but let them admire God's goodness that he did not reject them when they rejected him, and acknowledge his wisdom in the choice of the person, whom, if he did not find fit, yet he made fit, for the great trust he called him to, and enabled, in some measure, to merit the crown by his public services, before it is fixed on his head by the public approbation. Here is, I. The great extremity to which the city of Jabesh-gilead was reduced, on the other side Jordan, by the Ammonites, v. 1. 3 II. Saul's great readiness to come to their relief, whereby he signalized himself, v. 4. 10. III. The good success of his attempt, by which God signalized him, v. 11. IV. Saul's tenderness, notwithstanding this, toward those that had opposed him, v. 12, 13. V. The public confirmation and recognition of his election to the government, v. 14, 15.

1. THEN Nahash the Ammonite came up, and encamped against Jabesh-gilead: and all the men of Jabesh said unto Nahash, Make a covenant with us, and we will serve thee. 2. And Nahash the Ammonite answered them, On this condition will I make a covenant with you, that I may thrust out all your right eyes, and lay it for a reproach upon all Israel. 3. And the elders of Jabesh said unto him, Give us seven days' respite, that we may send messengers unto all the coasts of Israel: and then, if there be no man to save us, we will come out to thee. 4. Then came the messengers to Gibeah of Saul, and told the tidings in the ears of the people: and all the people lifted up their voices, and wept.

The Ammonites were bad neighbours to those tribes of Israel that lay next them, though descendants from just Lot, and, for that reason, dealt civilly with by Israel. See Deut. 2. 19. Jephthah, in his time, had humbled them, but now the sin of Israel had put them into a capacity to make head again, and avenge that quarrel. The city of Jabesh-gilead had been, some ages ago, destroyed by Israel's sword of justice, for not appearing against the wickedness of Gibeah; (Judg. 21. 10.) and now, being replenished again, probably, by the posterity of those that then escaped the sword, it is in danger of being destroyed by the Ammonites, as if some bad fate attended the place. Nahash, king of Ammon, (1 Chron. 19. 1.) laid siege to it. Now here,

1. The besieged beat a parley; (v. 1.) "Make a covenant with us, and we will surrender upon terms, and serve thee." They had lost the virtue of Israelites, else they had not thus lost the valour of Israelites, nor tamely yielded to serve an Ammonite, without one bold struggle for themselves. Had they not broken their covenant with God, and forsaken his service, they needed not thus to have courted a covenant with a Gentile nation, and offered themselves to serve them.

2. The besiegers offer them base and barbarous conditions; they will spare their lives, and take them to be their servants, upon condition that they shall put out their right eyes, v. 2. The Gileadites were content to part with their liberty and estates, for the ransom of their blood; and, had the Ammonites taken them at their word, the matter had been so settled immediately, and the Gileadites would not have sent out for relief; but their abject concessions make the Ammonites more insolent in their demands, and they cannot be content to have them their servants, but, (1.) They must torment them, and put them to pain, exquisite pain, for so the thrusting out of an eye would be. (2.) They must disable them for war, and render them incapable, though not of labour, (that would have been a loss to their lords,) yet of bearing arms; for in those times they fought with shields in their left hands, which covered their left eye, so that a soldier without his right eye, was, in effect, blind. (3.) They must put a reproach upon all Israel, as weak and cowardly, that would suffer the inhabitants of one of their chief cities to be thus miserably used, and not offer to rescue them.

3. The besieged desire, and obtain, seven days' time to consider of this proposal, v. 3. If Nahash had not granted them this respite, we may suppose the horror of the proposal would have made them desperate, and they would rather have died with their swords in their hands, than have surrendered to such merciless enemies; therefore Nahash, not imagining it possible that, in so short a time, they should have relief, and being very secure of the advantages he thought he had against them, in a bravado, gave them seven days, that the reproach upon Israel, for not rescuing them, might be the greater, and his triumphs the more illustrious. But there was a providence in it, that his security might be his infatuation and ruin.

4. Notice is sent of this to Gibeah. They said they would send messengers to all the coasts of Israel, (v. 3.) which made Nahash the more secure, for that, he thought, would be a work of time, and none would be forward to appear, if they had not one common head; and, perhaps, Nahash had not yet heard of the new-elected king; but the messengers, either of their own accord, or by order from their masters, went straight to Gibeah, and, not finding Saul within, told their news to the people, who fell a weeping upon it, v. 4. They would sooner lament their brethren's misery and danger, than think of helping them; shed their tears for them, than shed their blood. They wept, as despairing to help the men of Jabesh-gilead, and fearing, lest, if that frontier city were lost, the enemy would penetrate into the very bowels of their country, which now appeared in great hazard.

5. And, behold, Saul came after the herd out of the field; and Saul said, What aileth the people that they weep? And they told him the tidings of the men of Jabesh. 6. And the Spirit of God came upon Saul when he heard those tidings, and his anger was kindled greatly. 7. And he took a yoke of oxen, and hewed them in pieces, and sent them throughout all the coasts of Israel by the hands of messengers, saying, Whosoever cometh not forth after Saul and after Samuel, so shall it be done unto his oxen. And the fear of the LORD fell on the people, and they came out with one consent. 8. And when he numbered them in Bezek, the children of Israel were three hundred thousand, and the men of Judah thirty thousand. 9. And they said unto the messengers that came, Thus shall ye say unto the men of Jabesh-gilead, To-morrow, by that time the sun be hot, ye shall have help. And the messengers came and shewed it to the men of Jabesh; and they were glad. 10. Therefore the men of Jabesh said, To-morrow we will come out unto you, and ye shall do with us all that seemeth good unto you. 11. And it was so on the morrow, that Saul put the people in three companies; and they came into the midst of the host in the morning-watch, and slew the Ammonites until the heat of the day: and it came to pass, that they which remained were scattered, so that two of them were not left together.

What is here related, turns very much to the honour of Saul, and shews the happy fruits of that other spirit with which he was endued. Observe here,

I. His humility. Though he was appointed king, and accepted by the people, yet he did not think it below him to know the state of his own flocks, but went himself to see them, and came in the evening, with his servants, after the herd out of the field, v. 5. This was an evidence that he was not puffed up with his advancement, as those are most apt to be that are raised from a mean estate. Providence had not yet found him business as a king, he left all to Samuel; and therefore, rather than be idle, he would, for the present, apply himself to his country business again; though the sons of Belial would, perhaps, despise him the more for it; such as were virtuous and wise, and loved business themselves, would think never the worse of him. He had no revenues settled upon him for the support of his dignity, and he was desirous not to be burthensome to the people; for which reason, like Paul, he worked with his hands; for if he neglect his domestic affairs, how must he maintain himself and his family? Solomon gives it as a reason why men should look well to their herds, because the crown doth not endure to every generation, Prov. 27. 23, 24. Saul's did not, he must therefore provide something surer.

II. His concern for his neighbours. When he perceived them in tears, he asked, "What aileth the people that they weep?" Let me know, that, if it is a grievance which can be redressed, I may help them, and that, if not, I may weep with them." Good magistrates are in pain, if their subjects be in tears.

III. His zeal for the safety and honour of Israel. When he heard of the insolence of the Ammonites, and the distress of a city, a mother in Israel, the Spirit of God came upon him, and put great thoughts into his mind, and his anger was kindled greatly, v. 6. He was angry at the insolence of the Ammonites, angry at the mean and sneaking spirit of the men of Jabesh-gilead, angry that they had not sent him notice sooner of the Ammonites' descent, and the extremity they were likely to be reduced to. He was angry to see his neighbours weeping, when it had been fitter for them to have prepared for war. It was a brave and generous fire that was now kindled in the breast of Saul, and such as became his high station.

IV. The authority and power he exerted, upon this important occasion; he soon let Israel know, that, though he was retired to his privacy, he had a care for the public, and knew how to command men into the field, as well as how to drive cattle out of the field, v. 5, 7. He sent a summons to all the coasts of Israel, to shew the extent of his power beyond his own tribe, even to all the tribes, and ordered all the military men forthwith to appear in arms at a general rendezvous in Bezek. Observe, 1. His modesty, in joining Samuel in commission with himself; he would not execute the office of a king, without a due regard to that of a prophet. 2. His mildness, in the penalty threatened against those that should disobey his orders. He hews a yoke of oxen in pieces, and sends the pieces to the several cities of Israel, threatening, with respect to him who should decline the public service, not, "Thus shall it be done to him," but, "Thus shall it be done to his oxen." God had threatened it as a great judgment, (Dent. 28. 31.) Thine ox shall be slain before thine eyes, and thou shalt not eat thereof. It was necessary that the command should be enforced with some penalty, but this was not near so severe as that which was affixed to the like order by the whole congregation, Judg. 21. 5. Saul wished to shew that his government was more gentle than that which they had been under. The effect of this summons was, that the militia, or trained-bands, of the nation, came out as one man, and the reason given is, because the fear of the Lord fell upon them. Saul did not affect to make them fear him, but they were influenced to observe his orders by the fear of God, and a regard to him who had made Saul their king, and them members one of another. Note, Religion and the fear of God will make men good subjects, good soldiers, and good friends to the public interests of their country. They that fear God, will make conscience of their duty to all men, particularly to their rulers.

V. His conduct and prudent proceedings in this great affair, v. 8. He numbered those that came in to him, that he might know his own strength, and how to distribute his forces in the best manner their numbers would allow. It is the honour of princes to know the numbers of their men, but it is the honour of the King of kings that there is not any number of his armies, Job, 25. 3. In this muster, it seems, Judah, though numbered by itself, made no great figure, for as it was one tribe of twelve, so it was but an eleventh part of the whole number, thirty thousand three hundred and thirty; though the rendezvous was at Bezek, in that tribe, they wanted either the numbers, or the courage, or the zeal, that that tribe used to be famous for; so low was it, just before the sceptre was brought into it in David.

VI. His faith and confidence, and (grounded on that) his courage and resolution, in this enterprise. It should seem that those very messengers, which brought the tidings from Jabesh-gilead, Saul sent into the country to raise the militia, who would be sure to be faithful and careful in their own business, and them he now sends back to their distressed countrymen, with this assurance, (in which, it is probable, Samuel encouraged him,) "To-morrow, by such an hour, before the enemy can pretend that the seven days are expired, you shall have deliverance, v. 9. Be you ready to do your part, and we will not fail to do our's. Do you sally out upon the besiegers, while we surround them." Saul knew he had a just cause, a clear call, and God on his side, and therefore doubted not of success. This was good news to the besieged Gileadites, whose right eyes had wept themselves dry for their calamities, and now began to fail with looking for relief, and to ache in expectation of the doom of the ensuing day, when they must look their last; the greater the exigence, the more welcome the deliverance. When they heard it they were glad, relying on the assurances that were sent them. And they sent into the enemies' camp, (v. 10.) to tell them, that next day they would be ready to meet them, which the enemies understood as an intimation that they despaired of relief, and so were made the more secure by it; if they took not care, by sending out scouts, to rectify their own mistake, they must thank themselves if they were surprised, the besieged were under no obligation to give them notice of the help they were assured of.

VII. His industry and close application to this business. If he had been bred up to war from his youth, and had led regiments as often as he had followed droves, he could not have gone about an affair of this nature more dexterously or more diligently. When the Spirit of the Lord comes upon men, it would make them expert, even without experience. A vast army (especially in comparison with the present usage) Saul had now at his foot, and a long march before him, near sixty miles, and over Jordan too. No cavalry in his army, but all infantry, which he divides into three battalions, v. 11. And observe, 1. With what incredible swiftness he flew to the enemy; in a day and a night, he came to the place of action, where his own fate, and that of Israel, must be determined. He had passed his word, and would not break it; nay, he was better than his word, for he promised help next day, by that time the sun was hot, (v. 9.) but brought it before day, in the morning-watch, v. 11. Whom God helps, he helps right early, Ps. 46. 5. 2. With what incredible bravery he flew upon the enemy; betimes in the morning, when they lay dreaming of the triumphs they expected that day over the miserable inhabitants of Jabesh-gilead, before they were aware, he was in the midst of their host; and his men, being marched against them in three columns, surrounded them on each side, so that they could have neither heart, nor time, to make head against him.

Lastly, To complete his honour, God crowned all these virtues with success. Jabesh-gilead was rescued, and the Ammonites totally routed; he had now the day before him to complete his victory in; and so complete a victory it was, that they which remained, after a great slaughter, were scattered so, that two of them were not left together, to encourage or help one another, v. 11. We may suppose that Saul was the more vigorous in this matter, 1. Because there was some alliance between the tribe of Benjamin and the city of Jabesh-gilead. That city had declined joining with the rest of the Israelites to destroy Gibeah, which was then punished as their crime, but, perhaps, was now remembered as their kindness, when Saul of Gibeah came with so much readiness and resolution to relieve Jabesh-gilead. Yet that was not all; two thirds of the Benjamites, that then remained, were provided with wives from that city, (Judg. 21. 14.) so that most of the mothers of Benjamin were daughters of Jabesh-gilead, for which city, Saul, being a Benjamite, had therefore a particular kindness; and we find they returned his kindness, ch. 31. 11, 12. 2. Because it was the Ammonites' invasion that induced the people to desire a king, (so Samuel says, ch. 12. 12.) so that, if he had not done his part in this expedition, he had disappointed their expectations, and had for ever forfeited their respect.

12. And the people said unto Samuel, Who is he that said, Shall Saul reign over us? Bring the men, that we may put them to death. 13. And Saul said, There shall not a man be put death this day: for to-day the LORD hath wrought salvation in Israel. 14. Then said Samuel to the people, Come, and let us go to Gilgal, and renew the kingdom there. 15. And all the people went to Gilgal; and there they made Saul king before the LORD in Gilgal; and there they sacrificed sacrifices of peace-offerings before the LORD; and there Saul and all the men of Israel rejoiced greatly.

We have here the improvement of that glorious victory which Saul had obtained, not the improvement of it abroad, (though we take it for granted that the men of Jabesh-gilead, having so narrowly saved their right eyes, would with them now discern the opportunity they had of avenging themselves upon these cruel enemies, and disabling them ever to straiten them in like manner again; now shall they be avenged on the Ammonites, for their right eyes condemned, as Samson on the Philistines, for his two eyes put out, Judg. 16. 23.) but the account here given, is of the improvement of it at home.

I. The people took this occasion to shew their jealousy for the honour of Saul, and their resentment of the indignities done him. Samuel, it seems, was present, if not in the action, (it was too fa for him to march,) yet to meet them when they returned victorious; and to him, as judge, the motion was made, (for they knew Saul would not be judge in his own cause,) that the sons of Belial that would not have him to reign over them, should be brought forth and slain, v.12. Saul's good fortune (as foolish men commonly call it) went further with them to confirm his title, than either his choice by lot, or Samuel's anointing of him. They had not courage thus to move for the persecution of those that opposed him, when he himself looked mean, but, now that his victory made him look great, now, nothing will serve but they must be put to death.

II. Saul took this occasion to give further proofs of his clemency, for, without waiting for Samuel's answer, he himself quashed the motion; (v.13.) There shall not a man be put to death this day, no not those men, those bad men, that had abused him, and therein reflected on God himself: 1. Because it was a day of joy and triumph; To-day the Lord has wrought salvation in Israel: and, since God has been so good to us all, let us not be harsh one to another. Now that God has made the heart of Israel in general so glad, let not us make sad the hearts of any particular Israelites." 2. Because he hoped they were by this day's work brought to a temper, were now convinced that this man, under God, could save them; now honoured him whom before they had despised; and, if they be but reclaimed, he is secured from receiving any disturbance by them, and therefore his point is gained; if an enemy be made a friend, that is more to our advantage than to have him slain. And all good princes consider that their power is for edification, not for destruction.

III. Samuel took this occasion to call the people together before the Lord in Gilgal, v.14,15. 1. That they might publicly give God thanks for their late victory. There they rejoiced greatly; and, that God might have the praise of that which they had the comfort of, they sacrificed to him, as the Giver of all their successes, sacrifices of peace-offerings. 2. That they might confirm Saul in the government, more solemnly than it had been yet done, that he might not retire again to his obscurity. Samuel would have the kingdom renewed; he would renew his resignation, and the people should renew their approbation, and so, in concurrence with, or rather in attendance upon, the divine nomination, they made Saul king, making it their own act and deed to submit to him.

CHAP. XII.

We left the general assembly of the states together, in the close of the foregoing chapter; in this chapter, we have Samuel's speech to them, when he resigned the government into the hands of Saul. In which, I. He clears himself from all suspicion or imputation of mismanagement, while the administration was in his hands, v.1. 5. II. He reminds them of the great things God had done for them, and for their fathers, v.6. 13. III. He sets before them good and evil, the blessing and the curse, v.14, 15. IV. He awakens them to regard what he said to them, by calling to God for thunder, v.16. 19. V. He encourages them with hopes that all should be well, v.20. 25. This is his farewell sermon to that august assembly, and Saul's coronation sermon.

1. AND Samuel said unto all Israel, Behold, I have hearkened unto your voice in all that ye said unto me, and have made a king over you. 2. And now, behold, the king walketh before you: and I am old and gray-headed; and, behold, my sons are with you: and I have walked before you from my childhood unto this day. 3. Behold, here I am: witness against me before the LORD, and before his anointed: whose ox have I taken? or whose ass have I taken? or whom have I defrauded? whom have I oppressed? or of whose hand have I received any bribe to blind mine eyes therewith?

and I will restore it you. 4. And they said, Thou hast not defrauded us, nor oppressed us, neither hast thou taken aught of any man's hand. 5. And he said unto them, The LORD is witness against you, and his anointed is witness this day, that ye have not found aught in my hand. And they answered, He is witness.

Here,

I. Samuel gives them a short account of the late revolution, and of the present posture of their government, by way of preface to what he had further to say to them, v.1,2. 1. For his own part, he had spent his days in their service; he began betimes to be useful among them, and had continued long so. "I have walked before you, as a guide to direct you, as a shepherd that leads his flock, (Ps. 80.1.) from my childhood unto this day:" (as soon as he was illuminated with the light of prophecy, in his early days, he began to be a burning and shining light to Israel;) "and now my best days are done; I am old and gray-headed;" therefore they were the more unkind to cast him off; yet therefore he was the more willing to resign, finding the weight of government heavy upon his stooping shoulders. Old, and therefore the more able to advise them; and the more observant they should be of what they said, for days shall speak, and the multitude of years shall teach wisdom; and there is a particular reverence owing to the aged, especially aged magistrates and aged ministers. "Old, and therefore not likely to live long; perhaps may never have an opportunity of speaking to you again, and therefore take notice of what I say." 2. As for his sons: "Behold," (says he,) "they are with you; you may, if you please, call them to an account for any thing they have done amiss. They are present with you, and have not, upon this revolution, run their country; they are upon the level with you, subjects to the new king as well as you; if you can prove them guilty of any wrong, you may prosecute them now by a due course of law, punish them, and oblige them to make restitution." 3. As for their new king, Samuel had gratified them in setting him over them; (v.1.) "I have hearkened to your voice in all that ye said to me, being desirous to please you, if it were possible, and make you easy, though to the discarding of myself and family; and now, will you hearken to me, and take my advice?" The change was now perfected; "Behold, the king walketh before you; (v.2.) he appears in public, ready to serve you in public business. Now that you have made yourselves like the nations in your civil government, and have cast off the divine administration in that, now take heed lest you make yourselves like the nations in religion, and cast off the worship of God."

II. He solemnly appeals to them concerning his own integrity in the administration of the government; (v.3.) Witness against me, whose ox have I taken? By this he intended, 1. To convince them of the injury they had done him, in setting him aside, when they had nothing amiss to charge him with; his government had no fault, but that it was too cheap, too easy, too gentle. Also of the injury they had done themselves, in turning off one that did not so much as take an ox or an ass from them, to put themselves under the power of one that would take from them their fields and vineyards, nay, and their very sons and daughters; (ch. 8.11.) so unlike would the manner of the king be from his manner. 2. To preserve his own reputation: they that heard of Samuel's being rejected as he was, would be ready to suspect, that certainly he had done some bad thing, or he had never been so ill treated; so that it was necessary for him to make this challenge, that it might appear upon record, that it was not for any iniquity in his hands that he was laid aside, but to gratify the humour of a giddy people, who owned they could not have a better man to rule them, only they desired a bigger man. There is a just debt, which every man owes to his own good name, especially men in public stations, which is, to guard against unjust aspersions and suspicions, that we may finish our course with honour, as well as joy.

3. As he designed hereby to leave a good name behind him, so he designed to leave his successor a good example before him; let him write after his copy, and he will write fair. 4. Samuel designed, in the close of his discourse, to reprove the people, and therefore he begins with a vindication of himself: for he that will, with confidence, tell another of his sin, must see to it that he himself be clear.

Now observe, (1.) What it is that Samuel here acquits himself from. [1.] He had never, under any pretence whatsoever, taken that which was not his own, ox nor ass; had never distrained their cattle for tribute, fines, or forfeitures, nor used their service without paying for it. [2.] He had never defrauded those with whom he dealt, nor oppressed those that were under his power. [3.] He had never taken bribes to pervert justice, nor was ever biassed, by favour or affection, to give judgment in a cause against his conscience. (2.) How he appeals to those that had slighted him concerning it; "Here I am; witness against me, if you have any thing to lay to my charge; do it now before the Lord, and the king, the proper judges." He puts honour upon Saul, by owning himself accountable to him, if he had been guilty of any wrong.

III. Upon this appeal he is honourably acquitted; he did not expect that they should do him honour at parting, though he well deserved it, and therefore mentioned not any of the good services he had done them, for which they ought to have applauded him, and returned him the thanks of the house; all he desired was, that they should do him justice; and that they did, (v.4.) readily owing, 1. That he had not made his government oppressive to them, nor used his power to their wrong. 2. That he had not made it expensive to them; "Neither hast thou taken aught of any man's hand, for the support of thy dignity." Like Nehemiah, he did not require the bread of the governor; (Neh. 5. 18.) had not only been righteous, but generous; had coveted no man's silver or gold, or apparel, Acts, 20. 33.

IV. This honourable testimony borne to Samuel's integrity, is left upon record to his honour; (v.5.) The Lord is Witness, who searcheth the heart, and his anointed is witness, who trieth overt-acts; and the people agree to it, He is witness. Note, The testimony of our neighbours, and especially the testimony of our own consciences for us, that we have in our places lived honestly, will be our comfort, under the slights and contempts that are put upon us. Demetrius is a happy man, that has a good report of all men, and of the truth itself, 3 John, 12.

6. And Samuel said unto the people, It is the LORD that advanced Moses and Aaron, and that brought your fathers up out of the land of Egypt. 7. Now therefore stand still, that I may reason with you before the LORD of all the righteous acts of the LORD, which he did to you and to your fathers. 8. When Jacob was come into Egypt, and your fathers cried unto the LORD, then the LORD sent Moses and Aaron, which brought forth your fathers out of Egypt, and made them dwell in this place. 9. And when they forgot the LORD their God, he sold them into the hand of Sisera, captain of the host of Hazor, and into the hand of the Philistines, and into the hand of the king of Moab, and they fought against them. 10. And they cried unto the LORD, and said, We have sinned, because we have forsaken the LORD, and have served Baalim and Ashtaroth: but now deliver us out of the hand of our enemies, and we will serve thee. 11. And the LORD sent Jernbbaal, and Bedan, and Jephthah, and Samuel, and delivered you out of the hand of your enemies on every side, and ye dwelled safe. 12. And when ye saw that Nahash the king of the children of Ammon came against you, ye said unto me, Nay; but a king shall reign over us: when the LORD your God was your King.

13. Now therefore behold the king whom ye have chosen, and whom ye have desired! and, behold, the LORD hath set a king over you. 14. If ye will fear the LORD, and serve him, and obey his voice, and not rebel against the commandment of the LORD, then shall both ye and also the king that reigneth over you continue following the LORD your God: 15. But if ye will not obey the voice of the LORD, but rebel against the commandment of the LORD, then shall the hand of the LORD be against you, as it was against your fathers.

Samuel, having sufficiently secured his own reputation, instead of upbraiding the people upon it with their unkindness to him, sets himself to instruct them, and keep them in the way of their duty, and then the change of the government would be the less damage to them.

I. He reminds them of the great goodness of God to them and to their fathers; gives them an abstract of the history of their nation, that, by the consideration of the great things God had done for them, they might be for ever engaged to love him and serve him. "Come," says he, (v.7.) "stand still, in token of reverence, when God is speaking to you; stand still in token of attention and composedness of mind, and give me leave to reason with you." Religion has reason on its side, Isa. 1. 18. The work of ministers is to reason with people; not only to exhort and direct, but to persuade; to convince men's judgments, and so to gain their wills and affections. Let reason rule men, and they will be good. He reasons of the righteous acts of the Lord; that is, "both the benefits he has bestowed upon you, in performance of his promises, and the punishments he has inflicted on you for your sins." His favours are called his righteous acts, (Judg. 5. 11.) because in them he is just to his own honour. He not only puts them in mind of what God had done for them in their days, but of what he had done of old, in the days of their fathers, because the present age had the benefit of God's former favours. We may suppose that his discourse was much larger than as here related.

1. He reminds them of their deliverance out of Egypt; into that house of bondage Jacob and his family came down poor and little; when they were oppressed, they cried unto God, who advanced Moses and Aaron, from mean beginnings, to be their deliverers, and the founders of their state and settlement in Canaan, v. 6, 8.

2. He reminds them of the miseries and calamities which their fathers brought themselves into, by forgetting God, and serving other gods; (v. 9.) they enslaved themselves, for they were sold as criminals and captives in the hands of oppressors: they exposed themselves to the desolation of war, their neighbours fought against them.

3. He reminds them of their fathers' repentance and humiliation before God for their idolatries. They said, We have sinned, v. 10. Let not them imitate the sins of their fathers, for, what they had done amiss they had many a time wished undone again; in the day of their distress they had sought unto God, and had promised to serve him, let their children then reckon that good at all times, which they found good in bad times.

4. He reminds them of the glorious deliverances God had wrought for them, the victories he had blessed them with, and their happy settlements, many a time, after days of trouble and distress, v. 11. He specifies some of their judges, Gideon and Jephthah, great conquerors in their time; among the rest he mentions Bedan, whom we read not of any where else: he might be some eminent person, that was instrumental of salvation to them, though not recorded in the book of Judges; such a one as Shangar, of whom it is said, that he delivered Israel, but not that he judged them, Judg. 3. 31. Perhaps, this Bedan guarded and delivered them on one side, at the same time when some other of the judges appeared and acted for them on another side. Some think it was the same with Jair, so the learned Mr. Poole; others, the same with Samson, who was Ben Dan, a son of Dan, of that tribe, and the Spirit of the Lord came upon him, Be-Dan, in Dan, in the camp of Dan. Samuel mentions himself, not to his own praise, but to the honour of God, who had made him an instrument of subduing the Philistines.

5. At last, he puts them in mind of God's late favour to the present generation, in gratifying them with a king, when they would prescribe to God, by such a one, to save them out of the hand of Nahash king of Ammon, v. 12, 13. Now it appears that that was the immediate occasion of their desiring a king: Nahash threatened them; they moved Samuel to nominate a general; he told them God was Commander-in-chief in all their wars, and they needed no other; what was wanting in them should be made up by his power; The Lord is your king; but they insisted on it, Nay, but a king shall reign over us. "And now," said he, "you have a king: a king of your own asking, let that be spoken to your shame; but a king of God's making, let that be spoken to his honour, and the glory of his grace." God did not cast them off then, when they, in effect, cast him off.

II. He shews them that they were now upon their good behaviour, they and their king; let them not think that they had now cut themselves off from all dependence upon God, and that now, having a king of their own, the making of their own fortunes (as men foolishly call it) was in their own hands; no, still their judgment must proceed from the Lord. He tells them plainly,

1. That their obedience to God would certainly be their happiness, (v. 14.) if they would not revolt from God to idols, nor rebel against him, by breaking his commandments, but would persevere in their allegiance to him, would fear his wrath, serve his interests, and obey his will, then they and their king should certainly be happy: but observe how the promise is expressed, Then ye shall continue following the Lord your God; that is, (1.) "Ye shall continue in the way of your duty to God, which will be your honour and comfort." Note, To those that are sincere in their religion, God will give grace to persevere in it: those that follow God faithfully, God will enable to continue following him. And observe, Following God is a work that is its own wages. It is the matter of a promise as well as of a precept. (2.) "Ye shall continue under the divine guidance and protection." Ye shall be after the Lord, so it is in the original; that is, "He will go before you to lead and prosper you, and make your way plain; The Lord is with you, while you are with him."

2. That their disobedience would as certainly be their ruin; (v. 15.) "If ye rebel, think not that your having a king will secure you against God's judgments, and that now, having in this instance made yourselves like the nations, you may sin at as cheap a rate as they can. No, the hand of the Lord will be against you, as it was against your fathers when they offended him, in the days of the Judges." We mistake if we think that we can evade God's justice by shaking off his dominion. If God shall not rule us, yet he will judge us.

16. Now therefore stand and see this great thing, which the LORD will do before your eyes. 17. Is it not wheat-harvest to-day? I will call unto the LORD, and he shall send thunder and rain; that ye may perceive and see that your wickedness is great, which ye have done in the sight of the LORD, in asking you a king. 18. So Samuel called unto the LORD; and the LORD sent thunder and rain that day: and all the people greatly feared the LORD and Samuel. 19. And all the people said unto Samuel, Pray for thy servants unto the LORD thy God, that we die not; for we have added unto all our sins this evil, to ask us a king. 20. And Samuel said unto the people, Fear not: ye have done all this wickedness; yet turn not aside from following the LORD, but serve the LORD with all your heart; 21. And turn ye not aside: for then should ye go after vain things, which cannot profit nor deliver; for they are vain. 22. For the LORD will not forsake his people, for his great name's sake: because it hath pleased the LORD to make you his people. 23. Moreover as for me, God forbid that I should sin against the LORD in ceasing to pray for you: but I will teach you the good and the right way: 24. Only fear the LORD, and serve him in truth with all your heart: for consider how great things he hath done for you. 25. But if ye shall still do wickedly, ye shall be consumed, both ye and your king.

Two things Samuel here aims at:

I. To convince the people of their sin in desiring a king. They were now rejoicing before God, in and with their king, (ch. 11. 15.) and offering to God the sacrifices of praise, which they hoped God would accept of; and this perhaps made them think that there was no harm in the asking a king, but really they had done well in it; therefore Samuel here charges it upon them as their sin, as wickedness, great wickedness in the sight of the Lord. Note, Though we meet with prosperity and success in a way of sin, yet we must not therefore think the more favourably of it. They have a king, and if they conduct themselves well, their king may be a very great blessing to them, and yet Samuel will have them perceive and see that their wickedness is great in asking a king. We must never think well of that which God in his law frowns upon, though in his providence he seem to smile upon it.

Observe, 1. The expressions of God's displeasure against them for asking a king. At Samuel's word, God sent prodigious thunder and rain upon them, at a season of the year when, in that country, the like was never seen or known before, v. 16. 18. Thunder and rain have natural causes, and sometimes terrible effects. But Samuel made it to appear that this was designed by the almighty power of God, on purpose to convince them that they had done very wickedly in asking a king; not only by its coming in an unusual time, in wheat-harvest, and this on a fair clear day, when there appeared not to the eye any signs of a storm, but by his giving notice of it before. Had there happened to be thunder and rain at the time when he was speaking to them, he might have improved it for their awakening and conviction, as we may in a like case; but to make it no less than a miracle, before it came, (1.) He spoke to them of it; (v. 16, 17.) Stand and see this great thing. He had bidden them stand and hear, (v. 7.) but because he did not see that his reasoning with them affected them, (so stupid were they and unthinking,) now he bids them stand and see. If what he said in a still small voice did not reach their hearts, nor his doctrine, which dropped as the dew, they shall hear God speaking to them in dreadful claps of thunder, and the great rain of his strength. He appealed to this as a sign; "I will call upon the LORD, he shall send thunder; shall send it just now, to confirm the word of his servant, and to make you see that I said true, when I told you that God was angry with you for asking a king." And the event proved him a true prophet, the sign and wonder came to pass. (2.) He spoke to God for it. Samuel called unto the LORD, and, in answer to his prayer, even while he was yet speaking, the Lord sent thunder and rain. By this Samuel made it to appear, not only what a powerful influence God has upon this earth, that he could, of a sudden, when natural causes did not work towards it, produce this dreadful rain and thunder, and bring them out of his treasures, (Ps. 135. 7.) but also what a powerful interest he had in heaven, that God would thus hearken to the voice of a man, (Josh. 10. 14.) and answer him in the secret place of thunder, Ps. 81. 7. Samuel, that son of prayer, was still famous for success in prayer.

Now by this extraordinary thunder and rain sent on this occasion, [1.] God testified his displeasure against them in the same way in which he had formerly testified it, and at the prayer of Samuel too, against the Philistines; (ch. 7. 10.) The Lord discomfited them with a great thunder. Now that Israel rebelled, and vexed his holy Spirit, he turned to be their Enemy, and fought against them with the same weapons which, not long before, had been employed against their adversaries, Isa. 63. 10. [2.] He shewed them their folly in desiring a king to save them, rather than God, or Samuel, promising themselves more from an arm of flesh, than from the arm of God, or from the power of prayer. Could their king thunder with a voice like God? Job, 40. 9. Could their prince command such forces as the prophet could by his prayers? [3.] He intimated to them, that how serene and prosperous soever their condition seemed to be now that they had a king, like the weather in wheat-harvest, yet, if God pleased, he could soon change the face of the heavens, and persecute them with his tempest, as the psalmist speaks.

2. The impressions which this made upon the people. It startled them very much, as well it might. (1.) They greatly feared the Lord and Samuel. Though, when they had a king, they were ready to think they must fear him only, God made them know that he is greatly to be feared, and his prophets for his sake. Now they were rejoicing in their king, God taught them to rejoice with trembling. (2.) They own their sin and folly in desiring a king; (v. 19.) We have added to all our sins this evil. Some people will not be brought to a sight of their sins by any gentler methods than storms and thunders. Samuel did not extort this confession from them till the matter was settled, and the king confirmed, lest it should look as if he designed by it rather to establish himself in the government, than to bring them to repentance. Now that they were flattering themselves in their own eyes, their iniquity was found to be hateful, Ps. 36. 2. (3.) They earnestly begged Samuel's prayers; (v. 19.) Pray for thy servants, that we die not. They were apprehensive of their danger from the wrath of God, and could not expect that he should hear their prayers for themselves, and therefore they entreat Samuel to pray for them. Now they see their need of him whom a while ago they slighted. Thus many that will not have Christ to reign over them, would yet be glad to have him to intercede for them, to turn away the wrath of God. And the time may come, when those that have despised and ridiculed praying people, will value their prayers, and desire a share in them. "Pray" (say they) "to the Lord thy God; we know not how to call him our's, but if thou have any interest in him, improve it for us."

II. He aims to confirm the people in their religion, and engage them for ever to cleave unto the Lord. The design of his discourse is much the same with Joshua's, ch. 23. and 24.

1. He would not that the terrors of the Lord should frighten them from him, for they were intended to frighten them to him; (v. 20.) "Fear not, though ye have done all this wickedness; and though God is angry with you for it, yet do not therefore abandon his service, nor turn from following him." Fear not; that is, "Despair not, fear not with amazement; the weather will clear up after the storm. Fear not; for though God will frown upon his people, yet he will not forsake them, (v. 22.) for his great name's sake; do not you forsake him then." Every transgression in the covenant, though it displease the Lord, yet does not throw us out of covenant, and therefore God's just rebukes must not drive us from our hopes in his mercy. The fixedness of God's choice is owing to the freeness of it; we may therefore hope he will not forsake his people, because it has pleased him to make them his people. Had he chosen them for their good merits, we might fear he would cast them off for their bad merits: but, choosing them for his name's sake, for his name's sake he will not leave them.

2. He cautions them against idolatry; "Turn not aside from God and the worship of him," v. 20. and again, v. 21. "for if ye turn aside from God, whatever ye turn aside to, you will find it is a vain thing, that can never answer your expectations, but will certainly deceive you, if you trust to it; it is a broken reed, a broken cistern." Idols are so, they are enmity and a lie: whatever we make a god of, we shall find it so. Creatures in their own place are good things, but when put in God's place, they are vain things. Idols could not profit those that sought to them in their wants, nor deliver those that sought to them in their straits, for they were vain, and not what they pretended to be. An idol is nothing in the world, 1 Cor. 8. 4.

3. He comforts them with an assurance that he would continue his care and concern for them, v. 23. They desired him to pray for them: (v. 19.) he might have said, "Go to Saul, and get him to pray for you, the king that you have put in my room;" but so far is he from upbraiding them with their disrespect to him, that he promises them much more than they asked. (1.) They asked it of him as a favour; he promised it as a duty, and startles at the thought of neglecting it. Pray for you! says he, God forbid that I should sin against the Lord in not doing it. Note, It is a sin against God, not to pray for the Israel of God, especially for those of them that are under our charge: and good men are afraid of the guilt of omissions. (2.) They asked him to pray for them at this time, and upon this occasion, but he promises to continue his prayers for them, and not to cease as long as he lived. Our rule is, to pray without ceasing; we sin if we restrain prayer in general, and in particular if we cease praying for the church. (3.) They asked him only to pray for them, but he promises to do more for them, not only to pray for them, but to teach them; though they were not willing to be under his government as a judge, he would not therefore deny them his instructions as a prophet. And they may be sure he would teach them no other than the good and the right way: and the right way is certainly the good way; the way of duty, the way of pleasure and profit.

4. He concludes with an earnest exhortation to practical religion and serious godliness, v. 24, 25. The great duty here pressed upon us, is, to fear the Lord. He had said, (v. 20.) "Fear not with a slavish fear," but here, "Fear the Lord with a filial fear. As the fruit and evidence of this, serve him in the duties of religious worship, and of a godly conversation; in truth and sincerity, and not in shew and profession only, but with your heart, and with all your heart, not dissembling, not dividing." And two things he urges by way of motive; (1.) That they were bound in gratitude to serve God, considering what great things he had done for them, to engage them for ever to his service. (2.) That they were bound in interest to serve him, considering what great things he would do against them, if they should still do wickedly; "Ye shall be destroyed by the judgments of God, both ye and your king that you are so proud of, and expect so much from; and that will be a blessing to you, if you keep in with God." Thus, as a faithful watchman, he gave them warning, and so delivered his own soul.

CHAP. XIII.

They that desired a king like all the nations, fancied that, when they had one, they should look very great and considerable; but in this chapter we find it proved much otherwise. While Samuel was joined in commission with Saul, things went well; (ch. 11. 7.) but now that Saul began to reign alone, all went to decay, and Samuel's words began to be fulfilled. Ye shall be consumed, both you and your king; for never was the state of Israel further gone in a consumption than in this chapter. I. Saul appears here a very silly prince; 1. Infatuated in his councils, v. 1. 3. 2. Inveaded by his neighbours, v. 4, 5. 3. Deserted by his soldiers, v. 6, 7. 4. Disordered in his own spirit, and sacrificing in confusion, v. 8. 10. 5. Chidden by Samuel, v. 11. 13. 6. Rejected of God from being a king, v. 14. II. The people appear here a very miserable people; 1. Disheartened and dispersed, v. 6, 7. 2. Diminished, v. 15, 16. 3. Plundered, v. 17, 18. 4. Disarmed, v. 19. 23. This they got by casting off God's government, and making themselves like the nations; all their glory departed from them.

I. SAUL reigned one year; and when he had reigned two years over Israel, 2. Saul chose him three thousand men of Israel; whereof two thousand were with Saul in Michmash and in mount Beth-el, and a thousand were with Jonathan in Gibeah of Benjamin: and the rest of the people he sent every man to his tent. 3. And Jonathan smote the garrison of the Philistines that was in Geba, and the Philistines heard of it. And Saul blew the trumpet throughout all the land, saying, Let the Hebrews hear. 4. And all Israel heard say that Saul had smitten a garrison of the Philistines, and that Israel also was had in abomination with the Philistines. And the people were called together after Saul to Gilgal. 5. And the Philistines gathered themselves together to fight with Israel, thirty thousand chariots, and six thousand horsemen, and people as the sand which is on the sea-shore in multitude: and they came up, and pitched in Michmash, east-ward from Beth-aven. 6. When the men of Israel saw that they were in a strait, (for the people were distressed,) then the people did hide themselves in caves, and in thickets, and in rocks, and in high places, and in pits. 7. And some of the Hebrews went over Jordan to the land of Gad and Gilead. As for Saul, he was yet in Gilgal, and all the people followed him trembling.

We are not told wherein it was that the people of Israel offended God, so as to forfeit his presence, and turn his hand against them, as Samuel had threatened; (ch. 12. 15.) but, doubtless, they left God, else he had not left them, as here it appears he did; for,

I. Saul was very weak and impolitic, and did not order his affairs with discretion. Saul was the son of one year, so the first words are in the original; a phrase which we make to signify the date of his reign, but ordinarily it signifies the date of one's birth: and, therefore, some understand it figuratively, he was as innocent and good as a child of a year old; so the Chaldee paraphrase, he was without fault, like the son of a year. But, if we admit a figurative sense, it may as well intimate that he was ignorant and imprudent, and as unfit for business as a child of a year old: and the following particulars make that more his character, than the former. But we take it rather as our own translation has it, Saul reigned one year, and nothing happened that was considerable; it was a year of no action; but in his second year he did as follows:

1. He chose him a band of three thousand men, of which he himself commanded two thousand, and his son Jonathan one thousand; (v. 2.) the rest of the people he dismissed to their tents. If he intended these only for the guard of his person, and his honorary attendants, it was impolitic to have so many; if for a standing army, in apprehension of danger from the Philistines, it was no less impolitic to have so few; and, perhaps, the confidence he put in this select number, and his disbanding the rest of that brave army with which he lately beat the Ammonites, (ch. 11. 3, 11.) was looked upon as an affront to the kingdom, gave a general disgust, and was the reason he had so few at his call when he had occasion for them. The prince that relies on a particular party, weakens his own interest in the whole community.

2. He ordered his son Jonathan to surprise and destroy the garrison of the Philistines that lay near him in Geba, v. 3. I wish there were no ground for supposing it to have been a violation or infraction of some articles with the Philistines, and that it was done treacherously and perfidiously; the reason why I suspect it, is, because it is said, that, for doing it, Israel was had in abomination, or, as the word is, did stink with the Philistines, (v. 4.) as men void of common honesty, and whose word could not be relied on. If it was so, we will lay the blame, not on Jonathan, who did it, but on Saul, his prince and father, who ordered him to do it, and, perhaps, kept him in ignorance of the truth of the matter. Nothing makes the name of Israel odious to them that are without, so much as the fraud and dishonesty of those that are called by that worthy name. If professors of religion cheat and over-reach, break their word, and betray their trust, religion suffers by it, and is had in abomination with the Philistines. Whom may one trust, if not an Israelite? one that, it is expected, should be without guile.

3. When he had thus exasperated the Philistines, then he began to raise forces, which, if he had acted wisely, he would have done before. When the Philistines had a vast army ready to pour in upon him, to avenge the wrong he had done them, then was he blowing the trumpet through the land, among a careless, if not a disaffected, people, saying, Let the Hebrews hear; (v. 3.) and so, as many as thought fit, came to Saul to Gilgal, v. 4. But now, the generality, we may suppose, drew back, either in dislike of Saul's politics, or in dread of the Philistines' power, who, if he had summoned them sooner, would have been as ready at his beck as they were when he marched against the Ammonites. We often find that after-wit would have done much better before, and have prevented much inconvenience.

II. Never did the Philistines appear in such a formidable body as they did now, upon this provocation which Saul gave them; we may suppose they had great assistance from their allies, for, (v. 5.) beside six thousand horse, which, in those times, when horses were not so much used in war as they are now, was a great body, they had an incredible number of chariots, thirty thousand in all; most of them, we may suppose, were carriages for the bag and baggage of so vast an army, not chariots of war. But their foot was innumerable as the sand of the sea-shore; so jealous were they for the honour of their nation, and so much enraged at the baseness of the Israelites in destroying their garrison. If Saul had asked counsel of God before he had given the Philistines this provocation, he and his people might the better have borne this threatening trouble, which they had now brought on themselves by their own folly.

III. Never were the people of Israel so faint-hearted, so sneaking, so very cowardly, as they were now. Some considerable numbers, it may be, came to Saul to Gilgal, but, hearing of the Philistines' numbers and preparations, their spirits sunk within them; some think, because they did not find Samuel there with Saul. They that, a while ago, were weary of him, and wished for a king, now had small joy of their king, unless they could see him under Samuel's direction. Sooner or later, men will be made to see that God and his prophets are their best friends. Now, that they saw the Philistines making war upon them, and Samuel not coming in to help them, they know not what to do; men's hearts failed them for fear. And, 1. Some absconded. Rather than run upon death among the Philistines, they buried themselves alive in caves and thickets, v. 6. See what work sin makes; it exposes men to perils, and then robs them of their courage, and dispirits them. A single person, by faith, can say, I will not be afraid of ten thousand; (Ps. 3. 6.) but here thousands of degenerate Israelites tremble at the approach of a great crowd of Philistines. Guilt makes men cowards. 2. Others fled, v. 7. They went over Jordan to the land of Gilead, as far as they could from the danger, and to a place where they had lately been victorious over the Ammonites: where they had triumphed, they hoped to be sheltered. 3. Those that stayed with Saul, followed him trembling, expecting no other than to be cut off, and having their hands and hearts very much weakened by the desertion of so many of their troops. And, perhaps, Saul himself, though he had so much honour as to stand his ground, yet had no courage to spare, wherewith to inspire his trembling soldiers.

8. And he tarried seven days, according to the set time that Samuel had appointed: but Samuel came not to Gilgal; and the people were scattered from him. 9. And Saul said, Bring hither a burnt-offering to me, and peace-offerings. And he offered the burnt-offering. 10. And it came to pass, that as soon as he had made an end of offering the burnt-offering, behold, Samuel came; and Saul went out to meet him, that he might salute him. 11. And Samuel said, What hast thou done? And Saul said, Because I saw that the people were scattered from me, and that thou camest not within the days appointed, and that the Philistines gathered themselves together to Michmash; 12. Therefore said I, The Philistines will come down now upon me to Gilgal, and I have not made supplication unto the LORD: I forced myself therefore, and offered a burnt-offering. 13. And Samuel said to Saul, Thou hast done foolishly: thou hast not kept the commandment of the LORD thy God, which he commanded thee: for now would the LORD have established thy kingdom upon Israel for ever. 14. But now thy kingdom shall not continue: the LORD hath sought him a man after his own heart, and the LORD hath commanded him to be captain over his people, because thou hast not kept that which the LORD commanded thee.

Here is,

I. Saul's offence in offering sacrifice before Samuel came. Samuel, when he anointed him, had ordered him to tarry for him seven days in Gilgal, promising, that, at the end of those days, he would be sure to come to him, and both offer sacrifices for him, and direct him what he should do. This we had, ch. 10. 8. Perhaps that order, though inserted there, was given him afterward; or, was given him as a general rule to be observed in every public congress at Gilgal; or, as is most probable, though not mentioned again, was lately repeated, with reference to this particular occasion; for it is plain that Saul himself understood it as obliging him, from God, now to stay till Samuel came, else he would not have made so many excuses as he did for not staying, v. 11. This order Saul broke; he stayed till the seventh day, yet had not patience to wait till the end of the seventh day; perhaps, he began to reproach Samuel as false to his word, careless of his country, and disrespectful to his prince; and thought it more fit that Samuel should wait for him, than he for Samuel. However, 1. He presumed to offer sacrifice without Samuel, and nothing appears to the contrary, but that he did it himself, though he was neither priest nor prophet, as if, because he was a king, he might do any thing; a piece of presumption, which king Uzziah paid dear for, 2 Chron. 26. 16, &c. 2. He determined to engage the Philistines without Samuel's directions, though he had promised to shew him what he should do. So self-sufficient Saul was, that he thought it not worth while to stay for a prophet of the Lord, either to pray for him, or advise him.

This was Saul's offence, and that which aggravated it, was, (1.) That, for aught that appears, he did not send any messenger to Samuel, to know his mind, to represent the case to him, and to receive fresh directions from him, though he had enough about him that were swift enough of foot at this time. (2.) That, when Samuel came, he rather seemed to boast of what he had done, than to repent of it; for he went forth to salute him, as his brother sacrificer, and seemed pleased with the opportunity he had of letting

Samuel know that he needed him not, but could do well enough without him. He went out to bless him, so the word is, as if he now thought himself a complete priest, empowered to bless as well as sacrifice, whereas he should have gone out to be blessed by him. (3.) That he charged Samuel with breach of promise, Thou camest not within the days appointed; (v. 11.) and, therefore, if any thing was amiss, Samuel must bear the blame, who was God's minister; whereas, he did come according to his word, before the seven days were expired. Thus, the scoffers of the latter days think the promise of Christ's coming is broken, because he does not come in their time, though, it is certain, he will come at the set time. (4.) That, when he was charged with disobedience, he justified himself in what he had done, and gave no sign at all of repentance for it. It is not sinning that ruins men, but sinning, and not repenting; falling, and not getting up again. See what excuses he made, v. 11, 12. He would have this act of disobedience pass, [1.] For an instance of his prudence; the people were most of them scattered from him, and he had no other way than this, to keep those with him that remained, and to prevent their deserting too. If Samuel neglected the public concerns, he would not. [2.] For an instance of his piety; he would be thought very devout, and in great care not to engage the Philistines, till he had by prayer and sacrifice engaged God on his side. "The Philistines," said he, "will come down upon me, before I have made my supplication to the Lord, and then I am undone. What! go to war before I have said my prayers!" Thus he covered his disobedience to God's command, with a pretence of concern for God's favour. Hypocrites lay a great stress upon the external performances of religion, thinking thereby to excuse their neglect of the weightier matters of the law. And yet, lastly, He owns it went against his conscience to do it; I forced myself, and offered a burnt-offering; perhaps, boasting that he had broken through his convictions, and got the better of them; or, at least, thinking this extenuated his fault, that he knew he should not have done as he did, but did it with reluctance. Foolish man! to think that God would be well pleased with sacrifices offered in direct opposition both to his general and particular command.

11. The sentence passed upon Saul for this offence: Samuel found him standing by his burnt-offering; but, instead of an answer of peace, was sent to him with heavy tidings, and let him know that the sacrifice of the wicked is abomination to the Lord, much more when he brings it, as Saul did, with a wicked mind. 1. He shews him the aggravations of his crime; and says to this king, Thou art wicked; which it is not for any but a prophet of the Lord to say, Job, 34. 18. He charges him with being an enemy to himself and his interest, Thou hast done foolishly; and art a rebel to God and his government, "Thou hast not kept the commandment of the Lord thy God, that command wherewith he intended to try thy obedience." Note, Those that disobey the commandments of God, do foolishly for themselves. Sin is folly, and sinners are the greatest fools. 2. He reads his doom; (v. 14.) "Thy kingdom shall not continue long to thee or thy family; God has his eye upon another, a man after his own heart, and not like thee, that will have thy own will and way." The sentence is, in effect, the same with Mene tehel. On'y, now, there seems room left for Saul's repentance, upon which this sentence should have been reversed; but, upon the next act of disobedience, it was made irreversible, ch. 15. 29. And now, better a thousand times he had continued in obscurity tending his asses, than to be enthroned and so soon dethroned.

But, was not this hard, to pass so severe a sentence upon him and his house for a single error, and that seemed so small, and in excuse for which he had so much to say? No, The Lord is righteous in all his ways, and does no man any wrong; will be justified when he speaks, and clear when he judges. By this, (1.) He shews that there is no sin little, because no little god to sin against; but that every sin is a forfeiture of the heavenly kingdom, for which we stood fair. (2.) He shews, that disobedience to an express command, though in a small matter, is a great provocation; as in the case of our first parents. (3.) He warns us to take heed of our spirits; for that which to men may seem but a small offence, yet, to him that knows from what principle, and with what disposition of mind, it is done, may appear a heinous crime. (4.) God, in rejecting Saul for an error, seemingly little, sets off, as by a foil, the lustre of his mercy, in forgiving such great sins as those of David, Manasseh, and others. (5.) We are taught hereby, how necessary it is that we wait on our God continually. Saul lost his kingdom for want of two or three hour's patience.

15. And Samuel arose, and gat him up from Gilgal unto Gibeah of Benjamin. And Saul numbered the people that were present with him, about six hundred men. 16. And Saul, and Jonathan his son, and the people that were present with them, abode in Gibeah of Benjamin: but the Philistines encamped in Michmash. 17. And the spoilers came out of the camp of the Philistines in three companies: one company turned unto the way that leadeth to Ophrah, unto the land of Shual: 18. And another company turned to the way to Beth-horon: and another company turned to the way of the border that looketh to the valley of Zeboim toward the wilderness. 19. Now there was no smith found throughout all the land of Israel: for the Philistines said, Lest the Hebrews make them swords or spears: 20. But all the Israelites went down to the Philistines, to sharpen every man his share, and his coulter, and his axe, and his mattock. 21. Yet they had a file for the mattocks, and for the coulters, and for the forks, and for the axes, and to sharpen the goads. 22. So it came to pass in the day of battle, that there was neither sword nor spear found in the hand of any of the people that were with Saul and Jonathan: but with Saul and with Jonathan his son was there found. 23. And the garrison of the Philistines went out to the passage of Michmash.

Here is,

1. Samuel gone in displeasure. Saul has set up for himself, and now he is left to himself; Samuel gat him from Gilgal, (v. 15.) and it does not appear that he either prayed with him, or directed him. Yet, in going up to Gibeah of Benjamin, which was Saul's city, he intimated that he had not quite abandoned him, but waited there to do him a kindness another time. Or, he went to the college of the prophets, there to pray for Saul, when he did not think fit to pray with him.

2. Saul goes after him to Gibeah, and there musters his army, and finds his whole number to be but six hundred men, v. 15, 16. Thus were they for their sin diminished and brought low.

3. The Philistines ravaged the country, and put all the adjacent parts under contribution. The body of their army, or standing camp, as it is called in the margin, (v. 23.) lay in an advantageous pass at Michmash, but thence they sent out three several parties or detachments, that took several ways, to plunder the country, and bring in provisions for the army, v. 17, 18. By these the land of Israel was both terrified and impoverished, and the Philistines animated and enriched. This the sin of Israel brought upon them, Isa. 42. 24.

4. The Israelites that took the field with Saul were unarmed, had only slings and clubs, but not a sword or spear among them all, except what Saul and Jonathan themselves had, v. 19. 22. See here, (1.) How politic the Philistines were, when they had power in their hands, and did what they pleased in Israel; they put down all the smiths' shops, transplanted the smiths into their own country, and forbade any Israelite, under severe penalties, to exercise the trade, or mystery, of working in brass or iron, though they had rich mines of both, (Deut. 8. 9.) in such plenty, that it was said of Asher, His shoes shall be iron and brass, Deut. 33. 25. This was subtly done of the Philistines, for, hereby, they not only prevented the people of Israel from making themselves weapons of war, (by which they would be both disused to military exercises, and unfurnished when there was occasion,) but obliged them to a dependence upon them, even for the instruments of husbandry; they must go to them, that is, to some or other of their garrisons, which were dispersed in the country, to have all their iron-work done, and no more might an Israelite do than use a file; (v. 20, 21.) and, no doubt, the Philistines' smiths brought the Israelites long bills for work done. (2.) How impolitic Saul was, that did not, in the beginning of his reign, set himself to redress this grievance. Samuel's not doing it was very excusable, he fought with other artillery; thunder and lightning, in answer to his prayer, were to him instead of sword or spear; but for Saul, that pretended to be a king, like the kings of the nations, to leave his soldiers without swords and spears, and take no care to provide them, especially when he might have done it out of the spoils of the Ammonites, whom he conquered in the beginning of his reign, was such a piece of negligence, as could, by no means, be excused. (3.) How slothful and mean-spirited the Israelites were, that suffered the Philistines thus to impose upon them, and had no thought nor spirit to help themselves. It was reckoned very bad with them, when there was not a shield or spear found among forty thousand in Israel; (Judg. 5. 8.) and it was no better now, when there was never an Israelite with a sword by his side, but the king and his son; never a soldier, never a gentleman: surely they were reduced to this, or began to be so, in Samson's time, for we never find him with sword or spear in his hand. If they had not been dispirited, they could not have been disarmed, but it was sin that made them naked to their shame.

CHAP. XIV.

We left the host of Israel in a very ill posture, in the close of the foregoing chapter; we saw in them neither wisdom, nor strength, nor goodness, to give us ground to expect any other than that they should all be cut off by the army of the Philistines; yet here we find that infinite power which works without means, and that infinite goodness which gives without merit, glorified in a happy turn to their affairs, that still Samuel's words may be made good, The Lord will not forsake his people, for his great name's sake, ch. 12. 22. In this chapter, we have, I. The host of the Philistines trampled upon, and triumphed over, by the faith and courage of Jonathan, who, unknown to his father, (v. 1. .3.) with his armour-bearer only, made a brave attack upon them, encouraging himself in the Lord his God, v. 4. .7. He challenged them, (v. 8. .12.) and, upon their acceptance of the challenge, charged them with such fury, or rather such faith, that he put them to flight, and set them one against another, (v. 13. .15.) which gave opportunity to Saul and his forces, with other Israelites, to pursue the blow, and gain a victory, v. 16. .23. II. The host of Israel troubled and perplexed by the rashness and folly of Saul, who adjured the people to eat no food till night; which, 1. Brought Jonathan into a pramunive, v. 24. .30. 2. Was a temptation to the people, when the time of their fast was expired, to eat with the blood, v. 31. .35. 3. Jonathan's error, through ignorance, had like to have been his death, but the people rescued him, v. 36. .46. III. In the close, we have a general account of Saul's exploits, (v. 47, 48.) and of his family, v. 49. .52.

1. NOW it came to pass upon a day, that Jonathan the son of Saul said unto the young man that bare his armour, Come, and let us go over to the Philistines' garrison, that is on the other side. But he told not his father. 2. And Saul tarried in the uttermost part of Gibeah under a pomegranate-tree which is in Migron: and the people that were with him were about six hundred men; 3. And Ahiah, the son of Ahitub, I-chabod's brother, the son of Phinehas, the son of Eli, the LORD's priest in Shiloh, wearing an ephod. And the people knew not that Jonathan was gone. 4. And between the passages, by which Jonathan sought to go over unto the Philistines' garrison, there was a sharp rock on the one side, and a sharp rock on the other side: and the name of the one was Bozez, and the name of the other Seneh. 5. The forefront of the one was situate north-ward over against Michmash, and the other south-ward over against Gibeah. 6. And Jonathan said to the young man that bare his armour, Come, and let us go over unto the garrison of these uncircumcised: it may be that the LORD will work for us: for there is no restraint to the LORD to save by many or by few. 7. And his armour-bearer said unto him, Do all that is in thine heart: turn thee; behold, I am with thee according to thy heart. 8. Then said Jonathan, Behold, we will pass over unto these men, and we will discover ourselves unto them. 9. If they say thus unto us, Tarry until we come to you; then we will stand still in our place, and will not go up unto them. 10. But if they say thus, Come up unto us; then we will go up: for the LORD hath delivered them into our hand: and this shall be a sign unto us. 11. And both of them discovered themselves unto the garrison of the Philistines: and the Philistines said, Behold, the Hebrews come forth out of the holes where they had hid themselves. 12. And the men of the garrison answered Jonathan and his armour-bearer, and said, Come up to us, and we will shew you a thing. And Jonathan said unto his armour-bearer, Come up after me: for the LORD hath delivered them into the hand of Israel. 13. And Jonathan climbed up upon his hands and upon his feet, and his armour-bearer after him: and they fell before Jonathan; and his armour-bearer slew after him. 14. And that first slaughter, which Jonathan and his armour-bearer made, was about twenty men, within as it were an half acre of land, which a yoke of oxen might plough. 15. And there was trembling in the host, in the field, and among all the people: the garrison, and the spoilers, they also trembled, and the earth quaked: so it was a very great trembling.

We must here take notice,

I. Of the goodness of God in restraining the Philistines, who had a vast army of stout men in the field, from falling upon that little handful of timorous trembling people that Saul had with him, whom they would easily have swallowed up at once. It is an invisible power that sets bounds to the malice of the church's enemies, and suffers them not to do that which we should think there is nothing to hinder them from.

II. Of the weakness of Saul, who seems here to have been quite at a loss, and unable to help himself.

1. He pitched his tent under a tree, and had but six hundred men with him, v. 2. Where were now the three thousand men he had chosen, and put such a confidence in? ch. 13. 2. Those whom he trusted too much to, failed him when he most needed them. He durst not stay in Gibeah, but got into some obscure place, in the uttermost part of the city, under a pomegranate-tree, under Rimmon, so the word is, Ha-Rimmon, that Rimmon near Gibeah, in the caves of which these six hundred Benjamites, that escaped, hid themselves, Judg. 20. 47. Some think that Saul took shelter there, so mean and abject was his spirit, now that he was fallen under God's displeasure, every hour expecting the Philistines upon him, and, thereby, the accomplishment of Samuel's threatening, ch. 13. 14. Those can never think themselves safe, that see themselves cast out of God's protection.

2. Now, he sent for a priest, and the ark; a priest from Shiloh, and the ark from Kirjath-jearim, v. 3, 18. Saul had once offended by offering sacrifice himself, (ch. 13. 9.) now, he resolves never to fall into that error again, and, therefore, sends for a priest, and hopes to compromise the matter with God Almighty by a partial reformation, as many do, whose hearts are unhumiliated and unchanged. Samuel, the Lord's prophet, had forsaken him, but he thinks he can make up that loss, by commanding Abiah, the Lord's priest, to attend him, and he will not make him stay for him, nor reprove him, as Samuel had done, but will do just as he bids him, v. 18, 19. Many love to have just such ministers as will be what they would have them to be, and prophesy smooth things to them; and their caressing of them, because they are priests, they hope, will atone for their enmity to those ministers that deal faithfully and plainly with them. He will also have the ark brought, perhaps, to upbraid Samuel, who, in the days of his government, fet aught that appears, had not made any public use of it; or, in hopes that that would make up the deficiency of his forces; one would have supposed, that they would never have brought the ark into the camp again, since the last time, when it not only did not save them, but did itself fall into the Philistines' hands. But it is common for those that have lost the substance of religion, to be most fond of the shadows of it, as here is a deserted prince courting a deserted priest.

III. Of the bravery and piety of Jonathan, the son of Saul, who was much fitter than the father to wear the crown. "A sweet imp" (says Bishop Hall) "out of a crab-stock."

1. He resolved to go incognito—unknown to any one, into the camp of the Philistines; he did not acquaint his father with his design, for he knew he would forbid him; nor the people, for he knew they would all discourage him; and, because he resolved not to heed their objections, he resolved not to hear them, nor ask their advice, v. 1, 3. Nor had he so great an opinion of the priest as to consult him, but, being conscious of a divine impulse putting him upon it, he threw himself into the mouth of danger, in hopes of doing service to his country. The way of access to the enemies' camp is described (v. 4, 5.) to be peculiarly difficult, and their natural intrenchments seemed impregnable; yet that does not discourage him: the strength and sharpness of the rocks do but harden and whet his resolutions. Great and generous souls are animated by opposition, and take a pleasure in breaking through it.

2. He encouraged his armour-bearer, a young man that attended him, to go alone with him in this daring enterprise; (v. 6.) "Come, and let us put our lives in our hands, and go over to the enemies' garrison, and try what we can do to put them into confusion." See whence he draws his encouragements. (1.) "They are uncircumcised, and have not the seal of the covenant in their flesh, as we have. Fear not, we shall do well enough with them, for they are not under the protection of God's covenant, as we are, cannot call him their's, as we can, by the sign of circumcision." If such as are enemies to us are also strangers to God, we need not fear them. (2.) "God is able to make us two victorious over their unnumbered regiments. There is no restraint to the Lord, no limitation to the Holy One of Israel, but it is all one to him, to save by many or by few." This is a truth easily granted in general, that it is all alike to Omnipotence, what the instruments are by which it works: and yet it is not so easy to apply it to a particular case: when we are but few and feeble, then to believe that God cannot only save us, but save by us, this is an instance of faith, which, wherever it is, shall obtain a good report. Let this strengthen the weak, and hearten the heartless; let it be pleaded with God for the enforcing of our petitions, and with ourselves for the silencing of our fears, It is nothing with God to help, whether with many, or with them that have no power, 2 Chron. 14. 11. (3.) "Who knows, but he that can use us for his glory, will do it? It may be the Lord will work for us, work with us, work a sign or miracle for us;" so the Chaldee. We may encourage ourselves with hope that God will appear for us, though we have not ground on which to build an assurance. An active faith will venture far in God's cause upon an, It may be.

His armour-bearer, or esquire, as if he had learned to carry, not his arms only, but his heart, promised to stand by him, and follow him wheresoever he went, v. 7. We have reason to think that Jonathan felt a divine impulse and impression, putting him upon this bold adventure, in which he was encouraged by his servant's concurrence, else the danger was so great which he ran upon, that he had rather tempted God, than trusted him. And, perhaps, he had an actual regard to that word of Joshua, (ch. 23. 10.) One man of you shall chase a thousand, borrowed from Moses, Deut. 32. 30.

3. How bold soever his resolution was, he resolved to follow Providence in the execution of it, which, he believed, would guide him with its eye, (Ps. 32. 8.) and which therefore he would carefully attend, and take hints of direction from.

See, (1.) How he put himself upon Providence, and resolved to be determined by it, "Come," (says he to his confidant,) "we will discover ourselves to the enemy, as those that are not afraid to look them in the face, (v. 8.) and then, if they be so cautious as to bid us stand, we will advance no further, taking that intimation of Providence, that God would have us act defensively; and we will prepare, as well as we can, to give them a warm reception: (v. 9.) but if they be so presumptuous as to challenge us, and the first sentinel we meet with bids us march on, we will push forward, and make as brisk an onset, assuredly gathering from thence that it is the will of God we should act offensively, and then, not doubting but he will stand by us;" (v. 10.) and upon this issue he puts it, firmly believing, as we all should, [1.] That God has the governing of the hearts and tongues of all men, even of those that know him not, nor have any regard to him, and serves his own purposes by them, though they mean not so, neither doth their heart think so. Jonathan knew God could discover his mind to him, if he pleased, and would do it, since he depended upon him, as surely by the mouth of a Philistine, as by the mouth of a priest. [2.] That God will, some way or other, direct the steps of those that acknowledge him in all their ways, and seek unto him for direction, with full purpose of heart to follow his conduct. Sometimes we find most comfort in that which is least our own doing, and into which we have been led by the unexpected, but well observed, turns of Providence.

(2.) Providence gave him the sign he expected, and he answered the signal. He and his armour-bearer did not surprise the Philistines when they were asleep, but discovered themselves to them by day-light, v. 11. The guards of the Philistines, [1.] Disdained them, upbraided them with the cowardice of many of their people, and looked upon them to be of the regiment of the sneakers; Behold, the Hebrews came forth out of their holes. If some of Christ's soldiers play the coward, others, that play the man, may, perhaps, be upbraided with it. [2.] They defied them; (v. 12.) Come, and we will shew you a thing; as if they came like children to gaze about them; but meaning, as Goliath, (ch. 17. 44.) that they would give them as meat to the fowls of the air. They bantered them, not doubting but to make a prey of them. This greatly imboldened Jonathan. With it he encouraged his servant; he had spoken with uncertainty, (v. 6.) It may be the Lord will work for us, but now with assurance, (v. 12.) The Lord has delivered them, not into our hands, (he sought not his own glory,) but into the hand of Israel; for he aimed at nothing but the advantage of the public. His faith being thus strengthened, no difficulty can stand before him; he climbs up the rock upon all four, (v. 13.) though he had nothing to cover him, nor any of his own servants to second him, nor any human probability of any thing but death before him.

4. The wonderful success of this daring enterprise. The Philistines, instead of falling upon Jonathan, to slay him, or take prisoner, fell before him, (v. 13.) unaccountably, upon the first blow he gave. They fell; that is,

(1.) They were many of them slain by him and his armour-bearer; (v. 14.) twenty Philistines fell presently. It was not so much the name of Jonathan that made them yield so tamely, (though some think that he was become terrible to them, since he smote one of their garrisons, ch. 13. 3.) but it was God's right hand, and his arm, that got him this victory.

(2.) The rest were put to flight, and fell foul upon one another, (v. 15.) There was a trembling in the host. There was no visible cause for fear, they were so numerous, bold, and advantageously posted; the Israelites had fled before them, not an enemy made head against them, but one gentleman and his man, and yet they shook like an aspen-leaf; the consternation was general, they all trembled, even the spoilers; those that had been most bold and forward shared in the common fright, the joints of their loins were loosed, and their knees smote one against another, and yet none of them could tell why, or wherefore; it is called a trembling of God, so the original phrase is, signifying, not only, as we render it, a very great trembling which they could not resist, nor reason themselves clear of, but that it was supernatural, and came immediately from the hand of God. He that made the heart knows how to make it tremble. To complete the confession, even the earth quaked, and made them ready to fear that it would sink under them. Those that will not fear the eternal God, he can make them afraid of a shadow. See Prov. 28. 1. Isa. 33. 14.

16. And the watchmen of Saul in Gibeah of Benjamin looked; and, behold, the multitude melted away, and they went on beating down one another. 17. Then said Saul unto the people that were with him, Number now, and see who is gone from us. And when they had numbered, behold, Jonathan and his armour-bearer were not there. 18. And Saul said unto Ahiah, Bring hither the ark of God. For the ark of God was at that time with the children of Israel. 19. And it came to pass, while Saul talked unto the priest, that the noise that was in the host of the Philistines went on and increased: and Saul said unto the priest, Withdraw thine hand. 20. And Saul and all the people that were with him assembled themselves, and they came to the battle: and, behold, every man's sword was against his fellow, and there was a very great discomfiture. 21. Moreover the Hebrews that were with the Philistines before that time which went up with them into the camp from the country round about, even they also turned to be with the Israelites that were with Saul and Jonathan. 22. Likewise all the men of Israel which had hid themselves in mount Ephraim, when they heard that the Philistines fled, even they also followed hard after them in the battle. 23. So the Lord saved Israel that day: and the battle passed over unto Beth-aven.

We have here the prosecution and improvement of the wonderful advantages which Jonathan and his armour-bearer gained against the Philistines.

I. The Philistines were, by the power of God, set against one another. They melted away like snow before the sun, and went on, beating down one another, v. 16. for every man's sword was against his fellow, v. 20. When they fled for fear, instead of turning back upon those that chased them, they reckoned those only their enemies that stood in their way, and treated them accordingly. The Philistines were very secure, because all the swords and spears were in their hands, Israel had none, except what Saul and Jonathan had; but now God shewed them the folly of that confidence, by making their own swords and spears the instruments of their destruction, and more fatal in their own hands than if they had been in the hands of Israel. See the like done, Judg. 7. 22. 2 Chron. 20. 23.

II. The Israelites were hereby animated against them.

1. Notice was soon taken of it by the watchmen of Saul, those that stood sentinel at Gibeah; (v. 16.) they were aware that the host of the enemy was in great confusion, and that a great slaughter was made among them, and yet, upon search, they found none of their own forces absent, but only Jonathan and his servant, (v. 17.) which, no doubt, greatly animated them, and assured them that it could be no other than the Lord's doing, when there was no more of man's doing than what those two could do against a great host.

2. Saul began to inquire of God, but soon desisted. His spirit was not come down so far as to allow him to consult with Samuel, though, it is probable, he was near him; for we read, (ch. 13. 15.) that he was come to Gibeah of Benjamin; but he called for the ark, (v. 18.) desiring to know whether it would be safe for him to attack the Philistines, upon the disorder they perceived them to be in. Many will consult God about their safety, that would never consult him about their duty. But perceiving by his scouts that the noise in the enemy's camp increased, he commanded the priest that officiated to break off abruptly, "Withdraw thine hand, v. 19." consult no more, wait no longer for an answer." He was very unwise indeed, if (as some think) he forbade him to lift up his hands in prayer; for, when Joshua was actually engaged with Amalek, Moses continued still to lift up his hands. It is rather a prohibition to his inquiring of the Lord, either, (1.) Because now he thought he did not need an answer, the case was plain enough. And yet, the more evident it was that God did all, the more reason he had to inquire whether he would give him leave to do any thing. Or, (2.) Because now he would not stay for it; he was in such haste to fight a falling enemy, that he would not stay to make an end of his devotions, nor hear what answer God would give him. A little thing will divert a vain and carnal mind from religious exercises. He that believeth will not make such haste as this, nor reckon any business so urgent, as not to allow time to take God along with him.

3. He, and all the little force he had, made a vigorous attack upon the enemy: and all the people were cried together, so the word is, v. 20. for want of the silver trumpets, wherewith God appointed them to sound an alarm in the day of battle, Numb. 10. 9. They summoned them together by shouting, and their number was not so great, but that they might soon be got together. And now they seem bold and brave, when the work is done to their hands. Our Lord Jesus has conquered our spiritual enemies, routed and dispersed them, so that we are cowards indeed, if we will not stand to our arms, when it is only to pursue the victory and divide the spoil.

4. Every Hebrew, even those from whom one would least have expected it, now turned his hand against the Philistines. 1. Those that had deserted, and gone over to the enemy, and were among them, now fought against them; v. 21. some think, they were such as had been taken prisoners by them, and now they were as goads in their sides: it rather seems, that they went in to them voluntarily, but, now that they saw them falling, recovered the hearts of Israelites, and did valiantly for their country. 2. Those that had run their colours, and hid themselves in the mountains, returned to their posts, and joined in with the pursuers, v. 22. hoping, by their great zeal and officiousness, now that the danger was over, and the victory sure, to atone for their former cowardice. It was not much to their praise to appear now, but it would have been more their reproach if they had not appeared. Those are remiss and faint-hearted indeed, that will not act in the cause of God, when they see it victorious as well as righteous.

Thus all hands were at work against the Philistines, and every Israelite slew as many as he could, without sword or spear; yet it is said, v. 23. it was the Lord that saved Israel that day. He did it by them, for without him they could do nothing. Salvation is of the Lord.

24. And the men of Israel were distressed that day: for Saul had adjured the people, saying, Cursed be the man that eateth any food until evening, that I may be avenged on mine enemies. So none of the people tasted any food. 25. And all they of the land came to a wood; and there was honey upon the ground. 26. And when the people were come into the wood, behold, the honey dropped; but no man put his hand to his mouth: for the people feared the oath. 27. But Jonathan heard not when his father charged the people with the oath: wherefore he put forth the end of the rod that was in his hand, and dipped it in an honeycomb, and put his hand to his mouth; and his eyes were enlightened. 28. Then answered one of the people, and said, Thy father straightly charged the people with an oath, saying, Cursed be the man that eateth any food this day. And the people were faint. 29. Then said Jonathan, My father hath troubled the land: see, I pray you, how mine eyes have been enlightened, because I tasted a little of this honey. 30. How much more, if haply the people had eaten freely to-day of the spoil of their enemies which they found? for had there not been now a much greater slaughter among the Philistines? 31. And they smote the Philistines that day from Michmash to Ajalon: and the people were very faint. 32. And the people slew upon the spoil, and took sheep, and oxen, and calves, and slew them on the ground: and the people did eat them with the blood. 33. Then they told Saul, saying, Behold, the people sin against the LORD, in that they eat with the blood. And he said, Ye have transgressed: roll a great stone unto me this day. 34. And Saul said, Disperse yourselves among the people, and say unto them, Bring me hither every man his ox, and every man his sheep, and slay them here, and eat; and sin not against the LORD in eating with the blood. And all the people brought every man his ox with him that night, and slew them there. 35. And Saul built an altar unto the LORD: the same was the first altar that he built unto the LORD.

We have here an account of the distress of the children of Israel, even in the days of their triumphs. Such allays are all present joys subject to! and such obstructions does many a good cause meet with even then when it seems most prosperous, through the mismanagement of instruments.

I. Saul forbade the people, under the penalty of a curse, to taste any food that day, v. 54. Here we will suppose, 1. That as king he had power to put his soldiers under this interdict, and to bind it on with a curse; and therefore they submitted to it, and God so far owned it, as to discover, by the lot, that Jonathan was the delinquent that had meddled with the accursed thing, (though ignorantly,) on which account, God would not be at that time inquired of by them. 2. That he did it with a good intention, lest the people, who, perhaps, had been kept for some time at short allowance, when they found plenty of victuals in the deserted camp of the Philistines, should fall greedily upon that, and so lose time in pursuing the enemy, and some of them, it may be, glut themselves to that degree, as not to be fit for any more service that day. To prevent this, he forbade them to taste any food, and laid himself, it is likely, under the same restraint. And yet his making this severe order was, (1.) Impolitic, and very unwise; for if it gained time, it lost strength for the pursuit. (2.) It was imperious, and disobliging to the people, and worse than muzzling the mouth of the ox, when he treads out the corn. To forbid them to feast had been commendable, but to forbid them so much as to taste, though so hungry, was barbarous. (3.) It was impious to enforce the prohibition with a curse and an oath. Had he no penalty less than an anathema, wherewith to support his military discipline? Death for such a crime had been too much, but especially death with a curse. Though superiors may chide and correct, they may not curse their inferiors; our rule is, Bless, and curse not. When David speaks of an enemy he had that loved cursing, perhaps he meant Saul, Ps. 109. 17, 18.

II. The people observed his order, but it had many inconveniences attending it. 1. The soldiers were tantalized; for, in their pursuits of the enemy, it happened that they went through a wood so full of wild honey, that it dropped from the trees upon the ground; the Philistines having perhaps, in their flight, broken in upon the honey-combs, for their own refreshment, and left them running. Canaan flowed with honey, and here is an instance of it. They sucked honey out of the rock, the flinty rock; Deut. 32. 13. yet, for fear of the curse, they did not so much as taste the honey, v. 25, 26. Those are worthy the name of Israelites, that can deny themselves and their own appetites, even then when they are most craving, and the delights of sense most tempting, for fear of guilt and a curse, and the table becoming a snare. Let us never feed ourselves, much less feast ourselves, without fear. 2. Jonathan fell under the curse through ignorance. He heard not of the charge his father had given; for, having bravely forced the lines, he was then following the chase, and therefore might justly be looked upon as exempted from the charge, and not intended in it. But it seems it was taken for granted, and he himself did not object against it afterward, that it extended to him, though absent upon so good an occasion. He, not knowing any peril in it, took up a piece of a honey-comb, upon the end of his staff, and sucked it, v. 27. and was sensibly refreshed by it; his eyes were enlightened, which began to grow dim through hunger and faintness; it made his countenance look pleasant and cheerful, for it was such as a stander-by might discern, v. 29. See how mine eyes have been enlightened. He thought no harm, nor feared any, till one of the people acquainted him with the order, and then he found himself in a snare. Many a good son has been thus entangled and distressed, more ways than one, by the rashness of an inconsiderate father. Jonathan, for his part, lost the crown he was heir to, by his father's folly, which, it may be, this was an ill omen of. 3. The soldiers were faint, and grew feeble in the pursuit of the Philistines. Jonathan foresaw this would be the effect of it, their spirits would flag, and their strength would fail, for want of sustenance. Such is the nature of our bodies, that they soon grow unfit for service, if they be not supplied with fresh recruits. Daily work cannot be done without daily bread, which therefore our Father in heaven graciously gives us. It is bread that strengthens man's heart; therefore Jonathan reasoned very well, If the people had eaten freely, there had been a much greater slaughter, (v. 30.) but, as it was, they were very faint, too much fatigued, so the Chaldee, and began to think more of their meat than of their work. 4. The worst effect of all was, that, at evening, when the restraint was taken off, and they returned to their food again, they were so greedy and eager upon it, that they ate the flesh with the blood, expressly contrary to the law of God, v. 32. Two hungry meals, we say, make the third a glutton; it was so here. They would not stay to have their meat either duly killed, for they slew them upon the ground, and did not hang them up, as they used to do, that the blood might all run out of them, or duly dressed, but fell greedily upon it, before it was half boiled, or half roasted, v. 32. Saul, being informed of it, reproved them for the sin, v. 34. Ye have transgressed; but did not, as he should have done, reflect upon himself as having been necessary to it, and having made the Lord's people to transgress. To put a stop to this irregularity, Saul ordered them to set up a great stone before him, and let all that had cattle to kill, for their present use, bring them thither, and kill them under his eye upon that stone, v. 33. and the people did so; v. 34. so easily were they restrained and reformed when their prince took care to do his part. If magistrates would but use their power as they might, people would be made better than they are, with more ease than is imagined.

Lastly, On this occasion Saul built an altar, v. 35. that he might offer sacrifice, either by way of acknowledgment of the victory they had obtained, or by way of atonement for the sin they had been guilty of. The same was the first altar that he built, and perhaps the rolling of the great stone to kill the beasts on, reminded him of converting it into an altar, else he had not thought of it. Saul was turning aside from God, and yet now he begins to build altars, being most zealous (as many are) for the form of godliness then when he was denying the power of it. See Hos. 8. 14. Israel has forgotten his Maker, and buildeth temples. Some read it, He began to build that altar; he laid the first stone, but was so hasty to pursue his victory, that he could not stay to finish it.

36. And Saul said, Let us go down after the Philistines by night, and spoil them until the morning light, and let us not leave a man of them. And they said, Do whatsoever seemeth good unto thee. Then said the priest, Let us draw near hither unto God. 37. And Saul asked counsel of God, Shall I go down after the Philistines? wilt thou deliver them into the hand of Israel? But he answered him not that day. 38. And Saul said, Draw ye near hither, all the chief of the people: and know and see wherein this sin hath been this day. 39. For, as the LORD liveth, which saveth Israel, though it be in Jonathan my son, he shall surely die. But there was not a man among all the people that answered him. 40. Then said he unto all Israel, Be ye on one side, and I and Jonathan my son will be on the other side. And the people said unto Saul, Do what seemeth good unto thee. 41. Therefore Saul said unto the LORD God of Israel, Give a perfect lot. And Saul and Jonathan were taken: but the people escaped. 42. And Saul said, Cast lots between me and Jonathan my son. And Jonathan was taken. 43. Then Saul said to Jonathan, Tell me what thou hast done. And Jonathan told him, and said, I did but taste a little honey with the end of the rod that was in mine hand, and, lo,

I must die. 44. And Saul answered, God do so and more also: for thou shalt surely die, Jonathan. 45. And the people said unto Saul, Shall Jonathan die, who hath wrought this great salvation in Israel? God forbid: as the Lord liveth, there shall not one hair of his head fall to the ground; for he hath wrought with God this day. So the people rescued Jonathan, that he died not. 46. Then Saul went up from following the Philistines: and the Philistines went to their own place.

Here is,

I. Saul's boasting against the Philistines; he proposed, as soon as his soldiers had got their suppers, to pursue them all night, and not leave a man of them, v. 36. Here he shewed much zeal, but little discretion; for his army, thus fatigued, could as ill spare a night's sleep, as a meal's meat. But it is common for rash and foolish men, to consider no body but themselves, and, so they may but have their honour, not to care what hardships they put upon those that are under them. However, his people were so obsequious to their king, that they would by no means oppose the motion, but resolved to make the best of it, and, if he will go on, they will follow him. Do whatsoever seemeth good to thee. Only the priest thought it convenient to go on with the devotions that were broken off abruptly, (v. 19.) and to consult the oracle, Let us draw hither unto God. Princes and great men have need of such about them, as will thus be their remembrancers, wherever they go, to take God along with them. And, when the priest proposed it, Saul could not, for shame, reject the motion, but asked counsel of God, (v. 37.) "Shall I go down after the Philistines? And shall I speed?"

II. His falling foul on his son Jonathan: and the rest of this paragraph is wholly concerning him; for, while he is prosecuted, the Philistines made their escape. We know not what mischief may ensue upon one rash resolve.

1. God, by giving an intimation of his displeasure, put Saul upon searching for an accursed thing. When, by the priest, he consulted the oracle, God answered him not, v. 37. Note, When God denies our prayers, it concerns us to inquire what the sin is that has provoked him to do so. Let us see where the sin is, (v. 38.) for God's ear is not heavy that it cannot hear, but it is sin that separates between us and him. If God turns away our prayer, we have reason to suspect it is for some iniquity regarded in our hearts, which we are concerned to find out, that we may put it away, may mortify it, and put it to death. Saul swears by his Maker, that whoever was the Achan that troubled the camp, by eating the forbidden fruit, should certainly die, though it were Jonathan himself; that is, though ever so dear to himself and the people, little thinking that Jonathan was the man; (v. 39.) "He shall surely die; the curse shall be executed upon him." But none of the people answered him; that is, none of those who knew Jonathan had broken the order, would inform against him.

2. Jonathan was discovered by lot to be the offender. Saul would have lots cast between himself and Jonathan on the one side, and the people on the other, perhaps, because he was as confident of Jonathan's innocency in this matter, as of his own, v. 40. The people, seeing him in a heat, durst not gainsay any thing he proposed, but acquiesced. "Do as seemeth good unto thee. Before he cast lots, he prayed that God would give a perfect lot; (v. 41.) that is, make a full discovery of this matter, or, as it is in the margin, that he would shew the innocent. This was with an air of impartial justice. Judges should desire that truth may come out, whoever may suffer by it. Lots should be cast with prayer, because they are a solemn appeal to Providence, and by them we beg of God to direct and determine us; (Acts, 1. 24.) for which reason some have condemned games, that depend purely upon lot or chance, as making too bold with a sacred thing. Jonathan at length was taken; (v. 42.) Providence designing hereby to countenance and support a lawful authority, and to put an honour upon the administration of public justice in general, reserving another way to bring off one that had done nothing worthy of death.

3. Jonathan ingeniously confesses the fact, and Saul, with an angry curse, passes sentence upon him. Jonathan denies not the truth, nor goes about to conceal it, only he thinks it hard that he must die for it, v. 43. He might very fairly have pleaded his invincible ignorance of the law, or have insisted upon his merit, but he submitted to the necessity with a great and generous mind, "God's and my father's will be done:" thus he shewed as much valour in receiving the messengers of death himself, as in sending them among the Philistines. It is as brave to yield in some cases, as it is in other cases to fight. Saul is not mollified by his filial submission, nor the hardness of his case; but, as one that affected to be thought firm to his word, and much more to his oath, even then when it bound him hardest, with another imprecation he gives judgment upon Jonathan; (v. 44.) God do so and more also to me, if I do not execute the law upon thee, for thou shalt surely die, Jonathan." (1.) He passed this sentence too hastily, without consulting the oracle; Jonathan had a very good plea in arrest of the judgment; what he had done was not malum in se—bad in itself; and as for the prohibition of it, he was ignorant of that, so that he could not be charged with rebellion or disobedience. (2.) He did it in fury. Had Jonathan been worthy to die, yet it had become a judge, much more a father, to pass sentence with tenderness and compassion, and not with such an air of triumph, like a man perfectly divested of all humanity and natural affection. Justice is debased, when it is administered with wrath and bitterness. (3.) He backed it with a curse upon himself, if he did not see the sentence executed; and this curse did return upon his own head; Jonathan escaped, but God did so to Saul, and more also; for he was rejected of God, and made an anathema. Let none upon any occasion dare to use such imprecations as these, lest God say Amen to them, and make their own tongues to fall upon them, Ps. 64. 8. He that rolleth this stone, it will return upon him. Yet we have reason to think that Saul's bowels yearned toward Jonathan, so that he really punished himself, and very justly, when he seemed so severe upon Jonathan. God made him feel the smart of his own rash edict, which might make him fear being again guilty of the like. By all these vexatious accidents, God did likewise correct him for his presumption, in offering sacrifice without Samuel. An expedition so ill begun, could not end without some rebukes.

4. The people rescued Jonathan out of his father's hands, v. 45. Hitherto they had expressed themselves very observant of Saul, what seemed good to him they acquiesced in; (v. 36, 40.) but when Jonathan is in danger, Saul's word is no longer a law to them, but with the utmost zeal they oppose the execution of his sentence, "Shall Jonathan die?" That blessing, that darling, of his country? Shall that life be sacrificed to a punctilio of law and honour, which was so bravely exposed for the public service, and to which we owe our lives and triumphs? No, we will never stand by and see him thus treated, whom God delights to honour." It is good to see Israelites zealous for the protection of those whom God has made instruments of public good. Saul had sworn that Jonathan should die, but they oppose their oath to his, and swear he shall not die; As the Lord liveth, there shall (not only not his head, but) not a hair of his head fall to the ground; they did not rescue him by violence, but by reason and resolution; and Josephus says, they made their prayer to God, that he might be loosed from the curse. They plead for him, that he has wrought with God this day; that is, "he has owned God's cause, and God has owned his endeavours, and therefore his life is too precious to be thrown away upon a nicety." We may suppose, Saul had not so perfectly forgotten the relation of a father, but that he was willing enough to have Jonathan rescued, and well pleased to have that done, which yet he would not do himself; and he that knows the heart of a father, knows not how to blame him.

Lastly, The design against the Philistines is quashed by this incident; (v. 46.) Saul went up from following them, and so an op- portunity was lost of completing the victory. When Israel's shields are clashing with one another, the public safety and service suffer by it.

47. So Saul took the kingdom over Israel, and fought against all his enemies on every side, against Moab, and against the children of Ammon, and against Edom, and against the kings of Zobah, and against the Philistines: and whithersoever he turned himself, he vexed them. 48. And he gathered an host, and smote the Amalekites, and delivered Israel out of the hands of them that spoiled them. 49. Now the sons of Saul were Jonathan, and Ishui, and Melchi-shua: and the names of his two daughters were these; the name of the first-born Merab, and the name of the younger Michal: 50. And the name of Saul's wife was Ahinoam, the daughter of Ahimaaz: and the name of the captain of his host was Abner, the son of Ner, Saul's uncle. 51. And Kish was the father of Saul; and Ner the father of Abner was the son of Abiel. 52. And there was sore war against the Philistines all the days of Saul: and when Saul saw any strong man, or any valiant man, he took him unto him.

Here is a general account of Saul's court and camp.

1. Of his court and family. The names of his sons and daughters, v. 49. and of his wife, and his cousin-german that was general of his army, v. 50. There is mention of another wife of Saul's, 2 Sam. 21. 8. Rizpah, a secondary wife, and of the children he had by her.

2. Of his camp and military actions. (1.) How he levied his army: when he saw any strong valiant man, that was remarkably fit for service, he took him unto him, v. 52. as Samuel had told them the manner of the king would be; (ch. 8. 11.) and, if he must have a standing army, it was his prudence to fill it up with the ablest men he could make choice of. (2.) How he employed his army; he guarded his country against the insults of its enemies on every side, and prevented their incursions, v. 47, 48. It is supposed that he acted only defensively against those that used to invade the borders of Israel; and whithersoever he turned himself, as there was occasion, he vexed them, by checking and disappointing them. But the enemies he struggled most with, were, the Philistines, with them he had sore war all his days, v. 52. He had little reason to be proud of his royal dignity, nor had any of his neighbours cause to envy him, for he had little enjoyment of himself after he took the kingdom. He could not vex his enemies without some vexation to himself, such thorns are crowns quilted with.

CHAP. XV.

In this chapter, we have the final rejection of Saul from being king, for his disobedience to God's command, in not utterly destroying the Amalekites. By his wars and victories, he hoped to magnify and perpetuate his own name and honour; but, by his mismanagement of them, he ruined himself, and laid his honour in the dust. Here is, I. The commission God gave him to destroy the Amalekites, with a command to do it utterly, v. 1. 3. II. Saul's preparation for this expedition, v. 4. 6. III. His success, and partial execution of this commission, v. 7. 9. IV. His examination before Samuel, and sentence past upon him, notwithstanding the many frivolous pleas he made to excuse himself, v. 10. 31. V. The slaying of Agag, v. 32, 33. VI. Samuel's final farewell to Saul, v. 34, 35.

I. SAMUEL also said unto Saul, The LORD sent me to anoint thee to be king over his people, over Israel: now therefore hearken thou unto the voice of the words of the LORD. 2. Thus saith the LORD of hosts, I remember that which Amalek did to Israel, how he laid wait for him in the way, when he came up from Egypt. 3. Now go and smite Amalek, and utterly destroy all that they have, and spare them not; but slay both man and woman, infant and suckling, ox and sheep, camel and ass. 4. And Saul gathered the people together, and numbered them in Telaim, two hundred thousand footmen, and ten thousand men of Judah. 5. And Saul came to a city of Amalek, and laid wait in the valley. 6. And Saul said unto the Kenites, Go, depart, get you down from among the Amalekites, lest I destroy you with them: for ye shewed kindness to all the children of Israel, when they came up out of Egypt. So the Kenites departed from among the Amalekites. 7. And Saul smote the Amalekites from Havilah until thou comest to Shur, that is over against Egypt. 8. And he took Agag the king of the Amalekites alive, and utterly destroyed all the people with the edge of the sword. 9. But Saul and the people spared Agag, and the best of the sheep, and of the oxen, and of the fatlings, and the lambs, and all that was good, and would not utterly destroy them: but every thing that was vile and refuse, that they destroyed utterly.

Here,

I. Samuel, in God's name, solemnly requires Saul to be obedient to the command of God, and plainly intimates that he was now about to put him upon a trial, in one particular instance, whether he would be obedient or no, v. 1. And the making of this so expressly the trial of his obedience, did very much aggravate his disobedience. 1. He reminds him of what God had done for him. "The Lord sent me to anoint thee to be a king. God gave thee thy power, and therefore he expects thou shouldst use thy power for him. He put honour upon thee, and now thou must study how to do him honour. He made thee king over Israel, and now thou must plead Israel's cause, and avenge their quarrels. Thou art advanced to command Israel, but know that thou art a subject to the God of Israel, and must be commanded by him." Men's preferment, instead of discharging them from their obedience to God, obliges them so much the more to it. Samuel had himself been employed to anoint Saul, and therefore was the fitter to be sent with these orders to him. 2. He tells him, in general, that, in consideration of this, whatever God commanded him to do, he was bound to do it. Now therefore hearken to the voice of the Lord. Note, God's favours to us lay strong obligations upon us to be obedient to him. This we must render, Ps. 116. 12.

II. He appoints him a particular piece of service, in which he must now shew his obedience to God, more than in any thing he had done yet. Samuel promises God's authority to the command. Thus says the Lord of hosts, the Lord of all hosts, of Israel's hosts: he also gives him a reason for the command, that the severity he must use might not seem hard, I remember that which Amalek did to Israel, v. 2. God had an ancient quarrel with the Amalekites, for the injuries they did to his people Israel, when he brought them out of Egypt; we have the story, Exod. 17. 8, &c. and the crime is aggravated, Deut. 25. 18. he basely smote the hindmost of them, and feared not God; God then swore that he would have war with Amalek from generation to generation, and that, in process of time, he would utterly put out the remembrance of Amalek, that is the work that Saul is now appointed to do, v. 3. "Go, and smite Amalek. Israel is now strong, and the measure of the iniquity of Amalek is now full: now, go, and make a full riddance of that devoted nation." He is expressly commanded to kill and slay all before him, both man and woman, infant and suckling, and not spare them out of pity; ox and sheep, camel and ass, and not spare them out of covetousness. Note, 1. Injuries done to God's Israel will certainly be reckoned for sooner or later, especially the opposition given them, when they are coming out of Egypt. 2. God often bears long with those that are marked for ruin. The sentence past, is not executed speedily. 3. Though he bear long, he will not bear always. The year of recompence for the controversy of Israel, will come at last. Though divine justice strikes slow, it strikes sure. 4. The longer judgment is delayed, many times the more severe it is when it comes. 5. God chooses out instruments to do his work, that are fittest for it. This was bloody work, and therefore Saul must do it, that was a rough and severe man.

III. Saul hereupon musters his forces, and makes a descent upon the country of Amalek; it was an immense army that he brought into the field, (v. 4.) two hundred thousand footmen. When he was to engage the Philistines, and the success was hazardous, he had but six hundred attending him; (ch. 13. 15.) but now that he was to attack the Amalekites, by express order from heaven, in which he was sure of victory, he had thousands at his call. But, whatever it was at other times, it was not now for the honour of Judah, that their forces were numbered by themselves, for their quota was scandalously short, (whatever was the reason,) but a twentieth part of the whole, for they were but ten thousand, when the other ten tribes (for I except Levi) brought into the field two hundred thousand. The day of Judah's honour drew near, but was not yet come. Saul numbered them in Telaim, which signifies lambs. He numbered them like lambs, so the vulgar Latin: numbered them by the paschal lambs, so the Chaldee, allowing ten to a lamb, a way of numbering used by the Jews in the later times of their nation. Saul drew all his forces to the city of Amalek, that city was their metropolis, (v. 5.) that he might provoke them to give him battle.

IV. He gave a friendly advice to the Kenites, to separate themselves from the Amalekites, among whom they dwelt, while this execution was in doing, v. 6. Herein he did prudently and piously, and, it is probable, according to the direction Samuel gave him. The Kenites were of the family and kindred of Jethro, Moses's father-in-law, a people that dwelt in tents, which made it easy to them, upon every occasion, to remove to other lands, not appropriated; many of them, at this time, dwelt among the Amalekites, where, though they dwelt in tents, they were fortified by nature, for they put their nest in a rock; hardy people, that could live any where, and affected fastnesses, Numb. 24. 21. Balaam had there foretold, that they should be wasted; (v. 22.) however, Saul must not waste them. But, 1. He acknowledges the kindness of their ancestors to Israel, when they came out of Egypt. Jethro, and his family, had been very helpful and serviceable to them in their passage through the wilderness, had been to them instead of eyes, and this is remembered to their posterity many ages after. Thus a good man leaves the divine blessing for an inheritance to his children's children; those that come after us may be reaping the benefit of our good works, when we are in our graves. God is not unrighteous, to forget the kindness shewn to his people: but they shall be remembered another day, at furthest, in the great day, recompensed in the resurrection of the just: I was an hungered, and ye gave me meat. God's remembering the kindnesses of the Kenites' ancestors, in favour to them, at the same time when he was punishing the injuries done by the ancestors of the Amalekites, helped to clear the righteousness of God in that dispensation. If he entail favours, why may he not entail frowns? He espouses his people's cause, so as to bless those that bless them; and therefore so as to curse those that curse them, Numb. 24. 9. Gen. 12. 3. They cannot requite the kindnesses, nor avenge the injuries, done them, themselves, but God will do both. 2. He desires them to remove their tents from among the Amalekites; Go, depart, get you down from among them. When destroying judgments are abroad, God will take care to separate between the precious and the vile, and to hide the meek of the earth in the day of his anger. It is dangerous being found in the company of God's enemies, and it is our duty and interest to come out from among them, lest we share in their sins and plagues, Rev. 18. 4. The Jews have a saying, Woe to the wicked man, and woe to his neighbour.

V. Saul prevailed against the Amalekites, for it was rather an execution of condemned malefactors, than a war with contending enemies; the issue could not be dubious when the cause was just, and the call so clear, He smote them, (v. 7.) utterly destroyed them, v. 8. Now they pay dear for the sin of their ancestors; God sometimes lays up iniquity for the children. They were idolaters, and were guilty of many other sins, for which they deserved to fall under the wrath of God; yet, when God would reckon with them, he fastened upon the sin of their ancestors in abusing his Israel, as the ground of his quarrel. Lord, how unsearchable are thy judgments, yet how incontestable is thy righteousness!

VI. Yet he did his work by halves, v. 9. 1. He spared Agag, because he was a king like himself, and, perhaps, in hope to get a great ransom for him. 2. He spared the best of the cattle, and destroyed only the refuse, that was good for little. Many of the people, we may suppose, made their escape, and took their effects with them into other countries, and therefore we read of Amalekites after this, but that could not be helped; it was Saul's fault, that he did not destroy such as came to his hands, and were in his power. That which was now destroyed, was, in effect, sacrificed to the justice of God, as the God to whom vengeance belongeth; and for Saul to think the torn and the sick, the lame and the lean, good enough for that, while he reserved for his own fields, and his own table, the firstlings and the fat, was really to honour himself more than God.

10. Then came the word of the LORD unto Samuel, saying, 11. It repenteth me that I have set up Saul to be king: for he has turned back from following me, and hath not performed my commandments. And it grieved Samuel; and he cried unto the LORD all night. 12. And when Samuel arose early to meet Saul in the morning, it was told Samuel, saying, Saul came to Carmel, and, behold, he set him up a place, and is gone about, and passed on, and gone down to Gilgal. 13. And Samuel came to Saul: and Saul said unto him, Blessed be thou of the LORD: I have performed the commandment of the LORD. 14. And Samuel said, What meaneth then this bleating of the sheep in mine ears, and the lowing of the oxen which I hear? 15. And Saul said, They have brought them from the Amalekites: for the people spared the best of the sheep and of the oxen, to sacrifice unto the LORD thy God; and the rest we have utterly destroyed. 16. Then Samuel said unto Saul, Stay, and I will tell thee what the LORD hath said to me this night. And he said unto him, Say on. 17. And Samuel said, When thou wast little in thine own sight, wast thou not made the head of the tribes of Israel, and the LORD anointed thee king over Israel? 18. And the LORD sent thee on a journey, and said, Go and utterly destroy the sinners the Amalekites, and fight against them until they be consumed. 19. Wherefore then didst thou not obey the voice of the LORD, but didst fly upon the spoil, and didst evil in the sight of the LORD? 20. And Saul said unto Samuel, Yea, I have obeyed the voice of the LORD, and have gone the way which the LORD sent me, and have brought Agag the king of Amalek, and have utterly destroyed the Amalekites. 21. But the people took of the spoil, sheep and oxen, the chief of the things which should have been utterly destroyed, to sacrifice unto the LORD thy God in Gilgal. 22. And Samuel said, Hath the LORD as great delight in burnt-offerings and sacrifices, as in obeying the voice of the LORD? Behold, to obey is better than sacrifice, and to hearken than the fat of rams. 23. For rebellion is as the sin of witchcraft, and stubbornness is as iniquity and idolatry. Because thou hast rejected the word of the LORD, he hath also rejected thee from being king.

Saul is here called to account by Samuel, concerning the execution of his commission against the Amalekites; and remarkable instances we are here furnished with of the strictness of the justice of God, and the treachery and deceitfulness of the heart of man. We are here told,

I. What passed between God and Samuel in secret, upon this occasion, v. 10, 11. 1. God determines Saul's rejection, and acquaints Samuel with it. It repenteth me that I have set up Saul to be king. Repentance in God is not, as it is in us, a change of his mind, but a change of his method or dispensation. He does not alter his will, but wills an alteration. The change was in Saul, he is turned back from following me; this construction God put upon the partiality of his obedience, and the prevalency of his covetousness. And hereby he did himself make God his enemy. God repented that he had given Saul the kingdom, and the honour and power that belonged to it; but he never repented that he had given any man wisdom and grace, and his fear and love; those gifts and callings of God are without repentance. 2. Samuel laments and deprecates it. It grieved Samuel that Saul had forfeited God's favour, and that God had resolved to cast him off; and he cried unto the Lord all night, spent a whole night in interceding for him, that this decree might not go forth against him. When others were in their beds sleeping, he was upon his knees praying, and wrestling with God. He did not thus deprecate his own exclusion from the government; nor was he secretly pleased, as many a one would have been, that Saul, who succeeded him, was so soon laid aside, but, on the contrary, prayed earnestly for his establishment; so far was he from desiring that woeful day. The rejection of sinners is the grief of good people. God delights not in their death, nor should we.

II. What passed between Samuel and Saul in public. Samuel being sent of God to him with these heavy tidings, went, as Ezekiel, in bitterness of soul, to meet him; perhaps, according to an appointment, when Saul went forth on this expedition, for Saul was come to Gilgal, (v. 12.) the place where he was made king, (ch. 11. 15.) and where now he would have been confirmed, if he had approved himself well in this trial of his obedience. But Samuel was informed that Saul had, 1. Set him up a triumphal arch, or some monument of his victory, at Carmel, a city in the mountains of Judah, seeking his honour more than the honour of God, for he set up this place (or hand, as the word is) for himself: he had more need to have been repenting of his sin, and making his peace with God, than boasting of his victory. 2. That he had marched in great state to Gilgal, for that seems to be intimated in the manner of expression, he is gone about, and passed on, and gone down, with a great deal of pomp and parade. There Samuel gave him the meeting.

(1.) Saul makes his boast to Samuel of his obedience, because that was the thing by which he was now to signalize himself; (v. 13.) "Blessed be thou of the Lord, for thou sentest me upon a good errand, in which I have great success, and I have performed the commandment of the Lord." It is very likely, if his conscience had not flown in his face at this time, and charged him with disobedience, he would not have been so forward to proclaim his obedience; for by this he hoped to prevent Samuel's reproving him. Thus sinners think, by justifying themselves, to escape being judged of the Lord; whereas the only way to do that, is, by judging ourselves. They that boast most of their religion, may justly be suspected of partiality and hypocrisy in it.

(2.) Samuel convicts him by a plain demonstration of his disobedience. "Hast thou performed the commandment of the Lord? What means then the bleating of the sheep? v. 14." Saul would needs have it thought that God Almighty was wonderfully beholden to him for the good service he had done; but Samuel shews him, that God was so far being a debtor to him, that he had just cause of action against him, and produces for evidence the bleating of the sheep, and the lowing of the oxen, which, perhaps, Saul appointed to bring up the rear of his triumph, but Samuel appeals to them as witnesses against him; he need not go far to disprove him. The noise the cattle made, like the rust of the silver, (Jam. 5. 3.) would be a witness against him. Note, It is no new thing for the plausible professions and protestations of hypocrites to be contradicted and disproved by the most plain and undeniable evidence. Many boast of their obedience to the command of God; but what mean then their indulgence of the flesh, their love of the world, their passion and uncharitableness, and their neglect of holy duties, which witness against them?

(3.) Saul insists upon his own justification against this charge, v. 15. The fact he cannot deny, the sheep and oxen were brought from the Amalekites. But, [1.] It was not his fault, for the people spared them; as if they durst have done it without the express orders of Saul, when they knew it was against the express orders of Samuel. Note, Those that are willing to justify themselves, are commonly very forward to condemn others, and to lay the blame upon any, rather than take it to themselves. Sin is a brat that nobody cares to have laid at their doors. It is a sorry subterfuge of an impenitent heart, that will not confess its guilt, to lay the blame on those that were either tempters, or partners, or only followers, in it. [2.] It was with a good intention: "It was to sacrifice to the Lord thy God: he is thy God, and thou wilt not be against any thing that is done, as this is, for his honour." This was a false plea, for both Saul and the people designed their own profit in sparing the cattle: but, if it had been true, it had been frivolous, for God hates robbery for burnt-offering; God appointed these cattle to be sacrificed to him in the field, and therefore will give to those no thanks that bring them to be sacrificed at his altar; for he will be served in his own way, and according to the rule he himself has prescribed. Nor will a good intention justify a bad action.

(4.) Samuel over-rules, or rather over-looks, his plea, and proceeds, in God's name, to give judgment against him. He premises his authority; what he was about to say was, what the Lord had said to him; (v. 16.) otherwise he would have been far from passing so severe a censure upon him. Those who complain that their ministers are too harsh with them, should remember, that, while they keep to the word of God, they are but messengers, and must say as they are bidden; and therefore be willing, as Saul himself here was, that they should say on; he delivers his message faithfully. [1.] He reminds him of the honour God had done him in making him king; (v. 17.) when he was little in his own sight, God regarded the lowliness of his state, and rewarded the lowliness of his spirit. Note, Those that are advanced to honour and wealth, ought often to remember their mean beginnings, that they may never think highly of themselves, but always study to do great things for the God that has advancement. [2.] He lays before him the plainness of the orders he was to execute, v. 18. The Lord sent thee on a journey; so easy was the service, and so certain the success, that it was rather to be called a journey, than a war: the work was honourable, to destroy the sworn enemies of God and Israel; and had he denied himself, and set aside the consideration of his own profit, so far as to have destroyed all that belonged to Amalek, he would have been no loser by it at last, nor have gone this warfare on his own charges; God would, no doubt, have made it up to him, so that he should have no need of spoil. And therefore, [3.] He shews him how inexcusable he was, in aiming to make a handle of this expedition, and to enrich himself by it; v. 19. Wherefore then didst thou fly upon the spoil, and convert that to thine own use, which was to have been destroyed for God's honour? See what evil the love of money is the root of; but see what is the sinfulness of sin, and that in it which above any thing else makes it evil in the sight of the Lord, it is disobedience; thou didst not obey the voice of the Lord.

(5.) Saul repeats his vindication of himself, as that which, in defiance of conviction, he resolved to abide by, v. 20, 21. He denies the charge, v. 20. "Yea, I have obeyed, I have done all I should do;" for he had done all which he thought he needed to do, so much wiser was he in his own eyes than God himself; God bade him kill all, and yet he puts in among the instances of his obedience, that he had brought Agag alive, which he thought was as good as if he had killed him. Thus carnal deceitful hearts think to excuse themselves from God's commandments with their own equivalents. He insists upon it, that he has utterly destroyed the Amalekites themselves, which was the main thing intended: but as to the spoil, he owns it should have been utterly destroyed; so that he knew his Lord's-will, and was under no mistake about the command: but he thought that would be wilful waste; the cattle of the Midianites was taken for a prey in Moses's time, Numb. 31, 32, &c. and why not the cattle of the Amalekites now? Better it should be a prey to the Israelites, than to the fowls of the air, and the wild beasts; and therefore he connived at the people in carrying it away; but it was their doing, and not his; and, besides, it was for sacrifice to the Lord here at Gilgal, whither they were now bringing them. See what a hard thing it is to convince the children of disobedience of their sin, and to strip them of their fig-leaves.

(6.) Samuel gives a full answer to his apology, since he did insist upon it, v. 22, 23. He appeals to his own conscience, Has the Lord as great delight in sacrifices as in obedience? Though Saul was not a man of any great acquaintance with religion, yet he could not but know this; [1.] That nothing is so pleasing to God as obedience, no, not sacrifice and offering, and the fat of rams. See here what we should aim at and endeavour in all the exercises of religion, even acceptance with God, that he may delight in what we do. If God be well pleased with us and our services, we are happy, we have gained our point; but otherwise, to what purpose is it? Isa. 1. 11. Now, here we are plainly told, that humble, sincere, and conscientious obedience to the will of God, is more pleasing and acceptable to him than all burnt-offering and sacrifices. A careful conformity to moral precepts recommends us to God more than all ceremonial observances, Mic. 6. 6. 8. Hos. 6. 6. Obedience is enjoined by the eternal law of nature, but sacrifice only by a positive law: obedience was the law of innocency, but sacrifice supposes sin come into the world, and is but a feeble attempt to take that away which obedience would have prevented. God is more glorified, and self more denied, by obedience, than by sacrifice. It is much easier to bring a bullock or lamb to be burnt upon the altar, than to bring every high thought into obedience to God, and the will subject to his will. Obedience is the glory of angels, Ps. 103. 20. and it will be our's. [2.] That nothing is so provoking to God as disobedience, setting up our wills in competition with his. This is here called rebellion and stubbornness, and is said to be as bad as witchcraft and idolatry, v. 23. It is as bad to set up other gods, as to live in disobedience to the true God. They that are governed by their own corrupt inclinations, in opposition to the command of God, do, in effect, consult the Teraphim, (as the word here is for idolatry,) or the diviners. It was disobedience that made us all sinners, Rom. 5. 19, and this is the malignity of sin, that it is the transgression of the law, and consequently it is enmity to God, Rom. 8. 7. Saul was a king, but if he disobey the command of God, his royal dignity and power will not excuse him from the guilt of rebellion and stubbornness. It is not the rebellion of the people against their prince, but of a prince against God, that this text speaks of.

Lastly, He reads his doom, in short, "Because thou hast rejected the word of the Lord, hast despised it, so the Chaldee, hast made nothing of it, so the Seventy, hast cast off the government of it; therefore he has rejected thee, despised, and made nothing of thee, but cast thee off from being king. He that made thee king has determined to unmake thee again." Those are unfit and unworthy to rule over men, who are not willing that God should rule over them.

24. And Saul said unto Samuel, I have sinned: for I have transgressed the commandment of the LORD, and thy words: because I feared the people, and obeyed their voice. 25. Now therefore, I pray thee, pardon my sin, and turn again with me, that I may worship the LORD. 26. And Samuel said unto Saul, I will not return with thee: for thou hast rejected the word of the LORD, and the LORD hath rejected thee from being king over Israel. 27. And as Samuel turned about to go away, he laid hold upon the skirt of his mantle, and it rent. 28. And Samuel said unto him, The LORD hath rent the kingdom of Israel from thee this day, and hath given it to a neighbour of thine, that is better than thou. 29. And also the Strength of Israel will not lie nor repent; for he is not a man, that he should repent. 30. Then he said, I have sinned: yet honour me now, I pray thee, before the elders of my people, and before Israel, and turn again with me, that I may worship the LORD thy God. 31. So Samuel turned again after Saul; and Saul worshipped the LORD.

Saul is at length brought to put himself into the dress of a penitent; but it is too evident, that he only acts the part of a penitent, and is not one indeed. Observe,

I. How poorly he expressed his repentance. It was with much ado that he was made sensible of his fault, and not till he was threatened with being deposed; that touched him in a tender part, then he began to relent, and not till then; when Samuel told him, he was rejected from being king, then he said, I have sinned, v. 24. His confession was not free nor ingenuous, but extorted by the rack, and forced from him.

We observe here, several bad signs of the hypocrisy of his repentance, and that it came short even of Ahab's.

1. He made his application to Samuel only, and seemed most solicitous to stand right in his opinion, and to gain his favour. He makes a little god of him, only to preserve his reputation with the people, because they all knew Samuel to be a prophet, and the man that had been the instrument of his preferment. Thinking it would please Samuel, and be a sort of bribe to him, he puts it into his confession, I have transgressed the commandment of the Lord, and thy word; as if he had been in God's stead, v. 24. David, though convinced by the ministry of Nathan, yet, in his confession, has his eye to God alone, not to Nathan; (Ps. 51. 4.) Against thee, thee only, have I sinned: but Saul, ignorantly enough, confesses his sin as a transgression of Samuel's word; whereas his word was no other than a declaration of the commandment of the Lord. He also applies to Samuel for forgiveness, (v. 25.) I pray thee, pardon my sin; as if any could forgive sin but God only. Those wretchedly deceive themselves, who, when they are fallen into scandalous sin, think it enough to make their peace with the church and their ministers, by the shew and plausible profession of repentance, without taking care to make their peace with God by the sincerity of it. The most charitable construction we can put upon this of Saul here, is, to suppose that he looked upon Samuel as a sort of mediator between him and God, and intended an address to God in his application to him; however, it was very weak.

2. He excused his fault even in the confession of it, and that is never the fashion of a true penitent; (v. 24.) "I did it, because I feared the people, and obeyed their voice." We have reason enough to think that it was purely his own doing, and not the people's; however, if they were forward to do it, it is plain, by what we have read before, that he knew how to keep up his authority among them, and did not stand in awe of them. So that the excuse was false and frivolous; whatever he pretended, he did not really fear the people: but it is common for sinners, in excusing their faults, to plead the thoughts and workings of their own minds, because those are things which, how groundless soever, no man can disprove; but they forget that God searcheth the heart.

3. All his care was to save his credit, and preserve his interest in the people, lest they should revolt from him, or at least despise him; therefore he courts Samuel with so much earnestness (v. 25.) to turn again with him, and assist in a public thanksgiving for the victory: very importunate he was in this matter, when he laid hold on the skirt of his mantle to detain him; (v. 27.) not that he cared for Samuel, but he feared, if Samuel forsook him, the people would do so too. Many seem zealously affected to good ministers and good people, only for the sake of their own interest and reputation, while in heart they hate them. But his expression was very gross when he said, (v. 30.) I have sinned, yet honour me, I pray thee, before my people. Is this the language of a penitent? No, but the contrary; I have sinned, shame me now, for to me belongs shame, and no man can loathe me so much as I loathe myself." Yet how often do we meet with the copies of this hypocrisy of Saul! It is very common for those who are convicted of sin, to shew themselves very solicitous to be honoured before the people. Whereas he that has lost the honour of an innocent, can pretend to no other than that of a penitent, and it is the honour of a penitent to take shame to himself.

II. How little he got by these thin shews of repentance. What point did he gain by them.

1. Samuel repeated the sentence passed upon him, so far was he from giving him any hopes of the repeal of it, v. 26. the same with v. 23. He that covers his sins shall never prosper, Prov. 28. 13. Samuel refused to turn back with him, but turned about to go away, v. 27. As the thing appeared to him upon the first view, he thought it altogether unfit for him so far to countenance one whom God had rejected, as to join with him in giving thanks to God for a victory, which was made to serve rather Saul's covetousness than God's glory. Yet afterward he did turn again with him, (v. 31.) upon further thoughts, and, probably, by divine direction, either to prevent a mutiny among the people, or perhaps not to do honour to Saul, (for though Saul worshipped the Lord, (v. 31.) it is not said Samuel presided in that worship,) but to do justice on Agag, v. 32.

2. He illustrated the sentence by a sign, which Saul himself, by his rudeness, gave occasion for. When Samuel was turning from him, he tore his clothes to detain him, (v. 27.) so loath was he to part with the prophet; but Samuel put a construction upon this accident which none but a prophet could do; he made it to signify the rending of the kingdom from him; (v. 28.) and that, like this, was his own doing. "He hath rent it from thee, and given it to a neighbour better than thou," namely, to David, who afterward, upon an occasion, cut off the skirt of Saul's robe, (ch. 24. 4.) upon which Saul said, (v. 20.) I know that thou shalt surely be king: perhaps remembering this sign, the tearing of the skirt of Samuel's mantle.

3. He ratified it by a solemn declaration of its being irreversible; (v. 29.) The Strength of Israel will not lie: The Eternity, or Victory of Israel, so some read it: The holy One, so the Arabic; The most noble One, so the Syriac: the triumphant King of Israel, so Bishop Patrick: "He is determined to depose thee, and he will not change his purpose; He is not a man, that he should repent." Men are fickle and alter their minds, feeble and cannot effect their purposes; something happens which they could not foresee, by which their measures are broken; but with God it is not so. God has sometimes repented of the evil which he thought to have done, upon the sinners' repenting; but here repentance was hidden from Saul, and therefore hidden from God's eyes.

32. Then said Samuel, Bring ye hither to me Agag the king of the Amalekites. And Agag came unto him delicately. And Agag said, Surely the bitterness of death is past. 33. And Samuel said, As thy sword hath made women childless, so shall thy mother be childless among women. And Samuel hewed Agag in pieces before the LORD in Gilgal. 34. Then Samuel went to Ramah; and Saul went up to his house to Gibeah of Saul. 35. And Samuel came no more to see Saul until the day of his death: nevertheless Samuel mourned for Saul: and the LORD repented that he had made Saul king over Israel.

Samuel, as a prophet, is here set over kings, Jer. 1. 10.

I. He destroys king Agag, doubtless, by such special direction from heaven as none can now pretend to. He hewed Agag in pieces: some think he only ordered it to be done; or, perhaps he did it with his own hands, as a sacrifice to God's injured justice; (v. 33.) and sacrifices used to be cut in pieces. Now observe in this,

1. How Agag's present vain hopes were frustrated. He came delicately, in a stately manner, to shew that he was a king, and therefore to be treated with respect; or in a soft effeminate manner, as one never used to hardship, that could not set the sole of his foot to the ground for tenderness and delicacy, (Deut. 28. 56. to move compassion; and he said, "Surely, now that the heat of the battle is over, the bitterness of death is past," v. 32. Having escaped the sword of Saul, that man of war, he thought he was in no danger from Samuel, an old prophet, a man of peace. Note, (1.) There is bitterness in death, it is terrible to nature. Surely death is bitter, so divers versions read those words of Agag; as the Seventy read the former clause, He came trembling; death will dismay the stoutest heart. (2.) Many think the bitterness of death is past, when it is not so; they put that evil day far from them, which is very near. True believers may, through grace, say this, upon good grounds, though death be not past, the bitterness of it is, O death, where is thy sting?

2. How his former wicked practices were now punished. Samuel calls him to account, not only for the sins of his ancestors, but his own sins, Thy sword has made women childless, v. 33. He trod in the steps of his ancestors' cruelty, and those under him, it is likely, did the same; justly, therefore, is all the righteous blood shed by Amalek required of this generation, Matth. 23. 36. Agag, that was delicate and luxurious himself, was cruel and barbarous to others: we commonly see that those who are indulgent of their appetites are not less indulgent of their passions. But blood will be reckoned for; even kings must account to the King of kings for the guiltless blood they shed, or cause to be shed. It was that crime of king Manasseh which the Lord would not pardon, 2 Kings, 24. 4. See Rev. 13. 10.

II. He deserts king Saul; takes leave of him, (v. 34.) and never came any more to see him, (v. 35.) to advise or assist him in any of his affairs, because Saul did not desire his company, nor would he be advised by him. He looked upon him as rejected of God, and therefore he forsook him: though he might sometimes see him accidentally, as ch. 19. 24. yet he never came to see him out of kindness or respect. Yet he mourned for Saul, thinking it a very lamentable thing, that a man, who stood so fair for great things, should ruin himself so foolishly. He mourned for the bad state of the country, to which Saul was likely to have been so great a blessing, but now would prove a curse and a plague. He mourned for his everlasting state, having no hopes of bringing him to repentance: when he wept for him, it is likely he made supplication, but the Lord had repented that he had made Saul king, and resolved to undo that work of his, so that Samuel's prayers prevailed not for him. Observe, We must mourn for the rejection of sinners, 1. Though we withdraw from them, and dare not converse familiarly with them. Thus the prophet determines to leave his people and go from them, and yet to weep day and night for them, Jer. 9. 1, 2. 2. Though they do not mourn for themselves. Saul seems unconcerned at the tokens of God's displeasure which he lay under, and yet Samuel mourns day and night for him. Jerusalem was secure when Christ wept over it.

CHAP. XVI.

At this chapter begins the story of David, one that makes as great a figure in the sacred story, as almost any of the worthies of the Old Testament; one that both with his sword and with his pen served the honour of God and the interests of Israel, as much as most ever did, and was as illustrious a type of Christ. Here, I. Samuel is appointed and commissioned to anoint a king among the sons of Jesse at Beth-lehem, v. 1. 5. II. All his elder sons are passed by, and David the youngest is pitched upon and anointed, v. 6. 13. III. Saul growing melancholy, David is pitched upon to relieve him by music, v. 14. 23. Thus small are the beginnings of that great man.

1. AND the LORD said unto Samuel, How long wilt thou mourn for Saul, seeing I have rejected him from reigning over Israel? Fill thine horn with oil, and go, I will send thee to Jesse the Beth-lehemite: for I have provided me a king among his sons. 2. And Samuel said, How can I go? if Saul hear it, he will kill me. And the LORD said, Take an heifer with thee, and say, I am come to sacrifice to the LORD. 3. And call Jesse to the sacrifice, and I will shew thee what thou shalt do: and thou shalt anoint unto me him whom I name unto thee. 4. And Samuel did that which the LORD spake, and came to Beth-lehem. And the elders of the town trembled at his coming, and said, Comest thou peaceably? 5. And he said, Peaceably: I am come to sacrifice unto the LORD: sanctify yourselves, and come with me to the sacrifice. And he sanctified Jesse and his sons, and called them to the sacrifice.

Samuel was retired to his own house in Ramah, with a resolution not to appear any more in public business, but to addict himself wholly to the instructing and training up of the sons of the prophets, over whom he presided, as we find, ch. 19. 20. He promised himself more satisfaction in young prophets than in young princes; and we do not find that, to his dying day, God called him out to any public action relating to the state, but only here to anoint David.

1. God reproves him for continuing so long to mourn for the rejection of Saul. He does not blame him for mourning on that occasion, but for exceeding in his sorrow, How long wilt thou mourn for Saul? v. 1. We do not find that he mourned at all for the setting aside of his own family, and the deposing of his own sons; but for the rejecting of Saul and his seed he mourns without measure, for the former was done by the people's foolish discontent, this by the righteous wrath of God. Yet he must find time to recover himself, and not go mourning to his grave.

1. Because God has rejected him, and he ought to acquiesce in the divine justice, and forget his affection to Saul; if God will be glorified in his ruin, Samuel ought to be satisfied. Besides, to what purpose should he weep? The decree is gone forth, and all his prayers and tears cannot prevail for the reversing of it, 2 Sam. 12. 22, 23. 2. Because Israel shall be no loser by it, and Samuel must prefer the public welfare before his own private affection to his friend. "Mourn not for Saul, for I have provided me a king. The people provided them a king, and he proved bad, now I will provide me one, a man after my own heart." See Ps. 89. 20. Acts, 13. 22. "If Saul be rejected, yet Israel shall not be as sheep having no shepherd; I have another in store for them, let thy joy of him swallow up thy grief for the rejected prince."

II. He sends him to Beth-lehem, to anoint one of the sons of Jesse, a person, probably, not unknown to Samuel. Fill thine horn with oil. Saul was anointed with a glass-vial of oil, scanty and brittle, David with a horn of oil, which was more plentiful and durable; hence we read of a horn of salvation in the house of his servant David, Luke, 1. 69.

III. Samuel objects the peril of going on this errand; (v. 2.) If Saul hear it, he will kill me. By this it appears, 1. That Saul was grown very wicked and outrageous since his rejection, else Samuel would not have mentioned this. What impiety would he not be guilty of, who durst kill Samuel? 2. That Samuel's faith was not so strong as one would have expected, else he had not thus feared the rage of Saul. Would not he that sent him, protect him and bear him out? But the best men are not perfect in their faith, nor will fear be wholly cast out any where on this side heaven. But this may be understood as Samuel's desire of direction from heaven how to manage this matter prudently, so as not to expose himself, or any other, more than needed.

IV. God orders him to cover his design with a sacrifice. Say, I am come to sacrifice; and it was true he did, and it was proper that he should, when he came to anoint a king, ch. 11. 15. As a prophet, he might sacrifice when and where God appointed him; and it was not at all inconsistent with the laws of truth, to say, he came to sacrifice, when really he did so, though he had also a further end, which he thought fit to conceal. Let him give notice of a sacrifice, and invite Jesse (who, it is probable, was the principal man of the city) and his family to come to the feast upon the sacrifice; and, says God, I will shew thee what thou shalt do. Those that go about God's work in God's way, shall be directed step by step, wherever they are at a loss, to do it in the best manner.

V. Samuel went accordingly to Beth-lehem, not in pomp, or with any retinue, only a servant to lead the heifer which he was to sacrifice; yet the elders of Beth-lehem trembled at his coming, fearing it was an indication of God's displeasure against them, and that he came to denounce some judgment for the iniquities of the place; guilt causes fear. Yet indeed it becomes us to stand in awe of God's messengers, and to tremble at his word: or, they feared it might be an occasion of Saul's displeasure against them, for, probably, they knew how much he was exasperated at Samuel, and feared he would pick a quarrel with them for entertaining him. They asked him, "Comest thou peaceably? Art thou in peace thyself, and not flying from Saul? Art thou at peace with us, and not come with any message of wrath?" We should all covet earnestly to stand upon good terms with God's prophets, and dread having the word of God, or their prayers, against us. When the Son of David was born King of the Jews, all Jerusalem was troubled, Matth. 2. 3. Samuel kept at home, and it was a strange thing to see him so far from his own house; they therefore concluded it must needs be some extraordinary occasion that brought him, and feared the worst till he satisfied them; (v. 5.) "I come peaceably, for I come to sacrifice, not with a message of wrath against you, but with the methods of peace and reconciliation; and therefore you may bid me welcome, and need not fear my coming; therefore sanctify yourselves, and prepare to join with me in the sacrifice, that you may have the benefit of it." Note, Before solemn ordinances there must be a solemn preparation

When we are to offer spiritual sacrifices, it concerns us, by separating ourselves from the world, and renewing the dedication of ourselves to God, to sanctify ourselves. When our Lord Jesus came into the world, though men had reason enough to tremble, fearing that his errand was to condemn the world, yet he gave full assurance that he came peaceably, for he came to sacrifice, and he brought his offering along with him; a body hast thou prepared me; let us sanctify ourselves, that we may have an interest in his sacrifice. Samuel said, "I come peaceably, for I come to sacrifice." Note, Those that come to sacrifice, should come peaceably; religious exercises must not be performed tumultuously.

VI. He had a particular regard to Jesse and his sons, for with them his private business lay, with which, it is likely, he acquainted Jesse at his first coming, and took up his lodging at his house. He spoke to all the elders to sanctify themselves, but he sanctified Jesse and his sons, by praying with them and instructing them. Perhaps he had acquaintance with them before; and it appears, ch. 20. 29. (where we read of the sacrifices that family had,) that it was a devout religious family. Samuel assisted them in their family preparations for the public sacrifice, and, it is probable, chose out David, and anointed him, at the family solemnities, before the sacrifice was offered, or the holy feast solemnized. Perhaps he offered private sacrifices, like Job, according to the number of them all, (Job, 1. 5.) and, under colour of that, called for them all to appear before him. When signal blessings are coming into a family, they ought to sanctify themselves.

6. And it came to pass, when they were come, that he looked on Eliab, and said, Surely the LORD's anointed is before him. 7. But the LORD said unto Samuel, Look not on his countenance, or on the height of his stature; because I have refused him: for the LORD seeth not as man seeth; for man looketh on the outward appearance, but the LORD looketh on the heart. 8. Then Jesse called Abinadab, and made him pass before Samuel. And he said, Neither hath the LORD chosen this. 9. Then Jesse made Shammah to pass by. And he said, Neither hath the LORD chosen this. 10. Again, Jesse made seven of his sons to pass before Samuel. And Samuel said unto Jesse, The LORD hath not chosen these. 11. And Samuel said unto Jesse, Are here all thy children? And he said, There remaineth yet the youngest, and, behold, he keepeth the sheep. And Samuel said unto Jesse, Send and fetch him: for we will not sit down till he come hither. 12. And he sent, and brought him in. Now he was ruddy, and withal of a beautiful countenance, and goodly to look to. And the LORD said, Arise, anoint him: for this is he. 13. Then Samuel took the horn of oil, and anointed him in the midst of his brethren. and the Spirit of the LORD came upon David from that day forward. So Samuel rose up, and went to Ramah.

If the sons of Jesse were told that God would provide himself a king among them, as he had said, (v. 1.) we may well suppose they all made the best appearance they could, and each hoped he should be the man; but here we are told,

I. How all the elder sons were passed by, who stood fairest for the preferment. Eliab, the eldest, was privately presented first to Samuel, probably, none being present but Jesse only, and Samuel thought he must needs be the man; (v. 6.) Surely this is the Lord's anointed. The prophets themselves, when they spake from under the divine direction, were as liable to mistake as other men; as Nathan, 2 Sam. 7. 3. But God rectified the prophet's mistake, by a secret whisper to his mind, v. 7. Look not on his countenance. It was strange that Samuel, who had been so wretchedly disappointed in Saul, whose countenance and stature recommended him as much as any man's could, should be so forward to judge of a man by that rule. When God would please the people with a king, he chose a proper man, but when he would have one after his own heart, he should not be chosen by the outside; men judge by the sight of the eyes, but God does not; (Isa. 11. 3.) The Lord looks on the heart; that is, 1. He knows it. We can tell how men look, but he can tell what they are. Man looks on the eyes, so the original word is, and is pleased with the liveliness and sprightliness that appear in them; but God looks on the heart, and sees the thoughts and intents of that. 2. He judges of men by it. The good disposition of the heart, the holiness and goodness of that, recommend us to God, and are in his sight of great price, (1 Pet. 3, 4.) not the majesty of the look, or the strength and stature of the body; let us reckon that to be true beauty which is within, and judge of men, as far as we are capable, by their minds, not their mien.

When Eliab was set aside, Abinadab and Shammah, and, after them, four more of the sons of Jesse, seven in all, were presented to Samuel, as likely for his purpose, but Samuel, who now attended more carefully than he did at first to the divine direction, laid them all by, The Lord has not chosen these, v. 8. 10. Men dispose of their honours and estates to their sons, according to their seniority of age, and priority of birth, but God does not. The elder shall serve the younger. Had it been left to Samuel, or Jesse, to make the choice, one of these had certainly been chosen; but God will magnify his sovereignty, in passing by some that were most promising, as well as in fastening on others that were less so.

II. How David at length was pitched upon. He was the youngest of all the sons of Jesse; his name signifies beloved, for he was a type of the beloved Son. Observe,

1. How he was now employed. He was in the fields, keeping the sheep, (v. 11.) and was left there, though there was a sacrifice and a feast at his father's house. The youngest are commonly the fondlings of the family, but, it should seem, David was least set by of all the sons of Jesse; either they did not discern, or did not duly value, the excellent spirit he was of. Many a great genius lies buried in obscurity and contempt; and God often exalts those whom men despise, and gives abundant honour to that part which lacked. The Son of David was he whom men despised, the Stone which the builders refused, and yet has a name above every name. David was taken from following the ewes, to feed Jacob, (Ps. 78. 71.) as Moses from keeping the flock of Jethro: an instance of his humility and industry, both which God delights to put honour upon. We should think a military life, but God saw a pastoral life, (which gives advantage for contemplation and communion with heaven,) the best preparative for kingly power, at least, for those graces of the Spirit which are necessary to the due discharge of that trust which attends it. David was keeping sheep, though it was a time of sacrifice; for there is mercy that takes place of sacrifice.

2. How earnest Samuel was to have him sent for. "We will not sit down to meat," (perhaps it was not the feast upon the sacrifice, but a common meal,) "till he come hither; for, if all the rest be rejected, this must be he." He that was designed not to sit at table at all, is now stayed for as the principle guest. If God will exalt them of low degree, who can hinder?

3. What appearance he made, when he did come. No notice is taken of his clothing; no doubt, that was according to his employment, mean and coarse, as shepherds' coats commonly are, and he did not change his clothes, as Joseph did; (Gen. 41. 14.) but he had a very honest look, not stately, as Saul's, but sweet and lovely, he was ruddy, of a beautiful countenance, and goodly to look to, (v. 12.) that is, he had a clear complexion, a good eye, and a lovely face; the features extraordinary, and something is

His looks that was very charming. Though he was so far from using any art to help his beauty, that his employment exposed it to the sun and wind, yet nature kept its own, and, by the sweetness of his aspect, gave manifest indications of an amiable temper and disposition of mind. Perhaps his modest blush, when he was brought before Samuel, and received by him with surprising respect, made him look much the handsomer.

4. The anointing of him. The Lord told Samuel, in his ear, (as he had done, ch. 9. 15.) that this was he whom he must anoint, v. 12. Samuel objects not to the meanness of his education, his youth, or the little respect he had in his own family, but, in obedience to the divine command, took his horn of oil, and anointed him, (v. 13.) signifying thereby, (1.) A divine designation to the government, after the death of Saul, of which hereby he gave him a full assurance. Not that he was at present invested with the royal power, but it was entailed upon him, to come to him in due time. (2.) A divine communication of gifts and graces, to fit him for the government, and make him a type of him who was to be the Messiah, the anointed One, who received the Spirit, not by measure, but without measure. He is said to be anointed in the midst of his brethren, who yet, possibly, did not understand it as a designation to the government, and therefore did not envy David, as Joseph's brethren did him; because they saw no further marks of dignity put upon him, no, not so much as a coat of divers colours. But Bishop Patrick reads it, He anointed him from the midst of his brethren, that is, he singled him out from the rest, and privately anointed him, but with a charge to keep his own counsel, and not to let his own brethren know it, as, by what we find, (ch. 17. 28.) it should seem Eliab did not. It is computed that David was now about twenty years old; if so, his troubles by Saul lasted ten years, for he was thirty years old when Saul died. Dr. Lightfoot reckons him to be about twenty-five, and that his troubles lasted but five years.

5. The happy effects of this anointing. The Spirit of the Lord came upon David from that day forward, v. 13. The anointing him was not an empty ceremony, but a divine power went along with that instituted sign, and he found himself inwardly advanced in wisdom and courage, and concern for the public, with all the qualifications of a prince, though not at all advanced in his outward circumstances. This would abundantly satisfy him that his election was of God. The best evidence of our being predestinated to the kingdom of glory, is, our being sealed with the Spirit of promise, and our experience of a work of grace in our hearts. Some think that his courage, by which he slew the lion and the bear, and his extraordinary skill in music, were the effects and evidences of the Spirit's coming upon him. However, this made him the sweet psalmist of Israel, 2 Sam. 23. 1. Samuel, having done this, went to Ramah in safety, and we never read of him again but once, (ch. 19. 18.) till we read of his death; now he retired to die in peace, since his eyes had seen the salvation, even the sceptre brought into the tribe of Judah.

14. But the Spirit of the Lord departed from Saul, and an evil spirit from the Lord troubled him. 15. And Saul's servants said unto him, Behold now, an evil spirit from God troubleth thee. 16. Let our lord now command thy servants, which are before thee, to seek out a man who is a cunning player on an harp: and it shall come to pass, when the evil spirit from God is upon thee, that he shall play with his hand, and thou shalt be well. 17. And Saul said unto his servants, Provide me now a man that can play well, and bring him to me. 11. Then answered one of the servants, and said, Behold, I have seen a son of Jesse, the Beth-lehemite, that is cunning in playing, and a mighty valiant man, and a man of war, and prudent in matters, and a comely person, and the Lord is with him. 19. Wherefore Saul sent messengers unto Jesse, and said, Send me David thy son which is with the sheep. 20. And Jesse took an ass laden with bread, and a bottle of wine, and a kid, and sent them by David his son unto Saul. 21. And David came to Saul, and stood before him: and he loved him greatly; and he became his armour-bearer. 22. And Saul sent to Jesse, saying, Let David, I pray thee, stand before me; for he hath found favour in my sight. 23. And it came to pass, when the evil spirit from God was upon Saul, that David took an harp, and played with his hand: so Saul was refreshed, and was well, and the evil spirit departed from him.

We have here Saul falling, and David rising.

1. Here is Saul made a terror to himself; (v. 14.) The Spirit of the Lord departed from him. He having forsaken God and his duty, God, in a way of righteous judgment, withdrew from him those assistances of the good Spirit with which he was directed, animated, and encouraged, in his government and wars. He lost all his good qualities. This was the effect of his rejecting God, and an evidence of his being rejected by him. Now God took his mercy from Saul, (as it is expressed, 2 Sam. 7. 15.) for when the Spirit of the Lord departs from us, all good goes. When men grieve and quench the Spirit, by wilful sin, he departs, and will not always strive. The consequence of this was, that an evil spirit from God troubled him. They that drive the good Spirit away from them, do of course become a prey to the evil spirit. If God and his grace do not rule us, sin and Satan will have possession of us. The devil, by the divine permission, troubled and terrified Saul, by means of the corrupt humours of his body, and passions of his mind. He grew fretful, and peevish, and discontented; timorous and suspicious, ever and anon starting and trembling; he was sometimes, says Josephus, as if he had been choaked or strangled, and a perfect demoniac by fits. This made him unfit for business, precipitate in his counsels, the contempt of his enemies, and a burthen to all about him.

II. Here is David made a physician to Saul, and by that means brought to court; a physician that helped him against the worst of diseases, when none else could. David was newly anointed privately to the kingdom; it would be of use to him to go to court, and see the world: it is here brought about for him, without any contrivance of his own or his friends. Note, Those whom God designs for any service, his providence shall concur with his grace to prepare and qualify for it.

Saul is distempered; his servants have the honesty and courage to tell him what his distemper was; (v. 15.) An evil spirit, not by chance, but from God, and his providence, troubleth thee. Now,

1. The means they all advise him to for his relief, was, music; (v. 16.) "Let us have a cunning player on the harp to attend thee." How much better friends had they been to him, if they had advised him, since the evil spirit was from the Lord, to give all diligence to make his peace with God by true repentance, to send for Samuel to pray with him, and to intercede with God for him; then might he not only have had some present relief, but the good Spirit would have returned to him. But their project is to make him merry, and so cure him. Many, whose consciences are convinced and startled, are for ever ruined by such methods as these, which drown all care of the soul in the delights of sense. Yet Saul's servants did not amiss to send for music, as a help to cheer up the spirits, if they had but withal sent for a prophet to give him good counsel. And (as Bishop Hall observes) it was well they did not send for a witch or diviner, by his enchantments to cast out the evil spirit, which has been the abominable wicked practice of some that have worn the Christian name, who consult the devil to their distresses, and make hell their refuge. It will be no less than a miracle of divine grace, if those who thus agree with Satan ever break off from him again.

2. One of his servants recommended David to him, as a fit person to be employed in the use of these means, little imagining that he was the man whom Samuel meant, when he told Saul, a neighbour of his, better than he, should have the kingdom, ch. 15. 28. it is a very high character which this servant of Saul here gives of David, (v. 18.) that he was not only fit for his purpose, as a comely person, and comely in playing, but a man of courage and conduct, a mighty valiant man, and prudent in matters, fit to be further preferred, and (which crowned his character) the Lord is with him. By this it appears, that though David, after he was anointed, returned to his country business, and there remained on his head no marks of the oil, so careful was he to keep that secret, yet the workings of the Spirit, signified by the oil, could not be hid, but made him shine in obscurity, so that all his neighbours observed with wonder the great improvements of his mind on a sudden. David, even in his shepherd's garb, is become an oracle, a champion, and every thing that is great. His fame reached the court soon, for Saul was inquisitive after such young men, ch. 14. 52. When the Spirit of God comes upon a man, he will make his face to shine.

3. David is hereupon sent for to court. And, it seems,

(1.) His father was very willing to part with him, sent him very readily, and a present with him to Saul; (v. 20.) the present was, according to the usage of those times, bread and wine, (compare ch. 10. 3, 4.) therefore acceptable, because expressive of the homage and allegiance of him that sent it. Probably, Jesse, who knew what his son David was designed for, was aware that Providence was herein fitting him for it, and therefore he would not force Providence, by sending him to court uncalled; yet he followed Providence very cheerfully, when he saw it plainly putting him into the way of preferment. Some suggest, that, when Jesse received that message, Send me David thy son, he began to be afraid that Saul had got some intimation of his being anointed, and sent for him to do him a mischief, and therefore Jesse sent a present to pacify him; but it is probable that the person, whoever he was, that brought the message, gave him an account on what design he was sent for.

(2.) Saul became very kind to him, (v. 21.) loved him greatly, and designed to make him his armour-bearer, and (contrary to the manner of the king, ch. 8. 11.) asked his father's leave to keep him in his service, (v. 22.) Let David, I pray thee, stand before me. And good reason he had to respect him, for he did him a great deal of service with his music, v. 23. His instrumental music with his harp is the only kind mentioned, but, it should seem, by the account Josephus gives of it, that he added vocal music to it, and sung hymns, probably divine hymns, songs of praise, to his harp. David's music was Saul's physic. [1.] Music has a natural tendency to compose and exhilarate the mind, when it is disturbed and saddened. Elisha used it for the calming of his spirits, 2 Kings, 3. 15. On some it has a greater influence and effect than on others, and probably Saul was one of those; not that it charmed the evil spirit, but it made his spirit sedate, and allayed those tumults of the animal spirits, by which the Devil had advantage against him. The beams of the sun (it is the learned Bochart's comparison) cannot be cut with a sword, quenched with water, or blown out with wind, but, by closing the window-shutters, they may be kept out of the chamber. Music cannot work upon the Devil, but it may shut up the passages by which he had access to the mind. [2.] David's music was extraordinary, and in mercy to him, that he might gain a reputation at court, as one that had the Lord with him. God made his performance in music more successful in this case than that of others would have been. Saul found, even after he had conceived an enmity to David, that no one else could do him the same service, (ch. 19. 9, 10.) which was a great aggravation of his outrage against him. It is pity that music, which may be so serviceable to the good temper of the mind, should ever be abused by any, to the support of vanity and luxury, and made an occasion of drawing the heart away from God and serious things; if that be to any the effect of it, it drives away the good Spirit, not the evil spirit.

CHAP. XVII.

David is the man whom God now delights to honour, for he is a man after his own heart. We read, in the foregoing chapter, how, after he was anointed, Providence made him famous in the court; we read, in this chapter, how Providence made him much more famous in the camp, and, by both, not only marked him for a great man, but fitted him for the throne, to which he was designated. In the court, he was only Saul's physician, but, in the camp, Israel's champion; there he fairly fought, and beat, Goliath of Gath. In the story, observe, I. What a figure Goliath made, and how daringly he challenged the armies of Israel, v. 1. .11. II. What a mean figure David made, when Providence brought him to the army, v. 12. .30. III. The unparalleled bravery wherewith David undertook to encounter this Philistine, v. 31. .39. IV. The pious resolution with which he attacked him, v. 40. .47. V. The glorious victory he obtained over him with a sling and a stone, and the advantage which the Israelites thereby gained against the Philistines, v. 48. .54. VI. The great notice which was hereupon taken of David at court, v. 55. .58.

1. NOW the Philistines gathered together their armies to battle, and were gathered together at Shochoh, which belongeth to Judah, and pitched between Shochoh and Azekah, in Ephes-dammim. 2. And Saul and the men of Israel were gathered together, and pitched by the valley of Elah, and set the battle in array against the Philistines. 3. And the Philistines stood on a mountain on the one side, and Israel stood on a mountain on the other side: and there was a valley between them. 4. And there went out a champion out of the camp of the Philistines, named Goliath, of Gath, whose height was six cubits and a span. 5. And he had a helmet of brass upon his head, and he was armed with a coat of mail; and the weight of the coat was five thousand shekels of brass. 6. And he had greaves of brass upon his legs, and a target of brass between his shoulders. 7. And the staff of his spear was like a weaver's beam; and his spear's head weighed six hundred shekels of iron: and one bearing a shield went before him. 8. And he stood and cried unto the armies of Israel, and said unto them, Why are ye come out to set your battle in array? am not I a Philistine, and ye servants to Saul? Choose you a man for you, and let him come down to me. 9. If he be able to fight with me, and to kill me, then will we be your servants: but if I prevail against him, and kill him, then shall ye be our servants, and serve us. 10. And the Philistine said, I defy the armies of Israel this day; give me a man, that we may fight together. 11. When Saul and all Israel heard those words of the Philistine, they were dismayed, and greatly afraid.

It was not long ago that the Philistines were soundly beaten, and put to the worse, before Israel, and would have been totally routed, if Saul's rashness had not prevented; but here we have them making head again. Observe,

I. How they defied Israel with their armies, v. 1. They made a descent upon the Israelites' country, and possessed themselves, as it should seem, of some part of it, for they encamped in a place which belongeth to Judah. Israel's ground had never been footing for Philistine armies, if Israel had been faithful to their God. The Philistines (it is probable) had heard that Samuel had fallen out with Saul, and forsaken him, and no longer assisted and advised him, and that Saul was grown melancholy, and unfit for business, and this encouraged them to make this attempt for the retrieving of the credit they had lately lost. The enemies of the church are watchful to take all advantages, and they never have greater advantages than when her protectors have provoked God's Spirit and prophets to leave them. Saul mustered his forces, and faced them, v. 2, 3. And here we must take notice, 1. That the evil spirit, for the present, had left Saul, ch. 16. 23. David's harp having given him some relief, perhaps the alarms and affairs of the war prevented the return of the distemper. Business is a good antidote against melancholy. Let the mind have something without to fasten on, and employ itself about, and it will be less in danger of preying upon itself. God, in mercy to Israel, suspended the judgment for a while; for how distracted must the affairs of the public have been, if, at this juncture, the prince had been distracted! 2. That David, for the present, was returned to Beth-lehem, and had left the court, v. 15. When Saul had no further occasion to use him for the relief of his distemper, though, being anointed, he had a very good private reason, and, having a grant of the place of Saul's armour-bearer, he had a very plausible pretence to have continued his attendance, as a retainer to the court, yet he went home to Beth-lehem, and returned to keep his father's sheep; this was a rare instance, in a young man that stood so fair for preferment, of humility, and affection to his parents. He knew better than most do, how to come down again after he had begun to rise, and strangely preferred the retirements of a pastoral life before all the pleasures and gaieties of the court. None more fit for honour than he, nor that deserved it better, and yet none more dead to it.

II. How they defied Israel with their champion Goliath, whom they were almost as proud of as he was of himself, hoping by him to recover their reputation and dominion. Perhaps the army of the Israelites was superior in number and strength to that of the Philistines, which made the Philistines decline a battle, and stand at bay with them, desiring rather to put the issue upon a single combat, in which, having such a champion, they hoped to gain the victory. Now, concerning this champion, observe,

1. His prodigious size. He was of the sons of Anak, who at Gath kept their ground in Joshua's time, (Josh. 11. 22.) and kept a race of giants there, of which Goliath was one, and, it is probable, one of the largest. He was in height six cubits and a span, v. 4. The learned Bishop Cumberland has made it out that the scripture cubit was above twenty-one inches, (above three inches more than our half yard,) and a span was half a cubit; by which computation, Goliath wanted but eight inches of four yards in height, eleven foot and four inches—a monstrous stature, and which made him very formidable, especially if he had strength and spirit proportionable.

2. His armour. Art, as well as nature, made him terrible. He was well furnished with defensive armour, (v. 5, 6.) A helmet of brass on his head, a coat of mail, made of brass plates, laid over one another, like the scales of a fish; and, because his legs would lie most within the reach of an ordinary man, he wore brass boots, and a large corslet of brass about his neck. The coat is said to weigh five thousand shekels, and a shekel was half an ounce avoirdupois—a vast weight for a man to carry, all the other parts of his armour being proportionable. But some think it should be translated, not the weight of the coat, but the value of it, was five thousand shekels; so much it cost. His offensive weapons were extraordinary, of which his spear only is here described, v. 7. It was like a weaver's beam; his arm could manage that, which an ordinary man could scarcely heave. His shield only, which was the lightest of all his accoutrements, was carried before him by his esquire, probably for state; for he that was clad in brass little needed a shield.

3. His challenge. The Philistines having chosen him for their champion, to save themselves from the hazard of a battle, he here throws down the gauntlet, and bids defiance to the armies of Israel, v. 8, 10. He came into the valley that lay between the camps, and (his voice probably being as much stronger than other people's, as his arm was) he cried, so as to make them all hear him, Give me a man, that we may fight together. He looks upon himself with admiration, because he was so much taller and stronger than all about him; his heart (says Bishop Hall) nothing but a lump of proud flesh. He looks upon Israel with disdain, because they had none among them of such a monstrous bulk, and defies them to find a man among them bold enough to enter the lists with him. (1.) He upbraids them with their folly, in drawing an army together; "Why are ye come to set the battle in array?" How dare you oppose the mighty Philistines?" Or, "Why should the two armies engage, when the controversy may be sooner decided, with only the expence of one life, and the hazard of another?" (2.) He offers to put the war entirely upon the issue of the duel he proposes; "If your champion kill me, we will be your servants; if I kill him, you shall be our's." This (says Bishop Patrick) was only a bravado, for no nation would be willing thus to venture its all upon the success of one man, nor is it justifiable; notwithstanding Goliath's stipulation here, when he was killed, the Philistines did not stand to his word, nor submit themselves servants to Israel. When he boasts, I am a Philistine, and you servants to Saul, he would have it thought a great piece of condescension in him, who was a chief ruler, to enter the lists with an Israelite; for he looked on them as no better than slaves. The Chaldee paraphrase brings him in, boasting that he was the man that had killed Hophni and Phinehas, and taken the ark prisoner, but that the Philistines had never given him so much as the command of a regiment, in recompence of his services, whereas Saul had been made king for his services: "Let him, therefore, take up the challenge."

4. The terror thus struck upon Israel; (v. 11.) Saul and all his army were greatly afraid. The people would not have been dismayed, but that they observed Saul's courage failed him; and it is not to be expected, that, if the leader be a coward, the followers should be bold. We found before, when the Spirit of the Lord came upon Saul, (ch. 11. 6.) none could be more daring, more forward, to answer the challenge of Nahash the Ammonite; but now, that the Spirit of the Lord was departed from him, even the big looks and big words of a single Philistine made him change colour. But where was Jonathan all this while? Why did not he accept the challenge, who, in the last war, had so bravely engaged a whole army of Philistines? Doubtless he felt not himself stirred up of God to do it, as he did then. As the best, so the bravest, men, are no more than what God makes them. Jonathan must now sit still, because the honour of engaging Goliath is reserved for David. In great and good actions, the wind of the Spirit blows when and where he listeth. Now the pious Israelites lament their king's breach with Samuel.

12. Now David was the son of that Ephrathite of Beth-lehem-judah, whose name was Jesse, and he had eight sons: and the man went among men for an old man in the days of Saul. 13. And the three eldest sons of Jesse went and followed Saul to the battle: and the names of his three sons that went to the battle were Eliab the first-born, and next unto him Abinadab, and the third Shammah. 14. And David was the youngest: and the three eldest followed Saul. 15. But David went and returned from Saul to feed his father's sheep at Beth-lehem. 16. And the Philistine drew near morning and evening, and presented himself forty days. 17. And Jesse said unto David his son, Take now for thy brethren an ephah of this parched corn, and these ten loaves, and run to the camp to thy brethren; 18. And carry these ten cheeses unto the captain of their thousand, and look how thy brethren fare, and take their pledge. 19. Now Saul, and they, and all the men of Israel, were in the valley of Elah, fighting with the Philistines. 20. And David rose up early in the morning, and left the sheep with a keeper, and took, and went, as Jesse had commanded him; and he came to the trench, as the host was going forth to the fight, and shouted for the battle. 21. For Israel and the Philistines had put the battle in array, army against army. 22. And David left his carriage in the hand of the keeper of the carriage, and ran into the army, and came and saluted his brethren. 23. And as he talked with them, behold, there came up the champion, the Philistine of Gath, Goliath by name, out of the armies of the Philistines, and spake according to the same words: and David heard them. 24. And all the men of Israel, when they saw the man, fled from him, and were sore afraid. 25. And the men of Israel said, Have ye seen this man that is come up? surely to defy Israel is he come up: and it shall be, that the man who killeth him, the king will enrich him with great riches, and will give him his daughter, and make his father's house free in Israel. 26. And David spake to the men that stood by him, saying, What shall be done to the man that killeth this Philistine, and taketh away the reproach from Israel? for who is this uncircumcised Philistine, that he should defy the armies of the living God? 27. And the people answered him after this manner, saying, So shall it be done to the man that killeth him. 28. And Eliab his eldest brother heard when he spake unto the men; and Eliab's anger was kindled against David, and he said, Why camest thou down hither? and with whom hast thou left those few sheep in the wilderness? I know thy pride, and the naughtiness of thine heart; for thou art come down that thou mightest see the battle. 29. And David said, What have I now done? Is there not a cause? 30. And he turned from him toward another, and spake after the same manner: and the people answered him again after the former manner.

Forty days the two armies lay encamped, facing one another, each advantageously posted, but neither forward to engage. Either they were parleying, and treating of an accommodation, or waiting for recruits; and perhaps there were frequent skirmishes between small detached parties. All this while, twice a-day, morning and evening, did the insulting champion appear in the field and repeat his challenge, his own heart growing more and more proud for his not being answered, and the people of Israel more and more timorous, while God designed hereby to ripen him for destruction, and to make Israel's deliverance the more illustrious. All this while, David is keeping his father's sheep; but, at the end of forty days, Providence brings him to the field, to win and wear the laurel, which no other Israelite dares venture for.

We have, in these verses,

I. The present state of his family. His father was old, (v. 12.) he went among men for an old man, was taken notice of for his great age, above what was usual at that time, and therefore was excused from public services, and went not in person to the wars, but sent his sons; he had the honours paid him that were due to his age: his hoary head was a crown of glory to him. David's three elder brethren, who perhaps envied his place at the court, got their father to send for him home, and let them go to the camp, where they hoped to signalize themselves, and eclipse him, (v. 13, 14.) while David himself was so far from being proud of the services he had done his prince, or ambitious of further preferment, that he not only returned from court to the obscurity of his father's house, but to the care, and toil, and (as it proved, v. 34.) the peril, of keeping his father's sheep. It was the praise of this humility, that it came after he had the honour of a courtier; and the reward of it, that it came before the honour of a conqueror; before honour is humility. Now he had that opportunity of meditation and prayer, and other acts of devotion, which fitted him for what he was destined to, more than all the military exercises of that inglorious camp could do.

II. The orders his father gave him to go visit his brethren in the camp. He did not himself ask leave to go, to satisfy his curiosity, or to gain experience, and make observations; but his father sent him on a mean and homely errand, which any of his servants might have done. He must carry some bread and cheese to his brethren, ten loaves with some parched corn for themselves, (v. 17.) and ten cheeses, which, it seems, he thought too good for them, but might be acceptable as a present to their colonel, v. 18. David must still be the drudge of the family, though he was to be the greatest ornament of it. He had not so much as an ass at command to carry his load, but must take it on his back, and yet run to the camp. Jesse, we thought, was privy to his being anointed, and yet industriously kept him thus mean and obscure, probably to hide him from the eye of suspicion and envy, knowing that he was anointed to a crown in reversion. He must observe how his brethren fared, whether they were not reduced to short allowance, now that the encampment continued so long, that, if need were, he might send them more provisions. And he must take their pledge, that is, if they had pawned any thing, he must redeem it; take notice of their company, so some observe, whom they associate with, and what sort of life they lead; perhaps David, like Joseph, had formerly brought to his father their evil report, and now he sends him to inquire concerning their manners. See the care of pious persons about their children, when they are abroad from them, especially in places of temptation; they are solicitous how they conduct themselves, and particularly what company they keep. Let children think of this, and conduct themselves accordingly, remembering, that, when they are from under their parents' eye, they are still under God's eye.

III. David's dutiful obedience to his father's command. His prudence and care made him be up early, (v. 20.) and yet not to leave his sheep without a keeper; so faithful was he in a few things, and therefore the fitter to be made ruler over many things; and so well had he learnt to obey before he pretended to command. God's providence brought him to the camp very seasonably, when both sides had set the battle in array, and, as it should seem, were more likely to come to an engagement than they had yet been all the forty days, v. 21. Both sides were now preparing to fight. Jesse little thought of sending his son to the army, just at that critical juncture; but the wise God orders the time and all the circumstances of actions and affairs, so as to serve his designs of securing the interests of Israel, and advancing the man after his own heart. Now observe here,

1. How brisk and lively David was, v. 22. What articles he brought he honestly took care of, and left them with those that had the charge of the bag and baggage; but, though he had come a long journey, with a great load, he ran into the army, to see what was doing there, and to pay his respects to his brethren. Seest thou a man thus diligent in his business? he is in the way of preferment, he shall stand before kings.

2. How bold and daring the Philistine was, v. 23. Now that the armies were drawn out into a line of battle, he appeared first to renew his challenge, vainly imagining that he was in the eager chase of his own glory and triumph, whereas really he was but courting his own destruction.

3. How timorous and faint-hearted the men of Israel were. Though they had, for forty days together, been used to his haughty looks and threatening language, and, having seen no execution done by either, might have learned to despise both, yet, upon his approach, they fled from him, and were sore afraid, v. 24. One Philistine could never thus have chased a thousand Israelites, and put ten thousand to flight, unless their Rock, being treacherously forsaken by them, had justly sold them, and shut them up, Deut. 32. 30.

4. How high Saul bid for a champion. Though he was the tallest of all the men of Israel, and, if he had not been so, while he kept close to God, might himself have safely taken up the gauntlet which this insolent Philistine threw down, yet, the Spirit of the Lord being departed from him, he durst not do it, nor press Jonathan to do it; but whoever will do it shall have as good preferment as he can give him, v. 25. If the hope of wealth and honour will prevail with any man to expose himself so far, it is proclaimed, that the bold adventurer, if he come off, shall marry the king's daughter, and have a good portion with her; but, as it should seem, whether he come off or no, his father's house shall be free in Israel from all toll, tribute, custom, and services to the crown, or shall be ennobled, and advanced to the peerage.

5. How much concerned David was to assert the honour of God and Israel against the impudent challenges of this champion. He asked what reward was promised to him that should slay this Philistine, (v. 26.) though he knew already; not because he was ambitious of the honours, but because he would have it taken notice of, and reported to Saul, how much he resented the indignity hereby done to Israel and Israel's God. He might have presumed so far upon his acquaintance and interest at court, as to have gone himself to Saul to offer his service; but his modesty would not let him do that; it was one of his own rules, before it was one of his son's proverbs, Put not forth thyself in the presence of the king, and stand not in the place of great men; (Prov. 25. 6.) yet his zeal put him upon that method, which, he hoped, would bring him into this great engagement. Two considerations, it seems, fired David with a holy indignation. (1.) That the challenger was one that was uncircumcised, a stranger to God, and out of covenant with him. (2.) That the challenged were the armies of the living God, devoted to him, employed by him and for him, so that the affronts done to them reflected upon the living God himself, and that he cannot bear. When, therefore, some had told him what was the reward proposed for killing the Philistine, (v. 27.) he asked others, (v. 30.) with the same resentment, which he expected would at length come to Saul's ear.

6. How he was brow-beaten and discouraged by his elder brother Eliab, who, taking notice of his forwardness, fell into a passion upon it, and gave David very abusive language, v. 28. Consider it,

(1.) As the fruit of Eliab's jealousy. He was the eldest brother, and David the youngest, and perhaps it had been customary with him (as it is with too many elder brothers) to trample upon him, and take every occasion to chide him. But those who thus exalt themselves over their juniors, may perhaps live to see themselves, by a righteous Providence, abased, and those whom they are abusive to, exalted. Time may come when the elder may serve the younger. But Eliab was now vexed that his younger brother should speak those bold words against the Philistine, which he himself durst not say. He knew what honour David had had already in the court, and, if he should now get him honour in the camp, (from which, he thought, he had found means effectually to seclude him, v. 15.) the glory of his elder brother would be eclipsed and stained, and therefore (such is the nature of jealousy) he would rather that Goliath should triumph over Israel, than that David should be the man that should triumph over him. Wrath is cruel, and anger is outrageous, but who can stand before envy, especially the envy of a brother, which Jacob, and Joseph, and David here, experienced the keenness of? See Prov. 18. 19. It is very ill-favoured language that Eliab here gives him; not only unjust and unkind, but, at this time, basely ungrateful; for David was now sent by his father, as Joseph by his, on a kind visit to his brethren. Eliab intended, in what he said, not only to grieve and discourage David himself, and quench that noble fire which he perceived glowing in his breast, but to represent him to those about him as an idle proud lad, not fit to be taken notice of. He gives them to understand that his business was only to keep sheep, and falsely insinuates that he was a careless unfaithful shepherd; though he had left his charge in good hands, (v. 20.) yet he must tauntingly be asked, With whom hast thou left those few sheep? Though he came down now to the camp, in obedience to his father, and kindness to his brethren, and Eliab knew it, yet this is turned to his reproach; "Thou art come down, not to do any service, but to gratify thy own curiosity, and only to look about thee;" and from thence he will infer the pride and naughtiness of his heart, and pretends to know it as certainly as if he were in his bosom. David could appeal to God concerning his humility and sincerity, (Ps. 17. 3.—131. 1.) and at this time gave proofs of both, and yet could not escape this hard character from his own brother. See the folly, absurdity, and wickedness, of a proud and envious passion; how groundless its jealousies are, how unjust its censures, how unfair its representations, how bitter its invectives, and how indecent its language. God, by his grace, keep us from such a spirit!

(2.) As a trial of David's meekness, patience, and constancy; a short trial it was, and he approved himself well in it; for, [1.] He bore the provocation with admirable temper; (v. 29.) "What have I now done? What fault have I committed, for which I should thus be chidden? Is there not a cause for my coming to the camp, when my father sent me? Is there not a cause for my resenting the injury done to Israel's honour by Goliath's challenge?" He had right and reason on his side, and knew it, and therefore did not render railing for railing, but, with a soft answer, turned away his brother's wrath. This conquest of his own passion was, in some respects, more honourable than that of Goliath. He that hath rule over his own spirit is better than the mighty. It was no time for David to quarrel with his brother, when the Philistines were upon them. The more threatening the church's enemies are, the more forbearing her friends should be with one another. [2.] He broke through the discouragement with admirable resolution. He would not be driven off from his thoughts of engaging the Philistine by the ill-will of his brother. Those that undertake great and public services must not think it strange if they be discountenanced and opposed by those from whom they had reason to expect support and assistance; but must humbly go on with their work, in the face, not only of their enemies' threats, but of their friends' slights and suspicions.

31. And when the words were heard which David spake, they rehearsed them before Saul: and he sent for him. 32. And David said to Saul, Let no man's heart fail because of him; thy servant will o and fight with this Philistine. 33. And Saul said unto David, Thou art not able to go against this Philistine to fight with him: for thou art but a youth, and he a man of war from his youth. 34. And David said unto Saul, Thy servant kept his father's sheep, and there came a lion, and a bear, and took a lamb out of the flock: 35. And I went out after him, and smote him, and delivered it out of his mouth: and when he arose against me, I caught him by his beard, and smote him, and slew him. 36. Thy servant slew both the lion and the bear: and this uncircumcised Philistine shall be as one of them, seeing he hath defied the armies of the living God. 37. David said moreover, The LORD that delivered me out of the paw of the lion, and out of the paw of the bear, he will deliver me out of the hand of this Philistine. And Saul said unto David, Go, and the LORD be with thee. 38. And Saul armed David with his armour, and he put an helmet of brass upon his head; also he armed him with a coat of mail. 39. And David girded his sword upon his armour, and he assayed to go; for he had not proved it. And David said unto Saul, I cannot go with these; for I have not proved them. And David put them off him.

David is at length presented to Saul for his champion, (v. 31.) and he bravely undertakes to fight the Philistine; (v. 32.) Let no man's heart fail because of him: it would have reflected too much upon the valour of his prince, if he had said, Let not thy heart fail; therefore he speaks generally, Let no man's heart fail. A little shepherd, come but this morning from keeping sheep, has more courage than all the mighty men of Israel, and encourages them. Thus does God often send good words to his Israel, and do great things for them, by the weak and foolish things of the world. David only desires a commission from Saul to go and fight with the Philistine, but says nothing to him of the reward he had proposed, because that was not the thing he was ambitious of, but only the honour of serving God and his country: nor would he seem to question Saul's generosity.

Two things David had to do with Saul:

I. To get clear of the objection Saul made against his undertaking. "Alas," says Saul, "thou hast a good heart to it, but art by no means an equal match for this Philistine: to engage with him, is to throw away a life which may better be reserved for more agreeable services: thou art but a youth, rash and inconsiderate, weak and unversed in arms; he is a man that has the head and hands of a man, a man of war, trained up and inured to it from his youth, (v. 33.) and how canst thou expect but that he will be too hard for thee?"

David, as he had answered his brother's passion with meekness, so he answered Saul's fear with faith, and gives a reason of the hope which was in him, that he should conquer the Philistine to the satisfaction of Saul. We have reason to fear that Saul had no great acquaintance with, or regard to, the word of God, and therefore David, in reasoning with him, fetched not his arguments and encouragements from thence, how much soever he had an eye to that in his own mind: but he argues from experience; though he was but a youth, and never in the wars, yet perhaps he had done as much as the killing of Goliath came to; for he had, by divine assistance, spirit enough to encounter, and strength enough to subdue, a lion once, and another time a bear, that robbed him of his lambs: (v. 34. .36.) to these he compares this uncircumcised Philistine; looks upon him to be as much a ravenous beast as either of them, and therefore doubts not but to deal as easily with him; and hereby gives Saul to understand, that he was not so unexperienced in hazardous combats as he took him to be.

1. He tells his story like a man of spirit; he is not ashamed to own that he kept his father's sheep, which his brother had just now upbraided him with; so far is he from concealing it, that from his employment as a shepherd, he fetches the experience that now animated him. But he lets those about him know that he was no ordinary shepherd. Whatever our profession or calling is, be it ever so mean, we should labour to excel in it, and do the business of it in the best manner. When David kept sheep, (1.) He approved himself very careful and tender of his flock, though it was not his own, but his father's. He could not see a lamb in distress, but he would venture his life to rescue it. This temper made him fit to be a king, to whom the lives of the subjects should be dear, and their blood precious, (Ps. 72. 14.) and fit to be a type of Christ, the good Shepherd, who gathers the lambs in his arms, and carries them in his bosom, (Isa. 40. 11.) and who not only ventured, but laid down, his life for the sheep. Thus too was David fit to be an example to ministers, with the utmost care and diligence to watch for souls, that they be not a prey to the roaring lion. (2.) He approved himself very bold and brave in the defence of his flock. This was that which he was now concerned to give proof of, and better evidence could not be demanded than this; "Thy servant not only rescued the lambs, but, to revenge the injury, slew both the lion and the bear."

2. He applies his story like a man of faith. He owns (v. 37.) it was the Lord that delivered him from the lion and the bear; to him he gives the praise of that great achievement, and from thence he infers, He will deliver me out of the hand of this Philistine. "The lion and the bear were enemies only to me and my sheep, and it was in defence of my own interest that I attacked them; but this Philistine is an enemy to God and Israel, defies the armies of the living God, and it is for their honour that I attack him." Note, (1.) Our experiences ought to be improved by us, as our encouragements to trust in God, and venture in the way of duty. He that has delivered, does and will. (2.) By the care which common Providence takes of the inferior creatures, and the protection they are under, we may be encouraged to depend upon that special Providence which surrounds the Israel of God. He that sets bounds to the waves of the sea, and the rage of wild beasts, can and will restrain the wrath of wicked men. St. Paul seems to allude to this of David; (2Tim. 4. 17, 18.) "I was delivered out of the mouth of the lion, and therefore, I trust, the Lord shall deliver me." And perhaps David here thought of the story of Samson, and encouraged himself with it; for his slaying of a lion was a happy presage of his many illustrious victories over the Philistines in single combat.

Thus David took off Saul's objection against his undertaking, and gained a commission to fight the Philistine, with which Saul gave him a hearty good wish; since he would not venture himself, he prayed for him that would; Go, and the Lord be with thee. A good word, if it was not spoken customarily and in a formal manner, as too often it is.

II. But David has somewhat to do likewise, to get clear of the armour wherewith Saul would, by all means, have him dressed up, when he went upon this great action; (v. 33.) He armed David with his armour; not that which he wore himself, the disproportion of his stature would not admit that, but some that he kept in his armoury; little thinking that he on whom he now put his helmet and coat of mail, must shortly inherit his crown and robe. David being not yet resolved which way to attack his enemy, girded on his sword, not knowing, as yet, but he should have occasion to make use of it; but he found the armour would but incumber him, and would be rather his burthen than his defence, and therefore he desires leave of Saul to put them off again; I cannot go with these, for I have not proved them, that is, "I have never been accustomed to such accoutrements as these." We may suppose Saul's armour to be very fine and very firm; but what good would it do David, if it were not fit, or if he knew not how to manage himself in it? Those that aim at things above their education and usage, and covet the attire and armour of princes, forget that that is the best for us, which we are fit for and accustomed to; if we had our desire, we should wish to be in our own coat again, and should say, "We cannot go with these;" we had therefore better go without them.

40. And he took his staff in his hand, and chose him five smooth stones out of the brook, and put them in a shepherd's bag which he had, even in a scrip; and his sling was in his hand: and he drew near to the Philistine. 41. And the Philistine came on and drew near unto David; and the man that bare the shield went before him. 42. And when the Philistine looked about, and saw David, he disdained him: for he was but a youth, and ruddy, and of a fair countenance. 43. And the Philistine said unto David, Am I a dog, that thou comest to me with staves? And the Philistine cursed David by his gods. 44. And the Philistine said to David, Come to me, and I will give thy flesh unto the fowls of the air, and to the beasts of the field. 45. Then said David to the Philistine, Thou comest to me with a sword, and with a spear, and with a shield: but I come to thee in the name of the LORD of hosts, the God of the armies of Israel, whom thou hast defied. 46. This day will the LORD deliver thee into mine hand; and I will smite thee, and take thine head from thee; and I will give the carcases of the host of the Philistines this day unto the fowls of the air, and to the wild beasts of the earth; that all the earth may know that there is a God in Israel. 47. And all this assembly shall know that the LORD saveth not with sword and spear: for the battle is the LORD's, and he will give you into our hands.

We are now coming near this famous combat, and have in these verses the preparations and remonstrances made on both sides.

I. The preparations made on both sides for the encounter. The Philistine was already fixed, as he had been daily for the last forty days; well might he go with his armour, for he had sufficiently proved it. Only we are told, (v. 41.) that he came on and drew near; a signal, it is likely, being given that his challenge was accepted, and, as if he distrusted his helmet and coat of mail, a man went before him carrying his shield; for his own hands are full with his sword and spear, v. 45. But what arms and ammunition is David furnished with? Truly none but what he brought with him as a shepherd; no breastplate, or corselet, but his plain shepherd's coat; no spear, but his staff; no sword or bow, but his sling; no quiver, but his scrip; nor any arrows, but, instead of them, five smooth stones picked out of the brook, v. 40. By this it appeared that his confidence was purely in the power of God, and not in any sufficiency of his own; and that now, at length, he who put it into his heart to fight the Philistine, put it into his head with what weapons to do it.

II. The conference which precedes the encounter. In which observe,

1. How very proud Goliath was. (1.) With what scorn he looked upon his adversary, v. 42. He looked about, expecting to meet some tall strong man; but when he saw what a mean figure he made with whom he was to engage, he disdained him, thought it below him to enter the lists with him, fearing that the contemptibleness of the champion he contended with would lessen the glory of his victory. He took notice of his person, that he was but a youth, not come to his strength, ruddy, and of a fair countenance, fitter to accompany the virgins of Israel in their dances, (if mixed dancing was then in use,) than to lead on the men of Israel in their battles. He took notice of his array with great indignation; (v. 43.) "Am I a dog, that thou comest to me with staves? Dost thou think to beat me as easily as thou dost thy shepherd's dog?" (2.) With what confidence he presumed upon his success. He cursed David by his gods, imprecating the impotent vengeance of his idols against him, thinking those fire-balls thrown about him would secure him success: and therefore, in confidence of that, he darts his menaces, as if threatening words would kill; (v. 44.) "Come to me, and I will give thy flesh to the fowls of the air; it will be a tender and delicate feast for them." Thus the security and presumption of fools destroy them.

2. How very pious David was. His speech savours nothing of ostentation, but God is all in all in it, v. 45. . 47.

(1.) He derives his authority from God. "I come to thee, by warrant and commission from heaven, in the name of the Lord, who has called me to, and animated me for, this undertaking; who, by his universal providence, is the Lord of hosts, of all hosts; and therefore has power to do what he pleases; and, by the special grace of his covenant, is the God of the armies of Israel, and therefore has engaged, and will employ, his power for their protection, and against thee who hast impiously defied them." The name of God David relied on, as Goliath did on his sword and spear. See Ps. 20. 7.—118. 10, 11.

(2.) He depends for success upon God, v. 46. David speaks with as much assurance as Goliath had done, but upon better ground; it is his faith that says, "This day will the Lord deliver thee into my hand"; and not only thy carcase, but the carcases of the host of the Philistines, shall be given to the birds and beasts of prey."

(3.) He devotes the praise and glory of all to God. He did not, like Goliath, seek his own honour, but the honour of God: not doubting but by the success of this action, [1.] All the world should be made to know that there is a God, and that the God of Israel is the one only living and true God, and all other pretended deities are vanity and a lie. [2.] All Israel (whom he calls not this army, but this assembly, or church, because they were now religiously attending the goings of their God and King, as they used to do in the sanctuary) all Israel shall know that the Lord saveth not with sword and spear, (v. 47.) but can, when he pleases, save without either, and against both, Ps. 46. 9. David addresses himself to this combat rather as a priest that was going to offer a sacrifice to the justice of God, than as a soldier that was going to engage an enemy of his country.

48. And it came to pass, when the Philistine arose, and came and drew nigh to meet David, that David hasted, and ran toward the army to meet the Philistine. 49. And David put his hand in his bag, and took thence a stone, and slang it, and smote the Philistine in his forehead, that the stone sunk into his forehead; and he fell upon his face to the earth. 50. So David prevailed over the Philistine with a sling and with a stone, and smote the Philistine, and slew him; but there was no sword in the hand David. 51. Therefore David ran, and stood upon the Philistine, and took his sword, and drew it out of the sheath thereof, and slew him, and cut off his head therewith. And when the Philistines saw their champion was dead, they fled. 52. And the men of Israel and of Judah arose, and shouted, and pursued the Philistines, until thou come to the valley, and to the gates of Ekron. And the wounded of the Philistines fell down by the way to Shaaraim, even unto Gath, and unto Ekron. 53. And the children of Israel returned from chasing after the Philistines, and they spoiled their tents. 54. And David took the head of the Philistine, and brought it to Jerusalem; but he put his armour in his tent. 55. And when Saul saw David go forth against the Philistine, he said unto Abner, the captain of the host, Abner, whose son is this youth? And Abner said, As thy soul liveth, O king, I cannot tell. 56. And the king said, Inquire thou whose son the stripling is. 57. And as David returned from the slaughter of the Philistine, Abner took him, and brought him before Saul with the head of the Philistine in his hand. 58. And Saul said to him, Whose son art thou, thou young man? And David answered, I am the son of thy servant Jesse the Beth-lehemite.

Here is, 1. The engagement between the two champions, v. 48. To this engagement, (1.) The Philistine advanced with a great deal of state and gravity: if he must encounter a pigmy, yet it shall be with the magnificence of a giant and a grandee. This is intimated in the manner of expression. He arose, and came, and drew nigh, like a stalking mountain, overlaid with brass and iron, to meet David. (2.) David advanced with no less activity and cheerfulness, as one that aimed more to do execution, than to make a figure; he hasted, and ran, being lightly clad, to meet the Philistine. We may imagine with what tenderness and compassion the Israelites saw such a pleasing youth as this, throwing himself into the mouth of destruction; but he knew whom he had believed, and for whom he acted.

2. The fall of Goliath in this engagement. He was in no haste, because in no fear, but confident that he should soon, at one stroke, cleave his adversary's head: but while he was preparing to do it solemnly, David did his business effectually, without any parade; he slang a stone which hit him in the forehead, and, in the twinkling of an eye, fetched him to the ground, v. 49. He knew there were famous slingers in Israel, (Judg. 20. 16.) yet was either so forgetful or presumptuous, as to go with the beaver of his helmet open, and thither, to the only part left exposed, not so much David's art, as God's providence, directed the stone, and brought it with such force that it sunk into his head, notwithstanding the impudence with which his forehead was brazened. See how frail and uncertain life is, even then when it thinks itself best fortified, and how quickly, how easily, and with how small a matter, the passage may be opened for life to go out and death to enter. Goliath himself has not power over the spirit to retain the spirit, Eccl. 8. 8. Let not the strong man glory in his strength, nor the armed man in his armour. See how God resists the proud, and pours contempt upon those that bid defiance to him and his people. None ever hardened his heart against God, and prospered. One of the rabbins thinks, that when Goliath said to David, Come, and I will give thy flesh to the fowls of the air, he drew up his head so hastily, that his helmet fell off, and so left his broad forehead a fair mark for David. To complete the execution, he drew Goliath's own sword, a two-handed weapon for David, and with it cut off his head, v. 51. What need had David to take a sword of his own? His enemy's sword shall serve his purpose, when he has occasion for one. God is greatly glorified when his proud enemies are cut off with their own sword, and he makes their own tongues to fall upon them, Ps. 64. 8. David's victory over Goliath was typical of the triumphs of the Son of David over Satan and all the powers of darkness, whom he spoiled, and made a show of them openly; (1. Cor. 2. 15.) and we through him are more than conquerors.

3. The defeat of the Philistines' army hereupon. They relied wholly upon the strength of their champion, and therefore, when they saw him slain, they did not, as Goliath had offered, throw down their arms, and surrender themselves servants to Israel, (v. 9.) but took to flight, being wholly dispirited, and thinking it to no purpose to oppose one before whom such a mighty man was fallen: they fled, (v. 51.) and this put life into the Israelites; they shouted and pursued them, v. 52. (David, it is probable, leading them on in the pursuit,) even to the gates of their own cities. In their return from the chase, they seized all their baggage, plundered their tents, (v. 53.) and enriched themselves with the spoil.

4. David's disposal of his trophies, v. 54. He brought the head of the Philistine to Jerusalem, to be a terror to the Jebusites, who held the strong-hold of Zion: it is probable that he carried it in triumph to other cities; his armour he laid up in his tent; and the sword was preserved behind the ephod, in the tabernacle, as consecrated to God, and a memorial of the victory, to his honour, ch. 21. 9.

5. The notice that was taken of David. Though he had been at court formerly, yet, having been for some time absent, (v. 15.) Saul had forgotten him, being melancholy and mindless, and little thinking that his musician should have spirit enough to be his champion; and therefore, as if he had never seen him before, he asked whose son he was. Abner was a stranger to him, but brought him to Saul himself; (v. 57.) and he gave a modest account of himself, v. 58. And now he was introduced to the court with much greater advantages than before; in which he owned God's hand performing all things for him.

CHAP. XVIII.

In the course of the foregoing chapter we left David in triumph; now in this chapter we have, 1. The improvement of his triumphs; he soon became, 1. Saul's constant attendant, v. 2. 2. Jonathan's covenant friend, v. 1, 3, 4. 3. The darling of his country, v. 5, 7, 16. II. The allays of his triumphs. This is the vanity that accompanies even a right work, that for it a man is envied, Eccl. 4. 4. So David was by Saul. 1. He hated him, and sought to kill him himself, v. 8, 11. 2. He feared him, and contrived how he might have some mischief done him, v. 12, 17. Proposed to marry his daughter to him; but, (1.) Cheated him of the eldest, to provoke him, (v. 19.) and, (2.) Gave him the younger, upon conditions which would endanger his life, v. 20, 25. But David performed his conditions bravely, (v. 26, 27.) and grew to be more and more esteemed, v. 28, 30. Still David is rising, but (as all that aim at the crown of life must expect) he had a great deal of difficulty and opposition to grapple with.

1. AND it came to pass, when he had made an end of speaking unto Saul, that the soul of Jonathan was knit with the soul of David, and Jonathan loved him as his own soul. 2. And Saul took him that day, and would let him go no more home to his father's house. 3. Then Jonathan and David made a covenant, because he loved him as his own soul. 4. And Jonathan stripped himself of the robe that was upon him, and gave it to David, and his garments, even to his sword, and to his bow, and to his girdle. 5. And David went out whithersoever Saul sent him, and behaved himself wisely: and Saul set him over the men of war, and he was accepted in the sight of all the people, and also in the sight of Saul's servants.

David was anointed to the crown, to take it out of Saul's hand, and over Jonathan's head; and yet here we find,

1. That Saul, who was now in possession of the crown, reposed a confidence in him, God so ordering it, that he might, by his preferment at court, be prepared for future service. Saul now took him home with him, and would not suffer him to return again to his retirement, v. 2. And David having signalized himself above the men of war, in taking up the challenge which they declined, Saul set him over the men of war; (v. 5.) not that he made him general, Abner was in that post, but perhaps captain of the life-guard; or, though he was youngest, he ordered him to have the precedence, in recompence of his great services. He employed him in the affairs of government; and David went out whithersoever Saul sent him, shewing himself as dutiful as he was bold and courageous. Those that hope to rule, must first learn to obey. He had approved himself a dutiful son to Jesse his father, and now a dutiful servant to Saul his master: those that are good in one relation, it is to be hoped will be so in another.

II. That Jonathan, who was heir to the crown, entered into covenant with him: God so ordering it, that David's way might be the clearer, when his rival was his friend.

I. Jonathan conceived an extraordinary kindness and affection for him, v. 1. When he had made an end of speaking to Saul, he fell perfectly in love with him. Whether it refers to his conference with Saul before the battle, (ch. 17. 34. . 37.) or to that after, (v. 58.) in which, it is probable, much more was said than is there set down, is uncertain. But in both David expressed himself with so much prudence, modesty, and piety, such a felicity of expression, with so much boldness, and yet so much sweetness, and all this so natural and unaffected, and the more surprising because of the disadvantages of his education and appearance, that the soul of Jonathan was immediately knit unto the soul of David. Jonathan had formerly set upon the Philistine army with the same faith and bravery that David had now attacked a Philistine giant: so that there was between them a very near resemblance of affections, dispositions, and counsels, which made their spirits unite so easily, so quickly, so closely, that they seemed but as one soul in two bodies. None had so much reason to dislike David as Jonathan had, because he was to put him by the crown, yet none regards him more. Those that are governed in their love by principles of wisdom and grace, will not suffer their affections to be alienated by any secular regards or considerations: the greater thoughts will swallow up and overrule the lesser.

2. He testified his love to David by a generous present he made him, v. 4. He was concerned to see so great a soul, though lodged in so fair a body, yet disguised in the mean and despicable dress of a poor shepherd, and therefore takes care to put him speedily into the habit of a courtier, for he gave him a robe, and of a soldier, for he gave him, instead of his staff and sling, a sword and bow, and, instead of his shepherd's scrip, a girdle, either a belt or a sash; and, which made the present much more obliging, they were the same that he himself had worn, and (as a presage of what would follow) he stripped himself of them to dress David in them. Saul's would not fit him, but Jonathan's did; their bodies were of a size, a circumstance which well agreed with the suitableness of their minds. When Saul put these marks of honour on David, he put them off again, because he would first earn them, and then wear them; but now that he had given proofs of the spirit of a prince and soldier, he was not ashamed to wear the habits of a prince and soldier. David is seen in Jonathan's clothes, that all may take notice he is Jonathan's second self. Our Lord Jesus has thus shewed his love to us, that he stripped himself to clothe us, emptied himself to enrich us; nay, he did more than Jonathan, he clothed himself with our rags, whereas Jonathan did not put on David's.

3. He endeavoured the perpetuating of this friendship: so entirely satisfied were they in each other, even at the first interview, that they made a covenant with each other, v. 3. Their mutual affection was sincere; and he that bears an honest mind startles not at assurances. True love desires to be constant. Those who love Christ as their own souls, will be willing to join themselves to him in an everlasting covenant.

III. That both court and country agree to bless him: it is but seldom that they agree in their favourites; yet David was accepted in the sight of all the people, and also (which was strange) in the sight of Saul's servants, v. 5. The former cordially loved him, the latter could not for shame but caress and compliment him. And it was certainly a great instance of the power of God's grace in David, that he was able to bear all this respect and honour, flowing in upon him of a sudden, without being lifted up above measure. Those that climb so fast, have need of good heads and good hearts: it is harder to know how to abound, than how to be abased.

6. And it came to pass as they came, when David was returned from the slaughter of the Philistine, that the women came out of all cities of Israel, singing and dancing, to meet king Saul, with tabrets, with joy, and with instruments of music. 7. And the women answered one another as they played, and said, Saul hath slain his thousands, and David his ten thousands. 8. And Saul was very wroth, and the saying displeased him; and he said, They have ascribed unto David ten thousands, and to me they have ascribed but thousands: and what can he have more but the kingdom? 9. And Saul eyed David from that day and forward. 10. And it came to pass on the morrow, that the evil spirit from God came upon Saul, and he prophesied in the midst of the house: and David played with his hand, as at other times: and there was a javelin in Saul's hand. 11. And Saul cast the javelin; for he said, I will smite David even to the wall with it. And David avoided out of his presence twice.

Now begin David's troubles, and they not only tread on the heels of his triumphs, but take rise from them; such is the vanity of that in this world which seems greatest.

I. He was too much magnified by the common people. Some time after the victory, Saul went a triumphant progress through the cities of Israel that lay next him, to receive the congratulations of the country. And, when he made his public entry into any place, the women were most forward to shew him respect, as was usual then in public triumphs, (v. 6.) and they had got a song, it seems, which they sang in their dances, (made by some poet or other, that was a great admirer of David's bravery, and was more just than wise, in giving his achievements in the late action the preference before Saul's,) the burthen of which was, Saul has slain his thousands, and David his ten thousands. Such a difference as this Moses made between the numbers of Ephraim and Manasseh, Deut. 33. 17.

II. This mightily displeased Saul, and made him envy David, v. 8, 9. He ought to have considered that they referred only to this late action, and intended not to diminish any of Saul's former exploits; and that, in the action now celebrated, it was undeniably true, that David, in killing Goliath, did, in effect, slay all the Philistines that were slain that day, and defeated the whole army; so that they did but give David his due: it may be, he that composed the song only used a poetical liberty, and intended not any invidious comparison between Saul and David; or, if he did, it was below the great mind of a prince to take notice of such a reflection upon his personal honour, when it appeared that the glory of the public was sincerely intended. But Saul was very wroth, and presently suspected some treasonable design at the bottom of it: What can he have more but the kingdom? This made him eye David, as one he was jealous of, and sought advantages against; (v. 9.) his countenance was not toward him as it had been. Proud men cannot endure to hear any praised but themselves, and think all the honour lost that goes by themselves. It is a sign that the Spirit of God is departed from men, if they be peevish in their resentment of affronts, envious and suspicious of all about them, and ill-natured in their conduct; for the wisdom from above makes us quite otherwise.

III. In his fury he aimed to kill David, v. 10, 11. Jealousy is the rage of a man; it made Saul outrageous against David, and impatient to get him out of the way.

1. His fits of phrensy returned upon him. The very next day after he conceived malice against David, the evil spirit from God, that had formerly haunted him, seized him again. Those that indulge themselves in envy and uncharitableness, give place to the Devil, and prepare for the re-entry of the unclean spirit, with seven others more wicked. Where envy is, there is confusion. Saul pretended a religious ecstasy; he prophesied in the midst of the house; that is, he had the gestures and motions of a prophet, and humoured the thing well enough to decoy David into a snare, and that he might be fearless of any danger, and off his guard; and, perhaps, designing, if he could but kill him, to impute it to a divine impulse, and to charge it upon the spirit of prophecy with which he seemed to be animated; but really it was a hellish fury that actuated him.

2. David, though advanced to a much higher post of honour, disdained not, for his master's service, to return to his harp; he played with his hand, as at other times. Let not the highest think any thing below them, whereby they may do good, and be serviceable to those they are obliged to.

3. He took this opportunity to endeavour the death of David. A sword in a madman's hand is a dangerous thing, especially such a madman as Saul was, that was mad with malice. Yet he had a javelin or dart in his hand, with which he projected and endeavoured to slay David; not in a sudden passion, but deliberately: I will smite David to the wall with it; with such a desperate force did he throw it. Justly does David complain of his enemies, that they hated him with a cruel hatred, Ps. 25. 19. No life is thought too precious to be sacrificed to malice. If a grateful sense of the great service David had done to the public could not assuage Saul's fury, yet one would think he should have allowed himself to consider the kindness he was now doing to himself, relieving him, so as no one else could, against the worst of troubles. Those are possessed with a devilish spirit indeed, that render evil for good. Compare David, with his harp in his hand, aiming to serve Saul, and Saul, with his javelin in his hand, aiming to slay David; and observe the sweetness and usefulness of God's persecuted people, and the brutishness and barbarity of their persecutors. The blood-thirsty hate the upright, but the just seek his soul, Prov. 29. 10.

4. David happily avoided the blow twice, namely, now, and afterwards, ch. 19. 10. He did not throw the javelin at Saul again; he withdrew, not fighting, but flying, for his own preservation. Though he had both strength and courage enough, and colour of right, to make resistance and revenge the injury, yet he did no more than secure himself, by getting out of the way of it. David, no doubt, had a watchful eye upon Saul's hand, and the javelin in it, and did as bravely in running from it, as he did lately in running upon Goliath. Yet his safety must be ascribed to the watchful eye of God's providence upon him, saving his servant from the hurtful sword; and by this narrow escape it seemed he was designed for something extraordinary.

12. And Saul was afraid of David, because the LORD was with him, and was departed from Saul. 13. Therefore Saul removed him from him, and made him his captain over a thousand; and he went out and came in before the people. 14. And David behaved himself wisely in all his ways; and the LORD was with him. 15. Wherefore when Saul saw that he behaved himself very wisely, he was afraid of him. 16. But all Israel and Judah loved David, because he went out and came in before them. 17. And Saul said to David, Behold my elder daughter Merab, her will I give thee to wife: only be thou valiant for me, and fight the LORD's battles. For Saul said, Let not mine hand be upon him, but let the hand of the Philistines be upon him. 18. And David said unto Saul, Who am I? and what is my life, or my father's family in Israel, that I should be son-in-law to the king? 19. But it came to pass at the time when Merab Saul's daughter should have been given to David, that she was given unto Adriel the Meholahite to wife. 20. And Michal Saul's daughter loved David: and they told Saul, and the thing pleased him. 21. And Saul said, I will give him her, that she may be a snare to him, and that the hand of the Philistines may be against him. Wherefore Saul said to David, Thou shalt this day be my son-in-law in the one of the twain. 22. And Saul commanded his servants, saying, Commune with David secretly, and say, Behold, the king hath delight in thee, and all his servants love thee: now therefore be the king's son-in-law. 23. And Saul's servants spake those words in the ears of David. And David said, Seemeth it to you a light thing to be a king's son-in-law, seeing that I am a poor man, and lightly esteemed? 24. And the servants of Saul told him, saying, On this manner spake David. 25. And Saul said, Thus shall ye say to David, The king desireth not any dowry, but an hundred foreskins of the Philistines, to be avenged of the king's enemies. But Saul thought to make David fall by the hand of the Philistines. 26. And when his servants told David these words, it pleased David well to be the king's son-in-law: and the days were not expired. 27. Wherefore David arose and went, he and his men, and slew of the Philistines two hundred men; and David brought their foreskins, and they gave them in full tale to the king, that he might be the king's son-in-law. And Saul gave him Michal his daughter to wife. 28. And Saul saw and knew that the LORD was with David, and that Michal Saul's daughter loved him. 29. And Saul was yet the more afraid of David; and Saul became David's enemy continually. 30. Then the princes of the Philistines went forth: and it came to pass, after they went forth, that David behaved himself more wisely than all the servants of Saul; so that his name was much set by.

Saul had now, in effect, proclaimed war with David; he began in open hostility, when he threw the javelin at him; now we are here told, how his enmity proceeded, and how David received the attacks of it.

I. See how Saul expressed his malice against David.

1. He was afraid of him, v. 12. Perhaps he pretended to be afraid that David would do him mischief, to force his way to the crown. Those that design ill against others, are commonly willing to have it thought that others design ill against them: but

David's withdrawing, (v. 11.) was a plain evidence that he was far from such a thought. However, he really stood in awe of him, as Herod feared John, Mark, 6. 20. Saul was sensible that he had lost the favourable presence of God himself, and that David had it, and, for this reason, he feared him. Note, Those are truly great, and to be revered, that have God with them. The more wisely David behaved himself, the more Saul feared him, v. 15. and again, v. 29. Men think the way to be feared, is, to hector and threaten, which makes them feared by fools only, but despised by the wise and good; whereas the way to be both feared and loved, feared by those to whom we would wish to be a terror, and loved by those to whom we would wish to be a delight, is, to behave ourselves wisely. Wisdom makes the face to shine, and commands respect.

2. He removed him from court, and gave him a regiment in the country, v. 13. He made him captain over a thousand, that he might be from under his eye, because he hated the sight of him; and that he might not secure the interest of the courtiers. Yet herein he did impolitely; for he gave David an opportunity of ingratiating himself with the people, who therefore loved him, (v. 16.) because he went out and came in before them; that is, he presided in the business of his country, civil as well as military, and gave universal satisfaction.

3. He stirred him up to take all occasions of quarrelling with the Philistines and engaging them, (v. 17.) insinuating to him, that hereby he would do good service to his prince, Be thou valiant for me; and good service to his God, Fight the Lord's battles; and a kindness to himself too, for hereby he would qualify himself for the honour he designed him, which was, to marry his eldest daughter to him. This he had merited by killing Goliath, for it was promised by proclamation to him that should do that exploit; (ch. 17. 25.) but David was so modest, as not to demand it, and now, when Saul proposed it, it was with design of mischief to him, to make him venture upon hazardous attempts, saying in his heart, Let the hand of the Philistines be upon him, hoping they would some time or other be the death of him; yet how could he expect this, when he saw that God was with him?

4. He did what he could to provoke him to discontent and mutiny, by breaking his promise with him, and giving his daughter to another, when the time was come that she should have been given to him, v. 19. This was as great an affront as he could possibly put upon him, and touched him both in his honour and in his love; he, therefore, thought David's resentments of it would break out in some indecency or other, in word or deed, which might give him an advantage against him to take him off by course of law. Thus evil men seek mischief.

5. When he was disappointed in this, he proffered him his other daughter, (who, it seems, had a secret kindness for David, v. 20.) but with this design, that she might be a snare to him, v. 21. (1.) Perhaps he hoped that she would, even after her marriage to David, take part with her father against her husband, and give him an opportunity of doing him an unkindness. However, (2.) The conditions of the marriage, he hoped, would be his destruction; for (so zealous will Saul seem against the Philistines) the conditions of the marriage must be, that he killed a hundred Philistines, and, as proofs that those he had slain, were uncircumcised, he must bring in their foreskins cut off; this would be a just reproach upon the Philistines, who hated circumcision, as it was an ordinance of God; and perhaps David, in doing this, would the more exasperate them against him, and make them seek to be revenged on him, which was the thing that Saul desired and designed, much more than to be avenged on the Philistines: For Saul thought to make David fall by the Philistines, v. 25. See here, [1.] What cheats bad men put upon themselves. Saul's conscience would not suffer him, except when the evil spirit was actually upon him, to aim at David's life himself, for even he could not but conceive horror at the thought of murdering such an innocent and excellent person; but he thought that to expose him to the Philistines had nothing bad in it: Let not my hand be upon him, but the hand of the Philistines; whereas that malicious design against him was as truly murder before God, as if he had slain him with his own hands. [2.] What cheats they put upon the world. Saul pretended extraordinary kindness for David, even then when he aimed at his ruin, and was actually plotting it: Thou shalt be my son-in-law, says he, (v. 21.) notwithstanding he hated him implacably. Perhaps, David refers to this, when (Ps. 55. 21.) he speaks of his enemy as one whose words were smoother than butter, but war was in his heart. It is probable that Saul's employing his servants to persuade David to enter into a treaty of a match with his daughter Michal, (v. 22.) arose from an apprehension that either his having cheated him about his elder daughter, (v. 19.) or the hardness of the terms he intended now to propose, would make him decline it.

II. See how David conducted himself, when the tide of Saul's displeasure ran thus high against him.

1. He behaved himself wisely in all his ways, v. 14. He perceived Saul's jealousy of him, which made him very cautious and circumspect in every thing he said and did, and careful to give no offence. He did not complain of hard measure, nor make himself the head of a party, but managed all the affairs he was intrusted with, as one that made it his business to do real service to his king and country, looking upon that to be the end of his preferment. And then the Lord was with him to give him success in all his undertakings. Though he contracted Saul's ill-will by it, yet he obtained God's favour. Compare this with Ps. 101. 2. where it is David's promise, I will behave myself wisely; and that promise he here performed; and it is his prayer, Oh when wilt thou come unto me? And that prayer God here answered, the Lord was with him. However blind Fortune may seem to favour fools, God will own and bless those that behave themselves wisely.

2. When it was proposed to him to be son-in-law to the king, he once and again received the proposal with all possible modesty and humility. When Saul proposed his eldest daughter to him, (v. 18.) he said, Who am I, and what is my life? When the courtiers proposed the younger, he took no notice of the affront Saul had given him in disposing of the elder from him, but continued in the same mind; (v. 23.) Seemeth it a light thing to you to be a king's son-in-law, seeing that I am a poor man, and lightly esteemed? He knew Michal loved him, and yet did not offer to improve his interest in her affections, for the gaining of her without her father's consent, but waited till it was proposed to him. And then see, (1.) How highly he speaks of the honour offered him, To be son-in-law to the king! Though the king was but an upstart, in his original as mean as himself, in his management no better than he should be, yet, being a crowned head, he speaks of him, and the royal family, with all due respect. Note, Religion is so far from teaching us, that it does not allow us, to be rude and unmannerly. We must render honour to whom honour is due. (2.) How humbly he speaks of himself. Who am I? This did not proceed from a mean, abject, sneaking spirit, for, when there was occasion, he made it appear that he had as high a sense of honour as most men; nor was it from his jealousy of Saul, (though he had reason enough to fear a snake under the green grass,) but from his true and deep humility. Who am I? A poor man, and lightly esteemed! David had as much reason as any man to value himself. He was of an ancient and honourable family of Judah, a comely person, a great statesman and soldier; his achievements were great, for he had won Goliath's head and Michal's heart: he knew himself destined by the divine counsels to the throne of Israel, and yet, Who am I, and what is my life? Note, It well becomes us, however God has advanced us, always to have low thoughts of ourselves. He that humbleth himself, shall be exalted. And if David thus magnified the honour of being son-in-law to the king, how should we magnify the honour of being sons (not in law, but in gospel) to the King of kings! Behold what manner of love the Father has bestowed upon us! Who are we, that we should be thus dignified?

3. When the slaying of an hundred Philistines was made the condition of David's marrying Saul's daughter, he readily closed with it; (v. 26.) It pleased David well to be the king's son-in-law upon those terms; and, before the time given him for the action was expired, he doubled the demand, and slew two hundred, v. 27. He would not seem to suspect that Saul designed his hurt by it, (though he had reason enough,) but rather, he would act as if Saul had meant to consult his honour, and therefore cheerfully undertook it, as became a brave soldier and a true lover, though we may suppose it uneasy to Michal. David hereby discovered likewise, (1.) A great confidence in the divine protection; he knew God was with him, and therefore, whatever Saul hoped, David did not fear falling by the Philistines, though he must needs expose himself much by such an undertaking as this. (2.) A great zeal for the good of his country, which he would not decline any occasion of doing service to, though with the hazard of his life. (3.) A right notion of honour, which consists not so much in being preferred, as in deserving to be so. David was then pleased with the thoughts of being the king's son-in-law, when he found the honour set at this high price; being more solicitous how to merit it, than how to obtain it; nor could he wear it with satisfaction, till he had won it.

4. Even after he was married, he continued his good services to Israel. When the princes of the Philistines began to move towards another war, David was ready to oppose them, and behaved himself more wisely than all the servants of Saul, v. 30. The law dispensed with men from going to war the first year after they were married, (Deut. 24. 5.) but David loved his country too well to make use of that dispensation. Many that have shewed themselves forward to serve the public when they have been in pursuit of preferment, have declined it when they have gained their point; but David acted from more generous principles.

Lastly, Observe how God brought good to David out of Saul's projects against him. 1. Saul gave him his daughter to be a snare to him, but, in this respect, that marriage was a kindness to him, that his being Saul's son-in-law made his succeeding him much the less invidious, especially when so many of his sons were slain with him, ch. 31. 2. 2. Saul thought, by putting him upon dangerous services, to have him taken off, but that very thing confirmed his interest in the people; for the more he did against the Philistines, the better they loved him, so that his name was much set by, (v. 30.) which would make his coming to the crown the more easy. Thus God makes even the wrath of man to praise him, and serves his designs of kindness to his own people by it.

CHAP. XIX.

Immediately after David's marriage, which should have secured him Saul's affection, we find his troubles coming upon him faster than ever, and Saul's enmity to him the cause of all. His death was vowed, and four fair escapes of his from the hurtful sword of Saul we have on account of in this chapter. The first by the prudent mediation of Jonathan, v. 1. 7. The second by his own quickness, v. 8. 10. The third by Michal's fidelity, v. 11. 17. The fourth by Samuel's protection, and a change, for the present, wrought upon Saul, v. 18. 24. Thus God has many ways of preserving his people. Providence is never at a loss.

1. AND Saul spake to Jonathan his son, and to all his servants, that they should kill David. 2 But Jonathan Saul's son delighted much in David: and Jonathan told David, saying, Saul my father seeketh to kill thee: now therefore, I pray thee, take heed to thyself until the morning, and abide in a secret place, and hide thyself: 3. And I will go out and stand beside my father in the field where thou art, and I will commune with my father of thee; and what I see, that I will tell thee. 4. And Jonathan spake good of David unto Saul his father, and said unto him, Let not the king sin against his servant, against David; because he hath not sinned against thee, and because his works have been to thee-ward very good: 5. For he did put his life in his hand, and slew the Philistine, and the Lord wrought a great salvation for all Israel: thou sawest it, and didst rejoice; wherefore then wilt thou sin against innocent blood, to slay David without a cause? 6. And Saul hearkened unto the voice of Jonathan: and Saul sware, As the Lord liveth, he shall not be slain. 7. And Jonathan called David, and Jonathan shewed him all those things. And Jonathan brought David to Saul, and he was in his presence, as in times past.

Saul and Jonathan appear here in their different characters, with reference to David.

1. Never was enemy so unreasonably cruel as Saul. He spake to his son and all his servants, that they should kill David, v. 1. His projects to take him off had failed, and therefore he proclaims him an outlaw, and charges all about him, upon their allegiance, to take the first opportunity to kill David. It is strange that he was not ashamed thus to avow his malice, when he could give no reason for it; and that, knowing that all his servants loved him, (for so he had said himself, ch. 18. 22.) he was not afraid of provoking them to rebel by this bloody order. Either malice was not then so politic, or justice was not so corrupted, as it has been since, or else Saul would have had him indicted, and have suborned witnesses to swear treason against him, and so have had him taken off, as Naboth was, by colour of law; but there is least danger from this undisguised malice. It was strange that he who knew how well Jonathan loved him, should expect him to kill him; but he thought, because he was heir to the crown, he must needs be as envious at David as himself was. And Providence ordered it thus, that he might befriend David's safety.

II. Never was friend so surprisingly kind as Jonathan. A friend in need is a friend indeed: such a one Jonathan was to David. He not only continued to delight much in him, though David's glory eclipsed his, but bravely appeared for him now that the stream ran so strong against him.

1. He took care for his present security, by letting him know his danger; (v. 2.) Take heed to thyself, and keep out of harm's way." Jonathan knew not but some of the servants might be either so obsequious to Saul, or so envious at David, as to put the orders in execution which Saul had given, if they could light on David.

2. He took pains to pacify his father, and reconcile him to David. The next morning, he ventured to commune with him concerning David; (v. 3.) not that night, either because he observed Saul to be drunk, and not fit to be spoken to, or because he hoped that, when he had slept upon it, he would himself revoke the order, or because he could not have an opportunity of speaking to him till morning. His intercession for David was, (1.) Very prudent. It was managed with a great deal of the meekness of wisdom; and he shewed himself faithful to his friend by speaking good of him, though he was in danger of incurring his father's displeasure by it. A rare instance of valuable friendship! He pleads, [1.] The good services David had done to the public, and particularly to Saul; His work has been to thee-ward very good, v. 4. Witness the relief he had given him against his distemper with his harp; and his bold encounter with Goliath, that memorable action, which did, in effect, save Saul's life and kingdom: he appeals to himself concerning that, Thou thyself sawest it, and didst rejoice. In that, and other instances, it appeared that David was a favourite of Heaven, and a friend to Israel, as well as a good servant to Saul, for by him the Lord wrought a great salvation for all Israel; so that to order him to be slain was not only base ingratitude to so good a servant, but a great affront to God, and a great injury to the public. [2.] He pleads his innocence: though he had formerly done many good offices, yet if he had now been chargeable with any crimes, it had been another matter, but he has not sinned against thee; (v. 4.) his blood is innocent, (v. 5.) and if he be slain, it is without cause. And Jonathan had therefore reason to protest against it, because he could not entail any thing upon his family more pernicious than the guilt of innocent blood. (2.) His intercession, being thus prudent, was prevalent. God inclined the heart of Saul to hearken to the voice of Jonathan. Note, We must be willing to hear reason, and to take all reproof and good advice even from our inferiors; parents from their own children. How forcible are right words! Saul was, for the present, so far convinced of the unreasonableness of his enmity to David, that, [1.] He recalled the bloody warrant for his execution; (v. 6.) As the Lord liveth, he shall not be slain. Whether Saul swore here with due solemnity or no, does not appear; perhaps he did, and the matter was of such moment as to deserve it, and of such uncertainty as to need it; but, at other times, Saul swore rashly and profanely, which made the sincerity of this oath justly questionable: for it may be feared that those who can so far jest with an oath as to make a by-word of it, and prostitute it to a trifle, have not such a due sense of the obligation of it, but that, to serve a turn, they will prostitute it to a lie. Some suspect that Saul said and swore this with a malicious design to bring David within his reach again, intending to take the first opportunity to slay him; but, as bad as Saul was, we can scarcely think so ill of him; and therefore we suppose that he spake as he thought, for the present, but the convictions soon wore off, and his corruptions prevailed and triumphed over them. [2.] He renewed the grant of his place at court. Jonathan brought him to Saul, and he was in his presence as in times past, (v. 7.) hoping that now the storm was over, and that his friend Jonathan would be instrumental to keep his father always in this good mind.

8. And there was war again: and David went out, and fought with the Philistines, and slew them with a great slaughter; and they fled from him. 9. And the evil spirit from the LORD was upon Saul, as he sat in his house with his javelin in his hand: and David played with his hand. 10. And Saul sought to smite David even to the wall with the javelin; but he slipped away out of Saul's presence, and he smote the javelin into the wall: and David fled, and escaped that night.

Here,

1. David continues his good services to his king and country. Though Saul had requited him evil for good, and even his usefulness was the very thing for which Saul envied him, yet he did not therefore retire in sullenness, and decline public service. Those that are ill-paid for doing good, yet must not be weary in well-doing, remembering what a bountiful Benefactor our heavenly Father is, even to the froward and unthankful.

Notwithstanding the many affronts Saul had given to David, yet we find him, (1.) As bold as ever in using his sword for the service of his country, v. 8. The war broke out again with the Philistines, which gave David occasion again to signalize himself: it was with a great deal of bravery that he charged them; he came off victorious, slaying many, and putting the rest to flight. (2.) As cheerful as ever in using his harp for the service of his prince. When Saul was disturbed with his former fits of melancholy, David played with his hand, v. 9. He might have pleaded that that was a piece of service now below him; but an humble good man will think nothing below him by which he may do good. He might have objected the danger he was in the last time he did this office for Saul, ch. 18. 10. But he had learned to render good for evil, and to trust God with his safety in way of his duty. See how David was affected when his enemy was sick; (Ps. 35. 14.) which, perhaps, refers to Saul's sickness.

2. Saul continues his malice against David. He that but the other day had sworn by his Maker, that he should not be slain, now endeavours to slay him himself. So implacable, so incurable, is the enmity of the seed of the serpent against that of the woman; so deceitful and desperately wicked is the heart of man without the grace of God, Jer. 17. 9. The fresh honours David had won in this last war with the Philistines, instead of extinguishing Saul's ill will to him, and confirming his reconciliation, revived his envy, and exasperated him yet more. And when he indulged this wicked passion, no marvel that the evil spirit came upon him; (v. 9.) for when we let the sun go down upon our wrath, we give place to the Devil, (Eph. 4. 26, 27.) we make room for him, and invite him. Discomposures of mind, though helped forward by the agency of Satan, commonly owe their original to men's own sins and follies. Saul's fear and jealousy made him a torment to himself, so that he could not sit in his house without a javelin in his hand, pretending it was for his preservation, but designing it for David's destruction; for he endeavoured to nail him to the wall, running at him so violently, that he struck the javelin into the wall, v. 10. So strong was the Devil in him, so strong his own rage and passion. Perhaps he thought, if he had killed him now, he had been excusable both before God and man, as being non compos mentis—not in his right mind, and that it would have been imputed to his distraction. But God cannot be deceived by pretences, whatever men may be.

3. God continues his care of David, and still watches over him for good. Saul missed his blow; David was too quick for him, and fled, and, by a kind providence, escaped that night. To these preservations, among others, David often refers in his psalms, when he speaks of God's being his Shield and Buckler, his Rock and Fortress, and delivering his soul from death.

11. Saul also sent messengers unto David's house, to watch him, and to slay him in the morning: and Michal David's wife told him, saying, If thou save not thy life to-night, to-morrow thou shalt be slain. 12. So Michal let David down through a window: and he went, and fled, and escaped. 13. And Michal took an image, and laid it in the bed, and put a pillow of goats' hair for his bolster, and covered it with a cloth. 14. And when Saul sent messengers to take David, she said, He is sick. 15. And Saul sent the messengers again to see David, saying, Bring him up to me in the bed, that I may slay him. 16. And when the messengers were come in, behold, there was an image in the bed, with a pillow of goats' hair for his bolster. 17. And Saul said unto Michal, Why hast thou deceived me so, and sent away mine enemy, that he is escaped? And Michal answered Saul, He said unto me, Let me go; why should I kill thee?

Here is,

1. Saul's further design of mischief to David. When he had escaped the javelin, supposing he went straight to his own house, as indeed he did, he sent some of his guards after him to lay wait at the door of his house, and to assassinate him in the morning as soon as he started out, v. 11. Josephus says, the design was to seize him, and to hurry him before a court of justice that was ordered to condemn him, and put him to death, as a traitor; but we are here told, it was a shorter way they were to take with him, they were ordered to slay him. Well might David complain that his enemies were bloody men, as he did in the psalm which he penned at this time, and upon this occasion, (Ps. 59.) when Saul sent, and they watched the house to kill him. See v. 2, 3, and 7. He complains that swords were in their lips.

II. David's wonderful deliverance out of this danger; Michal was the instrument of it, whom Saul gave him to be a snare to him, but she proved his protector and helper; often is the Devil out-shot with his own bow. How Michal came to know the danger he was in, does not appear; perhaps she had notice sent her from court, or, rather, was herself aware of the soldiers about the house, when they were going to bed, though they kept so still and silent, that they said, Who does hear? as David takes notice of this in that psalm, v. 7. She, knowing her father's great indignation at David, soon suspected the design, and bestirred herself for her husband's safety.

1. She got David out of the danger. She told him how imminent the peril was, (v. 11.) To-morrow thou wilt be slain. She told him, as Josephus paraphrases it, that if the sun saw him there next morning, it would never see him more; and then put him in a way of escape. David himself was better versed in the art of fighting than of flying, and, had it been lawful, it would have been easy for him to have cleared his house, by dint of sword, from those that haunted it, but Michal let him down through a window, (v. 12.) all the doors being guarded; and so he fled, and escaped. And now it was, that, either in his own closet before he went, or in the hiding-place to which he fled, he penned that fifty-ninth psalm, which shews, that, in his fright and hurry, his mind was composed, and, in this great danger, his faith was strong and fixed on God; and whereas the plot was to slay him in the morning, he speaks there with the greatest assurance, (v. 16.) I will sing aloud of thy mercy in the morning.

2. She practised a deception upon Saul, and those whom he employed to be the instruments of his cruelty. When the doors of the house were opened in the morning, and David did not appear, the messengers would search the house for him; and did so. But Michal told them he was sick in bed, (v. 14.) and, if they would not believe her, they might see; for (v. 13.) she had put a wooden image in the bed, and wrapt it up close and warm as if it had been David asleep, not in a condition to be spoken to: the goats' hair about the image was to resemble David's hair, the better to impose upon them. Michal can by no means be justified in telling a lie, and covering it thus with a cheat; God's truth needed not her lie: but she intended hereby to keep Saul in suspense for a while, that David might have time to secure himself, not doubting but those messengers would pursue him, if they found he was gone. The messengers had so much humanity as not to offer him any disturbance, when they heard he was sick; for to them that are in that misery, pity should be shewn; but Saul, when he heard it, gave positive orders that he should be brought to him, sick or well; (v. 15.) Bring him to me in the bed, that I may slay him. It was base and barbarous thus to triumph over a sick man; and to vow the death of one who, for aught he knew, was dying by the hand of nature. So earnestly did he thirst after his blood, and so greedy was his revenge, that he could not be pleased to see him dead, unless he himself was the death of him; though, a while ago, he said, Let not mine hand be upon him. Thus, when men lay the reins on the neck of their passions, they grow more and more outrageous. When the messengers were sent again, the cheat was discovered, v. 16. But, by this time, it was to be hoped that David was safe, and, therefore, Michal was not then much concerned at the discovery. Saul chid her for helping David to escape; (v. 17.) Why hast thou deceived me so? What a base spirit was Saul of, to expect, that, because Michal was his daughter, she must therefore, betray her own husband to him unjustly! Ought she not to forsake and forget her father, and her father's house, to cleave to her husband? Those that themselves will be held by no bonds of reason or religion, are ready to think that others should as easily break those bonds. In answer to Saul's chiding, Michal is not so careful of her husband's reputation as she had been of his person, when she makes this her excuse, He said, Let me go; why should I kill thee? As her insinuating that she would have hindered his flight, was false, (it was she that put him upon it, and furthered it,) so it was an unjust, unworthy, reflection upon him, to suggest that he threatened to kill her, if she would not let him go, and might confirm Saul in his rage against him. David was far from being so barbarous a man, and so imperious a husband, so brutish in his resolves, and so haughty in his menaces, as she here represented him. But David suffered both from friends and foes, and so did the Son of David.

18. So David fled, and escaped, and came to Samuel to Ramah, and told him all that Saul had done to him. And he and Samuel went and dwelt in Naioth. 19. And it was told Saul, saying, Behold, David is at Naioth in Ramah. 20. And Saul sent messengers to take David: and when they saw the company of the prophets prophesying, and Samuel standing as appointed over them, the Spirit of God was upon the messengers of Saul, and they also prophesied. 21. And when it was told Saul, he sent other messengers, and they prophesied likewise. And Saul sent messengers again the third time, and they prophesied also. 22. Then went he also to Ramah, and came to a great well that is in Sechu: and he asked and said, Where are Samuel and David? And one said, Behold, they be at Naioth in Ramah. 23. And he went thither to Naioth in Ramah: and the Spirit of God was upon him also, and he went on, and prophesied, until he came to Naioth in Ramah. 24. And he stripped off his clothes also, and prophesied before Samuel in like manner, and lay down naked all that day and all that night. Wherefore they say, Is Saul also among the prophets?

Here is,

I. David's place of refuge. Being got away in the night from his own house, he fled not to Beth-lehem to his relations, or to any of the cities of Israel that had caressed and cried him up, to make an interest in them for his own preservation; but he ran straight to Samuel, and told him all that Saul had done to him, v. 18. 1. Because Samuel was the man that had given him assurance of the crown; and his faith in that assurance now beginning to fail, and he being ready to say in his haste, (or, in his flight, as some read it, Ps. 116. 11.) All men are liars, ("not only Saul that promised me my life, but Samuel himself that promised me the throne,") whither should he go but to Samuel, for such encouragements, in this day of distress, as would support his faith? In flying to Samuel, he made God his Refuge, trusting in the shadow of his wings; where else can a good man think himself safe? 2. Because Samuel, as a prophet, was best able to advise him what to do in this day of his distress. In the psalm he penned the night before, he had lifted up his prayer to God; and now he takes the first opportunity of waiting upon Samuel, to receive direction and instruction from God. If we expect answers of peace to our prayers, we must have our ears open to God's word, v. 3. Because, with Samuel, there was a college of prophets with whom he might join in praising God, and the pleasure of that would be the greatest relief imaginable to him in his present distress, he met with little rest or satisfaction in Saul's court, and therefore went to seek it in Samuel's church. And, doubtless, what little pleasure is to be had in this world, they have it that live a life of communion with God; so that David retired in the time of trouble, Ps. 27. 4. . 6.

II. David's protection in this place. He and Samuel went and dwelt (or lodged) in Naioth, where the school of the prophets was, in Ramah, as in a privileged place, for the Philistines themselves would not disturb that meeting, ch. 10. 10. But Saul, having notice of it by some of his spies, (v. 19) sent officers to seize David, v. 20. When they did not bring him, he sent more; when they returned not, he sent the third time; (v. 21.) and, hearing no tidings of these, he went himself, v. 22. So impatient was he in his thirst after David's blood, so restless to compass his design against him, though baffled by one providence after another, that he could not perceive that David was under the special protection of Heaven. It was below the king, to go himself on such an errand as this; but persecutors will stoop to any thing, and stick at nothing, to gratify their malice. Saul lays aside all public business, to hunt David. How was David delivered, now, that he was just ready to fall (like his own lamb formerly) into the mouth of the lion? Not as he delivered his lamb, by slaying the lion, or, as Elijah was delivered, by consuming the messengers with fire from heaven, but by turning the lions for the present into lambs.

1. When the messengers came into the congregation where David was among the prophets, the Spirit of God came upon them, and they prophesied; that is, they joined with the rest in praising God. Instead of seizing David, they themselves were seized. And thus, (1.) God secured David: for, either they were put into such an ecstacy by the spirit of prophecy, that they could not think of any thing else, and so forgot their errand, and never minded David; or they were, by it, put, for the present, into so good a frame, that they could not entertain the thought of doing so bad a thing. (2.) He put an honour upon the sons of the prophets, and the communion of saints, and shewed how he can, when he pleases, strike an awe upon the worst of men, by the tokens of his presence in the assemblies of the faithful, and force them to acknowledge, that God is with them of a truth, 1 Cor. 14. 24, 25. See also the benefit of religious societies, and what good impressions may be made by them on minds that seemed unapt to receive such impressions. And where may the influence of the Spirit be expected, but in the congregations of the saints? (3.) He magnified his power over the spirits of men. He that made the heart and tongue, can manage both to serve his own purposes. Balaam prophesied of the happiness of Israel, whom he would have cursed; and some of the Jewish writers think these messengers prophesied of the advancement of David to the throne of Israel.

2. Saul himself was likewise seized with the spirit of prophecy, before he came to the place. One would have thought that so bad a man as he, had been in no danger of being turned into a prophet; yet, when God will take this way of protecting David, even Saul is no sooner come (as Bishop Hall expresses it) within smell of the smoke of Naioth, but he prophesies, as his messengers did, v. 23. He stripped off his royal robe, and warlike habiliments, because they were either too fine, or too heavy, for this service, and fell into a trance, as it should seem, or into a rapture, which continued all that day and night. The saints at Damascus were delivered from the rage of the New-Testament Saul, by a change wrought on his spirit, but of another nature from this. This was only amazing, but that sanctifying. This, for a day, that, for ever. Note, Many have great gifts, and yet no grace; prophesy in Christ's name, and yet are disowned by him, Matth. 7. 22. Now, the proverb recurs, Is Saul among the prophets? See ch. 10. 12. Then, it was different from what it had been, but now, contrary. He is rejected of God, and actuated by an evil spirit, and yet among the prophets.

CHAP. XX.

David, having several times narrowly escaped Saul's fury, begins to consider at last, whether it were not necessary for him to retire into the country, and to take up arms in his own defence. But he will not do so daring a thing, without consulting his faithful friend Jonathan; how that was done, and what passed between them, we have an account in this chapter, where we have as surprising instances of supernatural love, as we had in the chapter before of unnatural hatred. I. David complains to Jonathan of his present distress, and engages him to be his friend, v. 1. . 8. II. Jonathan faithfully promises to get and give him intelligence how his father stood affected to him, and renews the covenant of friendship with him, v. 9. . 23. III. Jonathan, upon trial, finds, to his grief, that his father was implacably enraged against David, v. 24. . 34. IV. He gives David notice of this, according to the appointment between them, v. 35. . 42.

1. AND David fled from Naioth in Ramah, and came and said before Jonathan, What have I done? what is mine iniquity? and what is my sin before thy father, that he seeketh my life? 2. And he said unto him, God forbid; thou shalt not die: behold, my father will do nothing either great or small, but that he will shew it me: and why should my father hide this thing from me? it is not so. And David sware moreover, and said, Thy father certainly knoweth that I have found grace in thine eyes; and he saith, Let not Jonathan know this, lest he be grieved: but truly as the LORD liveth, and as thy soul liveth, there is but a step between me and death. 4. Then said Jonathan unto David, Whatsoever thy soul desireth, I will even do it for thee. 5. And David said unto Jonathan, Behold, to-morrow is the new moon, and I should not fail to sit with the king at meat: but let me go, that I may hide myself in the field unto the third day at even. 6. If thy father at all miss me, then say, David earnestly asked leave of me, that he might run to Beth-lehem his city: for there is a yearly sacrifice there for all the family. 7. If he say thus, It is well; thy servant shall have peace: but if he be very wroth, then be sure that evil is determined by him. 8. Therefore thou shalt deal kindly with thy servant; for thou hast brought thy servant into a covenant of the LORD with thee: notwithstanding, if there be in me iniquity, slay me thyself; for why shouldst thou bring me to thy father?

Here,

I. David makes a representation to Jonathan of his present troubles. While Saul lay bound by his trance at Naioth, David escaped to the court, and got to speak with Jonathan. And it was happy for him that he had such a friend at court, when he had such an enemy on the throne. If there be those that hate and despise us, let us not be disturbed at that, for there are those also that love and respect us; God hath set the one over against the other, and so must we. Jonathan was a friend that loved at all times; loved David as well now in distress, and bid him as welcome into his arms, as he had done when he was in his triumph; (ch. 18. 1.) and he was a brother that was born for adversity, Prov. 17. 17. Now, 1. David appeals to Jonathan himself concerning his innocency, and he needed not say much to him for the proof of that, only desires him, that, if he knew of any just offence he had given his father, he would tell him, that he might humble himself, and beg his pardon. What have I done? v. 1. 2. He endeavours to convince him, that, notwithstanding his innocency, Saul sought his life. Jonathan, from a principle of filial respect to his father, was very loath to believe that he designed, or would ever do, so wicked a thing, v. 2. He the rather hoped so, because he knew nothing of any such design; and he had usually been made privy to all his counsels. Jonathan, as became a dutiful son, endeavoured to cover his father's shame, as far as was consistent with justice and fidelity to David. Charity is not forward to think evil of any, especially of a parent, 1 Cor. 13. 5. David, therefore, gives him the assurance of an oath concerning his own danger; swears the peace upon Saul, that he was in fear of his life by him; "As the Lord liveth, than which, nothing more sure in itself; and as thy soul liveth, than which, nothing more certain to thee; whatever thou thinkest, there is but a step between me and death, v. 3. And, as for Saul's concealing it from Jonathan, it was easy to account for that, he knew the friendship between him and David; and, therefore, though in other things he advised with him, yet not in that. None more fit than Jonathan to serve him in every design that was just and honourable, but he knew him to be a man of more virtue, than to be his confidant in so base a design as the murder of David.

II. Jonathan generously offers him his service; (v. 4.) Whatever thou desirest, (he needed not insert the proviso of lawful and honest, for he knew David too well to think he would ask any thing that was otherwise,) I will even do it for thee. This is true friendship. Thus Christ testifies his love to us, Ask, and it shall be done for you; and we must testify our's to him, by keeping his commandments.

III. David only desires him to satisfy himself, and then to satisfy him, whether Saul did really design his death or no. Perhaps David proposed this, more for Jonathan's conviction than his own, for he himself was well satisfied.

I. The method of trial he proposes was very natural, and would certainly discover how Saul stood affected to him. The two next days, Saul was to dine publicly, upon occasion of the solemnities of the new moon, when extraordinary sacrifices were offered, and feasts made upon the sacrifices. Saul was rejected of God, and the Spirit of the Lord was departed from him, and yet he kept up his observance of the holy feasts. There may be the remains of external devotion, where there is nothing but the ruins of real virtue. At these solemn feasts, Saul had either all his children to sit with him, and David had a seat as one of them; or, all his great officers, and David had a seat as one of them. However it was, David resolved his seat should be empty (and that it never used to be at a sacred feast) those two days, (v. 5.) and he would abscond till the solemnity was over, and put it upon this issue; If Saul admitted an excuse for his absence, and dispensed with it, he would conclude he had changed his mind, and was reconciled to him; but, if he resented it, and was put into a passion by it, it was easy to conclude he designed him a mischief, since, it was certain, he did not love him so well as to desire his presence for any other end, than that he might have an opportunity to do him a mischief, v. 7.

2. The excuse he desires Jonathan to make for his absence, we have reason to think, was true; that he was invited by his elder brother to Beth-lehem, his own city, to celebrate this new moon with his relations there, because, beside the monthly solemnity, in which they held communion with all Israel, they had now a yearly sacrifice, and a holy feast upon it, for all the family, v. 6. They kept a day of thanksgiving in their family, for the comforts they enjoyed, and a prayer, for the continuance of them. By this, it appears that the family David was of, was a very religious family, a house that had a church in it.

3. The arguments he uses with Jonathan, to persuade him to do this kindness for him, are very pressing, v. 8. (1.) That he had entered into a league of friendship with him, and it was Jonathan's own proposal. Thou hast brought thy servant into a covenant of the Lord with thee. (2.) That he would by no means urge him to espouse his cause, if he were not sure that it was a righteous cause; "If there be iniquity in me, I am so far from desiring, or expecting, that the covenant between us should bind thee to be a confederate with me in that iniquity, that I freely release thee from it, and wish that thy hand may be first upon me: slay me thyself." No honest man will urge his friend to do a dishonest thing for his sake.

9. And Jonathan said, Far be it from thee: for if I knew certainly that evil were determined by my father to come upon thee, then would not I tell it thee? 10. Then said David to Jonathan, Who shall tell me? or what if thy father answer thee roughly? 11. And Jonathan said unto David, Come, and let us go out into the field. And they went out both of them into the field. 12. And Jonathan said unto David, O LORD God of Israel, when I have sounded my father about to-morrow any time, or the third day, and, behold, if there be good toward David, and I then send not unto thee, and shew it thee; 13. The LORD do so and much more to Jonathan: but if it please my father to do thee evil, then I will shew it thee, and send thee away, that thou mayest go in peace: and the LORD be with thee, as he hath been with my father. 14. And thou shalt not only while yet I live shew me the kindness of the LORD, that I die not; 15. But also thou shalt not cut off thy kindness from my house for ever: no, not when the LORD hath cut off the enemies of David every one from the face of the earth. 16. So Jonathan made a covenant with the house of David, saying, Let the LORD even require it at the hand of David's enemies. 17. And Jonathan caused David to swear again, because he loved him: for he loved him as he loved his own soul. 18. Then Jonathan said to David, To-morrow is the new moon: and thou shalt be missed, because thy seat will be empty. 19. And when thou hast stayed three days, then thou shalt go down quickly, and come to the place where thou didst hide thyself, when the business was in hand, and shalt remain by the stone Ezel. 20. And I will shoot three arrows on the side thereof, as though I shot at a mark. 21. And, behold, I will send a lad, saying, Go, find out the arrows. If I expressly say unto the lad, Behold, the arrows are on this side of thee, take them; then come thou: for there is peace to thee, and no hurt; as the LORD liveth. 22. But if I say thus unto the young man, Behold, the arrows are beyond thee; go thy way: for the LORD hath sent thee away. 23. And as touching the matter which thou and I have spoken of, behold, the LORD be between thee and me for ever.

Here,

I. Jonathan protests his fidelity to David in his distress. Notwithstanding the strong confidence David had in Jonathan, yet, because he might have some reason to fear that his father's influence, and his own interest, should make him warp, or grow cool toward him. Jonathan thought it requisite solemnly to renew the professions of his friendship to him; (v. 9.) "Far be it from thee to think that I suspect thee of any crime, for which I should either slay thee myself, or deliver thee to my father; no, if thou hast any jealousy of that, come, let us go into the field, (v. 11.) and talk it over more fully." He does not challenge him to the field to fight him for an affront, but to fix him in his friendship. He faithfully promises him that he would let him know how, upon trial, he found his father affected toward him, and would make the matter neither better nor worse than it was. "If there be good toward thee, I will shew it thee, that thou mayest be easy; (v. 12.) if evil, I will send thee away, that thou mayest be safe;" (v. 13.) and thus would help to deliver him from the evil, if it were real, and from the fear of evil, if it were but imaginary. For the confirmation of his promise, he appears to God, 1. As a witness; (v. 12.) "O Lord God of Israel, thou knowest I mean sincerely, and think as I speak." The strength of his passion made the manner of his speaking concise and abrupt. 2. As a judge; "The Lord do so, and much more, to Jonathan, (v. 13.) if I speak deceitfully, or break my word with my friend:" he expresses himself thus solemnly, that David might be abundantly assured of his sincerity. And thus God has confirmed his promises to us, that we might have strong consolation, Heb. 6. 17, 18. Jonathan adds to his protestations his hearty prayers, "The Lord be with thee, to protect and prosper thee, as he has been formerly with my father, though now he be withdrawn." This intimates his belief that David would be in his father's place, and his good wishes that he might prosper in it better than his father now did.

II. He provides for the entail of the covenant of friendship with David upon his posterity; (v. 14. . 16.) he engages David to be a friend to his family when he was gone; (v. 15.) "Thou shalt promise that thou wilt not cut off thy kindness from my house for ever." This he spoke from a natural affection he had to his children, whom he desired it might go well with when he was gone, and for whose future welfare he desired to improve his present interest. It also bespeaks his firm belief of David's advancement, and that it would be in the power of his hand to do a kindness or unkindness to his seed; for, in process of time, the Lord would cut off his enemies, Saul himself not excepted: then, "Do thou not cut off thy kindness from my house, nor revenge my father's wrongs upon my children." The house of David must likewise be bound to the house of Jonathan from generation to generation; he made a covenant (v. 16.) with the house of David. Note, True friends cannot but covet to transmit to their's after them their mutual affections. Thine own friend, and thy father's friend, forsake not. This kindness, 1. He calls the kindness of the Lord, because it is such kindness as the Lord shews to those whom he takes into covenant with himself; for he is a God to them, and to their seed; they are beloved for their father's sake. 2. He secures it by an imprecation, (v. 16.) The Lord require it at the hand of David's seed, (for of David himself he had no suspicion,) if they prove so far David's enemies, as to deal wrongfully with the posterity of Jonathan, David's friend. He feared lest David, or some of his, should hereafter be tempted, for the clearing and confirming of their title to the throne, to do by his seed, as Abimelech had done by the sons of Gideon; (Judg. 9. 5.) and this he would effectually prevent: but the reason given (v. 17.) why Jonathan was so earnest to have the friendship entailed, is purely generous, and has nothing of self in it; it was because he loved him as he loved his own soul, and therefore desired that he and his might be loved by him. David, though now in disgrace at court, and in distress, was as amiable in the eyes of Jonathan as ever he had been; and he loved him never the less for his father's hating him; so pure were the principles on which his friendship was built. Having himself sworn to David, he caused David to swear to him, and (as we read it) to swear again, which David consented to; (for, he that bears an honest mind, does not startle at assurances;) to swear by his love to him, which he looked upon as a sacred thing. Jonathan's heart was so much upon it, that, when they parted this time, he concludes with a solemn appeal to God, The Lord be between me and thee for ever; (v. 23.) that is, "God himself be judge between us and our families for ever, if on either side this league of friendship be violated." It was in remembrance of this covenant, that David was kind to Mephibosheth, 2 Sam. 9. 7.—21. 7. It will be a kindness to ourselves and our's, to secure an interest in those whom God favours, and to make his friends our's.

III. He settles the method of intelligence, and by what signs and tokens he would give him notice how his father stood affected toward him. He would be missed the first day, or, at least, the second day, of the new moon, and would be inquired after, v. 18. On the third day, by which time he would be returned from Beth-lehem, he must be at such a place, (v. 19.) and Jonathan would come toward that place with his bow and arrows to shoot for diversion; (v. 20.) would send his lad to fetch his arrows, and if they were shot short of the lad, David must take it for a signal of safety, and not be afraid to shew his head; (v. 21.) but if he shot beyond the lad, it was a signal of danger, and he must shift for his safety, v. 22. This expedient he fixed upon, lest he should not have the opportunity, which yet it proved he had, of talking with him, and making the report by word of mouth.

24. So David hid himself in the field: and when the new moon was come, the king sat him down to eat meat. 25. And the king sat upon his seat, as at other times, even upon a seat by the wall: and Jonathan arose, and Abner sat by Saul's side, and David's place was empty. 26. Nevertheless Saul spake not any thing that day: for he thought, Something hath befallen him, he is not clean; surely he is not clean. 27. And it came to pass on the morrow, which was the second day of the month, that David's place was empty: and Saul said unto Jonathan his son, Wherefore cometh not the son of Jesse to meat. neither yesterday, nor to-day? 28. And Jonathan answered Saul, David earnestly asked leave of me to go to Beth-lehem: 29. And he said, Let me go, I pray thee; for our family hath a sacrifice in the city; and my brother, he hath commanded me to be there: and now, if I have found favour in thine eyes, let me get away, I pray thee, and see my brethren. Therefore he cometh not unto the king's table. 30. Then Saul's anger was kindled against Jonathan, and he said unto him, Thou son of the perverse rebellious woman, do not I know that thou hast chosen the son of Jesse to thine own confusion, and unto the confusion of thy mother's nakedness? 31. For as long as the son of Jesse liveth upon the ground, thou shalt not be established, nor thy kingdom. Wherefore now send and fetch him unto me, for he shall surely die. 32. And Jonathan answered Saul his father, and said unto him, Wherefore shall he be slain? what hath he done? 33. And Saul cast a javelin at him to smite him: whereby Jonathan knew that it was determined of his father to slay David. 34. So

Jonathan arose from the table in fierce anger, and did eat no meat the second day of the month: for he was grieved for David, because his father had done him shame.

Jonathan is here effectually convinced of that which he was so loath to believe, that his father had an implacable enmity to David, and would certainly be the death of him, if it were in his power; and he had like to have paid very dear himself for the conviction.

I. David is missed from the feast on the first day, but nothing is said of him. The king sat upon his seat, to feast upon the peace-offerings, as at other times, (v. 25.) and yet had his heart as full of envy and malice against David as it would hold; he should first have been reconciled to him, and then come and offered his gift; but, instead of that, he hoped, at this feast, to drink the blood of David. What an abomination was that sacrifice, which was brought with such a wicked mind as this! Prov. 21. 27. When the king came to take his seat, Jonathan arose, in reverence to him, both as his father and as his sovereign; every one knew his place, but David's was empty. It did not use to be so. None more constant than he in attending holy duties; nor had he been absent now, but that he must have come at the peril of his life: self-preservation obliged him to withdraw. In imminent peril present opportunities may be waived, nay we ought not to throw ourselves into the mouth of danger. Christ himself absconded often, till he knew that his hour was come. But that day Saul took no notice that he missed David, but said within himself, Surely he is not clean, v. 26. Some ceremonial pollution has befallen him, which forbids him to eat of the holy things, till he has washed his clothes, and bathed his flesh in water, and been unclean until the even. Saul knew what conscience David made of the law, and that he would rather keep away from the holy feast, than come in his uncleanness. Blessed be God, no uncleanness is now a restraint upon us, but what we may by faith and repentance be washed from in the Fountain opened, Ps. 26. 6.

II. He is inquired for the second day, v. 27. Saul asked Jonathan, who he knew was his confidant, Wherefore cometh not the son of Jesse to meat? He was his own son by marriage, but he calls him in disdain, the son of Jesse. He asks for him, as if he were not pleased that he should be absent from a religious feast: and so it should be an example to masters of families, to see to it, that those under their charge be not absent from the worship of God, either in public or in the family. It is a bad thing for us, except in case of necessity, to omit any opportunity of stately attending on God in solemn ordinances. Thomas lost a sight of Christ by being once absent from a meeting of the disciples. But that which displeased Saul, was, that hereby he missed the opportunity he expected, of doing David a mischief.

III. Jonathan makes his excuse, v. 28, 29. 1. That he was absent upon a good occasion; keeping the feast in another place, though not here; sent for by his elder brother, who was now more respectful to him than he had been, (ch. 17. 28.) and that he was gone to pay his respects to his relations, for the keeping up of brotherly love; and no master would deny a servant liberty to do that at proper times. He pleads, 2. That he did not go without leave, humbly asked and obtained from Jonathan, who, as his superior officer, was proper to be applied to for it. Thus he represents David, as not wanting in any instance of respect and duty to the government.

IV. Saul, hereupon, breaks out into a most extravagant passion, and rages like a lion disappointed of his prey. David was out of his reach, but he falls foul upon Jonathan for his sake; (v. 30, 31.) gave him base language, not fit for a gentleman, a prince, to give to any man, especially his own son, heir apparent to his crown, a son that served him, the greatest stay and ornament of his family, before a deal of company, at a feast, when all should be in good humour, at a sacred feast, by which all irregular passions should be mortified and subdued; yet he does in effect call him, 1. A bastard: Thou son of the perverse rebellious woman; that is, according to the foolish and filthy language of men's brutish passion now-a-day, Thou son of a whore. He tells him he was born to the confusion of his mother; that is, he had given the world cause to suspect that he was not the legitimate son of Saul, because he loved him whom Saul hated, and supported him who would be the destruction of their family. 2. A traitor: Thou son of perverse rebellion, so the word is; that is, "Thou perverse rebel." At other times, he reckoned no counsellor or commander, that he had, more trusty and well-beloved than Jonathan; yet now, in his passion, he represents him as dangerous to his crown and life. 3. A fool: Thou hast chosen the son of Jesse for thy friend, to thine own confusion, for, while he lives, thou shalt never be established. Jonathan indeed did wisely and well for himself and family, to secure an interest in David, whom Heaven had destined to the throne; yet, for this, he is branded as most impolitic. It is good taking God's people for our people, and going with those that have him with them; it will prove to our advantage at last, however for the present it may be thought a disparagement, and a prejudice to our secular interest. It is probable Saul knew that David was anointed to the kingdom, by the same hand that anointed him, and then, not Jonathan, but himself, was the fool, to think to defeat the counsels of God. Yet nothing will serve him but David must die, and Jonathan must fetch him to execution. See how ill Saul's passion looks, and let it warn us against the indulgence of any thing like it in ourselves. Anger is madness, and he that hates his brother is a murderer.

V. Jonathan is sorely grieved, and put into disorder, by his father's barbarous passion; and the more, because he had hoped better things, v. 2. He was troubled for his father, that he should be such a brute; troubled for his friend, whom he knew to be a friend of God, that he should be so basely abused: he was grieved for David, (v. 34.) and troubled for himself too, because his father had done him shame; and though most unjustly, yet he must submit to it. One would pity Jonathan, to see how he was put, 1. Into the peril of sin. Much ado that wise and good man had to keep his temper, upon such a provocation as this. His father's reflections upon himself he made no return to; it becomes inferiors to bear with meekness and silence the contempts put upon them in wrath and passion. When thou art the anvil, lie thou still. But his dooming David to die, he could not bear; to that he replied with some heat, (v. 32.) Wherefore shall he be slain? What has he done? Generous spirits can much more easily bear to be abused themselves, than to hear their friends abused. 2. Into the peril of death. Saul was now so outrageous, that he threw a javelin at Jonathan, v. 33. He seemed to be in great care (v. 31.) that Jonathan should be established in his kingdom, and yet now he himself aims at his life. What fools, what savage beasts, and worse, does anger make men! How necessary is it to put a hook in its jaws! Jonathan was fully satisfied that evil was determined against David, which put him out of frame exceedingly: he rose from table, thinking it high time, when his life was struck at, and would eat no meat; for they were not to eat of the holy things in their mourning. All the guests, we may suppose, were discomposed, and the mirth of the feast spoiled. He that is cruel troubles his own flesh, Prov. 11. 17.

35. And it came to pass in the morning, that Jonathan went out into the field at the time appointed with David, and a little lad with him. 36. And he said unto his lad, Run, find out now the arrows which I shoot. And as the lad ran, he shot an arrow beyond him. 37. And when the lad was come to the place of the arrow which Jonathan had shot, Jonathan cried after the lad, and said, Is not the arrow beyond thee? 38. And Jonathan cried after the lad, Make speed, haste, stay not. And Jonathan's lad gathered up the arrows, and came to his master. 39. But the lad knew not this time to wait on the priest, either to be purified from some pollution, or to pay some vow; but, whatever his business was, it is said, he was detained before the Lord. He must attend, and could not help it, but he was sick of the service, smuffed at it, and said, What a weariness is it! Mal. 1. 13. He would rather have been any where else than before the Lord, and therefore, instead of minding the business he came about, was plotting to do David a mischief, and to be avenged on Ahimelech for detaining him. God's sanctuary could never secure itself from such wolves in sheep's clothing. See Gal. 2. 4.

10. And David arose, and fled that day for fear of Saul, and went to Achish the king of Gath.

11. And the servants of Achish said unto him, Is not this David the king of the land? Did they not sing one to another of him in dances, saying, Saul hath slain his thousands, and David his ten thousands? 12. And David laid up these words in his heart, and was sore afraid of Achish the king of Gath. 13. And he changed his behaviour before them, and feigned himself mad in their hands, and scrabbled on the doors of the gate, and let his spittle fall down upon his beard. 14. Then said Achish unto his servants, Lo, ye see the man is mad: wherefore then have ye brought him to me? 15. Have I need of madmen, that ye have brought this fellow to play the madman in my presence? shall this fellow come into my house?

David, though king elect, is here an exile; designed to be master of vast treasures, yet had been just now begging his bread; anointed to the crown, and yet here forced to run his country: thus do God's providences sometimes seem to run counter to his promises, for the trial of his people's faith, and the glorifying of his name, in the accomplishment of his counsels, notwithstanding the difficulties that lay in the way. Here is,

1. David's flight into the land of the Philistines, where he hoped to be hid, and to remain, undiscovered, in the court or camp of Achish, king of Gath, v. 10. Israel's darling is necessitated to quit the land of Israel, and he that was the Philistines' great enemy, (upon I know not what inducements,) goes to seek for shelter among them. It should seem, that as, though the Israelites loved him, yet the king of Israel had personal enmity to him, which obliged him to leave his own country; so, though the Philistines hated him, yet the king of Gath had a personal kindness for him, valuing his merit, and, perhaps, the more for his killing Goliath of Gath, who, it may be, had been no friend to Achish. To him David now went directly, as to one he could confide in; (as afterward, ch. 27. 2, 3.) and Achish would now have protected him, but that he was afraid of disobliging his own people by it. God's persecuted people have often found better usage from Philistines than from Israelites, in the Gentile theatres than in the Jewish synagogues: the king of Judah imprisoned Jeremiah, and the king of Babylon set him at liberty.

2. The disgust which the servants of Achish took at his being there, and the complaint of it to Achish; (v. 11.) "Is not this David? Is not this he that has triumphed over the Philistines? Witness that burthen of the song which was so much talked of; Saul has slain his thousands, but David, this very man, his ten thousands." Nay, is not this he that (if our intelligence from the land of Israel be true) is, or is to be, king of the land? As such, he must be an enemy to our country; and is it safe or honourable for us to protect or entertain such a man? Achish, perhaps, had intimated to them that it would be policy to entertain David, because he was now an enemy to Saul, and he might be hereafter a friend to them; it is common for the outlaws of a nation to be sheltered by the enemies of that nation; but the servants of Achish objected to his politics, and thought it not at all fit that he should stay among them.

3. The fright which this put David into. Though he had some reason to put confidence in Achish, yet, when he perceived the servants of Achish jealous of him, he began to be afraid that Achish would be obliged to deliver him up to them, and he was sore afraid; (v. 12.) and perhaps he was the more apprehensive of his own danger, when he was thus discovered, because he wore Goliath's sword, which, we may suppose, was well known at Gath, and with which he had reason to expect they would cut off his head, as he had cut off Goliath's with it. David now learned by experience what he has taught us, (Ps. 113. 9.) that it is better to trust in the Lord than to put confidence in princes. Men of high degree are a lie, and if we make them our hope, they may prove our fear. It was at this time that David penned the fifty-sixth psalm, (Michtam, a golden psalm,) when the Philistines took him in Gath, where, having shewed before God his distresses, he resolves, (v. 3.) what time I am afraid, I will trust in thee; and therefore (v. 11.) will not be afraid what man can do unto me, no not the sons of the giant.

4. The course he took to get out of their hands. He feigned himself mad; (v. 13.) he used the gestures and fashions of a natural fool, or one that was gone out of his wits; supposing they would be ready enough to believe that the disgrace he was fallen into, and the troubles he was now in, had driven him distracted. This dissimulation of his cannot be justified; it was a mean thing thus to disparage himself, and inconsistent with truth thus to misrepresent himself, and therefore not becoming the honour and sincerity of such a man as David: yet it was not a downright lie, and it was like a stratagem in war, by which he imposed upon his enemies, for the preservation of his own life. What David did here in pretence, and for his own safety, which made it partly excusable, drunkards do really, and only to gratify a base lust; they make fools of themselves, and change their behaviour; their words and actions commonly are either as silly and ridiculous as an idiot's, or as furious and outrageous as a madman's, which has often made me wonder, that ever men of sense and honour should allow themselves in it.

5. His escape by this means, v. 14, 15. I am apt to think Achish was aware that the delirium was but counterfeit, but, being desirous to protect David, (as we find afterward he was very kind to him, even when the lords of the Philistines favoured him not, ch. 28. 1, 2.—29. 6.) he pretended to his servants, that he really thought he was mad, and therefore had reason to question whether it was David or no; or, if it were, they needed not fear him, what harm could he do them, now that his reason was departed from him? They suspected that Achish was inclined to entertain him; "Not I," says he, "he is a madman, I'll have nothing to do with him, you need not fear that I should employ him, or give him any countenance. Have I need of madmen? Shall this fool come into my house? I will shew him no kindness, but then you shall do him no hurt, for if he be a madman, he is to be pitied." He therefore drove him away, as it is in the title of Ps. 34, which David penned upon this occasion, and an excellent psalm it is, and shews, that he did not change his spirit when he changed his behaviour, but even in the greatest difficulties and hurries his heart was fixed, trusting in the Lord; and he concludes that psalm with this assurance, that none of them that trust in God shall be desolate, though they may be, as he now was. solitary and distressed, persecuted and forsaken.

CHAP. XXII.

David, being driven from Achish, returns into the land of Israel, to be hunted by Saul. 1. David sets up his standard in the cave of Adullam; entertains his relations, (v. 1.) lists soldiers; (v. 2.) but removes his aged parents to a more quiet settlement, (v. 3, 4.) and has the prophet Gad for his counsellor, v. 5. 11. Saul resolves to pursue him and find him out, compairs of his servants and Jonathan, (v. 6. .8.) and finding by Doeg's information that Ahimelech area had been kind to David, he ordered him and all the priests that were with him, eighty-five in all, to be put to death, and all that belonged to them destroyed; (v. 9. 19.) from the barbarous execution of which sentence, Abiathar escaped to David, v. 20. 23.

1. DAVID therefore departed thence, and escaped to the cave Adullam: and when his brethren and all his father's house heard it, they went down thither to him. 2. And every one that was in distress, and every one that was in debt, and every one that was discontented, gathered themselves unto him; and he became a captain over them: and there were with him about four hundred men. 3. And David went thence to Mizpeh of Moab: and he said unto the king of Moab, Let my father and my mother, I pray thee, come forth, and be with you, till I know what God will do for me. 4. And he brought them before the king of Moab: and they dwelt with him all the while that David was in the hold. 5. And the prophet Gad said unto David, Abide not in the hold; depart, and get thee into the land of Judah. Then David departed, and came into the forest of Hareth.

Here,

1. David shelters himself in the cave of Adullam, v. 1. Whether it was a natural or artificial fastness does not appear; it is probable that the access to it was so difficult, that David thought himself able, with Goliath's sword, to keep it against all the forces of Saul, and therefore buried himself alive in it, while he was waiting to see (as he says here, v. 3.) what God would do with him. The promise of the kingdom implied a promise of preservation to it, and yet David used proper means for his own safety, else he had tempted God. He did not do any thing that aimed to destroy Saul, but only to secure himself. He that might have done good service to his country as a judge or general, is here shut up in a cave, and thrown by as a vessel in which there was no pleasure. We must not think it strange, if sometimes shining lights be thus eclipsed and hid under a bushel. Perhaps the apostle refers to this instance of David, among others, when he speaks of some of the Old-Testament worthies that wandered in deserts, in dens and caves of the earth, Heb. 11. 38. It was at this time that David penned the 142d psalm, which is entitled, A prayer when he was in the cave; and there he complains that no man would know him, and that refuge failed him, but hopes that shortly the righteous should compass him about.

2. Thither his relations flocked to him, his brethren and all his father's house, to be protected by him, to give assistance to him, and to take their lot with him. A brother is born for adversity. Now Joab and Abishai, and the rest of his relations, came to him, to suffer and venture with him, in hopes shortly to be advanced with him; and they were so. The first three of his worthies were those that first owned him when he was in the cave, 1 Chron. 11. 15, &c.

3. Here he began to raise forces in his own defence, v. 2. He found, by the late experiments he had made, that he could not save himself by flight, and therefore was necessitated to do it by force; wherein he never acted offensively, never offered any violence to his prince, nor gave any disturbance to the peace of the kingdom, but only used his forces as a guard to his own person. But, whatever defence his soldiers were to him, they did him no great credit, for the regiment he had was made up not of great men, or rich men, or stout men, nor good men, but men in distress, in debt, and discontented, men of broken fortunes and restless spirits; that were put to their shifts, and knew not well what to do with themselves. When David had fixed his head-quarters in the cave of Adullam, they came and enlisted themselves under him to the number of about four hundred. Set what weak instruments God sometimes makes use of, by which to bring about his own purposes. The Son of David is ready to receive distressed souls, that will appoint him their Captain, and be commanded by him.

4. He took care to settle his parents in a place of safety; no such place could he find, in all the land of Israel, while Saul was so bitterly enraged against him, and all that belonged to him, for his sake; he therefore goes with them to the king of Moab, and puts them under his protection, v. 3, 4. Observe here, (1.) With what a tender concern he provided for his aged parents. It was not fit they should be exposed either to the frights or to the fatigues which he must expect during his struggle with Saul, (their age would by no means bear it,) therefore the first thing he does, is, to find them a quiet habitation, whatever became of himself. Let children learn from hence to shew piety at home, and to require their parents, (1 Tim. 5. 4.) in every thing consulting their ease and satisfaction; though ever so highly preferred, and ever so much employed, let them not forget their aged parents. (2.) With what an humble faith he expects the issue of his present distress, Till I know what God will do for me. He expresses his hopes very modestly, as one that had entirely cast himself upon God and committed his way to him, expecting a good issue, not from his own arts, or arms, or merits, but from what the wisdom, power, and goodness, of God would do for him. Now David's father and mother forsook him, but God did not, Ps. 27. 10.

5. He had the advice and assistance of the prophet Gad, who, probably, was one of the sons of the prophets that were brought up under Samuel, and was by him recommended to David for his chaplain or spiritual guide; being a prophet, he would pray for him, and instruct him in the mind of God; and David, though he was himself a prophet, was glad of his assistance. He advised him to go into the land of Judah, (v. 5.) as one that was confident of his own innocency, and was well assured of the divine protection, and was desirous, even in his present hard circumstances, to do some service to his tribe and country. Let him not be ashamed to own his own cause, nor decline the succours that would be offered him. Animated by this word, there he determined to appear publicly. Thus are the steps of a good man ordered by the Lord.

6. When Saul heard that David was discovered, and the men that were with him; (now Saul abode in Gibeah under a tree in Ramah, having his spear in his hand, and all his servants were standing about him;) 7. Then Saul said unto his servants that stood about him, Hear now, ye Benjamites; will the son of Jesse give every one of you fields and vineyards, and make you all captains of thousands and captains of hundreds; 8. That all of you have conspired against me, and there is none that sheweth me that my son hath made a league with the son of Jesse, and there is none of you that is sorry for me, or sheweth unto me that my son hath stirred up my servant against me, to lie in wait, as at this day? 9. Then answered Doeg the Edomite, which was set over the servants of Saul, and said, I saw the son of Jesse coming to Nob, to Ahimelech the son of Ahitub. 10. And he inquired of the LORD for him, and gave him victuals, and gave him the sword of Goliath the Philistine. 11. Then the king sent to call Ahimelech the priest, the son of Ahitub, and all his father's house, the priests that were in Nob: and they came all of them to the king. 12. And Saul said, Hear now, thou son of Ahitub. And he answered, Here I am, my lord. 13. And Saul said unto him, Why have ye conspired against me, thou and the son of Jesse, in that thou hast given him bread, and a sword, and hast inquired of God for him, that he should rise against me, to lie in wait, as at this day? 14. Then Ahimelech answered the king, and said, And who is so faithful among all thy servants as David, which is the king's son-in-law, and goeth at thy bidding, and is honourable in thine house? 15. Did I then begin to inquire of God for him? be it far from me: let not the king impute any thing unto his servant, nor to all the house of my father: for thy servant knew nothing of all this, less or more. 16. And the king said, Thou shalt surely die, Ahimelech, thou, and all thy father's house. 17. And the king said unto the footmen that stood about him, Turn, and slay the priests of the LORD; because their hand also is with David, and because they knew when he fled, and did not shew it to me. But the servants of the king would not put forth their hand to fall upon the priests of the LORD. 18. And the king said to Doeg, Turn thou, and fall upon the priests. And Doeg the Edomite turned, and he fell upon the priests, and slew on that day fourscore and five persons that did wear a linen ephod. 19. And Nob, the city of the priests, smote he with the edge of the sword, both men and women, children and sucklings, and oxen, and asses, and sheep, with the edge of the sword.

We have seen the progress of David's troubles; now here we have the progress of Saul's wickedness. He seems to have laid aside the thoughts of all other business, and to have devoted himself wholly to the pursuit of David. He heard, at length, by the common fame of the country, that David was discovered, that is, that he appeared publicly, and enlisted men in his service; and hereupon he called all his servants about him, and sat down under a tree, or grove, in the high place at Gibeah, with his spear in his hand for a sceptre; intimating the force by which he designed to rule, and the present temper of his spirit, or its distemper rather, which was to kill all that stood in his way.

In this bloody court of inquisition,

I. Saul seeks for information against David and Jonathan, v. 7, 8. Two things he was willing to suspect, and desirous to see proved, that he might wreak his malice upon two of the best and most excellent men he had about him. 1. That his servant David did lie in wait for him, and seek his life, which was utterly false. He really sought David's life, and therefore pretended that David sought his life, though he could not charge him with any overt-act that gave the least umbrage or suspicion. 2. That his son Jonathan stirred him up to do so, and was confederate with him in compassing and imagining the death of the king. This also was notoriously false. A league of friendship there was between David and Jonathan, but no conspiracy in any evil thing; none of the articles of their covenant carried any mischief to Saul. If Jonathan had agreed, after the death of Saul, to resign to David, in compliance with the revealed will of God, what harm would that do to Saul? Yet thus the best friends to their prince and country have often been odiously represented as enemies to both; even Christ himself was so. He takes it for granted that Jonathan and David were in a plot against him, his crown, and dignity, and is displeased with his servants that they do not give him information of it, supposing that they could not but know it; whereas really there was no such thing. See the nature of a jealous malice, and its pitiful arts to extort discoveries of things that are not. He looks upon all about him as his enemies, because they do not just say as he says; and tells them, (1.) That they were very unwise, and acted against the interest both of their tribe, (for they were Benjamites, and David, if he were advanced, would bring the honour into Judah which was now in Benjamin,) and of their families; for David would never be able to give them such rewards as he had for them, of fields and vineyards, and such preferment, to be colonels and captains. (2.) That they were unfaithful; You have conspired against me. What a continual agitation and torment are they in that give way to a spirit of jealousy! If a ruler hearken to lies, all his servants are wicked; (Prov. 29. 12.) that is, they seem to be so in his eyes. (3.) That they were very unkind. He thought to work upon their good nature with that word, There is none of you that is so much as sorry for me, or solicitous for me, as some read it. By these reasonings he stirred them up to act vigorously, as the instruments of his malice, that they might take away his suspicions of them.

II. Though he could not learn any thing from his servants against David or Jonathan, yet he got information from Doeg against Ahimelech the priest.

1. An indictment is brought against Ahimelech by Doeg, and he himself is evidence against him, v. 9, 10. Perhaps Doeg, as bad as he was, would not have given this information, if Saul had not extorted it, for had he been very forward to it, he would have done it sooner: but now he thinks they must be all deemed traitors, if none of them be accusers, and therefore tells Saul what kindness Ahimelech had shewed to David, which he himself happened to be an eye-witness of. He had inquired of God for him, (which the priest used not to do but for public persons and about public affairs,) and he had furnished him with bread and a sword. All this was true: but it was not the whole truth; he ought to have told Saul further, that David had made Ahimelech believe he was then going upon the king's business; so that what service he did to David, however it proved, was designed in honour to Saul, and this would have cleared Ahimelech, whom Saul had in his power, and would have thrown all the blame upon David, who was out of his reach.

2. Ahimelech is seized, or summoned rather to appear before the king, and upon this indictment he is arraigned. The king sent for him and all the priests who then attended the sanctuary, whom he supposed to be aiding and abetting; and they, not being conscious of any guilt, and therefore not apprehensive of any danger, came all of them to the king, (v. 11.) and none of them attempted to make an escape, or to flee to David for shelter, as they would have done, now that he had set up his standard, if they had been as much in his interests as Saul suspected they were. Saul arraigns him himself with the utmost disdain and indignation; (v. 12.) Hear now, thou son of Ahitub; not so much as calling him by his name, much less giving him his title of distinction. By this it appears that he had cast off the fear of God, that he shewed no respect at all to his priests, but took a pleasure in affronting them and insulting over them. Ahimelech holds up his hand at the bar in those words, "Here I am, my lord, ready to hear my charge, knowing I have done no wrong." He does not demur to the jurisdiction of Saul's court, nor insist upon an exemption as a priest, no, not though he were a high priest, to which office, that of the judge, or chief magistrate, had not long since been annexed; but, Saul having now the sovereignty vested in him in things pertaining to the king, even the high priest lowers himself to a level with common Israelites. Let every soul be subject (even clergymen) to the higher powers.

2. His indictment is read to him, v. 13. That he, as a false traitor, had joined himself with the son of Jesse in a plot to depose and murder the king. "His design" (says Saul) "was to rise up against me, and thou didst assist him with victuals and arms." See what had constructions the most innocent actions are liable to; how unsafe they are that live under a tyrannical government, and what reason we have to be thankful for the happy constitution and administration of the government we are under.

4. To this indictment he pleads, Not guilty; (v. 14, 15.) he owns the fact, but denies that he did it traitorously or maliciously, or with any design against the king. He pleads that he was so far from knowing of any quarrel between Saul and David, that he really took David to have been then as much in favour at court as ever he had been. Observe, He does not plead that David had told him an untruth, and with that had imposed upon him, though really it was so, because he would not proclaim the weakness of so good a man, no not for his own vindication, especially to Saul, who sought all occasions against him; but he insists upon the settled reputation David had, as the most faithful of all the servants of Saul; the honour the king had put upon him in marrying his daughter to him, the use the king had often made of him, and the trust he had reposed in him; he goes at thy bidding, and is honourable in thy house, and therefore any one would think it a meritorious piece of service to the crown to shew him respect, so far from apprehending it to be a crime. He pleads that he had been wont to inquire of God for him, when he was sent by Saul upon any expedition, and did it now as innocently as ever he had done it. He protests his abhorrence of the thought of being in a plot against the king; "Be it far from me, I mind my own business, and meddle not with state-matters." He begs the king's favour, Let him not impute any crime to us; and concludes with a declaration of his innocency, Thy servant knew nothing of all this. Could any man plead with more evidences of sincerity? Had he been tried by a jury of honest Israelites, he had certainly been acquitted, for who can find any fault in him? But,

5. Saul himself gives judgment against him; (v. 16.) Thou shalt surely die, Ahimelech, as a rebel, thou and all thy father's house. What could be more unjust? I saw under the sun, the place of judgment, that wickedness was there, Eccl. 3. 16. (1.) It was unjust that Saul should himself, himself alone, give judgment in his own cause, without any appeal either to judge or prophet, to his privy-council, or to a council of war. (2.) That so fair a plea should be over-ruled and rejected without any reason given, or any attempt to disprove the allegations of it, but purely with a high hand. (3.) That sentence should be passed so hastily and with so much precipitation; the judge taking no time himself to consider of it, nor allowing the prisoner any time to move in arrest of judgment. (4.) That the sentence should be passed, not only on Ahimelech himself, who was the only person accused by Doeg, but on all his father's house, against whom nothing was alleged: must the children be put to death for the fathers? (5.) That the sentence was pronounced in passion, not for the support of justice, but for the gratification of his brutish rage.

6. He issues out a warrant (a verbal warrant only) for the immediate execution of his bloody sentence.

(1.) He ordered his footmen to be the executioners of this sentence, but they refused, v. 17. Hereby he intended to put a further disgrace upon the priests; they may not die by the hands of his men of war, (as 1 Kings, 2. 29.) or his usual ministers of justice, but his footmen must triumph over them, and wash their hands in their blood. [1.] Never was the command of a prince more barbarously given; Turn, and slay the priests of the Lord. This is spoken with such an air of impiety, as can scarce be paralleled. Had he seemed to forget their sacred office and relation to God, and taken no notice of that, it had intimated some regret that men of that character should fall under his displeasure; but to call them the priests of the Lord then, when he ordered his footmen to cut their throats, looked as if, upon that very account, he hated them. God having rejected him, and ordered another to be anointed in his room, he seems well pleased with this opportunity of being avenged on the priests of the Lord, since God himself was out of his reach. What wickedness will not the evil spirit hurry men to, when he gets the dominion! He alleges, in his order, that which was utterly false, and approved to him, that they knew when David fled; whereas they knew nothing of the matter. [2.] Never was the command of a prince more honourably disobeyed. The footmen had more sense and grace than their master. Though they might expect to be turned out of their places, if not punished and put to death for their refusal, yet, come on them what would, they would not offer to fall on the priests of the Lord, such a reverence had they for their office, and such a conviction of their innocence.

(2.) He ordered Doeg (the accuser) to be the executioner, and he did it. One would have thought that the footmen's refusal should have awakened Saul's conscience, and he should not have insisted upon the doing of a thing so barbarous as that his footmen started at the thought of it. But his mind was blinded and his heart hardened, and if they will not do it, the hands of the witness shall be upon them, Deut. 17. 7. The most bloody tyrants have found out instruments of their cruelty as barbarous as themselves; Doeg is no sooner commanded to fall upon the priests, than he does it willingly enough, and, meeting with no resistance, slays with his own hand (for aught that appears) on that same day eighty-five priests that were of the age of ministration, between twenty and fifty, for they wore a linen ephod, (v. 18.) and perhaps appeared at this time before Saul in their habits, and were slain in them. This (one would think) was enough to satiate the most blood-thirsty; but the horseleech of persecution still cries, "Give, give." Doeg, by Saul's order, no doubt, having murdered the priests, went to their city Nob, and put all to the sword there, (v. 19.) men, women, and children, and the cattle too. Barbarous cruelty, and such as one cannot think of without horror! Strange, that ever it should enter into the heart of man to be so impious, so inhuman! We may see in this, [1.] The desperate wickedness of Saul when the Spirit of the Lord was departed from him. Nothing so vile, but they may be hurried to it, who have provoked God to give them up to their hearts' lusts. He that was so compassionate as to spare Agag and the cattle of the Amalekites, in disobedience to the command of God, could now, with unrelenting bowels, see the priests of the Lord murdered, and nothing spared of all that belonged to them. For that sin, God left him to this. [2.] The accomplishment of the threatenings long since pronounced against the house of Eli; for Ahimelech and his family were descendants from him. Though Saul was unrighteous in doing this, yet God was righteous in permitting it: now God performed against Eli that, at which the ears of them that heard it must needs tingle, as he had told him that he would judge his house for ever, ch. 3. 11. 13. No word of God shall fall to the ground. [3.] This may be considered as a great judgment upon Israel, and the just punishment of their desiring a king before the time God intended them one. How deplorable was the state of religion at this time in Israel! Though the ark had long been in obscurity, yet it was some comfort to them that they had the altar, and priests to serve at it; but now to see their priests weltering in their own blood, and the heirs of the priesthood too, and the city of the priests made a desolation, so that the altar of God must needs be neglected for want of attendants, and this by the unjust and cruel order of their own king, to satisfy his brutish rage—this could not but go to the heart of all pious Israelites, and make them wish, a thousand times, they had been satisfied with the government of Samuel and his sons. The worst enemies of their nation could not have done them a greater mischief.

20. And one of the sons of Ahimelech the son of Ahitub, named Abiathar, escaped, and fled after David. 21. And Abiathar shewed David that Saul had slain the Lord's priests. 22. And David said unto Abiathar, I knew it that day, when Doeg the Edomite was there, that he would surely tell Saul: I have occasioned the death of all the persons of thy father's house. 23. Abide thou with me, fear not: for he that seeketh my life seeketh thy life: but with me thou shalt be in safeguard.

Here is,

1. The escape of Abiathar the son of Ahimelech out of the desolations of the priests' city. Probably, when his father went to appear, upon Saul's summons, he was left at home to attend the altar, by which means he escaped the first execution, and, before Doeg and his bloodhounds came to Nob, he had intelligence of the danger, and had time to shift for his own safety. And whither should he go but to David? v. 20. They that suffer for the Son of David, let them commit the keeping of their souls to him, 1 Pet. 4. 19.

2. David's resentment of the melancholy tidings he brought. He gave David an account of the bloody work Saul had made among the priests of the Lord, (v. 21.) as the disciples of John, when their master was beheaded, went and told Jesus, Matth. 14. 12. And David greatly lamented the calamity itself, but especially his being accessory to it; I have occasioned the death of all the persons of thy father's house, v. 22. Note, It is a great trouble to a good man to find himself any way an occasion of the calamities of the church and ministry. David knew Doeg's character so well, that he feared he would do some such mischief as this, when he saw him at the sanctuary. I knew he would tell Saul. He calls him Doeg the Edomite, because he retained the heart of an Edomite, though, by embracing the profession of the Jewish religion, he had put on the mask of an Israelite.

3. The protection he granted to Abiathar. He perceived him to be terrified, as he had reason to be, and therefore bids him not fear, he would be as careful for him as for himself; With me thou shalt be in safeguard, v. 23. David, having now time to recollect himself, speaks with assurance of his own safety, and promises that Abiathar should have the full benefit of his protection. It is promised to the Son of David, that God will hide him in the shadow of his hand, (Isa. 49. 2.) and with him, all that are his, may be sure that they shall be in safeguard, Ps. 91. 1. David had now not only a prophet, but a priest, a high priest, with him, to whom he was a blessing, and they to him, and both a happy men of his success. Yet it appears (by ch. 28. 6.) that Saul had a high priest too, for he had a Urim to consult: it is supposed he preferred Ahitub the father of Zadok, of the family of Eleazar; (1 Chron. 6. 8.) for even those that hate the power of godliness, yet will not be without the form. It must not be forgotten here, that David at this time penned the 52d psalm, as appears by the title of that psalm, wherein he represents Doeg not only as malicious and spiteful, but as false and deceitful: because, though what he said was, for the substance of it, true, yet he put false colours upon it, with a design to do mischief: yet even then, when the priesthood was become as a withered branch, he looks upon himself as a green olive-tree in the house of God, v. 8. In this hurry and distraction that David was continually in, yet he found both time and a heart for communion with God, and found comfort in it.

CHAP. XXIII.

Saul, having made himself drunk with the blood of the priests of the Lord, is here, in this chapter, seeking David's life, who appears here doing good, and suffering ill, at the same time. Here is, I. The good service he did to his king and country, in rescuing the city of Keilah out of the hands of the Philistines, v. 1. .6. II. The danger he was thereby brought into from the malice of the prince he served, and the treachery of the city he saved; and his deliverance, by divine direction, from that danger, v. 7. .13. III. David in a wood, and his friend Jonathan visiting him there, and encouraging him, v. 14. .18. IV. The information which the Ziphites brought to Saul of David's haunts, and the expedition Saul made in pursuit of him, v. 19. .25. V. The narrow escape David had of falling into his hands, v. 26. .29. Many are the troubles of the righteous, but the Lord delivereth them out of them all.

1. THEN they told David, saying, Behold, the Philistines fight against Keilah, and they rob the threshing-floors. 2. Therefore David inquired of the LORD, saying, Shall I go and smite these Philistines? And the LORD said unto David, Go and smite the Philistines, and save Keilah. 3. And David's men said unto him, Behold, we be afraid here in Judah: how much more then if we come to Keilah against the armies of the Philistines? 4. Then David inquired of the LORD yet again. And the LORD answered him and said, Arise, go down to Keilah; for I will deliver the Philistines into thine hand. 5. So David and his men went to Keilah, and fought with the Philistines, and brought away their cattle, and smote them with a great slaughter. So David saved the inhabitants of Keilah. 6. And it came to pass, when Abiathar the son of Ahimelech fled to David to Keilah, that he came down with an ephod in his hand.

Now we find why the prophet Gad (by divine direction, no doubt) ordered David to go into the land of Judah; (ch. 22. 5) it was, that, since Saul neglected the public safety, he might take care of it, notwithstanding the ill treatment that was given him: for he must render good for evil, and therein be a type of him who not only ventured his life, but laid down his life, for them that were his enemies.

1. Tidings are brought to David as to the patron and protector of his country's liberties, that the Philistines had made a descent upon the city of Keilah, and plundered the country thereabouts, v. 1. Probably, it was the departure both of God and David from Saul, that encouraged the Philistines to make this incursion. When princes begin to persecute God's people and ministers, let them expect no other than vexation on all sides. The way for any country to be quiet, is, to let God's church be quiet in it: if Saul fight against David, the Philistines shall fight against his country.

2. David is forward enough to come in for their relief, but is willing to inquire of the Lord concerning it. Here is an instance, (1.) Of David's generosity and public-spiritedness. Though his head and hands were full of his own business, and he had enough to do, with the little force he had, to secure himself, yet he was concerned for the safety of his country, and could not sit still to see that ravaged: nay, though Saul, whose business it was to guard the borders of his land, hated him, and sought his life, yet he was willing to the utmost of his power, to serve him and his interests against the common enemy, and bravely abhorred the thought of sacrificing the common welfare to his private revenge. Those are unlike to David, who sullenly decline to do good, because they have not been so well considered as they deserved for the services they have done. (2.) Of David's piety and regard to God. He inquired of the Lord by the prophet Gad; for it should seem, by v. 6. that Abiathar came not to him with the ephod till he was in Keilah. His inquiry is, Shall I go and smite these Philistines? He inquires both concerning the duty, whether he might lawfully take Saul's work out of his hand, and act without a commission from him; and concerning the event, whether he might safely venture against such a force as the Philistines had, with such a handful of men at his feet, and such a dangerous enemy as Saul was, at his back. It is our duty, and will be our ease and comfort, whatever happens, to acknowledge God in all our ways, and to seek direction from him.

3. God appointed him, once and again, to go against the Philistines, and promised him success; Go, and smite the Philistines, v. 2. His men opposed it, v. 3. No sooner did he begin to have soldiers of his own, than he found it hard enough to manage them. They objected, that they had enemies enough among their own countrymen, they needed not to make the Philistines their enemies. Their hearts failed them, when they only apprehended themselves in danger from Saul's band of pursuers, much more when they came to engage the Philistine armies. To satisfy them, therefore, he inquired of the Lord again, and now received not only a full commission, which would warrant him to fight, though he had no orders from Saul, (Arise, go down to Keilah,) but also a full assurance of victory; I will deliver the Philistines into thine hand, v. 4. This was enough to animate the greatest coward he had in his regiment.

4. He went, accordingly, against the Philistines, routed them, and rescued Keilah; (v. 5.) and, it should seem, he made a sally into the country of the Philistines, for he carried off their cattle by way of reprisal for the wrong they did to the men of Keilah, in robbing their threshing-floors. Here notice is taken, (v. 6.) that it was while David remained in Keilah, after he had cleared it of the Philistines, that Abiathar came to him with the ephod in his hand, that is, the high priest's ephod, in which the Urim and Thummim were. It was a great comfort to David, in his banishment, that when he could not go to the house of God, he had some of the choicest treasures of that house brought to him, the high priest, and his breast-plate of judgment.

7. And it was told Saul that David was come to Keilah. And Saul said, God hath delivered him into mine hand; for he is shut in, by entering into a town that hath gates and bars. 8. And Saul called all the people together to war, to go down to Keilah, to besiege David and his men. 9. And David knew that Saul secretly practised mischief against him; and he said to Abiathar the priest, Bring hither the ephod. 10. Then said David, O LORD God of Israel, thy servant hath certainly heard that Saul seeketh to come to Keilah, to destroy the city for my sake. 11. Will the men of Keilah deliver me up into his hand? will Saul come down, as thy servant hath heard? O LORD God of Israel, I beseech thee, tell thy servant. And the LORD said, He will come down. 12. Then said David, Will the men of Keilah deliver me and my men into the hand of Saul? And the LORD said, They will deliver thee up. 13. Then David and his men, which were about six hundred, arose and departed out of Keilah, and went whithersoever they could go. And it was told Saul that David was escaped from Keilah; and he forbore to go forth.

Here is,

I. Saul contriving within himself the destruction of David, v. 7, 8. He heard that he was come to Keilah; and did he not hear what brought him thither? Was it not told him that he had bravely relieved Keilah, and delivered it out of the hands of the Philistines? This, one would think, should have put Saul upon considering what honour and dignity should be done to David for this. But, instead of that, he catches at it as an opportunity of doing him a mischief. An ungrateful wretch he was, and for ever unworthy to have any service or kindness done him. Well might David complain of his enemies, that they rewarded him evil for good, and that for his love they were his adversaries, Ps. 35. 12.—100. 4. Christ was used thus basely, John, 10. 32. Now observe, 1. How Saul abused the God of Israel, in making his providence a patronise and give countenance to his malicious designs, and from thence promising himself success in them. God hath delivered him into my hand; as if he, who was rejected of God, were, in this instance, owned and favoured by him, and David infatuated. He vainly triumphs before the victory, forgetting how often he had had fairer advantages against David than he had now, and yet missed his aim. He impiously connects God with his cause, because he thought he had gained one point. Therefore David prays, (Ps. 140. 8.) Grant not, O Lord, the desires of the wicked; further not his wicked device, lest they exalt themselves. We must not think that one smiling providence either justifies an unrighteous cause, or secures its success. 2. How Saul abused the Israel of God, in making them the servants of his malice against David. He called all the people together to war, and they must with all speed march to Keilah, pretending to oppose the Philistines, but intending to besiege David and his men; concealing that design, for it is said, (v. 9.) he secretly practised mischief against him. Miserable is that people, whose prince is a tyrant; for while some are sufferers by his tyranny, other (which is worse) are made servants to it, and instruments of it.

II. David consulting with God concerning his own preservation. He knew, by the information brought him, that Saul was plotting his ruin, (v. 9.) and therefore applies himself to his great Protector for direction. No sooner is the ephod brought him, than he makes use of it, Bring hither the ephod. We have the scriptures, those lively oracles, in our hands, let us take advice from them in doubtful cases; "Bring hither the Bible." David's address to God, upon this occasion, is, 1. Very solemn and reverent. Twice he calls God, the Lord God of Israel, and thrice calls himself his servant, v. 10, 11. Those that address God must know their distance, and who they are speaking to. 2. Very particular and express. His representation of the case is so, v. 10. "Thy servant has certainly heard, on good authority," (for he would not call for the ephod upon every idle rumour,) "that Saul has a design upon Keilah; he does not say, 'to destroy me,' but, 'to destroy the city' (as he had lately done the city of Nob) 'for my sake.' He seems more solicitous for their safety than for his own, and will expose himself any where, rather than they shall be brought into trouble by his being among them. Generous souls are thus minded. His queries upon the case are likewise very particular. God allows us to be so in our addresses to him; 'Lord, direct me in this matter, about which I am now at a loss.' He does indeed invert the due order of his queries, but God in his answer puts him into method. That question should have been put first, and was first answered, 'Will Saul come down, as thy servant has heard?' 'Yea,' says the oracle, 'he will come down; he has resolved it, is preparing for it, and will do it, unless he hear that thou hast quitted the town.' 'Well, but if he do come down, will the men of Keilah stand by me in holding the city against him, or will they open him the gates, and deliver me into his hand?' If he had asked the men (that is, the magistrates or elders) of Keilah themselves, what they would do in that case, they could not have told him, not knowing their own minds, nor what they should do when it came to the trial, much less which way the superior vote of their council would carry it; or they might have told him they would protect him, and yet afterward have betrayed him; but God could tell them infallibly: 'When Saul besieges their city, and demands of them that they surrender thee into his hands, how fond soever they now seem of thee, as their saviour, they will deliver thee up, rather than stand the shock of Saul's fury.' Note, (1.) God knows all men better than they know themselves, knows their strength, what is in them, and what they will do, if they come into such and such circumstances. (2.) He therefore knows not only what will be, but what would be, if it were not prevented; and therefore knows how to deliver the godly out of temptation, and how to render to every man according to his works.

David, having thus far notice given him of his danger, quitted Keilah, v. 13. His followers were now increased in number to six hundred; with these he went out, not knowing whither he went, but resolving to follow Providence, and put himself under his protection. This broke Saul's measures; he thought God had delivered him into his hand, but it proved that God delivered him out of his hand, as a bird out of the snare of the fowler. When Saul heard that David was escaped from Keilah, he forbore to go forth with the body of the army, as he intended, (v. 8.) and resolved to take only his own guards, and go in quest of him. Thus does God baffle the designs of his people's enemies, and turn their counsels headlong.

14. And David abode in the wilderness in strong holds, and remained in a mountain in the wilderness of Ziph. And Saul sought him every day, but God delivered him not into his hand.

15. And David saw that Saul was come out to seek his life: and David was in the wilderness of Ziph in a wood. 16. And Jonathan Saul's son arose, and went to David into the wood, and strengthened his hand in God. 17. And he said unto him, Fear not: for the hand of Saul my father shall not find thee; and thou shalt be king over Israel, and I shall be next unto thee; and that also Saul my father knoweth. 18. And they two made a covenant before the LORD: and David abode in the wood, and Jonathan went to his house.

Here is,

I. David absconding. He abode in a wilderness, in a mountain, (v. 14.) in a wood, v. 15. We must here, 1. Commend his eminent virtues, his humility, modesty, fidelity to his prince, and patient attendance on the providence of his God, that he did not draw up his forces against Saul, fight him in the field, or surprise him by some stratagem or other, and so avenge his own quarrel and that of the Lord's priests upon him, and put an end to his own troubles, and the calamities of the country under his tyrannical government. No; he makes no such attempt; he keeps God's way, waits God's time, and is content to secure himself in woods and wildernesses, though with some it might seem a reproach to that courage for which he had been famous. But, 2. We must also lament his hard fate, that an innocent man should be thus terrified, and put in fear of his life; that a man of honour should be thus disgraced, a man of merit thus recompensed for his services, and a man that delighted in the service both of God and his country, should be debarred from both, and wrapt up in obscurity. What shall we say to this? Let it make us think the worse of this world, which often gives such bad treatment to its best men: let it reconcile even great and active men to privacy and restraint, if Providence make that their lot, for it was David's: and let it make us long for that kingdom, where goodness shall for ever be in glory, and holiness in honour, and the righteous shall shine as the sun.

II. Saul hunting him as his implacable enemy. He sought him every day, so restless was his malice, v. 14. He sought his life no less, so cruel was his malice, v. 15. As it had been from the beginning, it was now, and will be. He that is born after the flesh, persecuteth him that is born after the spirit, Gal. 4. 29.

III. God defending him as his powerful Protector. God delivered him not into his hand, as Saul hoped; (v. 7.) and unless God had delivered him into his hand, he could not prevail against him, John, 19. 11.

IV. Jonathan comforting him, as his faithful friend. True friends will find out means to get together; David, it is likely, appointed time and place for this interview, and Jonathan observed it, though he exposed himself by it to his father's displeasure, and, had it been discovered, it might have cost him his life. True friendship will not shrink from danger, but can easily venture; will not shrink from condescension, but can easily stoop, and exchange a palace for a wood, to serve a friend. The very sight of Jonathan was reviving to David; but, beside that, he said that to him which was very encouraging.

1. As a pious friend, he directed him to God, the Foundation of his confidence, and the Fountain of his comfort. He strengthened his hand in God. David, though a strong believer, needed the help of his friends, for the perfecting of what was lacking in his faith; and herein Jonathan was helpful to him, by reminding him of the promise of God, the holy oil wherewith he was anointed, the presence of God with him hitherto, and the many experiences he had had of God's goodness to him. Thus he strengthened his hands for action, by encouraging his heart, not in the creature, but in God. Jonathan was not in a capacity of doing any thing to strengthen him, but he assured him God would.

2. As a self-denying friend, he takes a pleasure in the prospect of David's advancement to that honour, which was his own birth-right; (v. 17.) "Thou shalt live to be king, and I shall think it preferment enough to be next thee, near thee, though under thee, and will never pretend to be a rival with thee." This resignation, which Jonathan made to David of his title, would be a great satisfaction to him, and make his way much the more clear. This, he tells him, Saul knew very well; Jonathan having sometimes heard him say as much. Whence it appears, what a wicked man Saul was, to persecute one whom God favoured; and what a foolish man he was, in thinking to prevent that which God had determined, and which would certainly come to pass. How could he disannul what God had purposed?

3. As a constant friend, he renewed his league of friendship with him; they two made a covenant now, this third time, before the Lord, calling him to witness to it, v. 18. True love takes delight in repeating its engagements, giving and receiving fresh assurances of the firmness of their friendship. Our covenant with God should be often renewed, and therein our communion with him kept up. David and Jonathan now parted, and never came together again, that we find, in this world; for Jonathan said what he wished, not what he had ground to expect, when he promised himself that he should be next David in his kingdom.

19. Then came up the Ziphites to Saul to Gibeah, saying, Doth not David hide himself with us in strong holds in the wood, in the hill of Hachilah, which is on the south of Jeshimon? 20. Now, therefore, O king, come down according to all the desire of thy soul to come down; and our part shall be to deliver him into the king's hand. 21. And Saul said, Blessed be ye of the LORD; for ye have compassion on me. 22. Go, I pray you, prepare yet, and know and see his place where his haunt is, and who hath seen him there: for it is told me that he dealeth very subtilly. 23. See therefore, and take knowledge of all the lurking places where he hideth himself, and come ye again to me with the certainty, and I will go with you: and it shall come to pass, if he be in the land, that I will search him out throughout all the thousands of Judah. 24. And they arose, and went to Ziph before Saul: but David and his men were in the wilderness of Maon, in the plain on the south of Jeshimon. 25. Saul also and his men went to seek him. And they told David: wherefore he came down into a rock, and abode in the wilderness of Maon. And when Saul heard that, he pursued after David in the wilderness of Maon. 26. And Saul went on this side of the mountain, and David and his men on that side of the mountain: and David made haste to get away for fear of Saul; for Saul and his men compassed David and his men round about to take them. 27. But there came a messenger unto Saul, saying, Haste thee, and come; for the Philistines have invaded the land. 28. Wherefore Saul returned from pursuing after David, and went against the Philistines: therefore they called that place Sela-hammah-lekoth. 29. And David went up from thence, and dwelt in strong holds at En-gedi.

Here,

1. The Ziphites offer their service to Saul, to betray David to him, v. 19, 20. He was sheltering himself in the wilderness of Ziph, (v. 14, 15.) putting the more confidence in the people of that country, because they were of his own tribe. They had reason to think themselves happy that they had an opportunity of serving one who was the ornament of their tribe, and was likely to be much more so; who was so far from plundering the country, or giving it any disturbance with his troops, that he was ready to protect it, and do them all the good offices that there was occasion for. But, to ingratiate themselves with Saul, they went to him, and not only informed him very particularly where David quartered, (v. 19.) but invited him to come with his forces into their country in pursuit of him, and promised to deliver him into his hand, v. 20. Saul had not sent to examine or threaten them, but of their own accord, and even without asking a reward, (as Judas did, What will ye give me?) they proffer to betray David to him, who, they knew, thirsted after his blood.

2. Saul thankfully receives their information, and gladly lays hold on the opportunity of hunting David in their wilderness, in hopes to make a prey of him at length. He intimates to them how kindly he took it; (v. 21.) Blessed be ye of the Lord, (so near is God to his mouth, though far from his heart,) for ye have compassion on me. It seems he looked upon himself as a miserable man and an object of pity; his own envy and ill nature made him so, else he might have been easy, and have needed no man's compassion. He likewise insinuates the little concern that the generality of his people shewed for him: "You have compassion on me, which others have not." Saul gives them instructions to search more particularly for his haunts, (v. 22.) "For," says he, "I hear he deals very subtilly;" representing him as a man crafty to do mischief, whereas all his subtlety was to secure himself. It was strange that he did not go down with them immediately, but he hoped, by their means, to set his game with the more certainty, and thus Divine Providence gave David time to shift for himself. But the Ziphites had laid their spies upon all the places where he was likely to be discovered, and therefore Saul might come and seize him, if he was in the land, v. 23. Now he thought himself sure of his prey, and pleased himself with the thoughts of devouring it.

3. The imminent peril that David was now brought into. Upon intelligence that the Ziphites had betrayed him, he retired from the hill of Hachilah to the wilderness of Maon, (v. 24.) and at this time he penned the 54th psalm, as appears by the title, wherein he calls the Ziphites strangers, though they were Israelites, because they used him barbarously; but he puts himself under the divine protection, "Behold, God is my Helper, and then all shall be well." Saul, having got intelligence of him, pursued him closely, (v. 25.) till he came so near him, that there was but a mountain between them; (v. 26.) David and his men on one side of the mountain flying, and Saul and his men on the other side pursuing; David in fear, and Saul in hope. But this mountain was an emblem of the Divine Providence coming between David and the destroyer, like the pillar of cloud between the Israelites and the Egyptians; David was concealed by this mountain, and Saul founded by it. David now flees as a bird to his mountain, (Ps. 11. 1.) and finds God to him as the shadow of a great rock. Saul hoped, with his numerous forces, to inclose David, and compass him in and his men; but the ground did not prove convenient for his design, and so it failed. A new name was given to the place in remembrance of this, (v. 28.) Sela-hammah-lekoth, the rock of division, because it divided between Saul and David.

4. The deliverance of David out of this danger. Providence gave Saul a diversion, when he was just ready to lay hold on David; notice was brought him that the Philistines were invading the land, (v. 27.) probably, that part of the land where his own estate lay, which would be seized, or at least spoiled, by the invaders: for the little notice he took of Keilah's distress, and David's relief of it, in the beginning of this chapter, give us cause to suspect that he would not now have left pursuing David, and gone to oppose the Philistines, if some private interests of his own had not been at stake. However it was, he found himself under a necessity of going against the Philistines, (v. 28.) and by this means David was delivered when he was on the brink of destruction; Saul was disappointed of his prey, and God was glorified as his wonderful Protector. When the Philistines invaded the land, they were far from intending any kindness to David by it; yet the over-ruling providence of God, which orders all events, and the times of them, made it very serviceable to him. The wisdom of God is never at a loss for ways and means to preserve his people. As this Saul here was diverted, so another Saul was converted, just then when he was breathing out threatenings and slaughter against the saints of the Lord, Acts, 9. 1.

Lastly, David having thus escaped, took shelter in some natural fortresses, which he found in the wilderness of En-gedi, v. 29. And this, Dr. Lightfoot thinks, was the wilderness of Judah, in which David was when he penned the 63d psalm, which breathes as much pious and devout affection as almost any of his psalms; for in all places, and in all conditions, he still kept up his communion with God.

CHAP. XXIV.

We have hitherto had Saul seeking an opportunity to destroy David, and, to his shame, he could never find it. In this chapter, David had a fair opportunity to destroy Saul, and, to his honour, he did not make use of it; his sparing Saul's life, was as great an instance of God's grace in him, as the preserving of his own life was of God's providence over him. Observe, I. How maliciously Saul sought David's life, v. 1, 2. II. How generously David saved Saul's life, (when he had him at an advantage,) and only cut off the skirt of his robe, v. 3, 4. III. How pathetically he reasoned with Saul, upon this, to bring him to a better temper towards him, v. 9, 10, 11, 12. IV. The good impression this made upon Saul, for the present, v. 16, 17.

1. AND it came to pass, when Saul was returned from following the Philistines, that it was told him, saying, Behold, David is in the wilderness of En-gedi. 2. Then Saul took three thousand chosen men out of all Israel, and went to seek David and his men upon the rocks of the wild goats. 3. And he came to the sheep-cotes by the way, where was a cave; and Saul went in to cover his feet: and David and his men remained in the sides of the cave. 4. And the men of David said unto him, Behold the day of which the Lord said unto thee, Behold, I will deliver thine enemy into thine hand, that thou mayest do to him as it shall seem good unto thee. Then David arose, and cut off the skirt of Saul's robe privily. 5. And it came to pass afterward, that David's heart smote him, because he had cut off Saul's skirt. 6. And he said unto his men, The Lord forbid that I should do this thing unto my master, the LORD's anointed, to stretch forth mine hand against him, seeing he is the anointed of the LORD. 7. So David stayed his servants with these words, and suffered them not to rise against Saul. But Saul rose up out of the cave, and went on his way. 8. David also arose afterward, and went out of the cave, and cried after Saul, saying, My lord the king. And when Saul looked behind him, David stooped with his face to the earth, and bowed himself.

Here,

I. Saul renews his pursuit of David, v. 1, 2. No sooner is he come home safe from chasing the Philistines, in which it should seem he had good success, than he inquires after David, to do him a mischief, and resolves to have another thrust at him, as if he had been delivered to do all these abominations, Jer. 7. 10. By the frequent incursions of the Philistines, he might have seen how necessary it was to recall David from his banishment, and restore him to his place in the army again; but so far is he from that, that now, more than ever, he is exasperated against him; and, fearing that he is in the wilderness of En-gedi, he draws out three thousand choice men, and goes with them at his feet in pursuit of him, upon the rocks of the wild goats, where, one would think, David should not be envied an habitation, nor Saul be desirous to disturb him; for what harm could he fear from one who was no better accommodated? But it is not enough to Saul, that he is thus cooped up; he cannot be easy while he is alive.

II. Providence brings Saul alone into the same cave wherein David and his men had hid themselves, v. 3. In those countries there were very large caves in the sides of the rocks or mountains, partly natural, but, probably, much enlarged by art, for the sheltering of sheep from the heat of the sun; hence we read of places where the flocks did rest at noon, (Cant. 1. 7.) and this cave seems to be spoken of as one of the sheep-cotes. In the sides of this cave David and his men remained, perhaps not all his men, the whole 600, but only some few of his particular friends, the rest being disposed of in similar retirements. Saul, passing by, turned in himself alone, not in search of David, (for, supposing him to be an aspiring ambitious man, he thought to find him rather climbing with the wild goats upon the rocks, than retiring with the sheep into a cave,) but thither he turned aside to cover his feet, that is, to sleep a while, it being a cool and quiet place, and very refreshing in the heat of the day; probably, he ordered his attendants to march before, reserving only a very few to wait for him at the mouth of the cave.

III. David's servants stir him up to kill Saul, now that he had so fair an opportunity to do it, v. 4. They remind him that this was the day which he had long looked for, and of which God had spoken to him in general, when he was anointed to the kingdom, which should put a period to his troubles, and open the passage to his advancement. Saul now lay at his mercy, and it was easy to imagine how little mercy he should find with Saul, and therefore what little reason he had to shew mercy to him. "By all means," say his servants, "give him the fatal blow now." See how apt we are to misunderstand, 1. The promises of God. God had assured David he would deliver him from Saul, and his men interpret that as a warrant to destroy Saul. 2. The providences of God; because it was now in his power to kill him, they concluded he might lawfully do it.

IV. David cut off the skirt of his robe, but soon repented that he had done that: his heart smote him for it, (v. 5.) though it did Saul no real hurt, and served David for a proof that it was in his power to have killed him; (v. 11.) yet, because it was an affront to Saul's royal dignity, he wished he had not done it. Note, It is a good thing to have a heart within us, smiting us for sins that seem little; it is a sign that conscience is awake and tender, and will be the means of preventing greater sins.

V. He reasons strongly, both with himself and with his servants, against doing Saul any hurt. 1. He reasons with himself; (v. 6.) The Lord forbid that I should do this thing. Note, Sin is a thing which it becomes us to startle at, and to resist the temptations to, not only with resolution, but with a holy indignation. He considers Saul now, not as his enemy, and the only person that stood in the way of his preferment, for then he would be induced to hearken to the temptation, but as God's anointed, that is, the person whom God had appointed to reign as long as he lived, and who, as such, was under the particular protection of the divine law; and as his master, to whom he was obliged to be faithful. Let servants and subjects learn hence to be dutiful and loyal, whatever hardships are put upon them, 1 Pet. 2. 18. 2. He reasons with his servants. He suffered them not to rise against Saul, v. 7. He would not only not do this bad thing himself, but he would not suffer those about him to do it. Thus did he render good for evil to him from whom he had received evil for good; and was herein both a type of Christ, who saved his persecutors, and an example to all Christians, not to be overcome of evil, but to overcome evil with good.

VI. He follows Saul out of the cave, and though he would not take the opportunity to slay him, yet he wisely took the opportunity, if possible, to slay his enmity, by convincing him that he was not such a man as he took him for. 1. Even in shewing his head, he testified that he had an honourable opinion of Saul. He had too much reason to believe, that, let him say what he would, Saul would immediately be the death of him, as soon as he saw him, and yet he bravely lays aside that jealousy, and thinks Saul so much a man of sense as to hear his reasoning, when he had so much to say in his own vindication, and such fresh and sensible proofs to give of his own integrity. 2. His behaviour was very respectful, he stooped with his face to the earth, and bowed himself, giving honour to whom honour was due, and teaching us to order ourselves lowly and reverently to all our superiors, even to those that have been most injurious to us.

9. And David said to Saul, Wherefore hearest thou men's words, saying, Behold, David seeketh thy hurt? 10. Behold, this day thine eyes have seen how that the LORD had delivered thee to-day into mine hand in the cave: and some bade me kill thee: but mine eye spared thee; and I said, I will not put forth mine hand against my lord; for he is the LORD's anointed. 11. Moreover, my father, see, yea, see the skirt of thy robe in my hand: for in that I cut off the skirt of thy robe, and killed thee not, know thou and see that there is neither evil nor transgression in mine hand, and I have not sinned against thee; yet thou huntest my soul to take it. 12. The LORD judge between me and thee, and the LORD avenge me of thee: but mine hand shall not be upon thee. 13. As saith the proverb of the ancients, Wickedness proceedeth from the wicked: but mine hand shall not be upon thee. 14. After whom is the king of Israel come out? after whom dost thou pursue? after a dead dog, after a flea? 15. The LORD therefore be judge, and judge between me and thee, and see, and plead my cause, and deliver me out of thine hand.

We have here David's warm and pathetic speech to Saul, wherein he endeavours to convince him that he did him a great deal of wrong in persecuting him thus, and to persuade him therefore to be reconciled.

1. He calls him father; (v. 11.) for he was not only, as king, the father of his country, but he was, in particular, his father-in-law. From a father one may expect compassion, and a favourable opinion. For a prince to seek the ruin of any of his good subjects, is as unnatural as for a father to seek the ruin of his own children.

2. He lays the blame of his rage against him upon his evil counsellors; Wherefore hearest thou men's words? v. 9. It is a piece of respect owing to crowned heads, if they do amiss, to charge it upon those about them, who either advised them to it, or should have advised them against it. David had reason enough to think that Saul persecuted him purely from his own envy and malice, yet he decently supposes that others put him on to do it, and made him believe that David was his enemy, and sought his hurt. Satan, the great accuser of the brethren, has his agents in all places, and particularly in the courts of those princes that encourage them and give ear to them, who make it their business to represent the people of God as enemies to Cæsar, and hurtful to kings and princes, that, being thus dressed up in bear skins, they may "be baited."

3. He solemnly protests his own innocence, and that he was far from designing any hurt or mischief to Saul. "There is neither evil nor transgression in my hand, v. 11. I am not chargeable with any crime, nor conscious of any guilt, and, had I a window in my breast, thou mightest through it see the sincerity of my heart in this protestation. I have not sinned against thee; (however I have sinned against God;) yet thou huntest my soul," that is, "my life." Perhaps it was about this time that David penned the seventh psalm, concerning the business of Cush the Benjamite, that is, Saul, as some think, wherein he appeals to God, (v. 3..5.) If there be iniquity in my hands, then let the enemy persecute my soul and take it; putting in a parenthesis, with reference to the story of this chapter. Yea, I have delivered him that without cause is mine enemy.

4. He produces undeniable evidence to prove the falseness of the suggestion upon which Saul's malice against him was grounded; David was charged with seeking Saul's hurt; "See," says he, "yea, see the skirt of thy robe; (v. 11.) let this be a witness for me, and an unexceptionable witness it is: had that been true which I am accused of, I had now had thy head in my hand, and not the skirt of thy robe, for I could as easily have cut off that as this." To corroborate this evidence, he shews him, (1.) That God's providence had given him opportunity to do it. The Lord delivered thee, very surprisingly, to-day into mine hand; whence many a one would have gathered an intimation, that it was the will of God he should now give the determining blow to him whose neck lay so fair for it. When Saul had but a very small advantage against David, he cried out, God has delivered him into my hand, (ch. 23. 7.) and resolved to make the best of that advantage: but David did not so. (2.) That his counsellors and those about him had earnestly put him on to do it. Some bade me kill thee. He had blamed Saul for hearkening to men's words, and justly; "for," says he, "if I had done so, thou hadst not been alive now." (3.) That it was upon a good principle that he refused to do it; not because his attendants were at hand, who, it may be, would have avenged his death; no, it was not by the fear of them, but by the fear of God, that he was restrained from it; "He is my lord, and the Lord's anointed, whom I ought to protect, and to whom I owe faith and allegiance, and therefore I said I will not touch a hair of his head." Such a happy command he had of himself, that his nature, in the midst of the greatest provocation, was not suffered to rebel against his principles.

5. He declares it his fixed resolution never to be his own avenger. The Lord avenge me of thee; that is, "deliver me out of thy hand; but, whatever comes of it, my hand shall not be upon thee; (v. 12. and again, v. 13.) as saith the proverb of the ancients, Wickedness proceedeth from the wicked. The wisdom of the ancients is transmitted to posterity by their proverbial sayings:

many such we receive by tradition from our fathers; and the counsels of common persons are very much directed by this, "As the old saying is." Here is one that was in use in David's time, Wickedness proceedeth from the wicked; that is, (1.) Men's own iniquity will ruin them at last. So some understand it. Forward furious men will cut their own throats with their own knives. Give them rope enough, and they will hang themselves. In this sense it comes in very fitly as a reason why his hand should not be upon him. (2.) Bad men will do bad things; according as men's principles and dispositions are, accordingly will their actions be: this suits the connexion. If David had been a wicked man, as he was represented, he would have done this wicked thing; but he durst not, because of the fear of God. Or thus: Whatever injuries bad men do us, (which we are not to wonder at; he that lies among thorns, must expect to be scratched,) yet we must not return them; never render railing for railing; though wickedness proceed from the wicked, yet let it not therefore proceed from us by way of retaliation. Though the dog bark at the sheep, the sheep does not bark at the dog. See Isa. 32. 6..8.

6. He endeavours to convince him, that as it was a bad thing, so it was a mean thing, for him to give chase to such an inconsiderable person as David was; (v. 14.) Whom does the king of Israel pursue with all this care and force? A dead dog; a flea; one flea; so it is in the Hebrew. It is below so great a king to enter the lists with one that is so unequal a match for him, one of his own servants, bred a poor shepherd, now an exile; neither able nor willing to make any resistance. To conquer him would not be to his honour, to attempt it was his disparagement. If Saul would consult his own reputation, he would slight such an enemy, (supposing he were really his enemy,) and would think himself in no danger from him. David was so far from aspiring, that he was, in his own account, as a dead dog; Mephibosheth thus calls himself, 2 Sam. 9. 8. This humble language would have wrought upon Saul, if he had any spark of generosity in him; Satis est prostrasse leoni—Enough for the lion, that he has laid his victim low. What credit would it be to Saul to trample upon a dead dog? What pleasure could it be to him to hunt a flea, a single flea? Which, (as some have observed,) if it be sought, is not easily found, if it be found, not easily caught, and if it be caught, is a poor prize, especially for a prince. Aquila non captat muscas—The eagle does not dart upon flies. David thinks Saul had no more reason to fear him, than to fear a flea-bite.

7. He once and again appeals to God as the righteous Judge; (v. 12. and v. 45.) The Lord judge between me and thee. Note, The justice of God is the refuge and comfort of oppressed innocence. If men wrong us, God will right us, at furthest, in the judgment of the great day. With him David leaves his cause, and so rests satisfied, waiting his time to appear for him.

16. And it came to pass, when David had made an end of speaking these words unto Saul, that Saul said, Is this thy voice, my son David? And Saul lifted up his voice, and wept. 17. And he said to David, Thou art more righteous than I: for thou hast rewarded me good, whereas I have rewarded thee evil. 18. And thou hast shewed this day how that thou hast dealt well with me: forasmuch as when the Lord had delivered me into thine hand, thou killedst me not. 19. For if a man find his enemy, will he let him go well away? wherefore the Lord reward thee good for that thou hast done unto me this day. 20. And now, behold, I know well that thou shalt surely be king, and that the kingdom of Israel shall be established in thine hand. 21. Swear now therefore unto me by the LORD, that thou wilt not cut off my seed after me, and that thou wilt not destroy my name out of my father's house. 22. And David sware unto Saul. And Saul went home; but David and his men gat them up unto the hold.

Here is,

I. Saul's penitent reply to David's speech. It was strange that he had patience to hear him out, considering how outrageous he was against him, and how cutting David's discourse was: but God restrained him and his men; and we may suppose Saul struck with amazement at the singularity of the event, and much more when he found how much he had lain at David's mercy. His heart must have been harder than a stone, if this had not affected him.

1. He melted into tears; and we will not suppose them to be counterfeit, but real expressions of his present concern at the sight of his own iniquity, so plainly proved upon him. He speaks as one quite overcome with David's kindness; Is this thy voice, my son David? And, as one that relented at the thought of his own folly and ingratitude, he lifted up his voice and wept, v. 16. Many mourn for their sins, that do not truly repent of them; weep bitterly for them, and yet continue in love and league with them.

2. He ingeniously acknowledged David's integrity, and his own iniquity; (v. 17.) Thou art more righteous than I. Now God made good to David that word on which he had caused him to hope, that he would bring forth his righteousness as the light, Ps. 37. 6. They who take care to keep a good conscience, may leave it to God to secure them the credit of it. This fair confession was enough to prove David innocent, (even his enemy himself being judge,) but not enough to prove Saul himself a true penitent. He should have said, Thou art righteous, but I am wicked; but the utmost he will own is this, Thou art more righteous than I. Bad men will commonly go no further than this in their confessions; they will own they are not so good as some others are; there are that are better than they, and more righteous. He now owns himself under a mistake concerning David; (v. 18.) "Thou hast shewed this day, that thou art so far from seeking my hurt, that thou hast dealt well with me." We are too apt to suspect others to be worse affected towards us than really they are, and than perhaps they are proved to be; when, afterward, our mistake is discovered, we should be forward to recall our suspicions, as Saul does here.

3. He prays God to recompense David for this his generous kindness to him. He owns that David's sparing him, when he had him in his power, was an uncommon and an unparalleled instance of tenderness to an enemy; no man would have done the like; and therefore, either because he thought himself not able to give him a full recompence for so great a favour, or, because he found himself not inclined to give him any recompence at all, he turns him over to God for his pay; The Lord reward thee good, v. 19. Poor beggars can do no less than pray for their benefactors, and Saul did no more.

4. He prophesies his advancement to the throne; (v. 20.) I know well that thou shalt surely be king. He knew it before, by the promise Samuel had made him of it, compared with the excellent spirit that appeared in David, which highly aggravated his sin and folly, in persecuting him as he did; he had as much reason to say concerning David, as David concerning him, How can I put forth mine hand against the Lord's anointed? But now he knew it by the interest he found he had in the people, the special providence of God in protecting him, and the generous kingly spirit he had now given a proof of in sparing his enemy. Now he knew it; that is, now that he was in a good temper, he was willing to own that he knew it, and to submit to the conviction of it. Note, Sooner or later, God will force even those that are of the synagogue of Satan to know and own those that he has loved, and to worship before their feet; for so it is promised, Rev. 3. 9. This acknowledgment, which Saul made of David's incontestable title to the crown, was a great encouragement to David himself, and a support to his faith and hope.

5. He binds David with an oath, hereafter to shew the same tenderness of his seed, and of his name, as he had now shewed of his person, v. 21. David had more reason to oblige Saul by an oath that he would not destroy him, yet he insists not on that; (if the laws of justice and honour would not bind him, an oath would not;) but Saul knew David to be a conscientious man, and would think his interests safe, if he could get them secured by his oath. Saul, by his disobedience, had ruined his own soul, and never took care by repentance to prevent that ruin, and yet is very solicitous that his name might not be destroyed, nor his seed cut off. However, David sware unto him, v. 22. Though he might be tempted, not only in revenge, but in prudence, to extirpate Saul's family, yet he binds himself not to do it, knowing that God could and would establish the kingdom to him and his, without the use of such bloody methods. This oath he afterward religiously observed; he supported Mephibosheth, and executed those, as traitors, that slew Ishbosheth. The hanging up of several of Saul's posterity, to atone for the destruction of the Gibeonites, was God's appointment, not David's act, and therefore not the violation of this oath.

II. Their parting in peace. 1. Saul, for the present, let fall the persecution: he went home convinced, but not converted; ashamed of his envy to David, yet retaining in his breast that root of bitterness; vexed that, when at last he had found David, he could not at that time find in his heart to destroy him, as he had designed. God has many ways to tie the hands of persecutors, when he does not turn their hearts. 2. David continued to shift for his own safety; he knew Saul too well to trust him, and therefore gat him up unto the hold. It is dangerous venturing upon the mercy of a reconciled enemy. We read of those who believed in Christ, and yet he did not commit himself to them, because he knew all men. They that, like David, are innocent as doves, must thus, like him, be wise as serpents.

CHAP. XXV.

We have here some intermission of David's troubles by Saul. Providence favoured him with a breathing time, and yet this chapter gives us instances of the troubles of David; if one vexation seem to be over, we must not be secure; a storm may arise from some other point, as here to David. I. Tidings of the death of Samuel could not trouble him, v. 1. But, II. The abuse he received from Nabal is more largely recorded in this chapter. 1. The character of Nabal, v. 2, 3. 2. The humble request sent to him, v. 4. . 9. 3. His churlish answer, v. 10, 11. 4. David's angry resentment of it, v. 12, 13, 21, 22. 5. Abigail's prudent care to prevent the mischief it was likely to bring upon her family, v. 14. . 20. 6. Her address to David to pacify him, v. 23. . 31. 7. David's favourable reception of her, v. 32. . 35. 8. The death of Nabal, v. 36. . 38. 9. Abigail's marriage to David, v. 39. . 41.

1. AND Samuel died; and all the Israelites were gathered together, and lamented him, and buried him in his house at Ramah. And David arose, and went down to the wilderness of Paran.

We have here a short account of Samuel's death and burial.

1. Though he was a great man, and one that was admirably well qualified for public service, yet he spent the latter end of his days in retirement and obscurity: not because he was superannuated, for he knew how to preside in a college of the prophets, (ch. 19. 20.) but because Israel had rejected him, for which God thus justly chastised them, and because his desire was to be quiet, and to enjoy himself and his God in acts of devotion, now in his advanced years; and in this desire God graciously indulged him. Let old people be willing to rest themselves, though it look like burying themselves alive.

2. Though he was a fast friend to David, for which Saul hated him, as also for dealing plainly with him; yet he died in peace, even in the worst of the days of Saul's tyranny, who he sometimes feared would kill him, ch. 16. 2. Though Saul loved him not, yet he feared him, as Herod did John; and feared the people, for all knew him to be a prophet. Thus is Saul restrained from hurting him.

3. All Israel lamented him; and they had reason, for they had all a loss in him. His personal merits commanded this honour to be done him at his death: his former services to the public, when he judged Israel, made this respect to his name and memory a just debt; it had been very ungrateful to have withheld it. The sons of the prophets had lost the founder and president of their college, and whatever weakened them was a public loss: but that was not all, Samuel was a constant intercessor for Israel, prayed daily for them; (ch. 12. 23.) if he go, they part with the best friend they have. The loss is the more grievous at this juncture, when Saul is grown so outrageous, and David driven from his country; never more need of Samuel than now, yet now he is removed. We will hope that the Israelites lamented Samuel's death the more bitterly, because they remembered against themselves their own sin and folly in rejecting him and desiring a king. Note, (1.) Those have hard hearts, who can bury their faithful ministers with dry eyes; who are not sensible of the loss of those who have prayed for them, and taught them the way of the Lord. (2.) When God's providence removes our relations and friends from us, we ought to be humbled for our misconduct toward them; while they were with us.

4. They buried him not in the school of the prophets at Nain, but in his own house, or perhaps in the garden pertaining to it, at Ramah, where he was born.

5. David hereupon went down to the wilderness of Paran, retiring, perhaps, to mourn the more solemnly for the death of Samuel. Or, rather, because now that he had lost so good a friend, who was (and he hoped would be) a great support to him, he apprehended his danger to be greater than ever, and therefore withdrew to a wilderness, out of the limits of the land of Israel; and now it was, that he dwelt in the tents of Kedar, Ps. 120. 5. In some parts of this wilderness of Paran, Israel wandered when they came out of Egypt; the place would bring to mind God's care concerning them, and David might improve that for his own encouragement, now in his wilderness state.

2. And there was a man in Maon, whose possessions were in Carmel; and the man was very great, and he had three thousand sheep, and a thousand goats; and he was shearing his sheep in Carmel. 3. Now the name of the man was Nabal; and the name of his wife Abigail: and she was a woman of good understanding, and of a beautiful countenance: but the man was churlish and evil in his doings; and he was of the house of Caleb. 4. And David heard in the wilderness that Nabal did shear his sheep. 5. And David sent out ten young men, and David said unto the young men, Get you up to Carmel, and go to Nabal, and greet him in my name: 6. And thus shall ye say to him that liveth in prosperity, Peace be both to thee, and peace be to thine house and peace be unto all that thou hast. 7. And now I have heard that thou hast shearers: now thy shepherds which were with us, we hurt them not, neither was there aught missing unto them, all the while they were in Carmel. 8. Ask thy young men, and they will shew thee. Wherefore let the young men find favour in thine eyes: for we come in a good day: give, I pray thee, whatsoever cometh to thine hand unto thy servants, and to thy son David. 9. And when David's young men came, they spake to Nabal according to all those words in the name of David, and ceased. 10. And Nabal answered David's servants, and said, Who is David? and who is the son of Jesse? there be many servants now-a-days that break away every man from his master. 11. Shall I then take my bread, and my water, and my flesh that I have killed for my shearers, and give it unto men, whom I know not whence they be?

I. A short account of him, who and what he was, v. 2, 3. A man we should never have heard of, if there had not happened some communication between him and David. Observe, 1. His name: Nabal; a fool, so it signifies. It was a wonder that his parents would give him that name, and an ill omen of what proved to be his character. Yet indeed we all of us deserve to be so called, when we come into the world; for, Man is born like the wild ass's colt, and foolishness is bound up in our hearts. 2. His family: he was of the house of Caleb, but was indeed of another spirit. He inherited Caleb's estate; for Maon and Carmel lay near Hebron, which was given to Caleb; (Josh. 15. 54, 55.—14. 14.) but he was far from inheriting his virtues. He was a disgrace to his family, and then it was no honour to him. Degenerant genus opprobrium—A good extraction is a reproach to him who degenerates from it. The Seventy, and some other ancient versions, read it appellatively; not, He was a Calebite, He was a dogged man, of a curriish disposition, surly and snappish, and always snarling. He was ἀνθρώπος κυνικός—a man that was a cynic. 3. His wealth: he was very great, that is, very rich; for riches make men look great in the eye of the world; otherwise, to one that takes his measures aright, he really looked very mean. Riches are common blessings, which God often gives to Nabals, to whom he gives neither wisdom nor grace. 4. His wife: Abigail; a woman of great understanding. Her name signifies, the joy of her father; yet he could not promise himself much joy of her, when he married her to such a husband, inquiring more after his wealth than after his wisdom. Many a child is thrown away upon a great heap of the mire of worldly wealth; married to that, and to nothing else that is desirable. Wisdom is good with an inheritance, but an inheritance is good for little without wisdom. Many an Abigail is tied to a Nabal, and if it be so, be her understanding, like Abigail's, ever so great, it will be little enough for her exercises. 5. His character: he had no sense either of honour or honesty: not of honour for he was churlish, cross, and ill-humoured; not of honesty, for he was evil in his doings, hard, and oppressive, and a man that cared not what fraud and violence he used in getting and saving, so he could but get and save. This is the character given of Nabal by Him who knows what every man is.

II. David's humble request to him, that he would send him some victuals for himself and his men.

1. David, it seems, was in such distress, that he would be glad to be beholden to him, and did, in effect, come a begging to his door. What little reason have we to value the wealth of this world, when so great a churl as Nabal was, abound, and, so great a saint as David was, suffers want! Once before, we had David begging his bread, but then it was of Ahiolech the high priest, to whom one would not grudge to stoop. But to send a begging to Nabal, was what such a spirit as David had could not admit without some reluctancy; yet if Providence bring him to these straits, he will not say, that to beg he is ashamed. Yet see Ps. 37. 25.

2. He chose a good time to send to Nabal, when he had many hands employed about him in shearing his sheep, for whom he was to make a plentiful entertainment, so that good cheer was stirring. Had he sent at another time, Nabal would have pretended he had nothing to spare, but now he could not have that excuse. It was usual to make feasts at their sheep-shearings, as appears from Absalom's feast on that occasion; (2 Sam. 13. 24.) for wool was one of the staple-commodities of Canaan.

3. David ordered his men to deliver their message to him with a great deal of courtesy and respect; "Go to Nabal, and greet him in my name. Tell him I sent you to present my service to him, and to inquire how he does and his family," v. 5. He puts words in their mouths; (v. 6.) Thus shall ye say to him that lieth; (our translators add, in prosperity;) as if those live indeed, that live as Nabal did, with abundance of the wealth of this world about them; whereas, in truth, those that live in pleasure, are dead while they live, 1 Tim. 5. 6. This was, methinks, too high a compliment to pass upon Nabal, to call him the man that lieth. David knew better things, that in God's favour is life, not in the world's smiles; and by the rough answer he was well enough served, for this too smooth address to such a muckworm. Yet his good wishes were very commendable; "Peace be to thee; all good both to soul and body; Peace to thy house, and to all that thou hast. Tell him I am a hearty well-wisher to his health and prosperity." He bids them call him his son David; (v. 8.) intimating, that, for his age and estate, David honoured him as a father, and therefore hoped to receive some fatherly kindness from him.

4. He pleaded the kindness which Nabal's shepherds had received from David and his men; and one good turn requires another. He appeals to Nabal's own servants, and shews, that, when David's soldiers were quartered among Nabal's shepherds, (1.) They did not hurt them themselves; did them no injury, gave them no disturbance, were not a terror to them, nor took any of their lambs out of their flock. Yet, considering the character of David's men, men in distress, and debt, and discontented, and the scarcity of provisions in his camp, it was not without a great deal of care and good management, that they were kept from plundering. (2.) They protected them from being hurt by others. David himself does but intimate this, that he would not boast of his good offices; neither was there ought missing unto them, v. 7. But Nabal's servants, to whom he appealed, went further; (v. 16.) They were a wall unto us both by night and day. David's soldiers were a guard to Nabal's shepherds, when the bands of the Philistines robbed the threshing-floors, (ch. 23. 1.) and would have robbed the sheep-folds. From those plunderers Nabal's flocks were protected by David's care, and therefore let us find favour in thine eyes. Those that have shewn kindness, may justly expect to receive kindness.

5. He was very modest in his request. Though David was anointed king, he insists not upon royal dainties, but, "Give whatsoever comes to thy hand, and we will be thankful for it." Beggars must not be choosers. They that deserved to have been served first, will now be glad of what is left. They plead, We come in a good day, a festival, when not only the provision is more plentiful, but the heart and hand are usually more open and free, than at other times: when much may be spared, and yet not be missed. He demands it not as a debt, either by way of tribute, as he was a king, or by way of contribution, as he was a general, but as a boon to a friend, that was his humble servant. David's servants delivered their message faithfully, and very handsomely, not doubting but to go back well laden with provisions.

III. Nabal's churlish answer to this modest petition, v. 10, 11. One would not have imagined it possible that any man should be so very rude and ill-conditioned as Nabal was. David called himself his son, and asked bread, and a fish, but, instead thereof, he gave him a stone, and a scorpion; not only denied him, but abused him. If he had not thought fit to send him any supplies for fear of Ahimelech's fate, who paid dear for his kindness to David, yet he might have given a civil answer, and made the denial as modest as the request was. But, instead of that, he falls into a passion, as covetous men are apt to do, when they are asked for any thing, thinking thus to cover one sin with another, and by abusing the poor to excuse themselves from relieving them. But God will not thus be mocked.

1. He speaks scornfully of David, as an insignificant man, not worth taking notice of. The Philistines could say of him, This is David the king of the land, that slew his ten thousands; (ch. 21. 11.) yet, Nabal his near neighbour, and one of the same tribe, takes on him to say that he does not know him, or not know him to be a man of any merit or distinction; Who is David? And who is the son of Jesse? He could not be ignorant how much the country was obliged to David for his public services, but his narrow soul thinks not of paying any part of that debt, nor so much as acknowledging it; he speaks of David as an inconsiderable man, obscure, and not to be regarded. Think it not strange, if great men and great merits be thus disgraced.

2. He upbraids him with his present distress, and takes occasion from it to represent him as a bad man, that was fitter to be set in the stocks for a vagrant than to have any kindness shewn him. How naturally does he speak the churlish clownish language of those that hate to give alms! There be many servants now-a-days, (as if there had been none such in former days,) that break every man from his master; suggesting that David was one of them himself. "He might have kept his place with his master Saul, and then he needed not have sent to me for provisions." Also that he entertained and harboured those that were fugitives like himself. It would make one's blood rise, to hear so great and good a man as David was thus vilified and reproached by such a base churl as Nabal was; But the vile person will speak villany, Isa. 32. 5. 7. If men bring themselves into straits by their own folly, yet they are to be pitied and helped, and not trampled upon and starved. But David is reduced to this distress, not by any fault, no, nor any indiscretion, of his own, but purely by the good services he had done to his country, and the honours which his God had put upon him; and yet he is represented as a fugitive and runaway. Let this help us to bear such reproaches and misrepresentations of us with patience and cheerfulness, and make us easy under them, that it has often been the lot of the excellent ones of the earth. Some of the best men that ever the world was blest with were counted as the off-scouring of all things, 1 Cor. 4. 13.

3. He insists much upon the property he had in the provisions of his table, and will by no means admit any body to share in them. "It is my bread and my flesh, yes, and my water too," (though usus communis aquarum—water is every one's property,) "and it is prepared for my shearers;" priding himself in it, that it was all his own; and who denied it? Who offered to dispute his title? But this, he thinks, will justify him in keeping it all to himself, and giving David none; for may he not do what he will with his own? Whereas we mistake, if we think we are absolute lords of what we have, and may do what we please with it. No, we are but stewards, and must use it as we are directed, remembering it is not our own, but his that intrusted us with it. Riches are the τα ἀλλότρια, (Luke, 16. 12.) they are another's, and we ought not to talk too much of their being our own.

12. So David's young men turned their way, and went again, and came and told him all those sayings. 13. And David said unto his men, Gird ye on every man his sword. And they girded on every man his sword; and David also girded on his sword: and there went up after David about four hundred men; and two hundred abode by the stuff. 14. But one of the young men told Abigail, Nabal's wife, saying, Behold, David sent messengers out of the wilderness to salute our master; and he railed on them. 15. But the men were very good unto us, and we were not hurt, neither missed we any thing, as long as we were conversant with them, when we were in the fields: 16. They were a wall unto us both by night and day, all the while we were with them keeping the sheep. 17. Now therefore know and consider what thou wilt do; for evil is determined against our master, and against all his household: for he is such a son of Belial, that a man cannot speak to him.

Here is,

I. The report made to David of the abuse Nabal had given to his messengers; (v. 12.) They turned their way; they shewed their displeasure as became them to do, by breaking off abruptly from such a churl, but prudently governed themselves so well as not to render railing for railing, nor to call him as he deserved, much less to take by force what ought of right to have been given them, but came and told David—let him do as he thought fit. Christ's servants, when they are thus abused, must leave it to him to plead his own cause, and wait till he appear in it. The servant shewed his lord what affronts he had received, but did not return them, Luke, 14. 21.

II. David's hasty resolution hereupon. He girded on his sword, and ordered his men to do so too, to the number of four hundred, c. 13. And what he said, we are told, v. 21, 22. 1. He repented of the kindness he had done to Nabal, and looks upon it as thrown away upon him. He said, "Surely in vain have I kept all that this fellow hath in the wilderness; I thought to have obliged him, and made him my friend, but I see it is to no purpose. He has no sense of gratitude, nor is he capable of receiving the impressions of a good turn, else he could not have used me thus. He hath requited me evil for good." But when we are thus required, we should not repent of the good we have done, nor be backward to do good another time. God is kind to the evil and unthankful, and why may not we? 2. He determined to destroy Nabal, and all that belonged to him, v. 22. Here David did not act like himself. His resolution was bloody, to cut off all the males of Nabal's house, and spare none, man nor man child. The ratification of his resolution was passionate; So, and more also, do God (he was going to say to me, but that would better become Saul's mouth (ch. 14. 44.) than David's, and therefore he decently turns it off) to the enemies of David. Is this thy voice, O David? Can the man after God's own heart speak thus unadvisedly with his lips? Has he been so long in the school of affliction, where he should have learned patience, and yet so passionate? Is this he who used to be dumb and deaf when he was reproached, (Ps. 38. 13.) who, but the other day, spared him who sought his life, and yet now will not spare any thing that belongs to him who had only put an affront upon his messengers? He who, at other times, used to be calm and considerate, is now put into such a heat by a few hard words, that nothing will atone for them but the blood of a whole family. Lord, what is man! What are the best of men, when God leaves them to themselves to try them, that they may know what is in their hearts! From Saul, David expected injuries, and against those he was prepared, and stood upon his guard, and so kept his temper; but from Nabal he expected kindness, and therefore the affront he gave him was a surprise to him, found him off his guard, and, by a sudden and unexpected attack, put him for the present into disorder. What need have we to pray, Lord, lead us not into temptation.

III. The account given of this matter to Abigail, by one of the servants, who was more considerate than the rest, v. 14. Had this servant spoken to Nabal, and shewed him the danger he had exposed himself to by his own rudeness, he would have said, "Servants are now-a-days so saucy, and so apt to prescribe, that there is no enduring them;" and, it may be, would have turned him out of doors. But Abigail, being a woman of good understanding, took cognizance of the matter, even from her servant, who, 1. Did David right, in commending him and his men for their civility to Nabal's shepherds; (v. 15, 16.) "The men were very good to us; and though they were themselves exposed, yet they protected us, and were a wall unto us." They who do that which is good, one way or other, shall have the praise of the same. Nabal's own servant will be a witness for David, that he is a man of honour and conscience, whatever Nabal himself says of him. And, 2. He did Nabal no wrong in condemning him for his rudeness to David's messengers. He railed on them, v. 14. He flew upon them, so the word is, with an intolerable rage: "For," say they, "it is his usual practice; (v. 17.) He is such a son of Belial, so very morose and untractable, that a man cannot speak to him, but he flies into a passion immediately." Abigail knew it too well herself. 3. He did Abigail and the whole family a kindness, in making her sensible what was likely to be the consequence. He knew David so well, that he had reason to think he would highly resent the affront, and, perhaps, had had information of David's orders to his men to march that way; for he is very positive evil is determined against our master and all his household; himself, among the rest, would be involved in it. Therefore he desires his mistress to consider what was to be done for their common safety. They could not resist the force David was to bring down upon them, nor had they time to send to Saul to protect them; something therefore must be done to pacify David.

18. Then Abigail made haste, and took two hundred loaves, and two bottles of wine, and five sheep ready dressed, and five measures of parched corn, and an hundred clusters of raisins, and two hundred cakes of figs, and laid them on asses. 19. And she said unto her servants, Go on before me; behold, I come after you. But she told not her husband Nabal. 20. And it was so, as she rode on the ass, that she came down by the covert of the hill, and, behold, David and his men came down against her; and she met them. 21. Now David had said, Surely in vain have I kept all that this fellow hath in the wilderness, so that nothing was missed of all that pertained unto him: and he hath requited me evil for good. 22. So and more also do God unto the enemies of David, if I leave of all that pertain to him by the morning light any that pisseth against the wall. 23. And when Abigail saw David, she hastened, and lighted off the ass, and fell before David on her face, and bowed herself to the ground. 24. And fell at his feet, and said, Upon me, my lord, upon me, let this iniquity be: and let thine handmaid, I pray thee, speak in thine audience, and hear the words of thine handmaid. 25. Let not my lord, I pray thee, regard this man of Belial even Nabal: for as his name is, so is he; Nabal is his name. and folly is with him: but I thine handmaid saw not the young men of my lord, whom thou didst send. 26. Now therefore, my lord, as the LORD liveth, and as thy soul liveth, seeing the LORD hath withholden thee from coming to shed blood, and from avenging thyself with thine own hand, now let thine enemies, and they that seek evil to my lord, be as Nabal. 27. And now this blessing which thine handmaid hath brought unto my lord, let it even be given unto the young men that follow my lord. 28. I pray thee, forgive the trespass of thine handmaid: for the LORD will certainly make my lord a sure house; because my lord fighteth the battles of the LORD, and evil hath not been found in thee all thy days. 29. Yet a man is risen to pursue thee, and to seek thy soul: but the soul of my lord shall be bound in the bundle of life with the LORD thy God; and the souls of thine enemies, them shall he sling out, as out of the middle of a sling. 30. And it shall come to pass, when the LORD shall have done to my lord according to all the good that he hath spoken concerning thee, and shall have appointed thee ruler over Israel; 31. That this shall be no grief unto thee, nor offence of heart unto my lord, either that thou hast shed blood causeless, or that my lord hath avenged himself: but when the LORD shall have dealt well with my lord, then remember thine handmaid.

We have here an account of Abigail's prudent management for the preserving of her husband and family from the destruction that was just coming upon them: and we find that she did her part admirably well, and fully answered her character. The passion of fools often makes those breaches in a little time, which the wise, with all their wisdom, have much ado to make up again. It is hard to say, whether Abigail was more miserable in such a husband, or Nabal happy in such a wife. A virtuous woman is a crown to her husband, to protect as well as adorn, and will do him good, and not evil. Wisdom, in such a case as this, was better than weapons of war. 1. It was her wisdom, that what she did, she did quickly, and without delay; she made haste, v.18. It was no time to trifle or linger, when all was in danger. They that desire conditions of peace, must send when the enemy is yet a great way off, Luke, 14. 32. 2. It was her wisdom, that what she did, she did herself: because, being a woman of great conduct and very happy address, she knew better how to manage it than any servant she had. The virtuous woman will herself look well to the ways of her household, and not devolve it wholly upon others.

Abigail must endeavour to atone for Nabal's faults, now that he had been two ways rude to David's messengers, and in them to David. (1.) He had denied them the provisions they asked for. (2.) He had given them very provoking language. Now,

I. By a most generous present, Abigail atones for his denial of their request. If Nabal had given them what came next to hand, they had gone away thankful; but Abigail prepares the very best the house afforded, and abundance of it, (v.11.) according to the usual entertainments of those times. Not only bread and flesh, but raisins and figs, which were their dried sweet-meats. Nabal grudged them water, but she took two bottles (casks or rundlets) of wine, loaded her asses with these provisions, and sent them before; for a gift pacifieth anger, Prov.21.14. Jacob thus pacified Esau. When the instruments of the churl are evil, the liberal devises liberal things, and loses nothing by it; for by liberal things shall he stand, Isa. 32. 7, 8. Abigail not only lawfully, but laudably, disposed of all these goods of her husband's, without his knowledge, even when she had reason to think, that, if he had known, he would not have consented to it; because it was not to gratify her own pride, or vanity, but for the necessary defence of him and his family, which otherwise had been inevitably ruined. Husbands and wives, for their common good and benefit, have a joint-interest in their worldly possessions; but if either waste, or unduly spend any way, it is robbing the other.

II. By a most obliging demeanour, and charming speech, she atones for the abusive language which Nabal had given them. She met David upon the march, big with resentment, and meditating the destruction of Nabal, (v. 20.) but, with all possible expressions of complaisance and respect, she humbly begs his favour, and solicits him to pass by the offence. Her demeanour was very submissive; she bowed herself to the ground before David, (v. 23.) and fell at his feet, v. 24. Yielding pacifies great offences. She puts herself into the place and posture of a penitent, and of a petitioner, and was not ashamed to do it, when it was for the good of her house, in the sight both of her own servants, and of David's soldiers. She humbly begs of David that he will give her the hearing; Let thy handmaid speak in thy audience. But she needed not thus to bespeak his attention and patience; what she said was sufficient to command it; for certainly nothing could be more fine or more moving. No topic of argument is left untouched, every thing is well placed, and well expressed, most pertinently and pathetically urged and improved to the best advantage, with such a force of natural rhetoric as cannot easily be paralleled.

1. She speaks to him all along with the deference and respect due to so great and good a man; calls him, My lord, over and over, to expiate her husband's crime in saying, "Who is David?" She does not upbraid him with the heat of his passion, though he deserved to be reproved for it; nor does she tell him how ill it became his character; but endeavours to soften him, and bring him to a better temper; not doubting but that then his own conscience would upbraid him with it.

2. She takes the blame of the ill treatment of his messengers upon herself; "Upon me, my lord, upon me, let this iniquity be, v. 24. If thou wilt be angry, be angry with me, rather than with my poor husband, and look upon it as the trespass of thine handmaid," v. 28. Sordid spirits care not how much others suffer for their faults. Abigail here discovered the sincerity and strength of her conjugal affection, and concern for her family: whatever Nabal was, he was her husband.

3. She excuses her husband's fault, by imputing it to his natural weakness and want of understanding; (v. 23.) "Let not my lord take notice of his rudeness and ill manners, for it is like him; it is not the first time that he has behaved so churlishly: he must be borne with, for it is for want of wit; Nabal is his name," (which signifies a fool), "and folly is with him." It was owing to his folly, not his malice. He is simple, but not spiteful. Forgive him, for he knows not what he does." What she said was too true, and she said it to excuse his fault, and prevent his ruin, else she had not done well to give such a bad character as this of her own husband, whom she ought to make the best of, and not to speak ill of.

4. She pleads her own ignorance of the matter; "I saw not the young men, else they should have had a better answer, and should not have gone without their errand;" intimating hereby, that though her husband was foolish, and unfit to manage his affairs himself, yet he had so much wisdom as to be ruled by her, and take her advice.

5. She takes it for granted that she has gained the point already, perhaps, perceiving by David's countenance, that he began to change his mind; (v. 26.) Seeing the Lord hath withholden thee. She depends not upon her own reasonings, but God's grace, to mollify him, and doubts not but that grace would work powerfully upon him; and then, "Let all thine enemies be as Nabal; that is, if thou forbear to avenge thyself, no doubt, God will avenge thee on him, as he will on all other thine enemies." Or, it intimates that it was below him to take vengeance on so weak and impotent an enemy as Nabal was, who, as he would do him no kindness, so he could do him no hurt, for he needed to wish no more concerning his enemies, than that they might be as unable to resist him as Nabal was. Perhaps she refers to his sparing of Saul, when, but the other day, he had him at his mercy. "Didst thou forbear to avenge thyself on that lion that would devour thee, and wilt thou shed the blood of this dog that can but bark at thee?" The very mentioning of what he was about to do, to shed blood, and to avenge himself, was enough to work upon such a tender gracious spirit as David had; and it should ~~was~~, by his reply, (v. 33.) that it affected him.

6. She makes a tender of the present she had brought, but speaks it as unworthy of David's acceptance; and therefore desires it might be given to the young men that followed him, (v. 27.) and particularly to those ten that were his messengers to Nabal, whom he had treated so rudely.

7. She applauds David for the good services he had done against the common enemies of his country, the glory of which great achievements, she hoped, he would not stain by any personal revenge. My lord fighteth the battles of the Lord against the Philistines, and therefore he will leave it to God to fight his battles against those that affront him. "Evil has not been found in thee all thy days, (v. 28.) thou never yet didst wrong to any of thy countrymen, (though persecuted as a traitor,) and therefore thou wilt not begin now, nor do a thing which Saul will improve for the justifying of his malice against thee."

8. She foretells the glorious issue of his present troubles. "It is true, a man pursues thee, and seeks thy life;" (she names not Saul, out of respect to his present character as king;) "but thou needest not look with so sharp and jealous an eye upon every one that affronts thee; for all these storms, that now ruffle thee, will be blown over shortly." She speaks it with assurance, (1.) That God would keep him safe; The soul of my lord shall be bound in the bundle of life with the Lord thy God; that is, God shall hold thy soul in life, (as the expression is, Ps. 66. 9.) as we hold those things tight which are bundled up, or which are precious to us, Ps. 116. 15. Thy soul shall be treasured up in the treasure of lives; so the Chaldee, under lock and key, as our treasure is; "Thou shalt abide under the special protection of the Divine Providence." The bundle of life is with the Lord our God, for in his hand our breath is, and our times. Those are safe, and may be easy, that have him for their Protector. The Jews understand this, not only of the life that now is, but of that which is to come, even the happiness of separate souls, and therefore use it commonly as an inscription on their grave-stones. "Here we have laid the body, but trusting that the soul is bound up in the bundle of life, with the Lord our God." There it is safe, while the dust of the body is scattered. (2.) That God could make him victorious over his enemies. Their souls he shall sling out, v. 29. The stone is bound up in the sling, but it is in order to be thrown out again; so the souls of the godly shall be bundled as corn for the barn, but the souls of the wicked as tares for the fire. (3.) That God would settle him in wealth and power; "The Lord will certainly make my lord a sure house, and no enemy thou hast in hinder it: therefore forgive this trespass;" that is, "shew mercy, as thou hopest to find mercy. God will make thee great, and it is the glory of great men to pass by offences."

9. She desires him to consider how much more comfortable it would be to him in the reflection to have forgiven this affront than to have revenged it, v. 30, 31. She reserves this argument for the last, as a very powerful one with so good a man: That the less he indulged his passion, the more he consulted his peace, and the repose of his own conscience, which every wise man will be tender of. (1.) She cannot but think, that, if he should avenge himself, it would afterward be a grief, and an offence of heart to him. Many have done that in a heat, which they have a thousand times wished undone again. The sweetness of revenge is soon turned into bitterness. (2.) She is confident, that, if he pass by the offence, it will afterward be no grief to him; but, on the contrary, it would yield him unspeakable satisfaction that his wisdom and grace had got the better of his passion. Note, When we are tempted to sin, we should consider how it will appear in the reflection. Let us never do any thing for which our own consciences will afterward have occasion to upbraid us, and which we shall look back upon with regret. My heart shall not reproach me.

Lastly, She recommends herself to his favour; "When the Lord shall have dealt well with my lord, then remember thine handmaid, as one that kept thee from doing that which would have disgraced thine honour, disquieted thy conscience, and made a blot in thine history." We have reason to remember those with respect and gratitude who have been instrumental to keep us from sin.

32. And David said to Abigail, Blessed be the Lord God of Israel, which sent thee this day to meet me: 33. And blessed be thy advice, and blessed be thou, which has kept me this day from coming to shed blood, and from avenging myself with mine own hand. 34. For in very deed, as the Lord God of Israel liveth, which hath kept me back from hurling thee, except thou hadst hasted and come to meet me, surely there had not been left unto Nabal by the morning light any that pisseth against the wall. 35. So David received of her hand that which she had brought him, and said unto her, Go up in peace to thine house; see, I have hearkened to thy voice, and have accepted thy person.

As an ear-ring of gold, and an ornament of fine gold, so is a wise reprover upon an obedient ear, Prov. 25. 12. Abigail was a wise reprover of David's passion, and he gave an obedient ear to the reproof, according to his own principle, (Ps. 141. 5.) Let the righteous smite me, it shall be a kindness. Never was such an admonition either better given, or better taken.

1. David gives God thanks for sending him this happy check in a sinful way; (v. 32.) Blessed be the Lord God of Israel, which sent thee this day to meet me. Note, (1.) God is to be acknowledged in all the kindnesses that our friends do us either for soul or body. Whoever meet us with counsel, direction, comfort, caution, or seasonable reproof, we must see God sending them. (2.) We ought to be very thankful for those happy providences which are means of preventing sin.

2. He gives Abigail thanks for interposing so opportunely between him and the mischief he was about to do; Blessed be thy advice, and blessed be thou, v. 33. Most people think it enough, if they take a reproof patiently; but we meet with few that will take it thankfully, and will commend those that give it them, and accept it as a favour. Abigail did not rejoice more that she had been instrumental to save her husband and family from death, than David rejoiced that she had been instrumental to save him and his men from sin.

3. He seems very apprehensive of the great danger he was in, which magnified the mercy of his deliverance. (1.) He speaks of the sin as very great. He was coming to shed blood, a sin which he had, prevailingly, a great horror of; witness his prayer, Deliver me from blood-guiltiness: he was coming to avenge himself with his own hand, and that is stepping into the throne of God, who has said, Vengeance is mine, I will repay. The more heinous any sin is, the greater mercy it is to be kept from it. He seems to aggravate the evil of his design with this, that it would have been an injury to so wise and good a woman as Abigail; God has kept me back from hurting thee, v. 34. Or, perhaps, at the first sight of Abigail, he was conscious of a thought to do her a mischief for offering to oppose him; and therefore reckons it a great mercy that God gave him patience to hear her speak. (2.) He speaks of the danger of his falling into it, as very imminent; "Except thou hadst hasted, the bloody execution had been done." The nearer we were to the commission of sin, the greater was the mercy of a seasonable restraint: Almost gone, (Ps. 73. 2.) and yet upheld.

4. He dismissed her with an answer of peace, v. 35. He does, in effect, own himself overcome by her eloquence; "I have hearkened to thy voice, and will not prosecute the intended revenge, for I have accepted thy person; am well pleased with thee, and what thou hast said." Note, (1.) Wise and good men will hear reason, and let that rule them, though it come from those that are every way their inferiors, and though their passions are up, and their spirits provoked. (2.) Oaths cannot bind us to that which is sinful. David had solemnly vowed the death of Nabal; he did ill to make such a vow, but he had done worse if he had performed it. (3.) A wise and faithful reproof is often better taken, and speeds better, than we expected; such is the hold God has of men's consciences. See Prov. 23. 23.

36. And Abigail came to Nabal; and, behold, he held a feast in his house, like the feast of a king; and Nabal's heart was merry within him, for he was very drunken: wherefore she told him nothing, less or more, until the morning light. 37. But it came to pass in the morning, when the wine was gone out of Nabal, and his wife had told him these things, that his heart died within him, and he became as a stone. 38. And it came to pass about ten days after, that the LORD smote Nabal, that he died. 39. And when David heard that Nabal was dead, he said, Blessed be the LORD, that hath pleaded the cause of my reproach from the hand of Nabal, and hath kept his servant from evil: for the LORD hath returned the wickedness of Nabal upon his own head. And David sent and commended with Abigail, to take her to him to wife. 40. And when the servants of David were come to Abigail to Carmel, they spake unto her, saying, David sent us unto thee, to take thee to him to wife. 41. And she arose, and bowed herself on her face to the earth, and said, Behold, let thine handmaid be a servant to wash the feet of the servants of my lord. 42. And Abigail hasted, and arose, and rode upon an ass, with five damsels of her's that went after her; and she went after the messengers of David, and became his wife. 43. David also took Ahinoam of Jezreel; and they were also both of them his wives. 44. But Saul had given Michal his daughter, David's wife, to Phalti the son of Laish, which was of Gallim.

We are now to attend Nabal's funeral, and Abigail's wedding.

I. Nabal's funeral. The apostle speaks of some that were twice dead, Jude, 12. We have here Nabal thrice dead, though but just now wonderfully rescued from the sword of David, and delivered from so great a death; for the preservations of wicked men are but reservations for some further sorer strokes of divine wrath. Here is,

1. Nabal dead drunk, v. 36. Abigail came home, and, it should seem, he had so many people, and so much plenty about him, that he neither missed her, nor the provisions she took to David; but she found him in the midst of his jollity, little thinking how near he was to ruin, by one whom he had foolishly made his enemy. Sinners are often most secure when they are most in danger, and destruction is at the door. Observe, (1.) How extravagant he was in the entertainment of his company; He held a feast like the feast of a king, so magnificent and abundant, though his guests were but his sheep-shearers. This abundance might have been allowed, if he had considered what God gave him his estate for, not to look great with, but to do good with. It is very common for those that are most niggardly in any act of piety or charity, to be most profuse in gratifying a vain humour, or a base lust. A mite is grudged to God and his poor; but, to make a fair shew in the flesh, gold is lavished out of the bag. If Nabal had not answered to his name, he would never have been thus secure and jovial, till he had inquired whether he was safe from David's resentments; but (as Bishop Hall observes) thus foolish are carnal men, that give themselves over to their pleasures, before they have taken any care to make their peace with God. (2.) How sottish he was in the indulgence of his own brutish appetite; He was very drunk. A sign he was Nabal, a fool, that could not use his plenty without abusing it; could not be pleasant with his friends without making a beast of himself. There is not a surer sign that a man has but little wisdom, nor a surer way to ruin the little he has, than drinking to excess. Nabal, that never thought he could bestow too little in charity, never thought he could bestow too much in luxury. Abigail finding him in this condition, (and, probably, those about him little better, when the master of the feast set them so bad an example,) she had enough to do to set the disordered house to rights a little, but told Nabal nothing of what she had done with reference to David, nothing of his folly in provoking David, of his danger, or of his deliverance; for, being drunk, he was as incapable to hear reason, as he was to speak it. To give good advice to those that are in drink, is to cast pearls before swine; it is better to stay till they are sober.

2. Nabal dead with melancholy, v. 37. Next morning, when he was come to himself a little, his wife told him how near to destruction he had brought himself and his family, by his own rudeness; and with what difficulty she had interposed to prevent it; and, upon this, his heart died within him, and he became as a stone. Some suggest, that the expence of the satisfaction made to David, by the present Abigail brought him, broke his heart: it seems rather, that the apprehension he now had of the danger he had narrowly escaped, put him into a consternation, and seized his spirits, so that he could not recover it. He grew sullen, and said little, ashamed of his own folly, put out of countenance by his wife's wisdom. How is he changed! His heart over-night merry with wine, next morning heavy as a stone; so deceitful are carnal pleasures; so transient the laughter of the fool; the end of that mirth is heaviness. Drunkards are sometimes sad, when they reflect upon their own folly. Joy in God makes the heart always light. Abigail could never, by her wise reasonings, bring Nabal to repentance; but now, by her faithful reproof, she brings him to despair.

3. Nabal, at last, dead indeed. About ten days after, when he had been kept so long under this pressure and pain, the Lord smote him, that he died; (v. 38.) and, it should seem, he never held up his head. It is just with God, (says Bishop Hall,) that they who live without grace, should die without comfort; nor can we expect better, while we go on in our sins. Here is no lamentation made for Nabal; he departed without being lamented; every one signified that the country would be well off, if it never sustained a greater loss. David, when he heard the news of his death, gave God thanks for it, v. 39. He blessed God, (1.) That he had kept him from killing him; Blessed be the Lord, who hath kept his servant from evil. He rejoices that Nabal died a natural death, and not by his hand. We should take all occasions to mention and magnify God's goodness to us, in keeping us from sin. (2.) That he had taken the work into his own hands, and had vindicated David's honour, and not suffered him to go unpunished, who had been abusive to him; hereby his interest would be confirmed, and all would stand in awe of him, as one for whom God fought. (3.) That he had thereby encouraged him, and all others, to commit their cause to God, when they are any way injured, with an assurance, that, in his own time, he will right them, if they sit still, and leave it to him.

II. Abigail's wedding. David was so charmed with the beauty of her person, and the uncommon prudence of her conduct and address, that, as soon as was proper, after he heard she was a widow, he informed her of his attachment to her, (v. 39.) not doubting, but that she, who approved herself so good a wife to so bad a husband as Nabal was, would much more make him a good wife; and, having taken notice of her respect to him, and her confidence of his coming to the throne, 1. He solicited by proxy, his affairs, perhaps, not permitting him to come himself. 2. She received the address with great modesty and humility, (v. 41.) reckoning herself unworthy of the honour, yet having such a respect for him, that she would gladly be one of the poorest servants in his family, to wash the feet of the other servants. None so fit to be preferred as those that can thus humble themselves. 3. She agreed to the proposal, went with his messengers, took a retinue with her agreeable to her quality, and she became his wife, v. 42. She did not upbraid him with his present distresses, and ask him how he could maintain her, but valued him, (1.) Because she knew he was a very good man. (2.) Because she believed he would, in due time, be a very great man: she married him in faith, not questioning but that, though now he had not a house of his own that he durst bring her to, yet God's promise to him would at length be fulfilled. Thus they who join themselves to Christ, must be willing now to suffer with him, believing that hereafter they shall reign with him.

Lastly, On this occasion, we have some account of David's wives. 1. One that he had lost before he married Abigail; Michal, Saul's daughter, his first, and the wife of his youth, to whom he would have been constant, if she would have been so to him; but Saul had given her to another, (v. 44.) in token of his displeasure against him, and disclaiming the relation of a father-in-law to him. 2. Another that he married beside Abigail, (v. 43.) and, as should seem, before her, for she is named first, ch. 27. 3. David was carried away by the corrupt custom of those times; but from the beginning it was not so, nor is it so now that Messias is come, and the times of reformation, Matth. 19. 4, 5. Perhaps Saul's defrauding David of his only rightful wife, was the occasion of his running into this irregularity; for when the knot of conjugal affection is once loosed, it is scarcely ever tied fast again. When David could not keep his first wife, he thought that would excuse him, if he did not keep to his second. But we deceive ourselves, if we think to make another's faults a cloak for our own.

CHAP. XXVI.

David's troubles from Saul here begin again, and the clouds return after the rain, when one would have hoped the storm had blown over, and the sky had cleared up on that side; but, after Saul had owned his fault in persecuting David, and David's title to the crown, yet here he revives the persecution; so perfectly lost was he to all sense of honour and virtue. I. The Ziphites informed him where David was, (v. 1.) and, thereupon, he marches out with a considerable force in quest of him, v. 2, 3. II. David gained intelligence of his motions, (v. 4.) and took a view of the camp, v. 5. III. He and one of his men ventured into his camp in the night, and found him and all his guards fast asleep, v. 6, 7. IV. David, though much urged to it by his companions, would not take away Saul's life; but only carried off his spear, and his cruse of water, v. 8. .12. V. He produced those as a further witness for him, that he did not design any ill to Saul, and reasoned with him upon it, v. 13. .20. VI. Saul was hereby convinced of his error, and once more let fall the persecution, v. 21. .25. The story is much like that which we had, ch. 21. In both, David is delivered out of Saul's hand, and Saul out of David's.

1. AND the Ziphites came unto Saul to Gibeah, saying, Doth not David hide himself in the hill of Hachilah, which is before Jeshimon? 2. Then Saul arose, and went down to the wilderness of Ziph, having three thousand chosen men of Israel with him, to seek David in the wilderness of Ziph. 3. And Saul pitched in the hill of Hachilah, which is before Jeshimon by the way. But David abode in the wilderness, and he saw that Saul came after him into the wilderness. 4. David therefore sent out spies, and understood that Saul was come in very deed. 5. And David arose, and came to the place where Saul had pitched: and David beheld the place where Saul lay, and Abner the son of Ner, the captain of his host: and Saul lay in the trench, and the people pitched round about him.

Here, 1. Saul gets information of David's motions, and acts offensively. The Ziphites came to him and told him where David now was; in the same place where he was when they formerly betrayed him, ch. 23. 19. Perhaps, (though it is not mentioned) Saul had given them intimation, under-hand, that he continued his design against David, and would be glad of their assistance: if not, they were very officious to Saul, aware of what would please him, and very malicious against David, to whom they despaired of ever reconciling themselves, and therefore they stirred up Saul (who needed no such spur) against him, v. 1. For aught we know, Saul would have continued in the same good mind that he was in, (ch. 24. 17.) and would not have given David this fresh trouble, if the Ziphites had not put him on. See what need we have to pray to God, that, since we have so much of the tinder of corruption in our own hearts, the sparks of temptation may be kept far from us, lest, if they come together, we be set on fire of hell. Saul readily caught at the information, and went down with an army of 3000 men, to the place where David hid himself, v. 2. How soon do unsanctified hearts loose the good impressions which their convictions have made upon them, and return with the dog to their vomit!

2. David gets information of Saul's motions, and acts defensively. He did not march out to meet and fight him; he sought only his own safety, not Saul's ruin; therefore he abode in the wilderness, (v. 3.) putting thereby a great force upon himself, and curbing the bravery of his own spirit by a silent retirement, shewing more true valour than he could have done by an irregular resistance. (1.) He had spies who ascertained him of Saul's descent; that he was come in very deed; (v. 4.) for he would not believe that Saul would have dealt so basely with him till he had the utmost evidence of it. (2.) He observed with his own eyes how Saul was encamped, v. 5. He came toward the place where Saul and his men had pitched their tents, so near as to be able, undiscovered, to take a view of their entrenchments, probably in the dusk of the evening.

6. Then answered David and said to Ahimelech the Hittite, and to Abishai the son of Zeruah, brother to Joab, saying, Who will go down with me to Saul to the camp? And Abishai said, I will go down with thee. 7. So David and Abishai came to the people by night: and, behold, Saul lay sleeping within the trench, and his spear stuck in the ground at his bolster: but Abner and the people lay round about him. 8. Then said Abishai to David, God hath delivered thine enemy into thine hand this day: now therefore let me smite him, I pray thee, with the spear, even to the earth at once, and I will not smite him the second time. 9. And David said to Abishai, Destroy him not: for who can stretch forth his hand against the LORD's anointed, and be guiltless? 10. David said furthermore, As the LORD liveth, the LORD shall smite him; or his day shall come to die; or he shall descend into battle, and perish. 11. The LORD forbid that I should stretch forth mine hand against the LORD's anointed: but, I pray thee, take thou now the spear that is at his bolster, and the cruse of water, and let us go. 12. So David took the spear and the cruse of water, from Saul's bolster; and they gat them away, and no man saw it, nor knew it, neither awaked: for they were all asleep; because a deep sleep from the LORD was fallen upon them.

I have played the fool, and have erred exceedingly. 22. And David answered and said, Behold the king's spear! and let one of the young men come over and fetch it. 23. The LORD render to every man his righteousness and his faithfulness: for the LORD delivered thee into my hand to-day, but I would not stretch forth mine hand against the LORD's anointed. 24. And, behold, as thy life was much set by this day in mine eyes, so let my life be much set by in the eyes of the LORD, and let him deliver me out of all tribulation. 25. Then Saul said to David, Blessed be thou, my son David: thou shalt both do great things, and also shalt still prevail. So David went on his way, and Saul returned to his place.

Here is,

I. Saul's penitent confession of his fault and folly in persecuting David, and his promise to do so no more. This second instance of David's respect to him wrought more upon him than the former, and extorted from him better acknowledgments, v. 21. 1. He owns himself melted and quite overcome by David's kindness to him; "My soul was precious in thine eyes this day, which, I thought, had been odious!" 2. He acknowledges he had done very ill to persecute him; that he had therein acted against God's law, I have sinned; and against his own interest, "I have played the fool, in pursuing him as an enemy who would have been one of my best friends, if I could but have thought so; herein (says he) I have erred exceedingly, and wronged both thee and myself." Note, Those that sin, play the fool, and err exceedingly; those especially that hate and persecute God's people, Job, 19. 28. 3. He invites him to court again; Return, my son David. Those that understand themselves, will see it their interest to have those about them that behave themselves wisely, as David did, and have God with them. 4. He promises him that he would not persecute him as he had done, but protect him: I will no more do thee harm. We have reason to think, according to the mind he was now in, that he meant as he said, and yet neither his confession, nor his promise of amendment, came from a principle of true repentance.

II. David's improvement of Saul's convictions and confessions, and the evidence he had to produce of his own sincerity. He desired that one of the footmen might fetch the spear, (v. 22.) and then, (v. 23.) 1. He appeals to God as Judge of the controversy; The Lord render to every man his righteousness. David, by faith, is sure that he will do it, for he infallibly knows the true characters of all persons and actions, and is inflexibly just to render to every man according to his work; and, by prayer, he desires he would do it, wherein he does, in effect, pray against Saul, who had dealt unrighteously and unfaithfully with him; Give them according to their deeds; (Ps. 28. 4.) but he principally intends it as a prayer for himself, that God would protect him in his righteousness and faithfulness, and reward him for it, since Saul so ill requited him. 2. He reminds Saul again of the proof he had now given of his respect to him, from a principle of loyalty; I would not stretch forth mine hand against the Lord's anointed; intimating to Saul, that the anointing oil was his protection, for which he was indebted to the Lord, and ought to express his gratitude to him: had he been a common person, he would not have been so tender of him; and, perhaps, with this further suggestion, Saul knew, or had reason to think, that David was the Lord's anointed too, and therefore, by the same rule, Saul ought to be as tender of David's life as he had been of his. 3. Not relying much upon Saul's promises, he puts himself under God's protection, and begs his favour; (v. 24.) "Let my life be much set by in the eyes of the Lord, how light soever thou makest of it." Thus he takes God to be his Paymaster for his kindness to Saul, which they may with confidence do, that do well and suffer for it.

III. Saul's prediction of David's advancement. He commend him; (v. 25.) Blessed be thou, my son David. So strong was the conviction Saul was now under of David's honesty, that he was not ashamed to condemn himself and applaud David, even in the hearing of his own soldiers, who could not but blush to think that they were come out so furiously against a man whom their master, when he meets, caresses thus. He foretells his victories, and his elevation at last; Thou shalt do great things. Note, Those who make conscience of doing that which is truly good, may come, by the divine assistance, to do that which is truly great. He adds, "Thou shalt also still prevail, more and more:" he means, against himself, but was loath to speak that out. The princely qualities which appeared in David, his generosity in sparing Saul, his military authority in reprimanding Abner for sleeping, his care of the public good, and the signal tokens of God's presence with him, convinced Saul that he would certainly be advanced to the throne at last, according to the prophecies concerning him.

Lastly, A palliative cure being thus made of the wound, they parted friends. Saul returned to Gibeah re infecta—without accomplishing his design, and ashamed of the expedition he had made; but David would not take his word so far as to return with him. Those that have once been false, are not easily trusted another time. Therefore David went on his way. And, after this parting, it does not appear that ever Saul and David saw one another again.

CHAP. XXVII.

David was a man after God's own heart, and yet he had his faults, which are recorded, not for our imitation, but for our admonition; witness the story of this chapter, in which, though, I. We find, to his praise, that he prudently took care of his own safety and his family's, (v. 2. 4.) and valiantly fought Israel's battles against the Canaanites; (v. 8, 9.) yet, II. We find, to his dishonour, 1. That he began to despair of his deliverance, v. 1. 2. That he deserted his own country, and went to dwell in the land of the Philistines, v. 1, 5. 7. 3. That he imposed upon Achish with an equivocation, if not a lie, concerning his expedition, v. 10. 12.

1. AND David said in his heart, I shall now perish one day by the hand of Saul: there is nothing better for me than that I should speedily escape into the land of the Philistines; and Saul shall despair of me, to seek me any more in any coast of Israel: so shall I escape out of his hand. 2. And David arose, and he passed over with the six hundred men that were with him unto Achish, the son of Maach, king of Gath. 3. And David dwelt with Achish at Gath, he and his men, every man with his household, even David with his two wives, Ahinoam the Jezreelitess, and Abigail the Carmelitess, Nabal's wife. 4. And it was told Saul that David was fled to Gath: and he sought no more again for him. 5. And David said unto Achish, If I have now found grace in thine eyes, let them give me a place in some town in the country, that I may dwell there: for why should thy servant dwell in the royal city with thee? 6. Then Achish gave him Ziklag that day: wherefore Ziklag pertaineth unto the kings of Judah unto this day. 7. And the time that David dwelt in the country of the Philistines was a full year and four months.

Here is,

I. The prevalency of David's fear, which was the effect of the weakness of his faith; (v. 1.) He said to his heart, (so it may be read,) in his communings with it concerning his present condition, I shall now perish one day by the hand of Saul. He represented to himself the restless rage and malice of Saul, who could not be wrought into a reconciliation; the treachery of his own countrymen, witness that of the Ziphites, once and again; he looked upon his own forces, and observed how few they were, and that no recruits had come into him of a great while, nor could he perceive that he got any ground; and from hence, in a melancholy mood, he draws this dark conclusion, I shall one day perish by the hand of Saul. But, O thou of little faith, wherefore dost thou doubt? Was he not anointed to be king? Did not that simply give an assurance that he should be preserved to the kingdom? Though he had no reason to trust Saul's promises, had he not all the reason in the world to trust the promises of God? His experience of the particular care Providence took of him, ought to have encouraged him. He that has delivered, does, and will. But unbelief is a sin that easily besets even good men. When without are fightings, within are fears, and it is a hard matter to get over them. Lord, increase our faith!

II. The resolution he came to, hereupon. Now, that Saul was, for this time, returned to his place, he determined to take this opportunity of retiring into the Philistines' country. Consulting his own heart only, and not the ephod or the prophet, he concludes, There is nothing better for me, than that I should speedily escape into the land of the Philistines. Long trials are in danger of tiring the faith and patience even of very good men. Now, 1. Saul was an enemy to himself and his kingdom, in driving him to this extremity. He weakened his own interest when he expelled from his service, and forced into the service of his enemies, so great a general as David was, and so brave a regiment as he had the command of. 2. David was no friend to himself in taking this course. God had appointed him to set up his standard in the land of Judah; (ch. 22. 5.) there God had wonderfully preserved him, and employed him, sometimes for the good of his country; why then should he think of deserting his post? How could he expect the protection of the God of Israel, if he went out of the borders of the land of Israel? Can he expect to be safe among the Philistines, out of whose hands he had lately escaped so narrowly, by feigning himself mad? Will he receive obligations from those now, whom he knows, when he comes to be king, he must not return kindness to, but be under an obligation to make war upon? He will hereby gratify his enemies, who bid him go serve other gods, that they might have wherewith to reproach him; and will very much weaken the hands of his friends, who would not have wherewith to answer that reproach. See what need we have to pray, Lord, lead us not into temptation.

III. The kind reception he had at Gath; Achish bade him welcome, partly out of generosity, being proud of entertaining so brave a man; partly out of policy, hoping to engage him for ever to his service, and that his example would invite many more to desert, and come over to him. No doubt he gave David a solemn promise of protection, which he could rely upon, when he could not trust Saul's promises. We may blush to think that the word of a Philistine should go further than the word of an Israelite, who, if an Israelite indeed, would be without guile; and that the city of Gath should be a place of refuge for a good man, when the cities of Israel refuse him a safe abode. David, 1. Brought his men with him, (v. 2.) that they might guard him, and might themselves be safe where he was; and to recommend himself the more to Achish, who hoped to have service out of him. 2. He brought his family with him, his wives and his household; so did all his men, v. 2, 3. Masters of families ought to take care of those that are committed to them, to protect and provide for those of their own house, and to dwell with them as men of knowledge.

IV. Saul's desisting from the further prosecution of him; (v. 4.) He sought no more again for him; this intimates that, notwithstanding the professions of repentance he had lately made, if he had had David in his reach, he would have aimed another blow. But, because he dares not come where he is, he resolves to let him alone. Thus, many seem to leave their sins, but really their sins leave them; they would persist in them, if they could. Saul sought no more for him, contenting himself with his banishment, since he could not have his blood; and hoping, it may be, (as he had done, ch. 18. 25.) that he would, some time or other, fall by the hand of the Philistines; and, though he would rather have the pleasure of destroying him himself, yet, if they do it, he will be satisfied, so that it be done effectually.

V. David's removal from Gath to Ziklag.

1. David's request for leave to remove, was prudent, and very modest, v. 5. (1.) It was really prudent. David knew what it was to be envied in the court of Saul, and had much more reason to fear in the court of Achish, and, therefore, declines preferment there, and wishes for a settlement in the country, where he might be private, more within himself, and less in other people's way. In a town of his own, he might have the more free exercise of his religion, and keep his men better to it, and not have his righteous soul vexed, as it was at Gath, with the idolatries of the Philistines. (2.) As it was presented to Achish, it was very modest. He does not prescribe to him what place he should assign him, only begs it might be in some town in the country, where he pleased; beggars must not be choosers: but he gives this for a reason, Why should thy servant dwell in the royal city, to crowd thee, and disoblige those about thee? Note, Those that would stand fast, must not covet to stand high; and humble souls aim not to dwell in royal cities.

2. The grant which Achish made him, upon that request, was very generous and kind; (v. 6, 7.) Achish gave him Ziklag. Hereby, (1.) Israel recovered their ancient right; for Ziklag was in the lot of the tribe of Judah, Josh. 15. 31, and afterward, out of that lot, was assigned, with some other cities, to Simeon, Josh. 19. 5. But, either it was never subdued, or the Philistines had, in some struggle with Israel, made themselves masters of it. Perhaps, they had got it unjustly, and Achish, being a man of sense and honour, took this occasion to restore it. The righteous God judgeth righteously. (2.) David gained a commodious settlement, not only at a distance from Gath, but bordering upon Israel, where he might keep up a correspondence with his own countrymen, and whither they might resort to him, at the revolution that was now approaching. Though we do not find that he augmented his forces at all, while Saul lived, (for ch. 30. 10. he had but his six hundred men;) yet, immediately after Saul's death, that was the rendezvous of his friends. Nay, it should seem, while he kept himself close, because of Saul, multitudes resorted to him, at least, to assure him of their sincere intentions, 1 Chron. 12. 1, 22. And this further advantage David gained, that Ziklag was annexed to the crown, at least, the royalty of it pertained to the kings of Judah, ever after, v. 6. Note, There is nothing lost by humility and modesty, and a willingness to retire. Real advantages follow those that flee from imaginary honours. Here David continued for some days, even four months, as it may very well be read, (v. 7.) or some days above four months. The Seventy read it, some months; so long he waited for the set time of his accession to the throne; for he that believeth shall not make haste.

8. And David and his men went up, and invaded the Geshurites, and the Gezerites, and the Amalekites: for those nations were of old the inhabitants of the land, as thou goest to Shur, even unto the land of Egypt. 9. And David smote the land, and left neither man nor woman alive, and took away the sheep, and the oxen, and the asses, and the camels, and the apparel, and returned, and came to Achish. 10. And Achish said, Whither have ye made a road to-day? And David said, Against the south of Judah, and against the south of the Jerahmeelites, and against the south of the Kenites. 11. And David saved neither man nor woman alive, to bring tidings to Gath, saying, Lest they should tell on us, saying, So did David, and so will be his manner all the while he dwelleth in the country of the Philistines. 12. And Achish believed David, saying, He hath made his people Israel utterly to abhor him; therefore he shall be my servant for ever.

Here is an account of David's actions, while he was in the land of the Philistines; a fierce attack he made upon some remains of the devoted nations, his success in it, and the representation he gave of it to Achish.

1. We may acquit him of injustice and cruelty in this action, because these people, whom he cut off, were such as Heaven had, long since, doomed to destruction, and he that did it was one whom Heaven had ordained to dominion; so that the thing was very fit to be done, and he was very fit to do it. It was not for him, that was anointed to fight the Lord's battles, to sit still in sloth, however he thought fit, in modesty, to retire. He desired to be safe from Saul, only that he might expose himself for Israel; he avenged an old quarrel that God had with these nations, and, at the same time, fetched in provisions for himself and his army, for by their swords they must live. The Amalekites were to be all cut off; probably, the Geshurites and Gezrites were branches of Amalek: Saul was rejected for sparing them; David makes up the deficiency of his obedience before he succeeds him. He smote them, and left none alive, v. 8, 9. The service paid itself, for they carried off abundance of spoil, which served for the subsistence of David's forces.

2. Yet we cannot acquit him of dissimulation with Achish, in the account he gave him of this expedition.

(1.) David, it seems, was not willing that he should know the truth, and therefore spared none to carry tidings to Gath; (v. 11.) not because he was ashamed of what he had done, as a bad thing, but because he was afraid, if the Philistines knew it, they would be apprehensive of danger to themselves or their allies, by harbouring him among them, and would expel him their coasts. It would be easy to conclude, If so he did, so will be his manner; and, therefore, he industriously conceals it from them, which, it seems, he could do, by putting them all to the sword; for none of their neighbours would inform against him, nor, perhaps, would soon come to the knowledge of what was done; intelligence not being so readily communicated then as now.

(2.) He hid it from Achish, with an equivocation not at all becoming his character. Being asked which way he had made his sally, he answered, Against the south of Judah, v. 10. It was true, he had invaded those countries that lay south of Judah, but he made Achish believe he had invaded those that lay south in Judah, the Ziphites, for example, that had once and again betrayed him; so Achish understood him, and from thence inferred that he had made his people Israel to abhor him, and so riveted himself in the interest of Achish. The fidelity of Achish to him, is his good opinion of him, and the confidence he put in him, aggravate his sin in deceiving him thus; which, with some other such instances, David seems penitently to reflect upon, when he prays, Remove from me the way of lying.

CHAP. XXVIII.

Preparations are herein making for that war which will put an end to the life and reign of Saul, and so make way for David to the throne. In this war, 1. The Philistines are the aggressors, and Achish, their king, makes David his confidant, v. 1, 2. 11. The Israelites prepare to receive them, and Saul, their king, makes the Devil his privy counsellor, and thereby fills the measure of his iniquity. Observe, 1. The despicable condition which Saul was in, v. 3, 6. 2. The application he made to a witch, to bring him up Samuel,

v. 7, 14. 3. His discourse with the apparition, v. 15, 19. 4. The damp it struck upon him, v. 21, 25.

1. AND it came to pass in those days, that the Philistines gathered their armies together for warfare, to fight with Israel. And Achish said unto David, Know thou assuredly, that thou shalt go out with me to battle, thou and thy men. 2. And David said to Achish, Surely thou shalt know what thy servant can do. And Achish said to David, Therefore will I make thee keeper of mine head for ever. 3. Now Samuel was dead, and all Israel had lamented him, and buried him in Ramah, even in his own city. And Saul had put away those that had familiar spirits, and the wizards, out of the land. 4. And the Philistines gathered themselves together, and came and pitched in Shunem: and Saul gathered all Israel together, and they pitched in Gilboa. 5. And when Saul saw the host of the Philistines, he was afraid, and his heart greatly trembled. 6. And when Saul inquired of the LORD, the LORD answered him not, neither by dreams, nor by Urim, nor by prophets.

Here is,

1. The design of the Philistines against Israel; they resolve to fight them, v. 1. If the Israelites had not forsaken God, there had been no Philistines remaining to molest them; if Saul had not forsaken him, they had by this time been put out of all danger by them. The Philistines took an opportunity to make this attempt, when they had David among them, whom they feared more than Saul and all his forces.

II. The expectation Achish had of assistance from David in this war, and the encouragement David gave him to expect it; "Thou shalt go with me to battle," says Achish; "if I protect thee, I may demand service from thee:" and he will think himself happy, if he may have such a man as David on his side, who prospered whithersoever he went. David gave him an ambiguous answer, "We will see what will be done, it will be time enough to talk of that hereafter; but surely thou shalt know what thy servant can do;" (v. 2.) that is, "I will consider in what post I may be best able to serve thee, if thou wilt but give me leave to choose it." Thus he keeps himself free from a promise to serve him, and yet keeps up his expectation of it. For Achish took it in no other sense than as an engagement to assist him, and promised him, thereupon, that he would make him captain of the guards, protector, or prime minister of state.

III. The drawing of the armies, on both sides, into the field, v. 4. The Philistines pitched in Shunem, which was in the tribe of Issachar, a great way north from their country. The land of Israel, it seems, was ill guarded, when the Philistines could march their army into the very heart of the country. Saul, while he pursued David, left his people naked and exposed. On some of the adjacent mountains of Gilboa, Saul musters his forces, and prepares to engage the Philistines, which he had little heart to do, now that the Spirit of the Lord was departed from him.

IV. The terror Saul was in, and the loss he was at, upon this occasion. He saw the host of the Philistines, and, by his own view of them, and the intelligence his spies brought him, he perceived they were more numerous, better armed, and in better heart, than his own were, which made him afraid, so that his heart greatly trembled, v. 5. Had he kept close to God, he needed not have been afraid at the sight of an army of Philistines; but now, that he had provoked God to forsake him, his interest failed, his armies dwindled and looked mean, and, which was worse, his spirits failed him, his heart sunk within him. A guilty conscience made him tremble at the shaking of a leaf: now, he remembered this guilty blood of the Amalekites, which he had spared, and the innocent blood of the priests, which he had spilt; his sins are set in order before his eyes, they put him into confusion, embarrass all his counsels, and rob him of his courage; so that there remained only a certain fearful looking for of judgment and fiery indignation. Note, Troubles are terrors to the children of disobedience. In this distress, Saul inquired of the Lord, v. 6. Need drives those to God, who, in the day of their prosperity, slighted his oracles and altars. Lord, in trouble have they visited thee, Isa. 26. 16. Did ever any seek the Lord and not find him? Yes, Saul did; the Lord answered him not, took no notice either of his petitions or of his inquiries; gave him no directions what to do, nor any encouragement to hope that he would be with him. Should he be inquired of at all by such a one as Saul? Ezek. 14. 3. No, he could not expect an answer of peace, for, 1. He inquired in such a manner, that it was as if he had not inquired at all. Therefore, it is said, (1 Chron. 10. 14.) He inquired not of the Lord; for he did it faintly, and coldly, and with a secret design, if God did not answer him, to consult the Devil. He did not inquire in faith, but with a double unstable mind. 2. He inquired of the Lord when it was too late, when the days of his probation were over, and he was finally rejected. Seek the Lord while he may be found, for there is a time when he will not be found. 3. He had forfeited the benefit of all the methods of inquiry. Could he that hated and persecuted Samuel and David, who were both prophets, expect to be answered by prophets? Or, he that bath slain the high priest, to be answered by Urim? Or, he that had sinned away the Spirit of grace, to be answered by dreams? No, Be not deceived, God is not mocked.

V. The mention of some things, that had happened a good while ago, to introduce the following story, v. 3. 1. The death of Samuel. Samuel was dead, which made the Philistines the more bold, and Saul the more afraid; for, had Samuel been alive, Saul would, probably, have thought that his presence and countenance, his good advice and good prayers, would have availed him in his distress. 2. Saul's edict against witchcraft. He had put the laws in execution against those that had familiar spirits, who must not be suffered to live, Exod. 22. 18. Some think that he did this in the beginning of his reign, while he was under Samuel's influence; others think that it was lately done, for it was spoken of here, (v. 9.) as a late edict. Perhaps, when Saul was himself troubled with an evil spirit, he suspected that he was bewitched, and, for that reason, cut off all that had familiar spirits. Many seem zealous against sin, when they themselves are any way hurt by it, (they will inform against swearers, if they swear at them, or against drunkards, if, in their drink, they abuse them,) who, otherwise, have no concern for the glory of God, nor any dislike of sin as sin. However, it was commendable in Saul thus to use his power for the terror and restraint of these evil doers. Note, Many seem enemies to sin in others, while they indulge it in themselves. Saul will drive the Devil out of his kingdom, and yet harbour him in his heart, by envy and malice.

7. Then said Saul unto his servants, Seek me a woman that hath a familiar spirit, that I may go to her, and inquire of her. And his servants said to him, Behold, there is a woman that hath a familiar spirit at En-dor. 8. And Saul disguised himself, and put on other raiment, and he went, and two men with him, and they came to the woman by night: and he said, I pray thee, divine unto me by the familiar spirit, and bring me him up, whom I shall name unto thee. 9. And the woman said unto him, Behold, thou knowest what Saul hath done, how he hath cut off those that have familiar spirits, and the wizards, out of the land: wherefore then layest thou a snare for my life, to cause me to die? 10. And Saul sware to her by the LORD, saying, As the LORD liveth, there shall no punishment happen to thee for this thing. 11. Then said the woman, Whom shall I bring up unto thee? And he said, Bring me up Samuel. 12. And when the woman saw Samuel, she cried with a loud voice: and the woman spake to Saul, saying, Why hast thou deceived me? for thou art Saul. 13. And the king said unto her, Be not afraid: for what sawest thou? And the woman said unto Saul, I saw gods ascending out of the earth. 14. And he said unto her, What form is he of? And she said, An old man cometh up; and he is covered with a mantle. And Saul perceived that it was Samuel; and he stooped with his face to the ground, and bowed himself.

Here,

I. Saul seeks for a witch, v. 7. When God answered him not, if he had humbled himself by repentance, and persevered in seeking God, who knows, but that, at length, he might have been entreated for him? But, since he can discern no comfort, either from heaven or earth, (Isa. 8. 21, 22.) he resolves to knock at the gates of hell, and to see if any there will befriend him, and give him advice; Seek me a woman that has a familiar spirit, v. 7. And his servants were too officious to serve him in this bad affair; they presently recommended one to him at En-dor, (a city not far off,) who had escaped the execution of Saul's edict: to her he resolves to apply himself. Herein he is chargeable, 1. With contempt of the God of Israel; as if any creature could do him a kindness, when God had left him, and frowned upon him. 2. With contradiction to himself. He knew the heinousness of the sin of witchcraft, else he would not have cut off those that had familiar spirits; yet now he has recourse to that as an oracle, which he had before condemned as an abomination. It is common for men to inveigh severely against those sins which they are in no temptation to, but suffer themselves afterward to be overcome by them. Had one told Saul, when he was destroying the witches, that he himself would, ere long, consult with one, he would have said, as Hazael did, What! is thy servant a dog? But who knows what mischiefs they will run into, that forsake God, and are forsaken of him?

II. Hearing of one, he hastens to her, but goes by night, and in disguise, only with two servants, and, probably, on foot, v. 8. See how those that are led captive by Satan, are forced, 1. To disparage themselves. Never did Saul look so mean as when he went sneaking to a sorry witch to know his fortune. 2. To dissemble. Evil works are works of darkness, and they hate the light, neither care for coming to it. Saul went to the witch, not in his robes, but in the habit of a common soldier; not only lest the witch herself, if she had known him, should have declined to serve him, either fearing he came to trepan her, or resolving to be avenged on him for his edict against those of her profession, but, lest his own people should know it, and abhor him for it. Such is the power of natural conscience, that even those who devil, blush, and are ashamed to do it.

III. He tells her his errand, and promises her impunity. 1. All he desires of her is, to bring him up one from the dead, whom he had a mind to discourse with. It was necromancy, or divination by the dead, that he hoped to serve his purpose by; this was expressly forbidden by the law, (Deut. 18. 11.) seeking for the living to the dead, Isa. 8. 19. Bring me up him whom I shall name, v. 8. This supposes that it was generally taken for granted, that souls exist after death, and that, when men die, there is not an end of them: it supposes, too, that great knowledge was attributed to separate souls. But, to think that any good souls should come up at the beck of an evil spirit, or, that God, who had denied a man the benefit of his own institutions, should suffer him to reap any real advantage by a cursed diabolical invention, was very absurd. 2. She signifies her fear of the law, and her suspicion that this stranger came to draw her into a snare; (v. 9.) Thou knowest what Saul has done. Providence ordered it so, that Saul should be told to his face of his edict against witches, at this very time when he was consulting one, for the greater aggravation of his sin. She insists upon the peril of the law, perhaps, to raise her price; for, though no mention is made of her fee, no doubt she demanded, and had, a large one. Observe how sensible she is of danger from the edict of Saul, and what care she is in to guard against it; but not at all apprehensive of the obligations of God's law, and the terrors of his wrath. She considers what Saul had done, not what God had done, against such practices, and fears a snare laid for her life, more than a snare laid for her soul. It is common for sinners to be more afraid of punishment from men, than of God's righteous judgment. But, 3. Saul promises, with an oath, not to betray her, v. 10. It was his duty, as a king, to punish her, and he knew it, yet he swears not to do it; as if he could, by his own oath, bind himself from doing that which, by the divine command, he was bound to do. But he promised more than he could perform, when he said, There shall no punishment happen to thee; for he could not secure himself, much less secure her, from divine vengeance.

IV. Samuel, who was lately dead, is the person whom Saul desired to have some talk with: and the witch, with her enchantments, gratifies his desire, and brings them together.

1. As soon as Saul had given the witch the assurance she desired, (that he would not discover her,) she applied herself to her witchcrafts, and asked very confidently, Whom shall I bring up to thee? v. 11. Note, Hopes of impunity imbolden sinners in their evil ways, and harden their hearts.

2. Saul desires to speak with Samuel, Bring me up Samuel. Samuel had anointed him to the kingdom, and had formerly been his faithful friend and counsellor, and, therefore, with him he wished to advise. While Samuel was living at Ramah, not far from Gibeah of Saul, and presided there in the school of the prophets, we never read of Saul's going to him to advise with him in any of the difficulties he was in; (it had been well for him if he had;) then he slighted him, and, perhaps, hated him, looking upon him to be in David's interest; but now that he was dead, "Oh for Samuel again! By all means, bring me up Samuel." Note, Many that despise and persecute God's saints and ministers, when they are living, would be glad to have them again, when they are gone. Send Lazarus to me, and send Lazarus to my father's house, Luke, 16. 24. 27. The sepulchres of the righteous are garnished.

3. Here is a seeming defect, or chasm, in the story; Saul said, Bring me up Samuel, and the very next words are, When the woman saw Samuel, v. 12. Whereas, one would have expected to be told how she performed the operation, what spells and charms she used, or that some little intimation should be given of what she said or did: but the profound silence of the scripture concerning it, forbids our coveting to know the depths of Satan, (Rev. 2. 24.) or to have our curiosity gratified with an account of the mysteries of iniquity. It has been said of the books of some of the popish confessors, that, by their descriptions of sin, they have taught men to commit it; but the scripture conceals sinful art, that we may be simple concerning evil, Rom. 16. 19.

4. The witch, upon sight of the apparition, was aware that her client was Saul; her familiar spirit, it is likely, informing her of it; v. 12. "Why hast thou deceived me with a disguise; for thou art Saul, the very man that I am afraid of above any man!" Thus she gave Saul to understand the power of her art, in that she could discover him through his disguise; and yet, she feared, lest, hereafter, at least, he should take advantage against her for what she was now doing. Had she believed that it was really Samuel whom she saw, she would have had more reason to be afraid of him, who was a good prophet, than of Saul, who was a wicked king. But the wrath of earthly princes is feared by most, more than the wrath of the King of kings.

5. Saul (who, we may suppose, was kept at a distance in the next room) bade her not to be afraid of him, but go on with the operation, and inquired what she saw? v. 13. Oh, says the woman,

I saw gods ascending out of the earth; that is, a spirit: they called angels gods, because spiritual beings. Poor gods that ascend out of the earth! But she speaks the language of the heathen, who had their infernal deities, and had them in veneration. If Saul had thought it necessary to his conversation with Samuel, that the body of Samuel should be called out of the grave, he would have taken the witch with him to Ramah, where his sepulchre was; but the design was wholly upon his soul, which yet, if it became visible, was expected to appear in the usual resemblance of the body; and God permitted the Devil to answer the design, to put on Samuel's shape, that they who would not receive the love of the truth, might be given up to strong delusions, and believe a lie. That it could not be the soul of Samuel himself, they might easily apprehend, when it ascended out of the earth; for the spirit of a man, much more of a good man, goes upward, Eccl. 3. 21. But if people will be deceived, it is just with God to say, "Let them be deceived." That the Devil, by the divine permission, should be able to personate Samuel, is not strange, since he can transform himself into an angel of light; nor is it strange that he should be permitted to do it upon this occasion; that Saul might be driven to despair, by inquiring of the Devil, since he would not, in a right manner, inquire of the Lord, by which he might have had comfort. Saul, being told of gods ascending, was eager to know what was the form of this deity, and in what shape he appeared; so far was he from conceiving any horror at it, his heart being wretchedly hardened by the deceitfulness of sin. Saul, it seems, was not permitted to see any manner of similitude himself, but he must take the woman's word for it, that she saw an old man covered with a mantle, or robe, the habit of a judge, which Samuel had sometimes worn; and, some think, it was for the sake of that, and the majesty of its aspect, that she called this apparition Elohim, a god, or gods: for so magistrates are styled, Ps. 82. 1.

6. Saul, perceiving, by the woman's description, that it was Samuel, stooped with his face to the ground, either, as it is generally taken, in reverence to Samuel, though he saw him not, or, perhaps, to listen to that soft and muttering voice which he now expected to hear; for they that had familiar spirits peeped and muttered; (Isa. 8. 19.) and, it should seem, Saul bowed himself, (probably, by the witch's direction,) that he might hear what was whispered, and listen carefully to it; for the voice of one that has a familiar spirit is said to come out of the ground, and to whisper out of the dust, Isa. 29. 4. He would stoop to that, who would not stoop to the word of God.

15. And Samuel said to Saul, Why hast thou disquieted me, to bring me up? And Saul answered, I am sore distressed; for the Philistines make war against me, and God is departed from me, and answereth me no more, neither by prophets, nor by dreams: therefore I have called thee, that thou mayest make known unto me what I shall do.

16. Then said Samuel, Wherefore then dost thou ask of me, seeing the LORD is departed from thee, and is become thine enemy? 17. And the LORD hath done to him, as he spake by me: for the LORD hath rent the kingdom out of thine hand, and given it to thy neighbour, even to David: 18. Because thou obeyedst not the voice of the LORD, nor executedst his fierce wrath upon Amalek, therefore hath the LORD done this thing unto thee this day. 19. Moreover the LORD will also deliver Israel with thee into the hand of the Philistines: and to-morrow shalt thou and thy sons be with me: the LORD also shall deliver the host of Israel into the hand of the Philistines.

We have here the conference between Saul and Satan. Saul came in disguise, (v. 8.) but Satan soon discovered him, v. 12. Satan comes in disguise, in the disguise of Samuel's mantle, and Saul cannot discover him. Such is the disadvantage we labour under, in wrestling with the rulers of the darkness of this world, that they know us, while we are ignorant of their wiles and devices.

I. The spectre, or apparition, personating Samuel, asks why he is sent for; (v. 15.) Why hast thou disquieted me to bring me up? To us this discovers that it was an evil spirit that personated Samuel; for (as Bishop Patrick observes) it is not in the power of witches to disturb the rest of good men, and to bring them back into the world when they please; nor would the true Samuel have acknowledged such a power in magical arts: but, to Saul, this was a proper device of Satan's, to draw veneration from him, to possess him with an opinion of the power of divination, and so to rivet him in the Devil's interests.

II. Saul makes his complaint to this counterfeit Samuel, mistaking him for the true, and a most doleful complaint it is; "I am sore distressed, and know not what to do, for the Philistines make war against me; yet I should do well enough with them, if I had but the tokens of God's presence with me; but, alas! God has departed from me." He complained not of God's withdrawals, till he fell into trouble, till the Philistines made war against him, and then he begins to lament God's departure. He that, in his prosperity, inquired not after God, in his adversity thought it hard that God answered him not, nor took any notice of his inquiries, either by dreams or prophets; he neither gave answers immediately himself, nor sent them by any of his messengers. He does not, like a penitent, own the righteousness of God in this, but, like a man enraged, flies out against God, as unkind, and flies off from him; therefore I have called thee: as if Samuel, a servant of God, would favour those whom God frowned upon, or as if a dead prophet could do him more service than the living ones. One would think, from this, that he really desired to meet with the Devil, and expected no other, (though under the covert of Samuel's name,) for he desires advice otherwise than from God, therefore from the Devil, that is a rival with God. "God denies me, therefore I come to thee." Flectere si nequeo Superos, Acheronta movebo—If I fail with Heaven, I will succeed with Hell.

III. It is cold comfort which this evil spirit, in Samuel's mantle, gives to Saul, and is manifestly intended to drive him to despair and self-murder. Had it been the true Samuel, when Saul desired to be told what he should do, he would have bid him repent, and make his peace with God, and recall David from his banishment, and would then have told him that he might hope in this way to find mercy with God; but, instead of that, he represents his case as helpless and hopeless, serving him as he did Judas, to whom he was first a tempter, and then a tormentor, persuading him first to sell his Master, and then to hang himself.

1. He upbraids him with his present distress; (v. 16.) tells him, not only that God was departed from him, but that he was become his Enemy, and therefore he must expect no comfortable answer from him; "Wherefore dost thou ask me? How can I be thy friend, when God is thine Enemy; or thy counsellor, when he has left thee?"

2. He upbraids him with the anointing of David to the kingdom, v. 17. He could not have touched upon a string that sounded more unpleasant in the ear of Saul than this. Nothing is said to reconcile him to David, but all tends rather to exasperate him against David, and widen the breach. Yet, to make him believe that he was Samuel, he says it was what God spake by him. The Devil knows how to speak with an air of religion, and can teach false apostles to transform themselves into the apostles of Christ, and imitate their language. Those who use spells and charms, and plead, in defence of them, that they find nothing in them but what is good, may remember what good words the Devil here spoke, and yet with what a malicious design.

3. He upbraids him with his disobedience to the command of God, in not destroying the Amalekites, v. 11. Satan had helped him to palliate and excuse that sin, when Samuel was dealing with him to bring him to repentance; but now he aggravates it, to make him despair of God's mercy. See what they get that hearken to Satan's temptations. He himself will be their accuser, and insult over them. And see whom they resemble that allure others to that which is evil, and reproach them for it when they have done.

4. He foretells his approaching ruin, v. 19. (1.) That his army should be routed by the Philistines. This is twice mentioned; The Lord shall deliver Israel into the hand of the Philistines. This he might foresee, by considering the superior strength and number of the Philistines, the weakness of the armies of Israel, Saul's terror, and especially God's departure from them. Yet, to personate a prophet, he very gravely ascribes it, once and again, to God; The Lord shall do it. (2.) That he and his sons should be slain in the battle. To-morrow, that is, in a little time, (and, supposing that it was now after midnight, I see not but it may be taken strictly for the very next day after that which was now begun,) thou and thy sons shall be with me; that is, in the state of the dead, separate from the body. Had this been the true Samuel, he could not have foretold it, unless God had revealed it to him; and, though it were an evil spirit, God might, by him, foretell it; as we read of an evil spirit that foresaw Ahab's fall at Ramoth-gilead, and was instrumental in it, (1 Kings, 22. 20, &c.) as perhaps this evil spirit was, by the divine permission, in Saul's destruction. That evil spirit flattered Ahab, this frightened Saul, and both, that they might fall: so miserable are they that are under the power of Satan; for, whether he rage or laugh, there is no rest, Prov. 29. 9.

20. Then Saul fell straightway all along on the earth, and was sore afraid, because of the words of Samuel: and there was no strength in him: for he had eaten no bread all the day, nor all the night. 21. And the woman came unto Saul, and saw that he was sore troubled, and said unto him, Behold, thine handmaid hath obeyed thy voice, and I have put my life in my hand, and have hearkened unto thy words which thou spakest unto me. 22. Now therefore, I pray thee, hearken thou also unto the voice of thine handmaid, and let me set a morsel of bread before thee; and eat, that thou mayest have strength, when thou goest on thy way. 23. But he refused, and said, I will not eat. But his servants, together with the woman, compelled him; and he hearkened unto their voice. So he arose from the earth, and sat upon the bed. 24. And the woman had a fat calf in the house; and she hasted, and killed it, and took flour, and kneaded it, and did bake unleavened bread thereof: 25. And she brought it before Saul, and before his servants; and they did eat. Then they rose up, and went away that night.

We are here told how Saul received this terrible message from the ghost he consulted. He desired to be told what he should do, (v. 15.) but is only told what he had not done, and what should be done to him. Those that expect any good counsel or comfort, otherwise than from God, and in the way of his institutions, will be as wretchedly disappointed as Saul here was. Observe,

I. How he sunk under the load, v. 20. He was indeed unfit to bear it, having eaten nothing all the day before, nor that night: he came fasting from the camp, and continued fasting, not for want of food, but for want of an appetite. The fear he was in of the power of the Philistines (v. 5.) took away his appetite; or perhaps the struggle he had with his own conscience, after he had entertained the thought of consulting the witch, made him to nauseate even his necessary food, though ever so dainty. This made him an easy prey to this fresh terror, that now came upon him like an armed man. He fell all along on the earth, as if the archers of the Philistines had already hit him, and there was no strength in him to bear up against these heavy tidings. Now he had enough of consulting witches, and found them miserable comforters. When God, in his word, speaks terror to sinners, he opens to them, at the same time, a door of hope, if they repent; but they that apply themselves to the gates of hell for succour, must there expect darkness, without any glimpse of light.

II. With what difficulty he was persuaded to take so much relief as was necessary to carry him back to his post in the camp. The witch, it should seem, had left Saul alone with the spectre, to have his talk with him by himself; but, perhaps, hearing him fall, and groan, and perceiving him to be in an agony, she came to him, (v. 21.) and was importunate with him to take some refreshment, that he might be able to get clear from her house, fearing, that, if he should be ill, especially if he should die there, she should be punished for it as a traitor, though she had escaped punishment as a witch. This, it is probable, rather than any sentiment of kindness, made her solicitous to help him. But what a deplorable condition had he brought himself to, when he needed so wretched a comforter!

1. She shews herself very importunate with him to take some refreshment; she pleads, (v. 21.) that she had obeyed his voice, to the endangering of her life; and why, therefore, should not he hearken to her voice, for the relieving of his life? v. 22. She had a fat calf at hand, (and the word signifies one that was made use of in treading out the corn, and therefore could the worse be spared,) this she prepares for his entertainment, v. 24. Josephus is large in applauding the extraordinary courtesy and liberality of this woman, and recommending it for an example of compassion to the distressed, and readiness to communicate for their relief, though we have no prospect of being recompensed for it.

2. He shewed himself very averse to it; He refused, and said, I will not eat, (v. 23.) choosing rather to die obscurely by famine, than honourably by the sword. Had he laboured only under a defect of animal spirits, food might help him; but, alas! his case was out of the reach of such succours. What are dainty meats to a wounded conscience? As vinegar upon nitre, so is he that sings songs to a heavy heart; so disagreeable and unwelcome.

3. The woman, at length, with the help of his servants, over-persuaded him, against his inclination and resolution, to take some refreshment. Not by force, but by friendly advice, they compelled him; (v. 23.) and of no other than such a rational and courteous compulsion are we to understand that in the parable, Compel them to come in, Luke, 14. 23. How forcible are right words, when men are pressed by them to that which is for their own interest! Job, 6. 25. Saul was somewhat revived with this entertainment, so that he and his servants, when they had eaten, rose up and went away before it was light, (v. 25.) that they might hasten to their business, and that they might not be seen to come out of such a scandalous house. Josephus here much admires the bravery and magnanimity of Saul, that though he was assured he should lose both his life and honour, yet he would not desert his army, but resolutely returned to the camp, and stood ready for an engagement. I wonder more at the hardness of his heart, that he did not again apply himself to God, by repentance and prayer, in hopes yet to obtain, at least, a reprieve; but he desperately ran headlong upon his own ruin. Perhaps, indeed, now that rage and envy possessed him to the uttermost, he was the better reconciled to his hard fate, being told that his sons, and Jonathan among the rest, whom he hated, for his affection to David, should die with him. If he must fall, he cared not what desolations of his family and kingdom accompanied his fall, hoping it would be the worse for his successor; ἐμοῦ θανάτος γαῖα μὴ χθέρω πνύει—I care not if, when I am dead, the world be set on fire. He begged not, as David, "Let thy hand be against me, but not against thy people."

CHAP. XXIX.

How Saul, who was forsaken of God, when he was in a strait, was more and more perplexed and embarrassed with his own counsels, we read in the foregoing chapter; in this chapter, we find how David, who kept close to God, when he was in a strait, was extricated and brought off, by the providence of God, without any contrivance of his own. We have him, I. Marching with the Philistines, v. 1. 2. II. Excepted against by the lords of the Philistines, v. 3. 5. III. Happily dismissed by Achish from the service which did so ill become him, and which yet he knew not how to decline, v. 6. 11.

1. NOW the Philistines gathered together all their armies to Aphek: and the Israelites pitched by a fountain which is in Jezreel. 2. And the lords of the Philistines passed on by hundreds, and by thousands: but David and his men passed on in the reeward with Achish. 3. Then said the princes of the Philistines, What do these Hebrews here? And Achish said unto the princes of the Philistines, Is not this David, the servant of Saul the king of Israel, which hath been with me these days, or these years, and I have found no fault in him since he fell unto me unto this day? 4. And the princes of the Philistines were wroth with him; and the princes of the Philistines said unto him, Make this fellow return, that he may go again to his place which thou hast appointed him, and let him not go down with us to battle, lest in the battle he be an adversary to us: for wherewith should he reconcile himself unto his master? Should it not be with the heads of these men? 5. Is not this David, of whom they sang one to another in dances, saying, Saul slew his thousands, and David his ten thousands?

Here is,

1. The great strait that David was in, which we may suppose he himself was aware of, though we read not of his asking advice from God, nor any project of his own to get clear of it. The two armies of the Philistines and the Israelites were encamped, and ready to engage, v. 1. Achish, who had been kind to David, had obliged him to come himself, and bring the forces he had, into his service. David came accordingly, and, upon a review of the army, was found with Achish, in the post assigned him in the rear, v. 2. Now, 1. If, when the armies engaged, he should retire, and quit his post, he would fall under the indelible reproach, not only of cowardice and treachery, but of base ingratitude to Achish, who had been his protector and benefactor, and had reposed a confidence in him, and from whom he had received a very honourable commission. Such an unprincipled thing as this he could by no means persuade himself to do. 2. If he should, as was expected from him, fight for the Philistines against Israel, he would incur the imputation of being an enemy to the Israel of God, and a traitor to his country; would make his own people hate him, and unanimously oppose his coming to the crown, as unworthy the name of an Israelite, much more the honour and trust of a king of Israel, who had fought against them, under the banner of the uncircumcised. If Saul would be killed (as it proved he was) in this engagement, the fault would be laid at David's door, as if he had killed him, so that on each side there seemed to be both sin and scandal. This was the strait he was in; and a great strait it was to a good man, greater to see sin before him than to see trouble. Into this strait he brought himself by his own unadvisedness, in quitting the land of Judah, and going among the uncircumcised. It is strange if those that associate themselves with wicked people, and grow intimate with them, come off without guilt, or grief, or both. What he himself proposed to do, does not appear. Perhaps he designed to act only as keeper to the king's head, the post assigned him, (ch. 28. 2.) and not to do any thing offensively against Israel. But it would have been very hard to come so near the brink of sin, and not to fall in; therefore, though God might justly have left him in this difficulty, to chastise him for his folly, yet, because his heart was upright with him, he would not suffer him to be tempted above what he was able, but with the temptation made a way for him to escape, 1 Cor. 10. 13.

11. A door opened for his deliverance out of this strait. God inclined the hearts of the princes of the Philistines to oppose his being employed in the battle, and to insist upon his being dismissed. Thus their enmity befriended him, when no friend he had was capable of doing him such a kindness. 1. It was a proper question which they asked, upon the mustering of the forces; "What do these Hebrews here? v.3. What confidence can we put in them? Or, what service can we expect from them? A Hebrew is out of his place, and, if he have the spirit of a Hebrew, is out of his element, when he is in the camp of the Philistines, and deserves to be made uneasy there. David used to hate the congregation of evil doers, (Ps. 26.5.) however he came now to be among them." 2. It was an honourable testimony which Achish, on this occasion, gave to David. He looked upon him as a refuge, that fled from a wrongful persecution in his own country, and had put himself under his protection, whom therefore he was obliged, in justice, to take care of, and thought he might, in prudence, employ; for (says he) he has been with me these days, or these years, that is, a considerable time, many days at his court, and a year or two in his country, and he never found any fault in him, nor saw any cause to distrust his fidelity, or to think any other than that he was heartily come over to him. By this it appears, that David had conducted himself with a great deal of caution, and had prudently concealed the affection he still retained for his own people. We have need to walk in wisdom toward them that are without, to keep our mouth when the wicked is before us, and to be upon the reserve. 3. Yet the princes are peremptory in it, that he must be sent home; and they give good reasons for their insisting on it. (1.) Because he had been an old enemy to the Philistines; witness what was sung in honour of his triumphs over them, Saul slew his thousands, and David his ten thousands, v.5. "It will be a reproach to us to harbour and trust so noted a destroyer of our people; nor can it be thought that he should now act heartily against Saul, who then acted so vigorously with him and for him." Who would be fond of popular praise and applause, when even that may, another time, be turned against a man to his reproach? (2.) Because he might be a most dangerous enemy to them, and do them more mischief than all Saul's army could, v. 4. "He may in the battle be an adversary to us, and surprise us with an attack in the rear, while their army charges us in the front; and we have reason to think he will do so, that, by betraying us, he may reconcile himself to his master. Who can trust a man, who, besides his affection to his country, will think it his interest to be false to us?" It is dangerous to put confidence in a reconciled enemy.

6. Then Achish called David, and said unto him, Surely, as the LORD liveth, thou hast been upright, and thy going out and thy coming in with me in the host is good in my sight: for I have not found evil in thee since the day of thy coming unto me unto this day: nevertheless the lords favour thee not. 7. Wherefore now return, and go in peace, that thou displease not the lords of the Philistines. 8. And David said unto Achish, But what have I done? and what hast thou found in thy servant so long as I have been with thee unto this day, that I may not go fight against the enemies of my lord the king? 9. And Achish answered and said to David, I know that thou art good in my sight as an angel of God: notwithstanding the princes of the Philistines have said, He shall not go up with us to the battle. 10. Wherefore now rise up early in the morning with thy master's servants that are come with thee: and as soon as ye be up early in the morning, and have light, depart. 11. So David and his men rose up early to depart in the morning, to return into the land of the Philistines. And the Philistines went up to Jezreel.

If the reasons Achish had to trust David were stronger than the reasons which the princes offered why they should distrust him, (as I do not see that, in policy, they were, for the princes were certainly in the right,) yet Achish was but one of five, though the chief, and the only one that had the title of king; accordingly, in a council of war, held on this occasion, he was over-voted, and obliged to dismiss David, though he was extremely fond of him. Kings cannot always do as they would, nor have such as they would about them.

1. The discharge Achish gives him is very honourable, and not a final discharge, but only from the present service. (1.) He signifies the great pleasure and satisfaction he had taken in him, and in his conversation. Thou art good in my sight, as an angel of God, v.9. Wise and good men will gain respect, wherever they go, from all that know how to make a right estimate of persons and things, though of different professions in religion. What Achish says of David, God, by the prophet, says of the house of David, (Zech. 12.8.) that it shall be as the angel of the Lord. But the former is a court compliment, the latter is a divine promise. (2.) He gives him a testimonial of his good behaviour, v.6. It is very full, and in obliging terms; "Thou hast been upright, and thy whole conduct has been good in my sight, and I have not found evil in thee." Saul would not have given him such a testimonial, though he had done far more service to him than to Achish. God's people should behave themselves always so unoffensively, as, if possible, to get the good word of all they have dealings with; and it is a debt we owe to those who have acquitted themselves well, to give them the praise of it. (3.) He lays all the blame of his dismissal upon the princes, who would by no means suffer him to continue in the camp. "The king loves thee entirely, and would venture his life in thy hand; but the lords favour thee not, and we must not disoblige them, nor can we oppose them; therefore return, and go in peace." He had better part with his favourite, than occasion a disgust among his generals, and a mutiny in his army. He intimates a reason why they were uneasy; it was not so much for his own sake, as for the sake of his soldiers that attended him, whom he calls his master's servants, namely Saul's; (v.10.) they could trust him, but not them. (4.) He orders him to be gone early, as soon as it was light, (v.10.) to prevent their further resentments, and the jealousies they would have been apt to conceive, if he had lingered.

2. His reception of this discourse is very complimentary, but, I fear, not without some degree of dissimulation. "What!" says David, "must I leave my lord the king, whom I am bound, by office, to protect, just now when he is going to expose himself in the field? Why may not I go fight against the enemies of my lord the king?" v.8. He seemed anxious to serve him; when he was at this juncture really anxious to leave him; but he was not willing that Achish should know that he was. No one knows how strong the temptation is to compliment and dissemble which they are in that attend great men, and how hard it is to avoid it.

3. God's providence ordered it wisely and graciously for him; for, besides that the snare was broken, and he was delivered out of the dilemma to which he was reduced, it proved a happy hastening of him to the relief of his own city, which sorely wanted him, though he did not know it. Thus the disgrace which the lords of the Philistines put upon him, proved, more ways than one, an advantage to him. The steps of a good man are ordered by the Lord, and he delighteth in his way. What he does with us, we know not now, but we shall know hereafter, and shall see it was all for good.

CHAP. XXX.

When David was dismissed from the army of the Philistines, he did not go over to the camp of Israel, but, being expelled by Saul, observed an exact neutrality, and silently retired to his own city, Ziklag, leaving the armies ready to engage. Now here we are told, I. What a melancholy posture he found the city in, all laid waste by the Amalekites, and what distress it occasioned him and his men, v. 1..6. II. What course he took to recover what he had lost. He inquired of God, and took out a commission from him; (v. 7, 8.) pursued the enemy, (v. 9, 10.) gained intelligence from a straggler, (v. 11..15.) attacked and routed the plunderers, (v. 16, 17.) and recovered all that they had carried off, v. 18..20. III. What method he observed in the distribution of the spoil, v. 21..31.

1. AND it came to pass, when David and his men were come to Ziklag on the third day, that the Amalekites had invaded the south, and Ziklag, and smitten Ziklag, and burnt it with fire; 2. And had taken the women captives, that were therein: they slew not any, either great or small, but carried them away, and went on their way. 3. So David and his men came to the city, and, behold, it was burned with fire; and their wives, and their sons, and their daughters, were taken captives. 4. Then David and the people that were with him lifted up their voice and wept, until they had no more power to weep. 5. And David's two wives were taken captives, Ahinoam the Jezreelitess, and Abigail the wife of Nabal the Carmelite. 6. And David was greatly distressed; for the people spake of stoning him, because the soul of all the people was grieved, every man for his sons and for his daughters: but David encouraged himself in the LORD his God.

Here is,

I. The descent which the Amalekites made upon Ziklag, in David's absence, and the desolations they made there. They surprised the city when it was left unguarded, plundered it, burnt it, and carried all the women and children captives, v. 1, 2. They intended, by this, to revenge the like havoc that David had lately made of them and their country, ch. 27. 8. He that had made so many enemies, ought not to have left his own concerns so naked and defenceless. They that make bold with others, must expect that others will make as bold with them, and provide accordingly. Now, observe in this, 1. The cruelty of Saul's pity, (as it proved,) in sparing the Amalekites; if he had utterly destroyed them, as he ought to have done, these had not been in being to do this mischief. 2. How David was corrected for being so forward to go with the Philistines against Israel. God shewed him that he had better have staid at home, and looked after his own business. When we go abroad in the way of our duty, we may comfortably hope that God will take care of our families in our absence, but not otherwise. 3. How wonderfully God inclined the hearts of these Amalekites to carry the women and children away captives, and not to kill them. When David invaded them, he put all to the sword; (ch. 27. 9.) and no reason can be given why they did not retaliate upon this city, but that God restrained them; for he has all hearts in his hands, and says to the fury of the most cruel men, Hitherto thou shalt come, and no further. Whether they spared them, to lead them in triumph, or to sell them, or to use them for slaves, God's hand must be acknowledged, who designed to make use of the Amalekites for the correction, not for the destruction, of the house of David.

II. The confusion and consternation that David and his men were in, when they found their houses in ashes, and their wives and children gone into captivity. Three days' march they had from the camp of the Philistines to Ziklag; and now, that they came thither weary, but hoping to find rest in their houses, and joy in their families, behold, a black and dismal scene is presented to them, (v. 3.) which made them all weep, (David himself not excepted,) though they were men of war, till they had no more power to weep, v. 4. The mention of David's wives, Ahinoam and Abigail, and their being carried captive, intimate that that went nearer his heart than any thing else. Note, It is no disparagement to the boldest and bravest spirits, to lament the calamities of relations and friends. Observe, 1. This trouble came upon them when they were absent. It was the ancient policy of Amalek to take Israel at an advantage. 2. It met them at their return, and, for aught that appears, their own eyes gave them the first intelligence of it. Note, When we go abroad, we cannot foresee what evil tidings may meet us when we come home again. The going out may be very cheerful, and yet the coming in be very doleful. Boast not thyself therefore of to-morrow, nor of to-night neither, for thou knowest not what a day, or a piece of a day, may bring forth, Prov. 27. 1. If, when we come off a journey, we find our tabernacles in peace, and not laid waste, as David here found his, let the Lord be praised for it.

III. The mutiny and murmuring of David's men against him, v. 6. David was greatly distressed, for, in the midst of all his losses, his own people spake of stoning him, 1. Because they looked upon him as the occasion of their calamities, by the provocation he had given the Amalekites, and his indiscretion in leaving Ziklag without a garrison in it. Thus apt are we, when we are in trouble, to fly into a rage against those who are any way the occasion of our trouble, while we overlook the Divine Providence, and have not that regard to the operations of God's hand in it, which would silence our passions, and make us patient. 2. Because now they began to despair of that preferment which they promised themselves in following David. They hoped, ere this, to have been all princes; and now, to find themselves all beggars, was such a disappointment to them, as made them grow outrageous, and threaten the life on him, of whom, under God, they had the greatest dependence. What absurdities will not ungoverned passions plunge men into! This was a sore trial to the man after God's own heart, and could not but go very near him. Saul had driven him from his country, the Philistines had driven him from their camp, the Amalekites had plundered his city, his wives were taken prisoners, and now, to complete his woe, his own familiar friends, in whom he trusted, whom he had sheltered, and who did eat of his bread, instead of sympathizing with him, and offering him any relief, lifted up the heel against him, and threatened to stone him. Great faith must expect such severe exercises. But it is observable, that David was reduced to this extremity just before his accession to the throne; at this present time, perhaps, the stroke was struck which opened the door to his advancement. Things are sometimes at the worst with the church and people of God, just before they begin to mend.

IV. David's pious dependence upon the divine providence and grace, in this distress; But David encouraged himself in the Lord his God. 1. His men fretted at their loss; the soul of the people was bitter, so the word is; Chai v'zn discontent and impatience added wormwood and gall to the affliction and misery, and made it doubly grievous. But David bore it better, though he had more reason than any of them to lament it; they gave liberty to their passions, but he set his graces on work, and, by encouraging himself in God, while they dispirited each other, he kept his spirit calm and sedate. Or, 2. David's language opposed itself to the threatening words his men gave out against him; they spake of stoning him; but he, not offering to avenge the affront, nor terrified by their menaces, encouraged himself in the Lord his God; believed and considered, with application to his present case, the power and providence of God, his justice and goodness, the method he commonly takes of bringing low, and then raising up; his care of his people that serve him, and trust in him, and the particular promises he had made to him of bringing him safe to the throne; with these considerations he supported himself, not doubting but the present trouble would end well. Note, Those that have taken the Lord for their God, may take encouragement from their relation to him in the worst of times. It is the duty and interest of all good people, whatever happens, to encourage themselves in God as their Lord and their God, assuring themselves that he can and will bring light out of darkness, peace out of trouble, and good out of evil, to all that love him, and are the called according to his purpose, Rom. 8. 28. It was David's practice, and he had the comfort of it; What time I am afraid, I will trust in thee. When he was at his wit's end, he was not at his faith's end.

7. And David said to Abiathar the priest, Abimelech's son, I pray thee, bring me hither the ephod. And Abiathar brought thither the ephod to David. 8. And David inquired at the LORD, saying, Shall I pursue after this troop? shall I overtake them? And he answered him, Pursue: for thou shalt surely overtake them, and without fail recover all. 9. So David went, he and the six hundred men that were with him, and came to the brook Besor, where those that were left behind stayed. 10. But David pursued, he and four hundred men: for two hundred abode behind, which were so faint that they could not go over the brook Besor. 11. And they found an Egyptian in the field, and brought him to David, and gave him bread, and he did eat; and they made him drink water; 12. And they gave him a piece of a cake of figs, and two clusters of raisins: and when he had eaten, his spirit came again to him; for he had eaten no bread, nor drunk any water, three days and three nights. 13. And David said unto him, To whom belongest thou? and whence art thou? And he said, I am a young man of Egypt, servant to an Amalekite; and my master left me, because three days ago I fell sick. 14. We made an invasion upon the south of the Cherethites, and upon the coast which belongeth to Judah, and upon the south of Caleb; and we burned Ziklag with fire. 15. And David said to him, Canst thou bring me down to this company? And he said, Swear unto me by God, that thou wilt neither kill me, nor deliver me into the hands of my master, and I will bring thee down to this company. 16. And when he had brought him down, behold, they were spread abroad upon all the earth, eating and drinking, and dancing, because of all the great spoil that they had taken out of the land of the Philistines, and out of the land of Judah. 17. And David smote them from the twilight even unto the evening of the next day: and there escaped not a man of them, save four hundred young men, which rode upon camels, and fled. 18. And David recovered all that the Amalekites had carried away: and David rescued his two wives. 19. And there was nothing lacking to them, neither small nor great, neither sons nor daughters; neither spoil, nor any thing that they had taken to them: David recovered all. 20. And David took all the flocks and the herds, which they drave before those other cattle, and said, This is David's spoil.

Solomon observes, that the righteous is delivered out of trouble, and the wicked cometh in his stead; that the just falleth seven times a day, and riseth again; so it was with David. Many were his troubles, but the Lord delivered him out of them all; and particularly out of this which here we have an account of.

I. He inquired of the Lord both concerning his duty, Shall I pursue after this troop? and concerning the event, Shall I overtake them? v. 8. It was a great advantage to David, that he had the high priest with him, and the breast-plate of judgment, which, as a public person, he might consult in all his affairs, Numb. 27. 21. We cannot think that he left Abiathar and the ephod at Ziklag, for then he and it would have been carried away by the Amalekites, unless we may suppose them hidden by a special providence, that they might be ready for David to consult at his return. If we conclude that David had his priest and ephod with him in the camp of the Philistines, it was certainly a great neglect in him, that he did not inquire of the Lord by them concerning his engagement to Achish. Perhaps he was ashamed to own his religion so far among the uncircumcised; but now he begins to apprehend that this trouble is brought upon him to correct him for that oversight; and therefore the first thing he does, is, to call for the ephod. It is well if we get this good by our afflictions, to be reminded by them of neglected duties, and particularly to be quickened by them to inquire of the Lord. See 1 Chron. 15. 13. David had no room to doubt but that his war against these Amalekites was just, and he had an inclination strong enough to set upon them, when it was for the recovery of that which was dearest to him in this world; and yet he would not go about it without asking counsel of God, thereby owning his dependence upon God, and submission to him. If we thus, in all our ways, acknowledge God, we may expect that he will direct our steps, as he did David's here, answering him above what he asked, with an assurance that he should recover all.

II. He went himself in person, and took with him all the force he had, in pursuit of the Amalekites, v. 9, 10. See how quickly, how easily, how effectually, the mutiny among the soldiers was qualified by his patience and faith. When they spoke of stoning him, (v. 6.) if he had spoken of hanging them, or had ordered that the ringleaders of the faction should immediately have had their heads struck off, though it had been just, yet it might have been of pernicious consequence to his interest in this critical juncture; and, while he and his men were contending, the Amalekites would have clearly carried off their spoil: but when he, as a deaf man, heard not, smothered his resentments, and encouraged himself in the Lord his God, the tumult of the people was stilled by his gentleness, and the power of God on their hearts; and, being thus mildly treated, they are now as ready to follow his foot, as they were but a little before to fly in his face. Meekness is the security of any government.

All his men were willing to go along with him in pursuit of the Amalekites, and he needed them all; but he was forced to drop a third part of them by the way; two hundred, out of six, were so fatigued with their long march, and so sunk under the load of their grief, that they could not pass the brook Besor, but staid behind there. This was, 1. A great trial of David's faith, whether he could go on, in a dependence upon the word of God, when so many of his men failed him. When we are disappointed and discouraged in our expectations from second causes, then to go on with cheerfulness, confiding in the divine power, this is giving glory to God, by believing against hope, in hope. 2. A great instance of David's tenderness to his men, that he would by no means urge them beyond their strength, though the case itself was so very urgent. The Son of David thus considers the frame of his followers, who are not all alike strong and vigorous in their spiritual pursuits and conflicts; but, where we are weak, there he is kind; nay more, there he is strong, 2 Cor. 12. 9, 10.

III. Providence threw one in their way that gave them intelligence of the enemy's motions, and guided their's; a poor Egyptian lad, scarcely alive, is made instrumental of a great deal of good to David. God chooses the foolish things of the world, with them to confound the wise. Observe, 1. His master's cruelty to him. He had got out of him all the service he could, and when he fell sick, probably being over-toiled with his work, he barbarously left him to perish in the field, when he was in no such haste, but he might have put him into some of the carriages, and brought him home, or, at least, have left him wherewithal to support himself. That master has the spirit of an Amalekite, not of an Israelite, that can thus use a servant worse than one would use a beast. The tender mercies of the wicked are cruel. This Amalekite thought he should now have servants enough of the Israelite captives, and therefore cared not what became of his Egyptian slave; but could willingly let him die in a ditch for want of necessaries, while he was eating and drinking, v. 16. Justly did Providence make this poor servant, that was thus basely abused, instrumental toward the destruction of a whole army of Amalekites, and his master among the rest; for God hears the cry of oppressed servants. 2. David's compassion to him; though he had reason to think he was one of those that had helped to destroy Ziklag, yet, finding him in distress, he generously relieved him, not only with bread and water, (v. 11.) but with figs and raisins, v. 12. Though the Israelites were in haste, and had no great plenty for themselves, yet they would not forbear to deliver one that was drawn unto death, nor say, Behold, we knew it not, Prov. 24. 11, 12. They are unworthy the name of Israelites, who shut up the bowels of their compassions from persons in distress. It was also prudently done to relieve this Egyptian; for, though despicable, he was capable of doing them service, so it proved, though they were not certain of it when they relieved him. It is a good reason why we should neither do an injury, nor deny a kindness, to any man, that we know not but, some time or other, it may be in his power to return either a kindness or an injury. 3. The intelligence David received from this poor Egyptian, when he was come to himself. He gave him an account concerning his party; (1.) What they had done, (v. 14.) We made an invasion. The countries which David had pretended to Achish to have made an incursion upon, (ch. 27. 10.) they really had invaded and laid waste. What was then false, now proved too true. (2.) Whither they were gone, v. 15. This he promised David to inform him of, upon condition he would spare his life, and protect him from his master, who, if he could hear of him again, (he thought,) would add cruelty to cruelty. Such an opinion this poor Egyptian had of the obligation of an oath, that he desired no greater security for his life than that, Swear unto me by God; not by the gods of Egypt or Amalek, but by the one supreme God.

IV. David, being directed to the place where they lay, securely celebrating their triumphs, fell upon them, and, as he used to pray, saw his desire upon his enemies.

1. The spoilers were cut off. The Amalekites, finding the booty was rich, and being got with it (as they thought) out of the reach of danger, were making themselves very merry with it, v. 16. All thoughts of war were laid aside, nor were they in any haste to house their prey, but spread themselves abroad on the earth in the most careless manner that could be, and there they were found eating and drinking, and dancing, probably, in honour of their idol-gods, to whom they gave the praise of their success. In this posture David surprised them, which made the conquest of them, and the blow he gave them, the more easy to him, and the more dismal to them. Taken are sinners nearest to ruin, when they cry, Peace and safety, and put the evil day far from them. Nor does any thing give our spiritual enemies more advantage against us than sensuality, and the indulgence of the flesh. Eating and drinking, and dancing, have been the soft and pleasant way in which many have gone down to the congregation of the dead. Finding them thus off their guard, and from their arms, (many of them, it may be, drunk, and unable to make any resistance,) he put them all to the sword, and only four hundred escaped, v. 17. Thus is the triumphing of the wicked short, and wrath comes on them, as on Belshazzar, when they are in the midst of their jollity.

2. The spoil was recovered and brought off, and nothing was lost, but a great deal gotten. (1.) They retrieved all their own; (v. 18, 19.) David rescued his two wives; that is mentioned particularly, because that pleased David more than all the rest of his achievements. Providence had so ordered it, that the Amalekites carefully preserved all that they had taken, concluding that they kept it for themselves, though really they preserved it for the right owners; so that there was nothing lacking to them; so it proved, when they concluded all was gone; so much better is God oftentimes to us, than our own fears. Our Lord Jesus was indeed the Son of David, and the Son of Abraham, in this, resembling them both, that he took the prey from the mighty, and led captivity captive: Abraham, Gen. 14. 16. and David here. But this was not all. (2.) They took all that belonged to the Amalekites besides, (v. 20.) flocks and herds; either such as were taken from the Philistines, and others which David had the disposal of by the law of war; or perhaps he made a sally into the enemy's country, and fetched off these flocks and herds from thence, as interest for his own. This drove was put in the van of the triumph, with this proclamation, "This is David's spoil. This we may thank him for." Those who lately spake of stoning him, now caressed him, and cried him up, because they got by him more than they had then lost. Thus are the world, and its sentiments, governed by interest.

21. And David came to the two hundred men, which were so faint that they could not follow David, whom they had made also to abide at the brook Besor: and they went forth to meet David, and to meet the people that were with him: and when David came near to the people, he saluted them. 22. Then answered all the wicked men and men of Belial, of those that went with David, and said, Because they went not with us, we will not give them ought of the spoil that we have recovered, save to every man his wife and his children, that they may lead them away, and depart. 23. Then said David, Ye shall not do so, my brethren, with that which the LORD hath given us, who hath preserved us, and delivered the company that came against us into our hand. 24. For who will hearken unto you in this matter? but as his part is that goeth down to the battle, so shall his part be that tarrieth by the stuff: they shall part alike. 25. And it was so from that day forward, that he made it a statute and an ordinance for Israel unto this day. 26. And when David came to Ziklag, he sent of the spoil unto the elders of Judah, even to his friends, saying, Behold a present for you of the spoil of the enemies of the LORD; 27. To them which were in Beth-el, and to them which were in south Ramoth, and to them which were in Jattir, 28. And to them which were in Aroer, and to them which were in Siphmoth, and to them which were in Eshtemoa, 29. And to them which were in Rachal, and to them which were in the cities of the Jerahmeelites, and to them which were in the cities of the Kenites, 30. And to them which were in Hormah, and to them which were in Chor-ashan, and to them which were in Athach, 31. And to them which were in Hebron, and to all the places where David himself and his men were wont to haunt.

We have here an account of the distribution of the spoil which was taken from the Amalekites. When the Amalekites had carried away a rich booty from the land of Judah and the Philistines, they spent it in sensuality, in eating and drinking, and making merry with it; but David disposed of the spoil taken after another manner, as one that knew that justice and charity must govern us in the use we make of whatever we have in this world. What God gives us, he designs we should do good with, not serve our lusts with. In the distribution of the spoil,

I. David was just and kind to those who abode by the stuff. They came forth to meet the conquerors, and to congratulate them on their success, though they could not contribute to it; (v. 21.) for we should rejoice in a good work done, though Providence had laid us aside, and rendered us incapable of lending a hand to it. David received their address very kindly, and was so far from upbraiding them with their weakness, that he shewed himself solicitous concerning them; he saluted them, he asked them of peace, so the word is; inquired how they did, because he had left them faint, and not well; or wished them peace, bid them be of good cheer, they should lose nothing by staying behind; for of this they seemed afraid; David perhaps saw it in their countenances.

1. There were those that opposed their coming in to share in the spoil; some of David's soldiers, probably the same that spake of stoning him, spake now of defrauding their brethren; they are called wicked men, and men of Belial, v. 22. Let not the best of men think it strange, if they have those attending them that are very bad, and they cannot prevail to make them better. We may suppose that David had instructed his soldiers, and prayed with them, and yet there were many among them that were wicked men, and men of Belial; often terrified with the apprehensions of death, and yet wicked men still, and men of Belial. These made a motion, that the two hundred men who abode by the stuff should only have their wives and children given them, but none of their goods. Well might they be called wicked men; for this bespeaks them, (1.) Very covetous themselves, and greedy of gain; for hereby the more would fall to their share. A while ago, they would gladly have given half their own to recover the other half; yet now, that they have all their own, they are not content, unless they can have their brethren's too; so soon do men forget their low estate. All seek their own, and too often more than their own. (2.) Very barbarous to their brethren; for, to give them their wives and children, and not their estates, was to give them the mouths without the meat. What joy could they have of their families, if they had nothing to maintain them with? Was this to do as they would be done by? These are men of Belial indeed, who delight in putting hardships upon their brethren, and care not who is starved, so they may be fed to the full.

2. David would by no means admit this, but ordered that they who tarried behind should come in for an equal share in the spoils with those that went to the battle, v. 23, 24. This he did, (1.) In gratitude to God. The spoil we have, is that which God has given us; we have it from him, and therefore must use it under his direction, as good stewards. Let this check us when we are tempted to misapply that which God has intrusted us with of this world's good; "Nay, I must not do so with that which God has given me, not serve Satan and a base lust with those things which are not only the creatures of his power, but the gifts of his bounty. God has righted us, by delivering the company that came against us into our hand, let not us then wrong our brethren; God has been kind to us in preserving us, and giving us victory, let not us be unkind to them." God's mercy to us should make us merciful to one another. (2.) In justice to them. It was true they tarried behind; but, [1.] It was not for want of good-will to the cause, or to their brethren, but because they had no strength to keep up with them. It was not their fault, but their infelicity; and therefore they ought not to suffer for it. [2.] Though they tarried behind now, they had formerly engaged many times in battle, and done their part as well as the best of their brethren, and their former services must be considered, now that there was something to enjoy. [3.] Even now they did good service, for they abode by the stuff, to guard that which somebody must take care of, else that might have fallen into the hands of some other enemy. Every post of service is not alike a post of honour, yet those that are any way serviceable to the common interest, though in a meaner station, ought to share in the common advantages; as in the natural body, every member has its use, and therefore has its share of the nourishment. First, Thus David over-ruled the wicked men, and men of Belial, with reason, but with a great deal of mildness; (for the force of reason is sufficient, without the force of passion;) he calls them his brethren, v. 23. Superiors often lose their authority by haughtiness, but seldom by courtesy and condescension. Secondly, Thus he settled the matter for time to come, made it a statute of his kingdom, (a statute of distributions, primo Davidis—in the first year of David's reign;) an ordinance of war, (v. 25.) that as his part is that goes down to the battle, and jeopardis his life in the high places of the field, so shall his be that guards the carriages. Abraham returned the spoils of Sodom to the right owners, and quitted his title to them, jure belli—derived from the laws of war. If we help others to recover their right, we must not think that this alienates the property, and makes it ours. God appointed that the spoil of Midian should be divided between the soldiers and the whole congregation, Numb. 31. 27. The case here was somewhat different, but governed by the same general rule—that we are members one of another. The disciples, at first, had all things common, and we should still be ready to distribute, willing to communicate, 1 Tim. 6. 18. When kings of armies did flee apace, she that tarried at home did divide the spoil, Ps. 68. 12.

II. David was generous and kind to all his friends. When he had given every one his own with interest, there was a considerable overplus, which David, as general, had the disposal of: probably the spoil of the tents of the Amalekites consisted much in plate and jewels; (Judg. 8. 24, 26.) and those, because he thought they would but make his own soldiers proud and effeminate, he thought fit to make presents of to his friends, even the elders of Judah, v. 26. Several places are here named to which he sent of these presents, all of them in or near the tribe of Judah. The first place named is Bethel, which signifies the house of God; that place shall be first served for its name's sake; or, perhaps, it means not the city so called, but the place where the ark was, which was therefore the house of God. Thither David sent the first and best, to them that attended there, for his sake who is the First and Best. Hebron is named last, (v. 31.) probably, because thither he sent the residuum, which was the largest share, having an eye upon that place as fittest for his head quarters, 2 Sam. 2. 1.

In David's sending these presents, observe, 1. His generosity. He aimed not to enrich himself, but to serve his country; and therefore God afterwards enriched him, and set him to rule the country he had served. It becomes gracious souls to be generous; there is that scatters, and yet increases. 2. His gratitude. He sent presents to all the places where he and his men were wont to haunt; (v. 31.) that is, to all that he had received kindness from, that had sheltered him, and sent him intelligence or provisions. Note, Honesty, as well as honour, obliges us to requite the favour that have been done us, or, at least, make a real acknowledgment of them as far as is in the power of our hand. 3. His piety; that he calls it a blessing; for no present we give to our friends will be a comfort to them, but as it is made so by the blessing of God: it intimates that his prayers for them accompanied his present; also, that he sent them out of the spoil of the enemies of the Lord, (so he calls them, not his enemies;) that they might rejoice in the victory, for the Lord's sake, and might join with him in thanksgivings for it. 4. His policy; that he sent these presents among his countrymen, to oblige them to be ready to appear for him, upon his accession to the throne, which he now saw at hand. A man's gift maketh room for him. He was fit to be a king, who thus shewed the bounty and liberality of a king. Munificence recommends a man more than magnificence. The Ziphites had none of his presents, nor the men of Keilah; and thus he shewed, that, though he was such a saint as not to revenge affronts, yet he was not such a fool as not to take notice of them.

CHAP. XXXI.

From the foregoing chapter, we had David conquering, yea, more than a conqueror. In this chapter, we have Saul conquered, and worse than a captive. Providence ordered it, that both these things should be doing just at the same time. The very same day, perhaps, that David was triumphing over the Amalekites, were the Philistines triumphing over Saul. One is set over against the other, that men may see what comes of trusting in God, and what comes of forsaking him. We left Saul ready to engage the Philistines, with a shaking hand and an aching heart, having had his doom read him from hell, which he would not regard when it was read him from heaven. Let us now see what comes of him. Here is, I. His army routed, v. 1. II. His three sons slain, v. 2. III. Himself wounded, v. 3. Slain by his own hand, v. 4. His armour bearer, (v. 5.) and all his men, v. 6. IV. His country possessed by the Philistines, v. 7. His camp plundered, and his dead body deserted, v. 8. His fall triumphed in, v. 9. His body publicly exposed, (v. 10.) and with difficulty rescued by the men of Jabesh-gilead, v. 11. 13. Thus fell the man that was rejected of God.

NOW the Philistines fought against Israel: and the men of Israel fled from before the Philistines, and fell down slain in mount Gilboa. 2. And the Philistines followed hard upon Saul and upon his sons; and the Philistines slew Jonathan, and Abinadab, and Melchishua, Saul's sons. 3. And the battle went sore against Saul, and the archers hit him; and he was sore wounded of the archers. 4. Then said Saul unto his armour-bearer, Draw thy sword, and thrust me through therewith; lest these uncircumcised come and thrust me through, and abuse me. But his armour-bearer would not; for he was sore afraid. Therefore Saul took a sword, and fell upon it. 5. And when his armour-bearer saw that Saul was dead, he fell likewise upon his sword, and died with him. 6. So Saul died, and his three sons, and his armour-bearer, and all his men, that same day together. 7. And when the men of Israel that were on the other side of the valley, and they that were on the other side Jordan, saw that the men of Israel fled, and that Saul and his sons were dead, they forsook the cities, and fled; and the Philistines came and dwelt in them.

The day of recompense is now come, in which Saul must account for the blood of the Amalekites, which he had sinfully spared, and that of the priests, which he had more sinfully spilt; that of David too, which he would have spilt, must come into the account. Now his day's come to fall, as David foresaw, when he should descend into battle, and perish, ch. 26. 10. Come, and see the righteous judgments of God.

I. He sees his soldiers fall about him, v. 1. Whether the Philistines were more numerous, better posted, and better led on, or what other advantages they had, we are not told; but it seems they were more vigorous, for they made the onset; they fought against Israel, and the Israelites fled and fell. The best of the troops were put into disorder, and multitudes slain; probably those whom Saul had employed in pursuing David. Thus they who had followed him, and served him in his sin, go before him in his fall, and share with him in his plagues.

II. He sees his sons fall before him. The victorious Philistines pressed most forcibly upon the king of Israel, and those about him; his three sons were next him, it is probable, and they were all three slain before his face, to his great grief, for they were the hopes of his family; and to his great terror, for they were now the guard of his person; and he can conclude no other, than that his own turn comes next. His sons are named, (v. 2.) and it grieves us to find Jonathan among them: that wise, valiant, good man, who was as much David's friend as Saul was his enemy; he falls with the rest. Duty to his father would not permit him to stay at home, or to retire when the armies engaged; and Providence so orders it, that he falls in the common fate of his family, though he never involved himself in the guilt of it; so that the observation of Eliphaz does not hold, (Job, 4. 7.) Who ever perished, being innocent? For here was one. What shall we say to it? 1. God would hereby complete the vexation of Saul in his dying moments, and the judgment that was to be executed upon his house. If the family must fall, Jonathan, that is one of it, must fall with it. 2. He would hereby make David's way to the crown the more clear and open. For though Jonathan himself would have cheerfully resigned all his title and interest to him, (we have no reason to suspect any other,) yet it is very probable that many of the people would have made use of his name for the support of the house of Saul, or, at least, would have come in but slowly to David. If Ish-bosheth (who was now left at home as one unfit for action, and so escaped) had so many friends, what would Jonathan have had, who had been the darling of the people, and had never forfeited their favour? They that were so anxious to have a king like the nations, would be zealous for the right line, especially if that threw the crown upon such a head as Jonathan's. This would have embarrassed David; and if Jonathan could have prevailed to bring in all his interest to David, then it would have been said that Jonathan had made him king, whereas God was to have all the glory. This is the Lord's doing. So that though the death of Jonathan would be a great affliction to David, yet, by making him mindful of his own frailty, as well as by facilitating his accession to the throne, it would be an advantage to him. 3. God would hereby shew us, that the difference between good and bad is to be made in the other world, not in this. All things come alike to all. We cannot judge of the spiritual or eternal state of any by the manner of their death; for in that there is one event to the righteous and to the wicked.

III. He himself is sorely wounded by the Philistines, and then slain by his own hand. The archers hit him, (v. 3.) so that he could neither fight nor fly, and therefore must inevitably fall into their hands. Thus, to make him the more miserable, destruction comes gradually upon him, and he dies so as to feel himself die. To that extremity was he now reduced, that, 1. He was desirous to die by the hand of his own servant, rather than by the hand of the Philistines, lest they should abuse him as they did Samson. Miserable man! He finds himself dying, and all his care is to keep his body out of the hands of the Philistines, but no care to resign his soul into the hands of God who gave it, Ecc. 12. 7. As he lived, so he died, proud and jealous, and a terror to himself and all about him. They who rightly understand themselves, think it of small account, in comparison, how it is with them in death, so it may but be well with them after death. Those are in a deplorable condition indeed, who, being bitter in soul, long for death, but it comes not, (Job, 3. 20, 21.) especially those who, despairing of the mercy of God, like Judas, leap into hell before them, to escape a hell within them. 2. When he could not obtain that favour, he became his own executioner, thinking thereby to avoid shame, but running upon a heinous sin, and with it entailing upon his own name a mark of perpetual infamy, as felo de se—a self-murderer. Jonathan, who received his death-wound from the hand of the Philistines, and bravely yielded to the fate of war, died in the bed of honour; but Saul died as a fool dieth, as a coward dieth, a proud fool, a sneaking coward; he died as a man that had neither the fear of God, nor hope in God; neither the reason of a man, nor the religion of an Israelite, nor the resolution of a soldier. Let us all pray, Lord, lead us not into temptation, this temptation. His armour-bearer would not run him through, and he did well to refuse it; for no man's servant ought to be a slave to his master's lusts or passions of any kind: the reason given, is, that he was sore afraid, not of death, for he himself ran wilfully upon that immediately; but, having a profound reverence for the king his master, he could not conquer that so far as to do him any hurt; or perhaps he feared lest his trembling hand should have given him but half a blow, and so have put him to the greater misery.

IV. His armour-bearer, who refused to kill him, refused not to die with him, but fell likewise upon his sword, v. 5. This was an aggravating circumstance of the death of Saul, that, by the example of his wickedness, in murdering himself, he drew in his servant to be guilty of the same wickedness, and perished not alone in his iniquity. The Jews say that Saul's armour-bearer was Doeg, whom he preferred to that dignity for killing the priests, and if so, justly does his violent dealing return on his own head. David had foretold concerning him, that God would destroy him for ever, Ps. 52. 5.

V. The country was put into such confusion by the rout of Saul's army, that the inhabitants of the neighbouring cities (on that side Jordan, as it might be read) quitted them, and the Philistines, for a time, had possession of them, till things were settled in Israel, v. 7. Such a sad pass had Saul, by his wickedness, brought his country to, which might have remained in the hands of the uncircumcised, if David had not been raised up to repair the breaches of it. See what a king he proved, for whom they rejected God and Samuel. They still had done wickedly (it is to be feared) as well as he, and therefore were consumed, both they and their king, as the prophet had foretold concerning them, ch. 12. 25. And to this reference is had long after; (Hos. 13. 10, 11.) "Where are thy saviours in all thy cities, of whom thou saidst, Give me a king and princes? I gave thee a king in mine anger, and took him away in my wrath; that is, he was a plague to thee living and dying: thou couldest expect no other."

8. And it came to pass on the morrow, when the Philistines came to strip the slain, that they found Saul, and his three sons, fallen in mount Gilboa. 9. And they cut off his head, and stripped off his armour, and sent into the land of the Philistines round about, to publish it in the house of their idols, and among the people. 10. And they put his armour in the house of Ashtaroth: and they fastened his body to the wall of Beth-shan. 11. And when the inhabitants of Jabesh-gilead heard of that which the Philistines had done to Saul; 12. All the valiant men arose, and went all night, and took the body of Saul, and the bodies of his sons, from the wall of Beth-shan, and came to Jabesh, and burnt them there. 13. And they took their bones, and buried them under a tree at Jabesh, and fasted seven days.

The scripture makes no mention of the souls of Saul and his sons, what became of them after they were dead; (secret things belong not to us;) but of their bodies only.

I. How they were basely abused by the Philistines. The day after the battle, when they had recovered their fatigue, they came to strip the slain, and, among the rest, found the bodies of Saul and his three sons, v. 8. Saul's armour-bearer perhaps intended to honour his master, by following the example of his self-murder, and to shew thereby how well he loved him; but, if he had consulted his reason more than his passions, he would have spared that foolish compliment, not only in justice to his own life, but in kindness to his master, to whom, by the opportunity of survivorship, he might have done all the service that could be done him by any man after he was dead: for he might, in the night, have conveyed away his body, and those of his sons, and buried them decently. But such false and foolish notions as these, vain men have, (though they would be wise,) of giving and receiving honour. Nay, it should seem, Saul might have saved himself the fatal thrust, and have made his escape; for the pursuers (in fear of whom he slew himself) came not to the place where he was, till the next day. But whom God will destroy, he infatuates, and utterly consumes with his terrors. See Job, 18. 5, &c.

Finding Saul's body, (which, now that it lay extended on the bloody turf, was distinguishable from the rest by its length, as it was, while erect, by its height, when he proudly overlooked the surrounding crowd,) they will, in that triumph over Israel's crown, and poorly gratify a barbarous and brutish revenge, by insulting the deserted corpse, which, when alive, they had stood in awe of.

1. They cut off his head. Had they designed in this to revenge the cutting off of Goliath's head, they should rather have cut off the head of David, who did that execution, when he was in their country; they intended it, in general, for a reproach to Israel, who promised themselves that a crowned and an anointed head would have saved them from the Philistines, and a particular reproach to Saul, who was taller by the head than other men, (which perhaps he was wont to boast of,) but was now shorter by the head.

2. They stripped him of his armour, (v. 9.) and sent that to be set up as a trophy of their victory in the house of Ashtaroth their goddess; (v. 10.) and we are told, 1 Chron. 10. 10. (though it is omitted here,) that they fastened his head in the temple of Dagon. Thus did they ascribe the honour of their victory, not, as they ought to have done, to the real justice of the true God, but to the imaginary power of their false gods; and, by this respect paid to pretended deities, shame those who give not the praise of their achievements to the living God. Ashtaroth, the idol, that Israel had many a time gone a whoring after, now triumphs over them.

3. They sent expresses throughout their country, and ordered public notice to be given, in the houses of their gods, of the victory they had obtained, (v. 9.) that public rejoicings might be made, and thanks given to their gods. This David regretted sorely; (2 Sam. 1. 20.) Tell it not in Gath.

4. They fastened his body, and the bodies of his sons, (as appears, v. 12.) to the wall of Beth-shan; a city that lay not far from Gilboa, and very near to the river Jordan. Hither the dead bodies were dragged, and here hung up in chains, to be devoured by the birds of prey. Saul slew himself, to avoid being abused by the Philistines, and never was royal corpse so abused as his was; perhaps the more, if they understood that he slew himself, and for that reason. He that thinks to save his honour by sin, will certainly lose it. See to what a height of insolence the Philistines were arrived, just before David was raised up, who perfectly subdued them. Now, that they had slain Saul and his sons, they thought the land of Israel was their own for ever, but they soon found themselves deceived. When God has accomplished his whole work by them, he will accomplish it upon them. See Isa. 10. 6, 7.

II. How they were bravely rescued by the men of Jabesh-gilead. Little more than the river Jordan lay between Beth-shan and Jabesh-gilead, and Jordan was in that place passable by its fords; a bold adventure was therefore made by the valiant men of that city, who, in the night, passed the river, took down the dead bodies, and gave them decent burial, v. 11. . 13. This they did, 1. Out of a common concern for the honour of Israel, or the land of Israel, which ought not to be defiled by the exposing of any dead bodies, and especially of the crown of Israel, which was thus profaned by the uncircumcised. 2. Out of a particular sense of gratitude to Saul, for his zeal and forwardness to rescue them from the Ammonites, when he first came to the throne, ch. 11. It is an argument of a gracious spirit, and an encouragement to beneficence, when the remembrance of kindnesses is thus retained, and they are thus returned, in an extremity. The men of Jabesh-gilead would have done Saul better service, if they had sent their valiant men to him sooner, to strengthen him against the Philistines. But his day was come to fall, and now this is all the service they can do him, in honour to his memory.

We find not that any general mourning was made for the death of Saul, as was for the death of Samuel, (ch. 25. 1.) only those Gileadites of Jabesh did him honour at his death; for, (1.) They made a burning for the bodies, to perfume them. So some understand the burning of them. They burnt spices over them, v. 12. And that it was usual thus to do honour to their deceased friends, at least their princes, appears by the account of Asa's funeral, (2 Chron. 16. 14.) that they made a very great burning for him. Or, (as some think,) they burnt the flesh, because it began to putrefy. (2.) They buried the bodies, when, by burning over them, they had sweetened them, (or, if they burnt them, they buried the bones and ashes,) under a tree, which served for a grave-stone and monument. And, lastly, they fasted seven days; that is, each day of the seven, they fasted till the evening; thus they lamented the death of Saul, and the present distracted state of Israel, and perhaps joined prayers with their fasting, for the re-establishment of their shattered state. Though when the wicked perish there is shouting, that is, it is to be hoped a better state of things will ensue, which will be matter of joy, yet humanity obliges us to shew a decent respect to dead bodies, especially those of princes. This book began with the birth of Samuel, but now it ends with the burial of Saul, the comparing of which two together will teach us to prefer the honour that comes from God, before any of the honours which this world pretends to have the disposal of.

WITH

Practical Observations,

OF THE SECOND BOOK OF

S A M U E L.

This Book is the history of the reign of king David. We had, in the foregoing Book, an account of his designation to the government, and his struggles with Saul, which ended at length in the death of his persecutor. This Book begins with his accession to the throne, and is entirely taken up with the affairs of the government during the forty years he reigned, and therefore is entitled, by the Seventy, The Third Book of the Kings. It gives us an account of David's triumphs and his troubles.

- I. His triumphs over the house of Saul; (ch. 1. . 4.) over the Jebusites and Philistines; (ch. 5.) at the bringing up of the ark; (ch. 6, and 7.) over the neighbouring nations that opposed him, ch. 8. . 10. And so far the history is agreeable to what we might expect from David's character, and the choice made of him. But his cloud has a dark side.
- II. We have his troubles, the cause of them, his sin in the matter of Uriah, ch. 11, and 12. The troubles themselves from the sin of Amnon, (ch. 13.) the rebellion of Absalom, (ch. 14. . 19.) and of Sheba, (ch. 20.) and the plague in Israel for his numbering the people, (ch. 24.) beside the famine for the Gibeonites, ch. 21. His song we have, (ch. 22.) and his words and worthies, ch. 23. Many things in this history are very instructive; but for the hero that is the subject of it, though, in many instances, he appears here very great, and very good, and very much the favourite of Heaven, yet it must be confessed that his honour shines brighter in his Psalms than in his Annals.

CHAP. I.

In the foregoing Book, (with which this is connected as a continuation of the same history,) we had Saul's exit; he went down slain to the pit, though he was the terror of the mighty in the land of the living. We are now to look toward the rising sun, and to inquire where David is, and what he is doing. In this chapter, we have, I. Tidings brought him to Ziklag of the death of Saul and Jonathan, by an Amalekite, who undertook to give him a particular narrative of it, v. 1..10. II. David's sorrowful reception of these tidings, v. 11, 12. III. Justice done upon the messenger, who boasted that he had helped Saul to despatch himself, v. 13..16. IV. An elegy which David penned upon this occasion, v. 17..27. And in all this David's breast appears very happily free from the sparks either of revenge or ambition, and he observes a very suitable demeanour.

I. NOW it came to pass after the death of Saul, when David was returned from the slaughter of the Amalekites, and David had abode two days in Ziklag; 2. It came even to pass on the third day, that, behold, a man came out of the camp from Saul with his clothes rent, and earth upon his head: and so it was, when he came to David, that he fell to the earth, and did obeisance. 3. And David said unto him, From whence comest thou? And he said unto him, Out of the camp of Israel am I escaped. 4. And David said unto him, How went the matter? I pray thee, tell me. And he answered, That the people are fled from the battle, and many of the people also are fallen and dead; and Saul and Jonathan his son are dead also. 5. And David said unto the young man that told him, How knowest thou that Saul and Jonathan his son be dead? 6. And the young man that told him said, As I happened by chance upon mount Gilboa, behold Saul leaned upon his spear; and, lo, the chariots and horsemen followed hard after him. 7. And when he looked behind him, he saw me, and called unto me. And I answered, Here am I. 8. And he said unto me, Who art thou? And I answered him, I am an Amalekite. 9. He said unto me again, Stand, I pray thee, upon me, and slay me: for anguish is come upon me, because my life is yet whole in me. 10. So I stood upon him, and slew him, because I was sure that he could not live after that he was fallen: and I took the crown that was upon his head, and the bracelet that was on his arm, and have brought them hither unto my lord.

Here is,

I. David settling again in Ziklag, his own city; after he had rescued his family and friends out of the hands of the Amalekites, (v. 1.) he abode in Ziklag. Thence he was now sending presents to his friends, (1 Sam. 30. 26.) and there he was ready to receive those that came into his interests; not men in distress and debt, as his first followers were, but persons of quality in their country, mighty men, men of war, and captains of thousands; (as we find, 1 Chron. 12. 1, 8, 20.) such came day by day to him, God stirred up their hearts to do so, till he had a great host, like the host of God, as it is said there, v. 22. The secret springs of revolutions are unaccountable, and must be resolved into that Providence which turns all hearts as the rivers of water.

II. Intelligence brought him thither of the death of Saul. It was strange that he did not leave some spies about the camps, to bring him early notice of the issues of the engagement; a sign that he desired not Saul's woeful day, nor was impatient to come to the throne, but willing to wait till those tidings were brought to him, which many a one would have sent more than half way to meet. He that believes does not make haste, takes good news when it comes, and is not uneasy while it is in the coming.

1. The messenger presents himself to David as an express, in the posture of a mourner for the deceased prince, and a subject to the succeeding one. He came with his clothes rent, and made obeisance to David, (v. 2.) pleasing himself with the fancy that he had the honour to be the first that did him homage as his sovereign; but it proved he was the first that received from him sentence of death, as his judge. He told David he came from the camp of Israel, and intimated the confusion it was in, when he said he was escaped out of it, having much ado to get away with his life, v. 3.

2. He gives him a general account of the issue of the battle. David was very desirous to know how the matter went, as one that had more reasons than any to be concerned for the public; and he told him very distinctly that the army of Israel was routed, many slain, and, among the rest, Saul and Jonathan, v. 4. He names only Saul and Jonathan, because he knew David would be most sollicitous to know their fate; for Saul was the man whom he most feared, and Jonathan the man whom he most loved.

3. He gives him a more particular account of the death of Saul. It is probable that David had heard, by the report of others, what the issue of the war was, for multitudes resorted to him, it should seem, in consequence; but he was desirous to know the certainty of the report concerning Saul and Jonathan, either because he was not forward to believe it, or because he would not proceed upon it, to make his own claims, till he was fully assured of it. He therefore asks, How knowest thou that Saul and Jonathan are dead? In answer to which, the young man tells him a very ready story, putting it past doubt that Saul was dead, for he himself had been not only an eye-witness of his death, but an instrument of it, and therefore David might rely upon his testimony. He says nothing, in his narrative, of the death of Jonathan, knowing how ungrateful that would be to David, but accounts only for Saul, thinking (as David understood it well enough, ch. 4. 10.) that he should be welcome for that, and rewarded, as one that brought good tidings.

The account he gives of this matter is,

(1.) Very particular; that he happened to go to the place where Saul was, (v. 6.) as a passenger, not as a soldier, and therefore an indifferent person; that he found Saul endeavouring to run himself through with his own spear, none of his attendants being willing to do it for him; and, it seems, he could not do it dexterously for himself, his hand and heart failed him, the miserable man had not courage enough either to live or die; he therefore called this stranger to him, (v. 7.) inquired what countryman he was, for, provided he were not a Philistine, he would gladly receive from his hand the coup de grace (as the French call it, concerning those that are broken on the wheel) the merciful stroke, that might despatch him out of his pain. Understanding that he was an Amalekite, (neither one of his subjects, nor one of his enemies,) he begs this favour from him; (v. 9.) Stand upon me, and slay me. He is now sick of his dignity, and willing to be trampled upon; sick of his life, and willing to be slain. Who then would be inordinately fond of life or honour? The case may be such, even with those that have no hope in their death, that yet they may desire to die, and death flee from them, Rev. 9. 6. Anguish is come upon me; so we read it; as a complaint of the pain and terror his spirit was seized with. If his conscience now brought to mind the javelin he had east at David, his pride, malice, and perfidiousness, and especially the murder of the priests, no marvel that anguish came upon him; moles (they say) open their eyes when they are dying. Sense of unpardoned guilt will make death indeed the king of terrors. They that have baffled their convictions, will, perhaps, in their dying moments, be overpowered by them. The margin reads it as a complaint of the inconvenience of his clothes; that his coat of mail, which he had for his defence, or his embroidered coat, which he had for ornament, hindered him, that he could not get the spear far enough into his body, or so straitened him, now that his body swelled with anguish, that he could not expire. Let no man's clothes be his pride, for it may so happen, that they may be his burthen and snare. "Hereupon," saith our young man, "I stood upon him, and slew him;" (v. 10.) at which word, perhaps, he observed David look upon him with some shew of displeasure, and therefore he excuses it, in the next words; "for I was sure he could not live; his life was whole in him indeed, but he would certainly have fallen into the hands of the Philistines, or given himself another thrust."

(2.) It is doubtful whether this story be true. If it was, the righteousness of God is to be observed, that Saul, who spared the Amalekites, in contempt of the divine command, received his death's wound from an Amalekite. But most interpreters think that it was false, and that, though he might happen to be present, yet he was not assisting in the death of Saul, but told David so, in expectation that he would have rewarded him for it, as having done him a piece of good service. They who rejoice at the fall of an enemy, are apt to measure others by themselves, and to think that they will do so too. But a man after God's own heart is not to be judged of by common men. I am not clear whether this young man's story were true or no: it may consist with the narrative in the chapter before, and be an addition to it, as Peter's account of the death of Judas, Acts, 1. 18. is to the narrative, Matth. 27. 5. What is there called a sword, may here be called a spear; or, when he fell upon his sword, he leaned on his spear.

(3.) However, he produced that which was proof sufficient of the death of Saul, the crown that was upon his head, and the bracelet that was on his arm. It should seem, these Saul was so foolishly fond of, as to wear them in the field of battle, which made him a fair mark for the archers, by distinguishing him from those about him: but as pride (we say) feels no cold, so it fears no danger from that which gratifies it. These fell into the hands of this Amalekite. Saul spared the best of their spoil, and now the best of his came to one of that devoted nation. He brought them to David, as the rightful owner of them, now that Saul was dead, not doubting but by his officiousness herein to recommend himself to the best preferments in his court or camp. The tradition of the Jews is, that this Amalekite was the son of Doeg, (for the Amalekites were descendants from Edom,) and that Doeg, who, they suppose, was Saul's armour-bearer before he slew himself, gave Saul's crown and bracelet (the ensigns of his royalty) to his son, and bade him carry them to David, to curry favour with him. But this is a groundless conceit; Doeg's son, it is likely, was so well known to Saul, that he needed not ask him, as he did, (v. 8.) Who art thou? David had been long waiting for the crown, and now it is brought him by an Amalekite. See how God can serve his own purposes of kindness to his people, even by designing (ill-designing) men, who aim at nothing but to set up themselves.

11. Then David took hold on his clothes, and rent them; and likewise all the men that were with him: 12. And they mourned, and wept, and fasted until even, for Saul, and for Jonathan his son, and for the people of the LORD, and for the house of Israel; because they were fallen by the sword. 13. And David said unto the young man that told him, Whence art thou? And he answered, I am the son of a stranger, an Amalekite. 14. And David said unto him, How wast thou not afraid to stretch forth thine hand to destroy the LORD's anointed? 15. And David called one of the young men, and said, Go near, and fall upon him. And he smote him that he died. 16. And David said unto him, thy blood be upon thy head; for thy mouth hath testified against thee, saying, I have slain the LORD's anointed.

Here is,

I. David's reception of these tidings. So far was he from falling into a transport of joy, as the Amalekite expected, that he falls into a passion of weeping, rent his clothes, (v. 11.) mourned and fasted, (v. 12.) not only for his people Israel, and Jonathan his friend, but for Saul his enemy. This he did, not only as a man of honour, in observance of that decorum which forbids us to insult over those that are fallen, and requires us to attend our relations to the grave with respect, whatever we lost by their life, or got by their death; but as a good man and a man of conscience, that had forgiven the injuries Saul had done him, and bore him no malice. He knew it, before his son wrote it, (Prov. 24. 17, 18.) that if we rejoice when our enemy falls, the Lord sees it, and it displeases him; and, that he who is glad at calamities shall not go unpunished, Prov. 17. 5. By this it appears, that those passages in David's psalms, which express his desire of, and triumph in, the ruin of his enemies, proceed not from a spirit of revenge, or any irregular passion, but from a holy zeal for the glory of God and the public good; for, by what he did here, when he heard of Saul's death, we may perceive that his natural temper was very tender, and that he was kindly affected even to those that hated him. He was very sincere, no question, in his mourning for Saul, and it was not pretended, or a copy of his countenance only. His passion was so strong, on this occasion, that it moved those about him; all that were with him, at least, in complaisance to him, rent their clothes, and they fasted till even, in token of their sorrow; and, probably, it was a religious fast, they humbled themselves under the hand of God, and prayed for the repairing of the breaches made upon Israel by this defeat.

II. The reward he gave to him that brought him the tidings; instead of preferring him, he put him to death; judged him, out of his own mouth, as a murderer of his prince, and ordered him forthwith to be executed for the same. What a surprise was this to the messenger, who thought he should have favour shewn him for his pains! In vain did he plead that he had Saul's order for it, that it was a real kindness to him, that he must inevitably have died; all those pleas are over-ruled, "Thy mouth has testified against thee, I have slain the LORD's anointed;" (v. 16.) therefore thou must die."

Now, 1. David herein did not do unjustly. For, (1.) The man was an Amalekite. This, lest he had mistaken it in his narrative, he made him own a second time, v. 13. That nation, and all that belonged to it, were doomed to destruction; so that, in slaying him, David did what his predecessor should have done, and was rejected for not doing. (2.) He did himself confess the crime, so that the evidence was, by the consent of all laws, sufficient to convict him; for every man is presumed to make the best of himself. If he did as he said, he deserved to die for treason, (v. 14.) doing that which, it is probable, he heard Saul's own armour-bearer refuse to do; if not, yet, by boasting that he had done it, he plainly shewed, that, if there had been occasion, he would have done it, and would have made nothing of it; and, by boasting of it to David, he shewed what opinion he had of him, that he would rejoice in it, as one altogether like himself, which was an intolerable affront to him, who had himself once and again refused to stretch forth his hand against the LORD's anointed. And his lying to David, if indeed it were a lie, was highly criminal, and proved, as sooner or later that sin will prove, lying against his own head.

2. He did honourably and well. Hereby he demonstrated the sincerity of his grief; discouraged all others from thinking, by doing the like, to ingratiate themselves with him; and did fat which might, probably, oblige the house of Saul, and win upon them, and recommend him to the people, as one that was zealous for public justice, without regard to his own private interest. We may learn from it, that to give assistance to any in murdering themselves, directly or indirectly, if done wittingly, incurs the guilt of blood; and that the lives of princes ought to be, in a special manner, precious to us.

17. And David lamented with this lamentation over Saul, and over Jonathan his son: 18. (Also he bade them teach the children of Judah the use of the bow: behold, it is written in the book of Jasher.) 19. The beauty of Israel is slain upon thy high places: how are the mighty fallen! 20. Tell it not in Gath, publish it not in the streets of Askelon; lest the daughters of the Philistines rejoice, lest the daughters of the uncircumcised triumph. 21. Ye mountains of Gilboa, let there be no dew, neither let there be rain, upon you, nor fields of offerings: for there the shield of the mighty is vilely cast away, the shield of Saul, as though he had not been anointed with oil. 22. From the blood of the slain, from the fat of the mighty, the bow of Jonathan turned not back, and the sword of Saul returned not empty. 23. Saul and Jonathan were lovely and pleasant in their lives, and in their death they were not divided: they were swifter than eagles, they were stronger than lions. 24. Ye daughters of Israel, weep over Saul, who clothed you in scarlet, with other delights, who put on ornaments of gold upon your apparel. 25. How are the mighty fallen in the midst of the battle! O Jonathan, thou wast slain in thine high places. 26. I am distressed for thee, my brother Jonathan: very pleasant hast thou been unto me: thy love to me was wonderful, passing the love of women. 27. How are the mighty fallen, and the weapons of war perished!

When David had rent his clothes, mourned, and wept, and fasted, for the death of Saul, and done justice upon him who made himself guilty of it, one would think he had made full payment of the debt of honour he owed to his memory; yet this is not all: we have here a poem he wrote on the occasion; for he was a great master of his pen as well as sword. By this elegy he designed both to express his own sorrow for this great calamity, and to impress the like on the minds of others, who ought to lay it to heart. The putting of lamentations into poems, made them, 1. The more moving and affecting. The passion of the poet, or singer, is, by this way, wonderfully communicated to the readers and hearers. 2. The more lasting. Thus they were made, not only to spread far, but to continue long; from generation to generation. Those might gain information by poems, that would not read history.

Here we have,

I. The orders David gave with this elegy; (v. 18.) He bade them teach the children of Judah (his own tribe, whatever others did) the use of the bow; either, 1. The bow used in war. Not but that the children of Judah knew how to use the bow; (it was so commonly used in war, long before this, that the sword and bow were put for all weapons of war, Gen. 48. 22.) but, perhaps, they had of late made more use of slings, as David, in killing Goliath, because cheaper; which David would have them now to see the inconvenience of, (for they were the archers of the Philistines that bore so hard upon Saul, 1 Sam. 31. 3.) and to return more generally to the use of the bow, to exercise themselves in this weapon, that they might be in a capacity to avenge the death of their prince upon the Philistines, and to outdo them at their own weapon. It was pity but that those that had such good heads, and hearts, as the children of Judah, should be well armed. David hereby shewed his authority over, and concern for, the armies of Israel, and set himself to rectify the errors of the former reign. But we find that the companies, which were now come to David to Ziklag, were armed with bows; (1 Chron. 12. 2.) therefore, 2. Some understand it, either of some musical instrument called a bow, to which he would have the mournful ditties sung; or, of the elegy itself; he bade them teach the children of Judah, Kesheth, the bow, that is, this song, which was so entitled, for the sake of Jonathan's bow, the achievements of which are here celebrated. Moses commanded Israel to learn his song, (Deut. 31. 19.) so David his. Probably he bade the Levites teach them. It is written in the book of Jasher, there it was kept upon record, and from thence transcribed into this history. That book was, probably, a collection of state-poems; what is said to be written in that book, (Josh. 10. 13.) is also poetical, a fragment of an historical poem. Even songs would be forgotten and lost, if they were not committed to writing, that best conservatory of knowledge.

II. The elegy itself. It is not a divine hymn, nor given by inspiration of God, to be used in divine service; nor is there any mention of God in it; but it is a human composition, and therefore was inserted, not in the book of Psalms, which, being of divine original, is preserved; but in the book of Jasher, which, being only a collection of common poems, is long since lost.

This elegy bespeaks David to be,

1. A man of an excellent spirit, in four things.

(1.) He was very generous to Saul, his sworn enemy. Saul was his father-in-law, his sovereign, and the anointed of the Lord; and therefore, though he had done him a great deal of wrong, he does not wreak his revenge upon his memory when he is in his grave; but, like a good man, and a man of honour, [1.] He conceals his faults; and though there was no preventing of their appearance in his history, yet they should not appear in this elegy. Charity teaches us to make the best we can of every body; and those we can say no good of, to say nothing of, especially when they are gone. De mortuis nil nisi bonum—Speak evil of no one. We ought to deny ourselves the satisfaction of making personal reflections upon those who have been injurious to us, much more drawing their character from thence, as if every man must of necessity be a bad man, that has done ill by us. Let the corrupt part of the memory be buried with the corrupt part of the man, earth to earth, ashes to ashes; let the blemish be hidden, and a veil drawn over the deformity. [2.] He celebrates that which was praise-worthy in him. He does not commend him for that which he was not: says nothing of his piety, or fidelity; those funeral commendations, which are gathered out of the spoils of truth, are not at all to the praise of those on whom they are bestowed, but very much the dispraise of those who unjustly misplace them. But he has this to say, in honour of Saul himself, First, That he was anointed with oil, (v. 21.) the sacred oil, which signified his elevation to, and qualification for, the government. Whatever he was otherwise, the crown of the anointing oil of his God was upon him, as is said of the high priest, (Lev. 21. 12.) and, on that account, he was to be honoured, because God, the Fountain of honour, had honoured him. Secondly, That he was a man of war, a mighty man; (v. 19. 21.) that he had often been victorious over the enemies of Israel, and vexed them whithersoever he turned; (1 Sam. 14. 47.) his sword returned not empty, but satiated with blood and spoil, v. 22. His disgrace and fall, at last, must not make his former successes and services to be forgotten. Though his sun set under a cloud, time was, when it shone bright. Thirdly, That, take him with Jonathan, he was a man of a very agreeable temper, that recommended himself to the affections of his subjects; (v. 23.) Saul and Jonathan were lovely and pleasant. Jonathan was always so, and Saul was so, as long as he concurred with him. Take them together, and in the pursuit of the enemy, never were men more bold, more brave, swifter than eagles, and stronger than lions. Observe, They that were most fierce and fiery in the camp, were no less sweet and lovely in the court; as amiable to the subject, as they were formidable to the foe: a rare composition of softness and sharpness they had, which makes any man's temper very happy. It may be understood of the harmony and affection that, for the most part, subsisted between Saul and Jonathan; they were lovely and pleasant one to another. Jonathan a dutiful son, Saul an affectionate father, and therefore dear to each other in their lives, and in their death they were not divided, but kept close together in the stand they made against the Philistines, and fell together in the same cause. Fourthly, That he had enriched his country with the spoils of conquered nations, and introduced a more splendid attire. When they had a king like the nations, they must have clothes like the nations; and herein he was, in a particular manner, obliging to his female subjects, v. 24. The daughters of Israel he clothed in scarlet, which was their delight.

(2.) He was very grateful to Jonathan his sworn friend. Beside the tears he sheds over him, and the encomiums he gives of him in common with Saul, he mentions him with some marks of distinction; (v. 25.) O Jonathan, thou wast slain in thine high places! which, compared with v. 19, intimates that he meant him by the beauty of Israel, which, he there says, was slain upon the high places. He laments Jonathan as his particular friend; (v. 26.) My brother Jonathan; not so much of what he would have been to him if he had lived, very serviceable, no doubt, in his advancement to the throne, and instrumental to prevent those long struggles which, for want of assistance, he had with the house of Saul; (had this been the only ground of his grief, it had been selfish;) but he lamented him for what he had been; "Very pleasant hast thou been unto me; but that pleasantness is now over, and I am distressed for thee." He had reason to say, that Jonathan's love to him was wonderful; sure never was the like, for a man to love one who he knew was to take the crown over his head; and to be so faithful to his rival: this far surpassed the highest degree of conjugal affection and constancy. See here, [1.] That nothing is more delightful in this world than a true friend, that is wise and good, that kindly receives and returns our affection, and is faithful to us in all our true interests. [2.] That nothing is more distressful than the loss of such a friend; it is parting with a piece of one's self. It is the vanity of this world, that what is most pleasant to us, we are most liable to be distressed in. The more we love, the more we grieve.

(3.) He was deeply concerned for the honour of God; for that is it which he has an eye to, when he fears lest the daughters of the uncircumcised, that are out of covenant with God, triumph over Israel, and the God of Israel, v. 20. Good men are touched in a very sensible part by the reproaches of them that reproach God.

(4.) He was deeply concerned for the public welfare. It was the beauty of Israel that was slain, (v. 19.) and the honour of the public that was disgraced; the mighty are fallen, that is three times lamented, (v. 19, 25, 27.) and so the strength of the people is weakened. Public losses are most laid to heart by men of public spirits. David hoped God would make him instrumental to repair those losses, and yet laments them.

2. David here shews himself to be a man of a fine imagination, as well as a wise and holy man. The expressions are all excellent, and calculated to work upon the passions. (1.) The embargo he would fain lay upon Fame, is elegant, (v. 20.) Tell it not in Gath. It grieved him to the heart, to think that it would be proclaimed in the cities of the Philistines, and that they would insult over Israel upon it, and the more, in remembrance of the triumphs of Israel over them formerly, when they sung, Saul has slain his thousands; that would now be retorted. (2.) The curse he entails on the mountains of Gilboa, the theatre on which this tragedy was acted, Let there be no dew upon you, nor fields of offerings, v. 21. This is a poetical strain, like that of Job, Let the day perish wherein I was born. Not as if David wished that any part of the land of Israel might be barren, but, to express his sorrow for the thing, he speaks with a seeming indignation at the place.

Observe, [1.] How the fruitfulness of the earth depends upon heaven. The worst thing he could wish to the mountains of Gilboa was, barrenness, and unprofitableness to man; those are miserable that are useless; it was the curse Christ pronounced on the fig-tree, Never fruit grow on thee more; and that took effect, the fig-tree withered away; this, on the mountains of Gilboa, did not; but, when he wished them barren, he wished there might be no rain upon them: and if the heavens be brass, the earth will soon be iron. [2.] How the fruitfulness of the earth must therefore be devoted to heaven; which is intimated in his calling the fruitful fields, fields of offerings. Those fruits of their land that were offered to God, were the crown and glory of it: and therefore the failure of the offerings is the saddest consequence of the failure of the corn. See Joel, 1. 9. To want that wherewith we should honour God, is worse than to want that wherewith we should sustain ourselves. This is the reproach David fastens upon the mountains of Gilboa, which, having been stained with royal blood, thereby forfeited celestial dews. In this elegy, Saul had a more honourable interment than that which the men of Jabesh-gilead gave him.

CHAP. II.

David had paid due respect to the memory of Saul his prince, and Jonathan his friend, and what he did was as much his praise as their's; he is now considering what is to be done next. Saul is dead, now therefore David arises. I. By direction from God, he went up to Hebron, and was there anointed king, v. 1..4. II. He returned thanks to the men of Jabesh-gilead for burying Saul, v. 5..7. III. Ish-bosheth, the son of Saul, is set up in opposition to him, v. 8..11. IV. A warm encounter happens between David's party and Ish-bosheth's, in which, 1. Twelve of each side engaged hand to hand, and were all slain, v. 12..16. 2. Saul's party was beaten, v. 17. 3. Asahel, on David's side, was slain by Abner, v. 18..23. 4. Joab, at Abner's request, sounds a retreat, v. 24..28. 5. Abner makes the best of his way; (v. 29.) and the loss on both sides is computed, v. 30..32. So that here we have an account of a civil war in Israel, which, in process of time, ended in the complete settlement of David on the throne.

1. AND it came to pass after this, that David inquired of the LORD, saying, Shall I go up into any of the cities of Judah? And the LORD said unto him, Go up. And David said, Whither shall I go up? And he said, Unto Hebron. 2. So David went up thither, and his two wives also, Abinoam the Jezreelitess, and Abigail Nabal's wife the Carmelite. 3. And his men that were with him did David bring up, every man with his household: and they dwelt in the cities of Hebron. 4. And the men of Judah came; and there they anointed David king over the house of Judah. And they told David, saying, That the men of Jabesh-gilead were they that buried Saul. 5. And David sent messengers unto the men of Jabesh-gilead, and said unto them, Blessed be ye of the LORD, that ye have shewed this kindness unto your lord, even unto Saul, and have buried him. 6. And now the LORD shew kindness and truth, unto you: and I also will requite you this kindness, because ye have done this thing. 7. Therefore now let your hands be strengthened, and be ye valiant: for your master Saul is dead, and also the house of Judah have anointed me king over them.

When Saul and Jonathan were dead, though David knew himself anointed to be king, and now saw his way very clear, yet he did not immediately send messengers through all the coasts of Israel, to summon all people to come in and swear allegiance to him, upon pain of death, but proceeded leisurely; for he had believeth, doth not make haste, but waits God's time for the accomplishment of God's promises. Many were come in to his assistance from several tribes, while he continued at Ziklag, (as we find, 1 Chron. 12. 1. . 22.) and by such a force he might have come in by conquest; but he that will rule with meekness, will not rise with violence. Observe here,

I. The direction he sought and had from God, in this critical juncture, v. 1. He doubted not of success, yet he uses proper means, both divine and human. Assurance of hope in God's promise will be so far from slackening, that it will quicken, pious endeavours. If I be elected to the crown of life, it does not follow, Then I will do nothing; but, Then I will do all that he directs me, and follow his conduct who chose me: this good use David made of his election, and so will all whom God has chosen. 1. David, according to the precept, acknowledged God in his way. He inquired of the Lord, by the breast-plate of judgment, which Abiathar brought him. We must apply ourselves to God, not only when we are in distress, but even then when the world smiles upon us, and second causes work in favour of us. His inquiry was, "Shall I go up to any of the cities of Judah? Shall I stir hence?" Though Ziklag be in ruins, he will not quit it without direction from God: "If I stir hence, shall I go to one of the cities of Judah?" Not limiting God to them; if God should so direct him, he would go to any of the cities of Israel. But it bespeaks his prudence, in the cities of Judah he would find most friends; and his modesty, he would look no further at present than his own tribe. In all our motions and removes, it is comfortable to see God going before us; and we may, if by faith and prayer we set him before us. 2. God, according to the promise, directed his path, bade him go up, told him whither, unto Hebron, a priests' city, one of the cities of refuge; so it was to David, and an intimation that God himself would be to him a little Sanctuary. The sepulchres of the patriarchs, adjoining to Hebron, would remind him of the ancient promise, on which God had caused him to hope. God sent him, not to Beth-lehem, his own city, because that was little among the thousands of Judah; (Mic. 5. 2.) but to Hebron, a more considerable place, and which, perhaps, was then as the county town of that tribe.

II. The care he took of his family and friends in his remove to Hebron. 1. He took his wives with him, (v. 2.) that, as they had been companions with him in tribulation, they might be so in the kingdom. It does not appear that as yet he had any children; his first-born was in Hebron, ch. 3. 2. 2. He took his friends and followers with him; (v. 3.) they had accompanied him in his wanderings, and therefore, when he gained a settlement, they settled with him. Thus, if we suffer with Christ, we shall reign with him, 2 Tim. 2. 12. Nay, Christ does more for his good soldiers, than David could do for his; he found lodging for them, They dwelt in the cities of Hebron, the adjacent towns; but to those who continue with Christ in his temptations, he appoints a kingdom, and will feast them at his own table, Luke, 22. 29, 30.

III. The honour done him by the men of Judah; they anointed him king over the house of Judah, v. 4. The tribe of Judah had often stood by itself, more than any other of the tribes; in Saul's time it was numbered by itself as a distinct body, (1 Sam. 15. 4.) and had been used to act separately; they did so now; yet they did it for themselves only; they did not pretend to anoint him king over all Israel, (as Judg. 9. 22.) but only over the house of Judah; the rest of the tribes might do as they pleased, but as for them and their house, they would be ruled by him whom God had chosen. See how David rose gradually; he was first anointed king in reversion, then, in possession, of one tribe only, and, at last, of all the tribes; thus the kingdom of the Messiah, the Son of David, is set up by degrees; he is Lord of all, by divine designation, but we see not yet all things put under him, Heb. 2. 8. David's reigning at first over the house of Judah only, was a tacit intimation of Providence, that his kingdom would in a short time be reduced to that again, as it was when the ten tribes revolted from his grandson; and it would be an encouragement to the godly kings of Judah, that David himself, at first, reigned over Judah only.

IV. The respectful message he sent to the men of Jabesh-gilead, to return them thanks for their kindness to Saul. Still he studies to honour the memory of his predecessor, and thereby to shew, that he was far from aiming at the crown from any principle of ambition or enmity to Saul, but purely because he was called of God to it. It was told him, that the men of Jabesh-gilead buried Saul, perhaps, by some that thought he would have been displeased at them as over-officious. But he was far from that; 1. He commended them for it, v. 5. According as our obligations were to love and honour any while they lived, we ought to shew respect to their remains, that is, their bodies, names, and families, when they are dead: "Saul was your lord," says David, "and therefore you did well to shew him this kindness, and do him this honour." 2. He prays to God to bless them for it, and to recompense it to them. Blessed be ye, and blessed may ye be of the Lord, who will deal kindly with those in a particular manner, that deal kindly with the dead, as it is in Ruth, 1. 8. Due respect and affection, shewed to the bodies, names, and families, of those that are dead, in conscience toward God, is a piece of charity, which shall in no wise lose its reward. The Lord shew kindness and truth to you! (v. 6.) that is, kindness according to the promise: what kindness God shews, is, in truth, what one may trust to. 3. He promises to make them amends for it, I also will requite you. He does not turn them over to God for recompence, that he might excuse himself from rewarding them; good wishes are good things, and instances of gratitude, but they are too cheap to be rested in where there is an ability to do more. 4. He prudently takes this opportunity to gain them to his interest, v. 7. They had paid their last respects to Saul, and he would have them to be the last; "The house of Judah have anointed me king; and it will be your wisdom to concur with them, and in that to be valiant." We must not so dote on the dead, how much soever we have valued them, as to neglect or despise the blessings we have in those that survive, whom God has raised up to us in their stead.

8. But Abner the son of Ner, captain of Saul's host, took Ish-bosheth the son of Saul, and brought him over to Mahanaim; 9. And he made him king over Gilead, and over the Ashurites, and over Jezreel, and over Ephraim, and over Benjamin, and over all Israel. 10. Ish-bosheth Saul's son was forty years old when he began to reign over Israel, and reigned two years. But the house of Judah followed David. 11. And the time that David was king in Hebron over the house of Judah was seven years and six months. 12. And Abner the son of Ner, and the servants of Ish-bosheth the son of Saul, went out from Mahanaim to Gibeon. 13. And Joab the son of Zeruiah, and the servants of David, went out, and met together by the pool of Gibeon: and they sat down, the one on the one side of the pool, and the other on the other side of the pool. 14. And Abner said to Joab, Let the young men now arise, and play before us. And Joab said, Let them arise. 15. Then there arose and went over by number twelve of Benjamin, which pertained to Ish-bosheth the son of Saul, and twelve of the servants of David. 16. And they caught every one his fellow by the head, and thrust his sword in his fellow's side, so they fell down together: wherefore that place was called Helkath-hazzurim, which is in Gibeon. 17. And there was a very sore battle that day; and Abner was beaten, and the men of Israel, before the servants of David.

Here is,

I. A rivalry between two kings; David, whom God made king, and Ish-bosheth, whom Abner made king. One would have thought, when Saul was slain, and all his sons that had sense and spirit enough to take the field with him, David should have come to the throne without any opposition, since all Israel knew not only how he had signalized himself, but how manifestly God had designated him to it; but such a spirit of contradiction is there, in the devices of men, to the counsels of God, that such a weak and silly thing as Ish-bosheth, who was not thought fit to go with his father to the battle, shall yet be thought fit to succeed him in the government, rather than David shall come peaceably to it. Herein David's kingdom was typical of the Messiah's, against which the heathens rage, and the rulers take counsel, Ps. 2. 1, 2. 1. Abner was the person who set up Ish-bosheth in competition with David; perhaps, in his zeal for the lineal succession; since they must have a king like the nations, in this they must be like them, that the crown must descend from father to son. Or rather, in his affection to his own family and relations, (for he was Saul's uncle,) and because he had no other way to secure to himself the post of honour he was in, as captain of the host. See how much mischief the pride and ambition of one man may be the occasion of. Ish-bosheth would never have set up himself, if Abner had not set him up, and made a tool of him to serve his own purposes. 2. Mahanaim was the place where he first made his claim. On the other side Jordan, where it was thought David had the least interest, and, being at a distance from his forces, they might have time to strengthen themselves. But, having set up his standard there, the unthinking people of all the tribes of Israel, that is, the generality of them, submitted to him, (v. 9.) and Judah only was entire for David. This was a further trial of the faith of David in the promise of God, and of his patience, whether he could wait God's time for the performance of that promise. 3. Some difficulty there is about the time of the continuance of this competition. David reigned over Judah only about seven years; (v. 11.) and yet (v. 10.) Ish-bosheth reigned over Israel but two years; either before these two years, or after, or both, it was in general for the house of Saul, (ch. 3. 6.) and not any particular person of that house, that Abner declared. Or, these two years he reigned before the war broke out, (v. 12.) which continued long, even the remaining five years, ch. 3. 1.

II. A rencounter between their two armies. It does not appear that either side brought their whole force into the field, for the slaughter was but small, v. 30, 31. We may wonder, 1. That the men of Judah did not appear and act more vigorously for David, to reduce all the nation into obedience to him; but, it is likely, David would not suffer them to act offensively, choosing rather to wait till the thing would do itself, or rather till God would do it for him, without the effusion of Israelitish blood, for to him, as a type of Christ, that was very precious, Ps. 72. 14. Even those that were his adversaries he looked upon as his subjects, and would treat them accordingly. 2. That the men of Israel could in a manner stand neuter, and sit down tamely under Ish-bosheth, for so many years, especially considering what characters many of the tribes displayed at this time, as we find, 1 Chron. 12. 23, &c. Wise men, mighty men, men of valour, expert in war, and not of double heart, and yet for seven years together, for aught that appears, most of them seemed indifferent in whose hand the public administration was. Divine Providence serves its own purposes, by the stupidity of men at some times, and the activity of the same persons at other times; they are unlike themselves, and yet the motions of Providence uniform.

(1.) In this battle Abner was the aggressor. David sat still to see how the matter would fall; but the house of Saul, and Abner at the head of it, gave the challenge, and they went by the worst. Therefore go not forth hastily to strive, nor be forward to begin quarrels, lest thou know not what to do in the end thereof. Prov. 25. 8. A fool's lips and hands enter into contention.

(2.) The seat of the war was Gibeon; Abner chose it, because it was in the lot of Benjamin, where Saul had the most friends; yet, since he offered battle, Joab, David's general, would not decline it, but there joined issue with him, and met him by the pool of Gibeon, v. 13. David's cause, being built upon God's promise, feared not the disadvantages of the ground; the pool between them gave both sides time to deliberate.

(3.) The engagement was first proposed by Abner, and accepted by Joab, to be between twelve and twelve of a side. [1.] It should seem this trial of skill began in sport. Abner made the motion, (v. 14.) Let the young men arise, and play before us, as gladiators; perhaps, Saul had used his men to these barbarous pastimes, like a tyrant indeed, and Abner had learnt it of him, to make a jest of wounds and death, and divert himself with the scenes of blood and horror. He meant, "Let them fight before us," when he said, "Let them play before us;" fools thus make a mock at sin. But he is unworthy the name of a man, that can be thus prodigal of human blood, that can thus throw about firebrands, arrows, and death, and say, Am not I in sport? Prov. 26. 18, 19. Joab, having been bred up under David, had so much wisdom as not to make such a proposal, yet had not resolution enough to resist and gainsay it when another made it. For he stood upon a point of honour, and thought it a blemish to his reputation to refuse a challenge; and therefore said, Let them arise; not that he was fond of the sport, or expected that the duels would be decisive, but he would not be hector'd by his antagonist. How many precious lives have thus been sacrificed to the caprice of proud men! Twelve of each side were accordingly called out as champions to enter the lists, a double jury of life and death, not of others', but their own; and the champions on Abner's side seem to have been most forward, for they took the field first, (v. 15.) having, perhaps, been bred up in a foolish ambition, thus to serve the humour of their commander-in-chief. But, [2.] However it began, it ended in blood; (v. 16.) they thrust every man his sword into his fellow's side, spurred on by honour, not by enmity; so they fell down together, that is, all the twenty-four were slain; such an equal match were they for one another, and so resolute, that neither side would either beg or give quarter; they did as it were by agreement (says Josaphus) despatch one another with mutual wounds. They that strike at other men's lives, often throw away their own, and death only conquers and rides in triumph. The wonderful obstinacy of both sides was remembered in the name given to the place, Helkath-hazzurim, the field of rocky men; men that were not only strong in body, but of firm and unshaken constancy, that stirred not at the sight of death. Yet the stout-hearted were spoiled, and slept their sleep, Ps. 76. 5. Poor honour for men to purchase at so vast an expense: they that lose their lives for Christ, shall find them.

(4.) The whole army, at length, engaged, and Abner's forces were routed, v. 17. The former was a drawn battle, in which all were killed on both sides and therefore they must put it upon another trial, in which (as it often happens) they that gave the challenge went away with loss. David had God on his side; his side therefore was victorious.

18. And there were three sons of Zeruiah there, Joab, and Abishai, and Asahel: and Asahel was as light of foot as a wild roe. 19. And Asahel pursued after Abner; and in going he turned not to the right hand nor to the left from following Abner. 20. Then Abner looked behind him, and said, Art thou Asahel? And he answered, I am. 21. And Abner said to him, Turn thee aside to thy right hand or to thy left, and lay thee hold on one of the young men, and take thee his armour. But Asahel would not turn aside from following of him. 22. And Abner said again to Asahel, Turn thee aside from following me: wherefore should I smite thee to the ground? how then should I hold up my face to Joab thy brother? 23. Howbeit he refused to turn aside: wherefore Abner with the hinder end of the spear smote him under the fifth rib, that the spear came out behind him; and he fell down there, and died in the same place: and it came to pass, that as many as came to the place where Asahel fell down and died, stood still. 24. Joab also and Abishai pursued after Abner: and the sun went down when they were come to the hill of Ammah, that lieth before Giah by the way of the wilderness of Gibeon.

We have here the contest between Abner and Asahel: Asahel, the brother of Joab, and cousin-german to David, was one of the principal commanders of David's forces, and was famous for swiftness in running; he was as light of foot as a wild roe; (v.18.) this he got the name of, by swift pursuing, not swift flying. Yet, we may suppose, he was not comparable to Abner, as a skilful experienced soldier; we must therefore observe,

1. How rash he was in aiming to make Abner his prisoner. He pursued after him, and no other, v.19. Proud of his relation to David and Joab, his own swiftness, and the success of his party, no less a trophy of victory would now serve the young warrior, than Abner himself, either slain or bound, which he thought would put an end to the war, and effectually open David's way to the throne. This made him very eager in the pursuit, and careless of the opportunities he had of seizing others in his way, on his right hand, and on his left; his eye is on Abner only. The design was brave, had he been par negotio—equal to the accomplishment of it: but let not the swift man glory in his swiftness, any more than the strong man in his strength; magnis excidit ausis—he perished in an attempt too vast for him.

2. How fair Abner was, in giving him notice of the danger he exposed himself to, and advising him not to meddle to his own hurt, 2Chron.25.19. (1.) He bid him content himself with a lesser prey; (v.21.) "Lay hold on one of the young men, plunder him, and make him thy prisoner; meddle with thy match, but pretend not to one who is so much superior to thee." It is wisdom, in all contests, to compare our own strength with that of our adversaries, and to take heed of being partial to ourselves in making the comparison, lest we prove, in the issue, enemies to ourselves, Luke, 14.31. (2.) He begged of him not to put him upon the necessity of slaying him in his own defence, which he was very loath to do, but must do, rather than he slain by him, v.22. Abner, it seems, either loved Joab, or feared him, for he was very loath to incur his displeasure, which he would certainly do, if he slew Asahel. It is commendable for enemies to be thus respectful one to another. Abner's care how he should lift up his face to Joab, gives cause to suspect that he really believed David would have the kingdom at last, according to the divine designation, and then, in opposing him, he acted against his conscience.

3. How fatal Asahel's rashness was to him. He refused to turn aside, thinking that Abner spoke so kindly, because he feared him; but what came of it? Abner, as soon as he came up to him, gave him his death's wound with a back stroke; (v.23.) he smote him with the hinder end of his spear, from which he feared no danger. This was a pass which Asahel was not acquainted with, nor had learned to stand upon his guard against; but Abner, perhaps, had formerly used it, and done execution with it; and here it did effectual execution, Asahel died immediately of the wound. See here, (1.) How death often comes upon us by ways that we least suspect. Who would fear the hand of a flying enemy, or the butt-end of a spear? Yet from these Asahel receives his death's wound. (2.) How we are often betrayed by the accomplishments we are proud of. Asahel's swiftness, which he presumed so much upon, did him no kindness, but forwarded his fate, and with it he ran upon his death, instead of running from it. Asahel's fall was not only Abner's security from him, but put a full stop to the conqueror's pursuit, and gave Abner time to rally again; for all that came to the place stood still: only Joab and Abishai, instead of being disheartened, were exasperated by it, pursued Abner with so much the more fury, (v.24.) and overtook him at last about sun-set, when the approaching night would oblige them to retire.

25. And the children of Benjamin gathered themselves together after Abner, and became one troop, and stood on the top of an hill. 26. Then Abner called to Joab, and said, Shall the sword devour for ever? knowest thou not that it will be bitterness in the latter end? how long shall it be then, ere thou bid the people return from following their brethren? 27. And Joab said, As God liveth, unless thou hadst spoken, surely then in the morning the people had gone up every one from following his brother. 28. So Joab blew a trumpet, and all the people stood still, and pursued after Israel no more, neither fought they any more. 29. And Abner and his men walked all that night through the plain, and passed over Jordan, and went through all Bitron, and they came to Mahanaim. 30. And Joab returned from following Abner: and when he had gathered all the people together, there lacked of David's servants nineteen men, and Asahel. 31. But the servants of David had smitten of Benjamin, and of Abner's men, so that three hundred and three-score men died. 32. And they took up Asahel, and buried him in the sepulchre of his father, which was in Beth-lehem. And Joab and his men went all night, and they came to Hebron at break of day.

Here, 1. Abner, being conquered, meanly begs for a cessation of arms; he rallied the remains of his forces on the top of a hill, (v.25.) as if he would have made head again, but becomes a humble supplicant to Joab for a little breathing-time, v.26. He that was most forward to fight, was the first that had enough of it. He that made a jest of bloodshed, (v.14. Let the young men arise and play before us,) is now shocked at it, when he finds himself on the losing side; and the sword he made so light of drawing, threatening to touch himself. Observe how his note is changed: then, it was but playing with the sword; now, Shall the sword devour for ever? It had devoured but one day, yet to him it seemed for ever, because it went against him; and very willing he is now, that the sun should not go down upon his wrath. Now he can appeal to Joab himself concerning the miserable consequences of a civil war. Knowest thou not that it will be bitterness in the latter end? It will be reflected upon with regret when the account comes to be made up; for whoever gets in a civil war, the community is sure to lose. Perhaps he refers to the bitterness that was in the tribes of Israel, in the end of their war with Benjamin, when they wept sore for the desolations which they themselves had made, Judg. 21. 2. Now he begs of Joab to sound a retreat, and pleads that they were brethren, who ought not thus to bite and devour one another: he that in the morning would have Joab bid the people fall upon their brethren, now would have bid them lay down their arms. See here, (1.) How easy it is for men to use reason, when it makes for them, who would not use it, if it made against them! If Abner had been the conqueror, we should not have had him complaining of the voraciousness of the sword, and the miseries of a civil war, nor pleading that both sides were brethren; but, finding himself beaten, all these reasonings are mustered up and improved for the securing of his retreat, and the saving of his scattered troops from being cut off. (2.) How the issue of things alters men's minds. The same thing which looked pleasant in the morning, at night looked dismal. Those that are forward to enter into contention, will, perhaps, repent it before they have done with it, and therefore had better leave it off before it be meddled with, as Solomon advises. It is true of every sin, (Oh that men would consider it in time!) that it will be bitterness in the latter end. At the last it bites, like a serpent, those on whom it fawned.

2. Joab, though a conqueror, generously grants it, and sounds a retreat, knowing very well his master's mind, and how averse he was to the shedding of blood. He does indeed justly upbraid Abner with his forwardness to engage; he lays the blame upon him, that there had been so much blood shed as there was; (v. 27.) "Unless thou hadst spoken," that is, "hadst given orders to fight, hadst bidden the young men arise and play before us, none of us had struck a stroke, nor drawn a sword against our brethren. Thou complainest that the sword devours: but who first unsheathed it? Who began? Now thou wouldest have the people parted, but remember who set them on to fight. We had retired in the morning, if thou hadst not given the challenge." Those that are forward to make mischief are commonly the first to complain of it. This might have served to excuse Joab, if he had pushed on his victory, and made a full end of Abner's forces; but, like one that pitied the mistake of his adversaries, and scorned to make an army of Israelites pay dear for the folly of their commander, he very honourably, by sound of trumpet, put a stop to the pursuit, (v. 28.) and suffered Abner to make an orderly retreat. It is good husbandry to be sparing of blood. As the soldiers were here very obsequious to the general's orders, so he, no doubt, observed the instructions of his prince, who sought the welfare of all Israel, and therefore not the hurt of any.

3. The armies being separated, both retired to the places whence they came, and both marched in the night; Abner to Mahanaim, on the other side Jordan, (v. 29.) and Joab to Hebron, where David was, v. 32. The slain on both sides are computed. On David's side, only nineteen men were missing, and Asahel, (v. 30.) who was worth more than all; on Abner's side, three hundred and three score, v. 31. In civil wars formerly great slaughters had been made; (as Judg. 12. 6.—20. 44.) in comparison with which, this was nothing. It is to be hoped that they were grown wiser and more moderate. Asahel's funeral is here mentioned; the rest they buried in the field of battle, but he was carried to Beth-lehem, and buried in the sepulchre of his father, v. 32. Thus are distinctions made between the dust of some and that of others; but in the resurrection no other difference will be made, but that between godly and ungodly, which will remain for ever.

CHAP. III.

The battle between Joab and Abner did not end the controversy between the two houses of Saul and David, but it is in this chapter working towards a period. Here is, I. The gradual advance of David's interest, v. 1. II. The building up of his family, v. 2. 5. III. Abner's quarrel with Ish-bosheth, and his treaty with David, v. 6. 12. IV. The preliminaries settled, v. 13. 16. V. Abner's undertaking and attempt to bring Israel over to David, v. 17. 21. VI. The treacherous murder of Abner, by Joab, when he was carrying on this matter, v. 22. 27. VII. David's great concern and trouble for the death of Abner, v. 28. 36.

1. NOW there was long war between the house of Saul and the house of David: but David waxed stronger and stronger, and the house of Saul waxed weaker and weaker. 2. And unto David were sons born in Hebron: and his first-born was Amnon, of Ahinoam the Jezreelitess; 3. And his second, Chileab, of Abigail the wife of Nabal the Carmelite; and the third, Absalom the son of Maacab, the daughter of Talmai king of Geshur; 4. And the fourth, Adonijah the son of Haggith; and the fifth, Shephatiah the son of Abital; 5. And the sixth, Ithream, by Eglah David's wife. These were born to David in Hebron. 6. And it came to pass, while there was war between the house of Saul and the house of David, that Abner made himself strong for the house of Saul.

Here is,

1. The struggle that David had with the house of Saul, before his settlement in the throne was completed, v. 1. (1.) Both sides contested; Saul's house, though beheaded and diminished, would not fall tamely. It is not strange that there was war between them; but one would wonder it should be a long war, when David's house had right on its side, and therefore God on its side; but, though truth and equity will triumph at last, God may, for wise and holy ends, prolong the conflict. The length of this war tried the faith and patience of David, and made his establishment at last the more welcome to him. (2.) David's side got ground. The house of Saul waxed weaker and weaker, lost places, lost men, sunk in its reputation, grew less considerable, and was foiled in every engagement; but the house of David grew stronger and stronger; many deserted the declining cause of Saul's house, and prudently came into David's interest, being convinced that he would certainly win the day. The contest between grace and corruption in the hearts of believers, who are sanctified but in part, may fitly be compared to this recorded here. There is a long war between them, the flesh lusting against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh; but as the work of sanctification is carried on, corruption, like the house of Saul, grows weaker and weaker; while grace, like the house of David, grows stronger and stronger, till it come to a perfect man, and judgment be brought forth unto victory.

2. The increase of his own house. Here is an account of six sons he had by six several wives, in the seven years he reigned in Hebron. Perhaps this is mentioned here, as that which strengthened David's interest; every child, whose welfare was embarked in the common safety, was a fresh security given to the commonwealth for his care of it. He that has his quiver filled with these arrows, shall speak with his enemy in the gate, Ps. 127. 5. As the death of Saul's sons weakened his interest, so the birth of David's strengthened his. (1.) It was David's fault thus to multiply wives, contrary to the law, (Deut. 17. 17.) and it was a bad example to his successors. (2.) It does not appear, that in these seven years he had above one son by each of these wives; some have had as numerous a progeny, and with much more honour and comfort, by one wife. (3.) We read not that any of these sons came to be famous, three of them were infamous, Amnon, Absalom, and Adonijah; we have therefore reason to rejoice, with trembling, in the building up of our families. (4.) His son by Abigail is called Chileab, v. 3. whereas

1 Chron. 3. 1. he is called Daniel. Bishop Patrick tells the reason which the Hebrew doctors give for these names: that his first name was Daniel, God has judged me, namely, against Nabal; but David's enemies reproached him, and said, "It was Nabal's son, and not David's;" to confute which calumny, Providence so ordered it, that, as he grew up, he became, in his countenance and features, extremely like David, and resembled him more than any of his children, upon which he gave him the name of Chileab, which signifies, like his father; or, the father's picture. (5.) Absalom's mother is said to be the daughter of Talmi, king of Geshur, a heathen prince: perhaps David thereby hoped to strengthen his interest, but the issue of the marriage was one that proved his grief and shame. (6.) The last is called David's wife, which therefore, some think, was Michal, his first and most rightful wife, called here by another name; and though she had no child after she mocked David, she might have had before.

Thus was David's house strengthened: but it was Abner that wade himself strong for the house of Saul, which is mentioned, (v. 6.) to shew, that, if he failed them, they would fall of course.

7. And Saul had a concubine, whose name was Rizpah, the daughter of Aiah: and Ish-bosheth said to Abner, Wherefore hast thou gone in unto my father's concubine? 8. Then was Abner very wroth for the words of Ish-bosheth, and said, Am I a dog's head, which against Judah do shew kindness this day unto the house of Saul thy father, to his brethren, and to his friends, and have not delivered thee into the hand of David, that thou chargest me to-day with a fault concerning this woman? 9. So do God to Abner, and more also, except, as the LORD hath sworn to David, even so I do to him; 10. To translate the kingdom from the house of Saul, and to set up the throne of David over Israel and over Judah, from Dan even to Beer-sheba. 11. And he could not answer Abner a word again, because he feared him. 12. And Abner sent messengers to David on his behalf, saying, Whose is the land? saying also, Make thy league with me, and, behold, my hand shall be with thee, to bring about all Israel unto thee. 13. And he said, Well; I will make a league with thee: but one thing I require of thee, that is, Thou shalt not see my face, except thou first bring Michal Saul's daughter, when thou comest to see my face. 14. And David sent messengers to Ish-bosheth Saul's son, saying, Deliver me my wife Michal which I espoused to me for an hundred foreskins of the Philistines. 15. And Ish-bosheth sent, and took her from her husband, even from Phaltiel the son of Laish. 16. And her husband went with her along weeping behind her to Bahurim. Then said Abner unto him, Go, return. And he returned. 17. And Abner had communication with the elders of Israel, saying, Ye sought for David in times past to be king over you: 18. Now then do it: for the LORD hath spoken of David, saying, By the hand of my servant David I will save my people Israel out of the hand of the Philistines, and out of the hand of all their enemies. 19. And Abner also spake in the ears of Benjamin: and Abner went also to speak in the ears of David in Hebron all that seemed good to Israel, and that seemed good to the whole house of Benjamin. 20. So Abner came to David to Hebron, and twenty men with him. And David made Abner and the men that were with him a feast. 21. And Abner said unto David, I will arise and go, and will gather all Israel unto my lord the king, that they may make a league with thee, and that thou mayest reign over all that thine heart desireth. And David sent Abner away; and he went in peace.

Here,

1. Abner breaks with Ish-bosheth, and deserts his interest, upon a little provocation which Ish-bosheth unadvisedly gave him. God can serve his own purposes by the sins and follies of men. 1. Ish-bosheth accused Abner of no less a crime than debauching one of his father's concubines, v. 7. Whether it was so or no, does not appear, nor what ground he had for the suspicion: but, however it was, it had been Ish-bosheth's prudence to connive at it, considering how much it was his interest not to disoblige Abner. If the thing was false, and his jealousy groundless, it was very disingenuous and ungrateful to entertain unjust surmises of one who had ventured his all for him, and was certainly the best friend he had in the world. 2. Abner resented the charge very deeply. Whether he was guilty of the fault concerning this woman, or no, he does not say, (v. 8.) but we suspect he was guilty, for he does not expressly deny it; and though he was, he lets Ish-bosheth know, (1.) That he scorned to be reproached with it by him, and would not take it at his hands. "What!" says Abner, "am I a dog's head, a vile and contemptible animal, that thou expositest me thus? v. 8. Is this my recompence for the kindness I have shewn to thee and thy father's house, and the good services I have done you?" He magnifies the service with this, That it was against Judah, the tribe on which the crown was settled, and which would certainly have it at last; so that, in supporting the house of Saul, he acted both against his conscience, and against his interest, for which he deserved a better requital than this: and yet, perhaps, he would not have been so zealous for the house of Saul, if he had not thereby gratified his own ambition, and hoped to find his own account in it. Note, Proud men will not bear to be reproved, especially by those whom they think they have obliged. (2.) That he would certainly be avenged on him, v. 9, 10. With the utmost degree of arrogance and insolence, he lets him know, that, as he had raised him up, so he could pull him down again, and would do it. He knew that God had sworn to David to give him the kingdom, and yet opposed it with all his might, from a principle of ambition; but now he complies with it from a principle of revenge, under colour of some regard to the will of God, which was but a pretence. They that are slaves to their lusts have many masters, which drive, some one way, and some another, and, according as they make head, men are violently hurried into self-contradictions. Abner's ambition made him zealous for Ish-bosheth, and now his revenge made him as zealous for David; if he had sincerely regarded God's promise to David, and acted with an eye to that, he had been steady and uniform in his counsels, and acted in consistence with himself. But, while Abner serves his own lusts, God, by him, serves his own purposes; makes even his wrath and revenge to praise him, and ordains strength to David by it. Lastly, See how Ish-bosheth was thunder-struck by Abner's insolence; he could not answer him again, v. 11. If Ish-bosheth had had the spirit of a man, especially of a great prince, he might have answered him, that his merits were the aggravation of his crimes; that he would not be served by so bad a man, and doubted not but to do well enough without him. But he was conscious to himself of his own weakness, and therefore said not a word, lest he should make himself worse. His heart failed him, and he now became, as David had foretold, concerning his enemies, like a bowing wall, and a tottering fence, Ps. 62. 3.

II. Abner treats with David. We must suppose that he began to grow weary of Ish-bosheth's cause, and sought an opportunity to desert it; or else, however he might threaten Ish-bosheth with it, for the quashing of the charge against himself, he would not have made good his angry words so soon as he did, v. 12. He sent messengers to David, to tell him that he was at his service. "Whose is the land? Is it not thine? For thou hast the best title to the government, and the best interest in the people's affections." Note, God can find out ways to make those serviceable to the kingdom of Christ, who yet have no sincere affection for it, and who have vigorously set themselves against it. Enemies are sometimes made a footstool, not only to be trodden upon, but to ascend by. The earth helped the woman.

III. David enters into a treaty with Abner, but upon condition that he procure him the restitution of Michal his wife, v. 13. Hereby, 1. David shewed the sincerity of his conjugal affection to his first and most rightful wife; neither her marrying another, nor his, had alienated him from her; many waters could not quench that love. 2. He testified his respect to the house of Saul; so far was he from trampling upon it, now that it was fallen, that, even in his elevation, he valued himself not a little on his relation to it. He cannot be pleased with the honours of the throne, unless he have Michal, Saul's daughter, to share with him in them; so far was he from bearing any malice to the family of his enemy. Abner sent him word, that he must apply himself to Ish-bosheth, which he did, (v. 14.) pleading, that he had purchased her at a dear rate, and she was wrongfully taken from him. Ish-bosheth durst not deny his demand, now that he had not Abner to stand by him, but took her from Phaltiel, to whom Saul had married her, (v. 15.) and Abner conducted her to David, not doubting, but that then he should be doubly welcome, when he brought him a wife in one hand, and a crown in the other. Her latter husband was loath to part with her, and followed her weeping; (v. 16.) but there was no remedy, he must thank himself; for when he took her, he knew that another had a right to her. Usurpers must expect to resign. Let no man therefore set his heart on that which he is not entitled to. If any disagreement has separated husband and wife, as they expect the blessing of God, let them be reconciled, and come together again; let all former quarrels be forgotten, and let them live together in love, according to God's holy ordinance.

IV. Abner uses his interest with the elders of Israel, to bring them over to David; knowing, that, whichever way they went, the common people would follow of course. Now that it serves his own turn, he can plead in David's behalf, that he was, 1. Israel's choice; (v. 17.) "Ye sought for him in times past to be king over you; when he had signalized himself in so many engagements with the Philistines, and done you so much good service; no man can pretend to greater personal merit than David, nor to less than Ish-bosheth: you have tried them both, Detur digniori—Give the crown to him that best deserves it. Let David be your king." 2. God's choice; (v. 18.) The Lord hath spoken of David. Compare v. 9. "When God appointed Samuel to anoint him, he did, in effect, promise, that by his hand he would save Israel; for, for that end he was made king. God having promised, by David's hand, to save Israel, it is both your duty, in compliance with God's will, and your interest, in order to your victories over your enemies, to submit to him; and it is the greatest folly in the world to oppose him." Who would have expected such reasonings as these out of Abner's mouth? But thus God will make the enemies of his people to know, and own, that he has loved them, Rev. 3. 9. He particularly applied himself to the men of Benjamin, those of his own tribe, on whom he had the greatest influence, and whom he had drawn in to appear for the house of Saul; he was the man that had deceived them, and therefore he was concerned to undeceive them. Thus the multitude are as they are managed.

V. David concludes the treaty with Abner; and he did wisely and well therein; for, whatever induced Abner to it, it was a good work to put an end to the war, and to settle the Lord's anointed on the throne; and it was as lawful for David to make use of his agency, as it is for a poor man to receive an alms from a Pharisee, who gives it in pride and hypocrisy. Abner reported to David the sense of the people, and the success of his communications with them, v. 19. He came now, not, as at first, privately, but with a retinue of twenty men, and David entertained them with a feast, (v. 20.) in token of reconciliation and joy, and as a pledge of the agreement between them: it was a feast upon a covenant, like that, Gen. 26. 30. If thine enemy hunger, feed him; but if he submit, feast him. Abner, pleased with his entertainment, the prevention of his fall with Saul's house, (which would have been inevitable, if he had not taken this course,) and much more with the prospect he had of preferment under David, undertakes, in a little time, to perfect the revolution, and to bring all Israel into obedience to David, v. 21. He tells David he shall reign over all that his heart desired. He knew David's elevation took rise from God's appointment, yet he insinuates that it sprang from his own ambition and desire of rule; thus (as bad men often do) he measured that good man by himself. However, David and he parted very good friends, and the affair between them was well settled. Thus it behoves all who fear God, and keep his commandments, to avoid strife, even with the wicked; to live at peace with all men, and to shew the world that they are children of the light.

22. And, behold, the servants of David and Joab came from pursuing a troop, and brought in a great spoil with them: but Abner was not with David in Hebron; for he had sent him away, and he was gone in peace. 23. When Joab and all the host that was with him were come, they told Joab, saying, Abner the son of Ner came to the king, and he hath sent him away, and he is gone in peace. 24. Then Joab came to the king, and said, What hast thou done? Behold, Abner came unto thee; why is it that thou hast sent him away, and he is quite gone? 25. Thou knowest Abner the son of Ner, that he came to deceive thee, and to know thy going out and thy coming in, and to know all that thou doest. 26. And when Joab was come out from David, he sent messengers after Abner, which brought him again from the well of Sirah; but David knew it not. 27. And when Abner was returned to Hebron, Joab took him aside in the gate to speak with him quietly, and smote him there under the fifth rib, that he died, for the blood of Asahel his brother. 28. And afterward when David heard it, he said, I and my kingdom are guiltless before the LORD for ever from the blood of Abner the son of Ner: 29. Let it rest on the head of Joab, and on all his father's house; and let there not fail from the house of Joab one that hath an issue, or that is a leper, or that leaneth on a staff, or that falleth on the sword, or that lacketh bread. 30. So Joab and Abishai his brother slew Abner, because he had slain their brother Asahel at Gibeon in the battle. 31. And David said to Joab, and to all the people that were with him, Rend your clothes, and gird you with sackcloth, and mourn before Abner. And king David himself followed the bier. 32. And they buried

Abner in Hebron: and the king lifted up his voice, and wept at the grave of Abner; and all the people wept. 33. And the king lamented over Abner, and said, Died Abner as a fool dieth? 34. Thy hands were not bound, nor thy feet put into fetters: as a man falleth before wicked men, so fellest thou. And all the people wept again over him. 35. And when all the people came to cause David to eat meat while it was yet day, David sware, saying, So do God to me, and more also, if I taste bread, or aught else, till the sun be down. 36. And all the people took notice of it, and it pleased them: as whatsoever the king did pleased all the people. 37. For all the people and all Israel understood that day that it was not of the king to slay Abner the son of Ner. 38. And the king said unto his servants, Know ye not that there is a prince and a great man fallen this day in Israel? 39. And I am this day weak, though anointed king; and these men the sons of Zerniah be too hard for me: the LORD shall reward the doer of evil according to his wickedness.

We have here an account of the murder of Abner by Joab, and David's deep resentment of it.

I. Joab very insolently fell foul upon David, for treating with Abner. He happened to be abroad upon service, when Abner was with David, pursuing a troop, either of Philistines, or of Saul's party; but, upon his return, was informed that Abner was just gone, (v. 22, 23.) and that a great many kind things had past between David and him. He had all the reason in the world to be satisfied of David's prudence, and to acquiesce in the measures he took, knowing him to be a wise and good man himself, and under a divine conduct in all his affairs; and yet, as if he had the same sway in David's cause that Abner had in Ish-bosheth's, he chides David, and reproaches him to his face, as impolitic; (v. 24, 25.) What hast thou done? As if David were accountable to him for what he did: "Why hast thou sent him away, when thou mightest have made him a prisoner? He came as a spy, and will certainly betray thee." I know not whether to wonder more, that Joab had impudence enough to give such an affront to his prince, or that David had patience enough to take it. He does, in effect, call David a fool, when he tells him he knew Abner came to deceive him, and yet he trusted him. We find no answer that David gave him, not because he feared him, as Ish-bosheth did Abner, (v. 11.) but because he despised him, or because Joab had not so much good manners as to stay for an answer.

II. He very treacherously sent for Abner back, and, under colour of a private conference with him, barbarously killed him with his own hand. That he made use of David's name, under pretence of giving him some further instructions, is intimated in that, but David knew it not, v. 26. Abner, designing no harm, feared none, but very innocently returned to Hebron, and, when he found Joab waiting for him at the gate, turned aside with him to speak with him privately, forgetting what he himself had said, when he slew Asahel, How shall I hold up my face to Joab thy brother? (ch. 2. 22.) and there Joab murdered him; (v. 27.) and it is intimated, (v. 30.) that Abishai was privy to the design, and was aiding and abetting, and would have come in to his brother's assistance, if there had been occasion: he is therefore charged as an accessory; Joab and Abishai slew Abner; though perhaps He only knew it, who is privy to the thoughts and intents of men's hearts.

Now in this, 1. It is certain that the Lord was righteous. Abner had maliciously, and against the convictions of his conscience, opposed David; he had now basely deserted Ish-bosheth, and betrayed him, under pretence of regard to God and Israel, but really from a principle of pride and revenge, and impatience of controul; God will not therefore use so bad a man, though David might, in so good a work, as the uniting of Israel. Judgments are prepared for such scorers as Abner was. But, 2. It is as certain that Joab was unrighteous, and, in what he did, did wickedly. David was a man after God's heart, but could not have those about him, no not in places of the greatest trust, after his own heart. Many a good prince, and a good master, has been forced to employ bad men. (1.) Even the pretence for doing this was very unjust. Abner had indeed slain his brother Asahel, and Joab and Abishai pretended herein to be the avengers of his blood; (v. 27, 30.) but Abner slew Asahel in an open war, wherein Abner indeed had given the challenge, but Joab himself had accepted it, and had slain many of Abner's friends; he did it likewise in his own defence, and not till he had given him fair warning, (which he would not take,) and he did it with reluctance; but Joab here shed the blood of war in peace, 1 Kings, 2. 5. (2.) That which we have reason to think was at the bottom of Joab's enmity to Abner, made it much worse. Joab was now general of David's forces; but if Abner should come into his interest, he would possibly be preferred before him, being a senior officer, and more experienced in the art of war. This Joab was jealous of, and could better bear the guilt of blood, than the thoughts of a rival. (3.) He did it treacherously, and under pretence of speaking peaceably to him, Deut. 27. 24. Had he challenged him, he had done like a soldier; but to assassinate him, was done villainously, and like a coward. His words were softer than oil, yet were they drawn swords, Ps. 55. 21. Thus he basely slew Amasa, ch. 20. 9, 10. (4.) The doing of it was a great affront and injury to David, who was now in treaty with Abner, and Joab knew it. Abner was now actually in his master's service, so that, through his side, he struck at David himself. (5.) It was a great aggravation of the murder, that he did it in the gate, openly and avowedly, as one that was not ashamed, nor could blush. The gate was the place of judgment and the place of concourse; so that he did it in defiance of justice, both the just sentence of the magistrates, and the just resentments of the crowd; as one that neither feared God, nor regarded man, but thought himself above all controul: and Hebron was a Levites' city, and a city of refuge.

III. David laid it deeply to heart, and many ways expressed his detestation of this execrable villany.

1. He washed his hands from the guilt of Abner's blood. Lest any should suspect that Joab had some secret intimation from David to do as he did, (and the rather, because he went so long unpunished,) he here solemnly appeals to God concerning his innocency; I and my kingdom are guiltless (and my kingdom is so, because I am so) before the Lord for ever, v. 28. It is a comfort to be able to say, when any bad thing is done, that we had no hand in it; We have not shed this blood, Dent. 21. 7. However we may be censured or suspected, our hearts shall not reproach us.

2. He entailed the curse for it upon Joab and his family; (v. 29.) Let it rest on the head of Joab; let the blood cry against him, and let divine vengeance follow him. Let the iniquity be visited upon his children, and children's children, in some hereditary disease or other." The longer the punishment is delayed, the longer let it last when it does come. Let his posterity be stigmatized, blemished with an issue, or a leprosy, which will shut them out from society; let them be beggars, or cripples, or come to some untimely end, that it may be said, "Here is one of Joab's race." This intimates that the guilt of blood brings a curse upon families; if men do not avenge it, God will, and will lay up the iniquity for the children. But, methinks, a resolute punishment of the murderer himself would better have become David, than this passionate imprecation of God's judgments upon his posterity.

3. He called upon all about him, even Joab himself, to lament the death of Abner; (v. 31.) Rend your clothes, and mourn before

Abner; that is, before the hearse of Abner, as Abraham is said to mourn before his dead; (Gen. 23. 2, 3.) and he gives a reason why they should attend his funeral with sincere and solemn mourning, (v. 38.) because there is a prince and a great man fallen this day in Israel. His alliance to Saul, his place as general, his interest, and the great services he had formerly done, were enough to denominate him a prince and a great man. When he could not call him a saint and a good man, he said nothing of that, but what was true he gave him the praise of, though he had been his enemy, that he was a prince and a great man; such a man fallen in Israel, and fallen this day, just when he was doing the best deed he ever did in his life; this day, when he was likely to be so serviceable to the public peace and welfare, and could so ill be spared.

(1.) Let them all lament it. The humbling change death puts all men under, is to be lamented, especially as affecting princes and great men. Alas, alas, (alluding to Rev. 18. 10.) how mean, how little, are they made by death, who made themselves the terror of the mighty in the land of the living! But we are especially obliged to lament the fall of useful men in the midst of their usefulness, and when there is most need of them. A public loss must be every man's grief, for every man shares in it. Thus David took care that honour should be done to the memory of a man of merit, to animate others.

(2.) Let Joab, in a particular manner, lament it, which he has less at heart, but more reason to do, than any of them. If he could be brought to do it sincerely, it would be an expression of repentance for his sin in slaying him. If he did it in show only, as it is likely he did, yet it was a sort of penance imposed upon him, and a present commutation of the punishment. If he do not as yet expiate the murder with his blood, let him do something towards it with tears. This, perhaps, Joab submitted to with no great reluctancy, now he had gained his point. Now that he is on the bier, no matter in what pomp he lies, Sit divus, modo non sit vivus—Let him be canonized, so that he be but killed.

4. David himself followed the corpse as chief mourner, and made a funeral oration at the grave. He attended the bier, (v. 31.) and wept at the grave, v. 32. Though Abner had been his enemy, and might possibly have proved no fast friend, yet, because he had been a man of bravery in the field, and might have done service in the public counsels at this critical juncture, all former quarrels are forgotten, and David is the true mourner for his fall. What he said over the grave, fetched fresh floods of tears from the eyes of all that were present, when they thought they had already paid the debt in full, v. 33, 34. Died Abner as a fool dieth? (1.) He speaks as one vexed that Abner was fooled out of his life; that so great a man as he, so famed for conduct and courage, should be imposed upon by a colour of friendship, slain by surprise, and so, died as a fool dies. The wisest and stoutest of men have no fence against treachery. To see Abner, who thought himself the main hinge on which the great affairs of Israel turned, so considerable as, himself, to be able to turn the scale of a trembling government, his head full of great projects, and great prospects, to see him made a fool of by a base rival, and falling, on a sudden, a sacrifice to his ambition and jealousy—this stains the pride of all glory, and would put one out of conceit with worldly grandeur; Put not your trust in princes, Ps. 146. 3, 4. And let us therefore make that sure which we cannot be fooled out of. A man may have his life, and all that is dear to him, taken from him, and not be able to prevent it with all his wisdom, care, and integrity; but there is that which no thief can break through to steal. See here how much more we are beholden to God's providence, than to our own prudence, for the continuance of our lives and comforts. Were it not for the hold God has of the consciences of bad men, how soon would the weak and innocent become an easy prey to the strong and merciless, and the wisest die as fools! Or, (2.) He speaks as one maintaining that Abner did not fool himself out of his life. “Died Abner as a fool dies?” No, he did not, not as a criminal, a traitor or felon, that forfeits his life into the hands of public justice; his hands were not pinioned, or his feet fettered, as those of a malefactor's are. Abner fails not before just men, by a judicial sentence, but as a man, an innocent man, falleth before wicked men, thieves and robbers, so feltest thou. Died Abner as Nabal died? So the Seventy read it. Nabal died as he lived, like himself, like a sot; but Abner's fate was such as might have been the fate of the wisest and best man in the world. Abner did not throw away his life as Asahel did, who wilfully ran upon the spear, after fair warning, but he was struck by surprise. Note, It is a sad thing to die like a fool, as they do, that any way shorten their own days, and much more they that make no provision for another world.

5. He fasted all that day, and would by no means be persuaded to eat any thing till night, v. 35. It was then the custom of great mourners, to refrain for the time from bodily refreshments, as ch. 1. 12. 1 Sam. 31. 13. How incongruous is it then to turn the house of mourning into a house of feasting! The respect which David paid to Abner was very pleasing to the people, and satisfied them that he was not, in the least, accessory to the murder; (v. 36, 37.) he was solicitous to avoid the suspicion, lest Joab's villany should have made him odious, as that of Simeon and Levi did Jacob, Gen. 34. 30. On this occasion it is said, Whatever the king did, pleased all the people. Which bespeaks, (1.) His good affection to them; he studied to please them in every thing, and carefully avoided what might be disobliging. (2.) Their good opinion of him; they thought every thing he did well done; such a mutual willingness to please, and easiness to be pleased, will make every relation comfortable.

6. He bewailed it that he could not, with safety, do justice on the murderers, v. 39. He was weak, his kingdom newly planted, and a little shake would overthrow it; Joab's family had a great interest, were bold and daring, and to make them his enemies now might be of bad consequence. These sons of Zeruiah were too hard for him, too big for the law to take hold of; and therefore, though by man, by the magistrate, the blood of a murderer should be shed, (Gen. 9. 6.) David bears the sword in vain, and contents himself, as a private person, to leave them to the judgment of God; The Lord shall reward the doer of evil according to his wickedness. Now this is a diminution, (1.) To David's greatness; he is anointed king, and yet is kept in awe by his own subjects, and some of them are too hard for him. Who would be fond of power, when a man may have the name of it, and must be accountable for it, and yet be hampered in the use of it? (2.) To David's goodness; he ought to have done his duty, and trusted God with the issue. Fiat justitia, ruat cælum—Let justice be done, though the heavens should fall asunder. If the law had had its course against Joab, perhaps the murder of Ish-bosheth, Amnon, and others, had been prevented. It was carnal policy and cruel pity that spared Joab. Righteousness supports the throne, and will never shake it. Yet it was only a reprieve that David gave to Joab; on his death-bed, he left it to Solomon (who could the better wield the sword of justice, because he had no occasion to draw the sword of war) to avenge the blood of Abner. Evil pursues sinners, and will overtake them at last. David preferred Abner's son Jaasiel, 1 Chron. 27. 21.

CHAP. IV.

When Abner was slain, David was at a loss for a friend to perfect the reduction of those tribes that were yet in Ish-bosheth's interest; which way to adopt for the accomplishment of it, he could not tell; but here Providence brings it about by the removal of Ish-bosheth. I. Two of his own servants slew him, and brought his head to David, v. 1. .8. II. David, instead of rewarding them, put them to death for what they had done, v. 9. .12.

1. AND when Saul's son heard that Abner was dead in Hebron, his hands were feeble, and all the Israelites were troubled. 2. And Saul's son had two men that were captains of bands: the name of the one was Baanah, and the name of the other Rechab, the sons of Rimmon a Beerothite, of the children of Benjamin: (for Beeroth also was reckon ed to Benjamin: 3. And the Beerothites fled to Gittaim, and were sojourners there until this day.) 4. And Jonathan, Saul's son, had a son that was lame of his feet. He was five years old when the tidings came of Saul and Jonathan out of Jezreel, and his nurse took him up, and fled: and it came to pass, as she made haste to flee, that he fell, and became lame. And his name was Mephibosheth. 5. And the sons of Rimmon the Beerothite, Rechab and Baanah, went, and came about the heat of the day to the house of Ish-bosheth, who lay on a bed at noon. 6. And they came thither into the midst of the house, as though they would have fetched wheat; and they smote him under the fifth rib: and Rechab and Baanah his brother escaped. 7. For when they came into the house, he lay on his bed in his bed-chamber, and they smote him, and slew him, and beheaded him, and took his head, and gat them away through the plain all night. 8. And they brought the head of Ish-bosheth unto David to Hebron, and said to the king, Behold the head of Ish-bosheth the son of Saul thine enemy, which sought thy life; and the LORD hath avenged my lord the king this day of Saul, and of his seed.

Here is,

I. The weakness of Saul's house; still it grew weaker and weaker. 1. As for Ish-bosheth, who was in possession of the throne, his hands were feeble; (v.1.) all the strength they ever had, was from Abner's support, and now, that he was dead, he had no spirit left in him. Though Abner had, in a passion, deserted his interest, yet he hoped, by his means, to have made good terms with David; but now even that hope fails him, and he sees himself forsaken by his friends, and at the mercy of his enemies. All the Israelites that adhered to him were troubled, and at a loss what to do, whether to proceed in their treaty with David or no. 2. As for Mephibosheth, who, in the right of his father Jonathan, had a prior title, his feet were lame, and he was unfit for any service, v.4. He was but five years old when his father and grandfather were killed; his nurse, hearing of the Philistines' victory, was apprehensive that, in pursuit of it, they would immediately send a party to Saul's house, to cut off all that pertained to it, and would especially aim at her young master, who was now next heir to the crown. Under the apprehension of this, she fled with the child in her arms, to secure it either in some secret place where he could not be found, or in some strange place where he could not be come at; and, making more haste than good speed, she fell with the child, and by the fall some bone was broken or put out, and not well set, so that he was lame of it as long as he lived, and unfit either for court or camp. See what sad accidents children are liable to in their infancy, the effect of which may be felt by them, to their great uneasiness, all their days: even the children of princes and great men, the children of good men, for such a one Jonathan was, children that are well tended, and have nurses of their own to take care of them, yet are not always safe. What reason have we to be thankful to God for the preservation of our limbs and senses to us, through the many perils of the weak and helpless state of infancy, and to own his goodness in giving his angels a charge concerning us, to bear us up in their arms, out of which there is no danger of falling, Ps.91.12.

II. The murder of Saul's son: we are here told,

1. Who were the murderers, Baanah and Rechab, v.2,3. They were own brothers, as Simeon and Levi, and partners in iniquity. They were, or had been, Ish-bosheth's own servants, employed under him; so much the more base and treacherous was it in them to do him a mischief. They were Benjamites, of his own tribe. They were of the city of Beeroth; for some reason, which we cannot now account for, care is here taken to let us know (in a parenthesis) that the city belonged to the lot of Benjamin; (so we find, Josh.18.25.) but that the inhabitants, upon some occasion or other, perhaps upon the death of Saul, retired to Gittaim, another city which lay not far off in the same tribe, but was better fortified by nature, being situate (if we may depend upon Mr. Fuller's map) between the two rocks Bozez and Sench; there the Beerothites were when this was written, and, probably, took root there, and never returned to Beeroth again, which made Beeroth, that had been one of the cities of the Gibeonites, (Josh.9.17.) to be forgotten, and Gittaim to be famous long after, as we find, Neh.11.33.

2. How the murder was committed, v.5..7. See here, (1.) The slothfulness of Ish-bosheth. He lay upon his bed at noon; it does not appear that the country was at any time of the year so hot, as to oblige the inhabitants to retire at noon, as we are told they do in Spain in the heat of summer: but Ish-bosheth was a sluggish man, loved his ease, and hated business: and when he should have been, at this critical juncture, at the head of his forces in the field, or at the head of his counsels in a treaty with David, he was lying upon his bed, and sleeping, for his hands were feeble, (v.1.) and so were his head and heart. When those difficulties dispirit us, which should rather invigorate us, and sharpen our endeavours, we betray both our crowns and lives. Love not sleep, lest thou come to poverty and ruin. The idle soul is an easy prey to the destroyer. (2.) The treachery of Baanah and Rechab. They came into the house, under pretence of fetching wheat for the victualling of their regiments; and such was the plainness of those times, that the king's corn-chamber, and his bed-chamber, lay near together, which gave them an opportunity, when they were fetching wheat, to murder him as he lay on the bed. We know not when and where death will meet us: when we lie down to sleep, we are not sure but that we may sleep the sleep of death before we awake; nor do we know from what unsuspected hand a stroke may come. Ish-bosheth's own men, who should have protected his life, took it away.

3. The murderers triumph in what they had done. As if they had performed some very glorious action, and the doing of it for David's advantage was enough not only to justify it, but to sanctify it, they make a present of Ish-bosheth's head to David; (v.3.) Behold the head of thine enemy; than which they thought nothing could be more acceptable to him; yea, and they make themselves instruments of God's justice, ministers to bear his sword, though they had no commission; The Lord hath avenged thee this day of Saul, and of his seed. Not that they had any regard either to God, or David's honour; they aimed at nothing but to make their own fortunes, (as we say,) and to get preferment in David's court; but, to ingratiate themselves with him, they pretend a concern for his life, a conviction of his title, and a zealous desire to see him in full possession of the throne. Jehu pretended zeal for the Lord of hosts, when an ambition to set up himself and his own family was the spring of his actions.

9. And David answered Rechab and Baanah his brother, the sons of Rimmon the Beerothite, and said unto them, As the LORD liveth, who hath redeemed my soul out of all adversity, 10. When one told me, saying, Behold, Saul is dead, thinking to have brought good tidings, I took hold of him, and slew him in Ziklag, who thought that I would have given him a reward for his tidings: 11. How much more, when wicked men have slain a righteous person in his own house upon his bed? shall I not therefore now require his blood of your hand, and take you away from the earth? 12. And David commanded his young men, and they slew them, and cut off their hands and their feet, and hanged them up over the pool in Hebron. But they took the head of Ish-bosheth, and buried it in the sepulchre of Abner in Hebron.

We have here justice done upon the murderers of Ish-bosheth.

I. Sentence past upon them. There needed no evidence, their own tongues witnessed against them, and were so far from denying the fact, that they gloried in it; David therefore shews them the heinousness of the crime, and that blood called for blood from his hand, who was now the chief magistrate, and was, by office, the avenger of blood. And, perhaps, he was the more vigorous in the prosecution, because, for reasons of state, he had spared Joab. "Shall I not require the blood of the slain at the hand of the slayers, and since they cannot make restitution, take their's instead of it?" Observe, 1. How he aggravates the crime, v. 11. Ish-bosheth was a righteous person: he had done them no wrong, nor designed them any. As to himself, David was satisfied that what opposition he gave him, was not from malice, but mistake, from an idea he had of his own title to the crown, and the influence of others upon him, who urged him to put in for it. Note, Charity teaches us to make the best, not only of our friends, but of our enemies, and to think those may be righteous persons, who yet, in some instances, do us wrong. I must not presently judge a man a bad man, because I think him so to me. David owns Ish-bosheth an honest man, though he had created him a deal of trouble unjustly. The manner of it much aggravated the crime. To slay him in his own house, which should have been his castle, and upon his bed, when he was in no capacity of making any opposition; this is treacherous and barbarous, and all that is base, and that which every man's heart will rise with indignation at the thought of, that is not perfectly lost to all honour and humanity. Assassinating is confessedly the most odious and villanous way of murdering. Cursed is he that smiteth his neighbour secretly. 2. He quotes a precedent; (v. 10.) he had put him to death who had brought him the tidings of the death of Saul, because he thought it would be good tidings to David. Nothing is here said of that Amalekite's helping Saul to kill himself, only of his bringing the tidings of it: by which it should seem that the story he told was, upon inquiry, found to be false, and that he lied against his own head. "Now," (says David,) "did I treat him as a criminal, and not a favourite," (as he expected,) "who brought me Saul's crown, and shall they be held guiltless, that bring me Ish-bosheth's head?" 3. He ratifies the sentence with an oath; (v. 9.) As the Lord liveth, who hath redeemed my soul out of all adversity. He expresses himself thus resolutely, to prevent the making of any intercession for the criminals by those about him: and thus piously, to intimate that his dependance was upon God for the putting of him in possession of the promised throne, and that he would not be beholden to any man to help him to it, by any indirect or unlawful practices. God had redeemed him from all adversity hitherto, helped him over many a difficulty, and through many a danger, and therefore he would depend upon him to crown and complete his own work. He speaks of his redemption from all adversity, as a thing done, though he had many a storm yet before him, because he knew that he who had delivered would deliver. Hereupon, he signs a warrant for the execution of these men, v. 12. This may seem severe, when they intended him a kindness in what they did; but, (1.) He would thus shew his detestation of the villany. When he heard that the Lord smote Nabal, he gave thanks, (1. Sam. 25. 38, 39.) for he is the God to whom vengeance belongeth; but if wicked men smite Ish-bosheth, they deserve to die, for taking God's work out of his hand. (2.) He would thus shew his resentment of the great affront they put upon him, in expecting that he should patronise and reward it; they could scarcely have done him a greater injury, than thus to think him altogether such a one as themselves; one that cared not what blood he waded through to the crown.

II. Execution done. The murderers were put to death according to law, and their hands and feet were hung up; not their whole bodies, the law forbade that, but only their hands and feet, in terrorem—to frighten others, and to be monuments of David's justice, to make that to be taken notice of, which would recommend him to the esteem of the people, as a man fit to rule, and that aimed not at his own preferment, nor had any enmity to the house of Saul, but only, and sincerely, designed the public welfare. But what a confusion was this to the two murderers! What a horrid disappointment! And such they will meet with, who think to serve the interests of the Son of David by any immoral practices, by war and persecution, fraud and rapine; who, under colour of religion, murder princes, break solemn contracts, lay countries waste, hate their brethren, and eat them out, and say, Let the Lord be glorified; kill them, and think they do God good service. However men may canonize such methods of serving the church and the catholic cause, Christ will let them know, another day, that Christianity was not intended to destroy humanity; and they, who thus think to merit heaven, shall not escape the damnation of hell.

CHAP. V.

How far Abner's deserting the house of Saul, his murder, and the murder of Ish-bosheth, might contribute to the perfecting of the revolution, and the establishing of David king over all Israel, does not appear; but, it should seem, that happy change followed presently thereupon, which in this chapter we have an account of. Here is, I. David anointed king by all the tribes, v. 1. 5. II. Making himself master of the strong-hold of Zion, v. 6. 10. III. Building himself a house, and strengthening himself in his kingdom, v. 11, 12. IV. His children that were born after this, v. 13. 16. V. His victories over the Philistines, v. 17. 25.

1. THEN came all the tribes of Israel to David unto Hebron, and spake, saying, Behold, we are thy bone and thy flesh. 2. Also in time past, when Saul was king over us, thou wast he that leddest out and broughtest in Israel: and the LORD said to thee, Thou shalt feed my people Israel, and thou shalt be a captain over Israel. 3. So all the elders of Israel came to the king to Hebron; and king David made a league with them in Hebron before the LORD: and they anointed David king over Israel. 4. David was thirty years old when he began to reign, and he reigned forty years. 5. In Hebron he reigned over Judah seven years and six months: and in Jerusalem he reigned thirty and three years over all Israel and Judah.

Here is,

I. The humble address of all the tribes to David, beseeching him to take upon him the government, (for they were now as sheep having no shepherd,) and owning him for their king. Though David might by no means approve the murder of Ish-bosheth, yet he might improve the advantages he gained thereby, and accept the applications made to him thereupon. Judah had submitted to David as their king, above seven years ago, and their ease and happiness, under his administration, encouraged the rest of the tribes to make their court to him. What numbers came from each tribe, with what zeal and sincerity they came, and how they were entertained for three days at Hebron, when they were all of one heart to make David king, we have a full account, 1 Chron. 12. 23. 40. Here we have only the heads of their address, containing the grounds they went upon in making David king. 1. Their relation to him was some inducement. "We are thy bone, and thy flesh, v. 1. Not only thou art our bone, and our flesh, not a stranger, unqualified by the law to be king, (Deut. 17. 15.) but we are thine;" that is, "we know that thou considerest us thy bone and flesh, and hast a tender concern for us, as a man has for his own body, which Saul and his house had not. We are thy bone and thy flesh, and therefore thou wilt be as glad as we shall be, to put an end to this long civil war; and thou wilt take pity on us, protect us, and do thine utmost for our welfare." Those who take Christ for their King, may thus plead with him, "We are thy bone and thy flesh; thou hast made thyself in all things like unto thy brethren, (Heb. 2. 17.) therefore be thou our Ruler, and let this ruin be under thy hand," Isa. 3. 6. 2. His former good services to the public were a further inducement; (v. 2.) "When Saul was king, he was but the cipher, thou wast the figure, thou wast he that leddest out Israel to battle, and broughtest them in triumph; and therefore who so fit now to fill the vacant throne?" He that is faithful in a little deserves to be intrusted with more. Former good offices done for us should be gratefully remembered by us, when there is occasion. 3. The divine appointment was the greatest inducement of all. The Lord said, Thou shalt feed my people Israel; that is, thou shalt rule them; for princes are to feed their people as shepherds, in every thing consulting the subjects' benefit; feeding them, and not fleecing them. "And thou shalt be not only a king to govern in peace, but a captain to preside in war, and be exposed to all the toils and perils of the camp." Since God has said so, now at length, when need drives them to it, they are persuaded to say so too.

II. The public and solemn inauguration of David, v. 3. A convention of the states was called, all the elders of Israel came to him; the contract was settled, the pacta convento—covenants sworn to, and subscribed on both sides; he obliged himself to protect them as their judge in peace, and captain in war; and they obliged themselves to obey him; he made a league with them, to which God was a Witness; it was before the Lord. Hereupon he was, the third time, anointed king. His advances were gradual, that his faith might be tried, and that he might gain experience. And thus his kingdom typified that of the Messiah, which was to come to its height by degrees; for we see not yet all things put under him, (Heb. 2. 8.) but we shall see it, 1 Cor. 15. 25.

III. A general account of his reign and age. He was thirty years old when he began to reign, upon the death of Saul, v. 4. At that age, the Levites were at first appointed to begin their ministration, Numb. 4. 3. About that age, the Son of David entered upon his public ministry, Luke, 3. 23. Then men come to their full maturity of strength and judgment. He reigned, in all, forty years and six months; of which, seven years and a half in Hebron, and thirty-three years in Jerusalem, v. 5. Hebron had been famous; (Josh. 14. 15.) it was a priests' city, but Jerusalem was to be more so, and to be the holy city. Great kings affected to raise cities of their own, (Gen. 10. 11.—36. 32. .35.) David did so, and Jerusalem was it; the city of David. It is a name famous to the end of the Bible, (Rev. 21.) where we read of a new Jerusalem.

6. And the king and his men went to Jerusalem unto the Jebusites, the inhabitants of the land: which spake unto David, saying, Except thou take away the blind and the lame, thou shalt not come in hither: thinking, David cannot come in hither. 7. Nevertheless David took the strong hold of Zion: the same is the city of David. 8. And David said on that day, Whosoever getteth up to the gutter, and smiteth the Jebusites, and the lame and the blind, that are hated of David's soul, he shall be chief and captain. Wherefore they said, The blind and the lame shall not come into the house. 9. So David dwelt in the fort, and called it the city of David. And David built round about from Millo and inward. 10. And David went on, and grew great, and the LORD God of hosts was with him.

If Salem, the place which Melchizedek was king of, was Jerusalem, (as seems probable from Ps. 76. 2.) it was famous in Abraham's time; Joshua, in his time, found it the chief city of the south part of Canaan, Josh. 10. 1. . 3. It fell to Benjamin's lot, (Josh. 18. 28.) but joined close to Judah's, Josh. 15. 8. The children of Judah had taken it, (Judg. 1. 8.) but the children of Benjamin suffered the Jebusites to dwell among them, (Judg. 1. 21.) and they grew so upon them, that it became a city of Jebusites, Judg. 19. 11. Now the very first exploit David did, after he was anointed king over all Israel, was, to gain Jerusalem out of the hand of the Jebusites, which, because it belonged to Benjamin, he could not well attempt, till that tribe, which long adhered to Saul's house, (1 Chron. 12. 29.) submitted to him. Here we have,

1. The Jebusites' defiance of David, and his forces. They said, Except thou take away the blind and lame, thou shalt not come in hither, v. 6. They sent David this provoking message, because, as it is said afterward, on another occasion, they could not believe that ever an enemy should enter into the gates of Jerusalem, Lam. 4. 12. They confided, either, 1. In the protection of their gods, which David, in contempt, had called the blind and the lame, for they have eyes and see not, feet and walk not; "But," say they, "these are the guardians of our city, and except thou take those away, (which thou canst never do,) thou wilt not come in thither." Some think they were constellated images of brass, set up in the recess of the fort, and intrusted with the custody of the place. They call their idols their Mauzzim, or strong holds, (Dan. 11. 38.) and as such relied on them; the name of the Lord is our strong tower, and his arm is strong, his eyes piercing. Or, 2. In the strength of their fortifications, which they thought were made so impregnable by nature or art, or both, that the blind and the lame were sufficient to defend them against the most powerful assailant. The strong-hold of Zion they especially depended on, as that which could not be forced. Probably, they set blind and lame people, invalids or maimed soldiers, to make their appearance upon the walls, in scorn of David and his men, judging them an equal match for him. Though there remain but wounded men among them, yet they should serve to beat back the besiegers, Compare Jer. 37. 10. Note, The enemies of God's people are often very confident of their own strength, and most secure when their day to fall draws nigh.

II. David's success against the Jebusites. Their pride and insolence, instead of daunting him, animated him, and when he made a general assault, he gave this order to his men, "He that smiteth the Jebusites, let him also throw down in the ditch, or gutter, the lame and the blind, which are set upon the wall to affront us and our God." It is probable they had spoken blasphemous things, and were therefore hated of David's soul. Thus v. 8. may be read; we fetch our reading of it from 1 Chron. 11. 6. which speaks only of smiting the Jebusites, but nothing of the blind and the lame. The Jebusites had said, that if these images of their's did not protect them, the blind and the lame should not come into the house, that is, they would never again trust their palladium, (so Mr. Gregory understands it,) nor pay the respect they had paid to their images; and David, having gained the fort, said so too, that these images, which could not protect their worshippers, should never have any place there more.

III. His fixing his royal seat in Zion; he himself dwelt in the fort, (the strength whereof, which had given him opposition, and was a terror to him, now contributed to his safety, and he built houses round about for his attendants and guards, (v. 9.) from Millo (the town-hall, or state-house) and inward. He proceeded and prospered in all he set his hand to; grew great in honour, strength, and wealth; more and more honourable in the eyes of his subjects, and formidable in the eyes of his enemies; for the Lord God of hosts was with him. God has all creatures at his command, makes what use he pleases of them, and serves his own purposes by them; and he was with him, to direct, preserve, and prosper him: those that have the Lord of hosts for them, need not fear what hosts of men or devils can do against them. Those who grow great, must ascribe it to the presence of God with them, and give him the glory of it. The church is called Zion, and the city of the living God; the Jebusites, Christ's enemies, must first be conquered and dispossessed, the blind and the lame taken away, and then Christ divides the spoil, sets up his throne there, and makes it his residence by the Spirit.

11. And Hiram king of Tyre sent messengers to David, and cedar-trees, and carpenters, and masons: and they built David an house. 12. And David perceived that the Lord had established him king over Israel, and that he had exalted his kingdom for his people Israel's sake. 13. And David took him more concubines and wives out of Jerusalem, after he was come from Hebron: and there were yet sons and daughters born to David. 14. And these be the names of those that were born unto him in Jerusalem; Shammuah, and Shobab, and Nathan, and Solomon, 15. Ithar also, and Elishua, and Nepheg, and Japhia, 16. And Elishama, and Eliada, and Eliphalet.

Here is,

I. David's house built, a royal palace, fit for the reception of the court he kept, and the homage that was made to him, v. 11. The Jews were husbandmen and shepherds, and did not much addict themselves either to merchandise or manufactures; and therefore Hiram, king of Tyre, a wealthy prince, when he sent to congratulate David on his accession to the throne, offered him workmen to build him a house: David thankfully accepted the offer, and Hiram's workmen built David a house to his mind. Many have excelled in arts and sciences, who were strangers to the covenants of promise; yet David's house was never the worse, nor the less fit to be dedicated to God, for its being built by the sons of the stranger: it is prophesied of the gospel-church, The sons of the strangers shall build up thy wall, and their kings shall minister unto thee, Isa. 60. 10.

II. David's government rooted and built up, v. 12. 1. His kingdom was established; there was nothing to shake it, none to disturb his possession, or question his title. He that made him king established him, because he was to be a type of Christ, with whom God's hand should be established, and his covenant stand fast, Ps. 89. 21. . . 28. Saul was made king, but not established; so Adam in innocency. David was established king, so is the Son of David, and all who, through him, are made to our God kings and priests. 2. It was exalted in the eyes both of its friends and enemies: never had the nation of Israel looked so great or made such a figure, as it began now to do. Thus it is promised of Christ, that he shall be higher than the kings of the earth, Ps. 89. 27. God has highly exalted him, Phil. 2. 9. 3. David perceived it, by the wonderful concurrence of providences to his establishment and advancement. By this I know that thou favour'st me, Ps. 41. 11. Many have the favour and love of God, and do not perceive it, and so want the comfort of it; but to be exalted to that, and established in it, and to perceive it, is happiness enough. 4. He owned that it was for his people Israel's sake; that God had done great things for him; that he might be a blessing to them, and they might be happy under his administration. God did not make Israel his subjects for his sake, that he might be great, and rich, and absolute; but he made him their king for their sake, that he might lead, and guide, and protect them. Kings are ministers of God to their people for good, Rom. 13. 4.

III. David's family multiplied and increased. All the sons that were born to him after he came to Jerusalem are here mentioned together; eleven in all; beside the six that were born to him before in Hebron, ch. 3. 2. . . 5. There the mothers are mentioned, not here; only, in general, that he took more concubines and wives, v. 13. Shall we praise him for this? We praise him not; we justify him not; nor can scarce excuse him. The bad example of the patriarchs might make him think there was no harm in it, and he might hope it would strengthen his interest, by multiplying his alliances, and increasing the royal family. Happy is the man that has his quiver full of these arrows. But one vine by the side of the house, with the blessing of God, may send boughs to the sea, branches to the rivers. Adam, by one wife, peopled the world, and Noah re-peopled it. David had many wives, and yet that did not keep him from coveting his neighbour's wife, and defiling her; for men that have once broken the fence, will wander endlessly. Of David's concubines, see 2 Sam. 15. 16. — 16. 22. — 19. 3. Of his son, see 1 Chron. 3. 5.

17. But when the Philistines heard that they had anointed David king over Israel, all the Philistines came up to seek David; and David heard of it, and went down to the hold. 18. The Philistines also came and spread themselves in the valley of Rephaim. 19. And David inquired of the Lord, saying, Shall I go up to the Philistines? wilt thou deliver them into mine hand? And the Lord said unto David, Go up: for I will doubtless deliver the Philistines into thine hand. 20. And David came to Baal-perazim, and David smote them there, and said, The Lord hath broken forth upon mine enemies before me, as the breach of waters. Therefore he called the name of that place Baal-perazim. 21. And there they left their images, and David and his men burned them. 22. And the Philistines came up yet again, and spread themselves in the valley of Rephaim. 23. And when David inquired of the Lord, he said, Thou shalt not go up; but fetch a compass behind them, and come upon them over against the mulberry-trees. 24. And let it be, when thou hearest the sound of a going in the tops of the mulberry-trees, that then thou shalt bestir thyself: for then shall the Lord go out before thee, to smite the host of the Philistines. 25. And David did so, as the Lord had commanded him; and smote the Philistines from Geba until thou come to Gazer.

The particular service which David was raised up for, was, to save Israel out of the hand of the Philistines, ch. 3. 18. This therefore Divine Providence, in the first place, gives him an opportunity of accomplishing. Two great victories obtained over the Philistines we have here an account of, by which David not only balanced the disgrace, and retrieved the loss, Israel had sustained in the battle wherein Saul was slain, but went far toward the total subduing of those vexatious neighbours, the last remains of the devoted nations.

I. In both these actions, the Philistines were the aggressors, stirred first toward their own destruction, and pulled it on their own heads. 1. In the former, they came up to seek David, v. 17. because they heard that he was anointed king over Israel. He that under Saul had slain his ten thousands, what would he do when he himself came to be king! They therefore thought it was time to look about them, and try to crush his government in its infancy, before it was well settled. Their success against Saul, some years ago, perhaps encouraged them to make this attack upon David; but they considered not that David had that presence of God with him, which Saul had forfeited and lost. The kingdom of the Messiah, as soon as ever it was set up in the world, was thus vigorously attacked by the powers of darkness, who, with the combined force both of Jews and Gentiles, made head against it: the heathen raged, and the kings of the earth set themselves to oppose it; but all in vain, Ps. 2. 1, &c. The destruction will turn, as this here did, upon Satan's own kingdom. They took counsel together, but were broken in pieces, Isa. 6. 9, 10. 2. In the latter, they came up yet again, hoping to recover what they had lost in the former engagement, and their hearts being hardened to their destruction, v. 22. 3. In both, they spread themselves in the valley of Rephaim, which lay very near Jerusalem: that city they hoped to make themselves masters of, before David had completed the fortifications of it. Jerusalem, from its infancy, has been aimed at, and struck at, with a particular enmity. Their spreading themselves, intimates that they were very numerous, and that they made a very formidable appearance. We read of the church's enemies going upon the breadth of the earth; (Rev. 20. 9.) but the further they spread themselves, the fairer mark they are to God's arrows.

II. In both, David, though forward enough to go forth against them, (for, as soon as he heard it, he went down to the hold, to secure some important and advantageous post, v. 17.) yet he entered not upon action till he had inquired of the Lord by the breast-plate of judgment, (v. 19.) and again, v. 23. His inquiry was twofold. 1. Concerning his duty; "Shall I go up? Shall I have a commission from heaven to engage them?" One would think he needed not doubt this; what was he made king for, but to fight the battles of the Lord, and Israel? But a good man loves to see God going before him in every step he takes. "Shall I go up now?" It is to be done, but is it to be done at this time? In all thy ways acknowledge him. And besides, though the Philistines were public enemies, yet some of them had been his particular friends; Achish had been kind to him in his distress, and had protected him; "Now," says David, "ought not I, in remembrance of that, rather to make peace with them, than to make war with them?" "No," says God, "they are Israel's enemies, and are doomed to destruction, and therefore never scruple it, but go up." 2. Concerning his success. His conscience asked the former question, Shall I go up? his prudence asked this, Wilt thou deliver them into my hand? Hereby he owns his dependence on God for victory, that he could not conquer them, unless God delivered them into his hand; and refers himself to the good pleasure of God, Wilt thou do it? Yea, says God, I will doubtless do it. If God send us, he will bear us out, and stand by us: the assurance God has given us of victory over our spiritual enemies, that he will tread Satan under our feet shortly, should animate us in our spiritual conflicts. We do not fight at uncertainty. David had now a great army at command, and in good heart, yet he relied more on God's promise than his own force.

III. In the former of these engagements, David routed the army of the Philistines by dint of sword, (v. 20.) he smote them; and, when he had done, 1. He gave his God the glory; he said, "The Lord has broken forth upon mine enemies before me; I could not have done it, if he had not done it before me; he opened the breach, like the breach of waters in a dam, which, when once opened, grows wider and wider." The principal part of the work was God's doing; nay, he did all; what David did was not worth speaking of; and therefore, Not unto us, but unto the Lord, give glory. He hoped likewise that this breach, like that of waters, was as the opening of the sluice, to let in a final desolation upon them; and, to perpetuate the remembrance of it, he called the place Baal-perazim, the master of the breaches; because, God having broken in upon their forces, he soon had the mastery of them. Let posterity take notice of it to God's honour. 2. He put their gods to shame. They brought the images of their gods into the field, as their protectors, in imitation of the Israelites bringing the ark into their camp: but, being put to flight, they could not stay to carry off their images, for they were a burthen to the weary beasts, (Isa. 46. 1.) and therefore they left them to fall, with the rest of their baggage, into the hands of the conqueror. Their images failed them, and gave them no assistance, and therefore they left their images to shift for themselves. God can make men weary of those things that they have been most fond of, and compel them to desert what they doted upon, and cast even the idols of silver and gold to the moles and the bats, Isa. 2. 20, 21. David and his men converted to their own use the rest of the plunder, but the images they burned, as God had appointed; (Deut. 7. 5.) "Ye shall burn their graven images with fire, in token of your detestation of idolatry, and lest they should be a snare." Bishop Patrick well observes here, that, when the ark fell into the Philistines' hands, it consumed them, but, when these images fell into the hands of Israel, they could not save themselves from being consumed.

IV. In the latter of these engagements, God gave David some sensible tokens of his presence with him, bade him not fall upon them directly, as he had done before, but fetch a compass behind them, v. 23. 1. God appoints him to draw back, as Israel stood still, to see the salvation of the Lord. 2. He promised him to charge the enemy himself, by an invisible host of angels, v. 24. Thou shalt hear the sound of a going, like the march of an army in the air, upon the tops of the mulberry-trees. Angels tread light, and he that can walk upon the clouds, can, when he pleases, walk on the tops of trees, or, (as Bishop Patrick understands it,) at the head of the mulberry-trees; that is, of the wood, or hedge-row, of those trees. "And by that sign thou shalt know that the Lord goes out before thee; though thou see him not, yet thou shalt hear him, and faith shall come and be confirmed by hearing." He goes forth to smite the host of the Philistines." When David had himself smitten them, (v. 20.) he ascribed it to God; The Lord has broken forth upon mine enemies; to reward him for which thankful acknowledgment, the next time God did it himself alone, without putting him to any toil or peril; for those that own God in what he has done for them, he will do more. But observe, though God promised to go before him, and smite the Philistines, yet David, when he heard the sound of the going, must bestir himself, and be ready to pursue the victory. Note, God's grace must quicken our endeavours. If God work in us both to will and to do, it does not follow that we must sit still, as those that have nothing to do, but we must therefore work out our salvation with all possible care and diligence, Phil. 2. 12, 13. The sound of the going was, (1.) A signal to David when to move; it is comfortable going out when God goes before us. And, (2.) Perhaps it was an alarm to the enemy, and put them into confusion. Hearing the march of an army against their front, they retreated with precipitation, and fell into David's army, which lay behind them in their rear. Of those whom God fights against, it is said, (Lev. 26. 36.) The sound of a shaken leaf shall chase them.

The success of this is briefly set down, v. 25. David observed his orders, waited till God moved and stirred them, but not till then. Thus he was trained up in a dependence on God and his providence. God performed his promise, went before him, and routed all the enemies' force, and David failed not to improve his advantages; he smote the Philistines, even to the borders of their own country. When the kingdom of the Messiah was to be set up, the apostles, that were to beat down the Devil's kingdom, must not attempt any thing till they received the promise of the Spirit, who came with a sound from heaven, as of a rushing mighty wind, (Acts. 2. 2.) which was typified by this sound of the going on the tops of the mulberry-trees; and, when they heard that, they must bestir themselves, and did so; they went forth conquering and to conquer.

CHAP. VI.

The obscurity of the ark, during the reign of Saul, had been as great a grievance to Israel as the insults of the Philistines. David, having humbled the Philis-times, and mortified them, in gratitude for that favour, and in pursuance of his designs for the public welfare, is here bringing up the ark to his own city, that it might be near him, and be an ornament and strength to his new foundation. Here is, 1. An attempt to do it, which failed and miscarried. The design was laid, v. 1, 2. But, 1. They were guilty of an error in carrying it in a cart, v. 3, 5. 2. They were punished for that error by the sudden death of Uzzah, v. 6, 7. 3. Which was a great terror to David, (v. 8, 9.) and put a stop to his proceedings, v. 10, 11. 4. The great joy and satisfaction with which it was, at last, done, v. 12, 15. And, 1. The good understanding between David and his people, v. 17, 19. 2. The uneasiness between David and his wife, upon that occasion, v. 16, 20, 23. And, when we consider that the ark was both the token of God's presence and a type of Christ, we shall see that this story is very instructive.

1. A GAIN, David gathered together all the chosen men of Israel, thirty thousand.
2. And David arose, and went with all the people that were with him from Baale of Judah, to bring up from thence the ark of God, whose name is called by the name of the LORD of hosts that dwelleth between the cherubims.
3. And they set the ark of God upon a new cart, and brought it out of the house of Abinadab that was in Gibeah: and Uzzah and Ahio, the sons of Abinadab, drave the new cart.
4. And they brought it out of the house of Abinadab which was at Gibeah, accompanying the ark of God: and Ahio went before the ark.
5. And David and all the house of Israel played before the LORD on all manner of instruments made of fir wood, even on harps, and on psalteries, and on timbrels, and on cornets, and on cymbals.

We have not heard a word of the ark since it was lodged in Kirjath-jearim, immediately after its return out of its captivity among the Philistines, 1 Sam. 7. 1, 2. except that, once, Saul called for it, 1 Sam. 14. 18. That which, in former days, had made so great a figure, is now thrown aside, as a neglected thing, for many years. And, if now the ark was for so many years in a house, let it not seem strange that we find the church so long in the wilderness, Rev. 12. 14. Perpetual visibility is no mark of the true church. God is graciously present with the souls of his people, when they want the external tokens of his presence. But, now that David is settled in the throne, the honour of the ark begins to revive, and Israel's care of it to flourish again, wherein also, no doubt, the good people among them had been careful, but they lacked opportunity, Phil. 4. 10.

I. Here is honourable mention made of the ark. Because it had not been spoken of a great while; now that it is spoken of, observe how it is described, v. 2. It is the ark of God, whose name is called by the name of the Lord of hosts, that dwelleth between the cherubims: Or, at which the name, even the name of the Lord of hosts, was called upon: Or, upon which the name of the Lord of hosts was called: Or, because of which the name is proclaimed, the name of the Lord of hosts, that is, God was greatly magnified in the miracles done before the ark. Or, the ark of God, who is called the name, (Lev. 24. 11, 16.) the name of the Lord of hosts, sitting on the cherubims upon it. Let us learn hence, 1. To think and speak highly of God. He is the name above every name; the Lord of hosts, that has all the creatures in heaven and earth at his command, and receives homage from them all, and yet is pleased to dwell between the cherubims, over the propitiatory or mercy-seat, graciously manifesting himself to his people, reconciled in a Mediator, and ready to do them good. 2. To think and speak honourably of holy ordinances, which are to us, as the ark was to Israel, the tokens of God's presence, (Matth. 23. 20.) and the means of our communion with him, Ps. 27. 4. It is the honour of the ark, that it is the ark of God; he is jealous for it, is magnified in it, his name is called upon it. The divine institution puts a beauty and grandeur upon holy ordinances, which otherwise have no form nor comeliness. Christ is our Ark, in and by him God manifests his favour, and communicates his grace to us, and accepts our adorations and addresses.

II. Here is an honourable attendance given to the ark upon the removal of it. Now, at length, it is inquired after; David made the motion, 1 Chron. 13. 1, 3. and the heads of the congregation agreed to it, v. 4. All the chosen men of Israel are called together to grace the solemnity, to pay their respect to the ark, and to testify their joy on its removal. The nobility and gentry, elders and officers, came, to the number of thirty thousand, v. 1. and the generality of the common people besides, 1 Chron. 13. 5. for, some think, it was done at one of the three great festivals. This would make a noble cavalcade, and would help to inspire the young people of the nation, who, perhaps, had scarcely heard of the ark, with a great veneration for it, for this was certainly a treasure of inestimable value, which the king himself, and all the great men, waited upon, and were a guard to.

III. Here are great expressions of joy, upon the removal of the ark, v. 5. David himself, and all that were with him that were musically inclined, made use of such instruments as they had to excite and express their rejoicing upon this occasion. It might well put them into a transport of joy to see the ark rise out of obscurity, and move towards a public station. It is better to have the ark in a house than not at all, better in a house than a captive in Dagon's temple. But it is very desirable to have it in a tent pitched on purpose for it, where the resort to it may be more free and open. As secret worship is better the more secret it is, so public worship is better the more public it is: and we have reason to rejoice, when restraints are taken off, and the ark of God finds welcome in the city of David, and has not only the protection and support, but the countenance and encouragement, of the civil powers; for joy of this, they played before the Lord. Note, Public joy must always be as before the Lord, with an eye to him, and terminating in him, and must not degenerate into that which is carnal and sensual. Dr. Lightfoot supposes, that, upon this occasion, David penned the 68th psalm, because it begins with that ancient prayer of Moses, at the removing of the ark, Let God arise, and let his enemies be scattered: and notice is taken there, v. 25. of the singers and players on instruments that attended, and v. 27. of the princes of several of the tribes; and perhaps those words in the last verse, O God, thou art terrible out of thy holy places, were added, upon occasion of the death of Uzzah.

IV. Here is an error that they were guilty of in this matter, that they carried the ark in a cart or carriage, whereas the priests should have carried it upon their shoulders, v. 3. The Kohathites, that had the charge of the ark, had no waggons assigned them, because their service was to bear it upon their shoulders, Numb. 7. 9. The ark was no such heavy burthen, but that they might, among them, have carried it as far as mount Zion upon their shoulders; they needed not put it in a cart, like a common thing. It was no excuse for them that the Philistines had done so, and were not punished for it; they knew no better, nor had they any priests or Levites with them to undertake the carrying of it; better carry it in a cart, than that any of Dagon's priests should carry it. Philistines may cart the ark with impunity; but, if Israelites do, it is at their peril. And it mended the matter very little that it was a new cart; old or new, it was not what God had appointed. I wonder how so wise and good a man as David was, that conversed so much with the law of God, came to be guilty of such an oversight. We will charitably hope that it was because he was so extremely intent upon the substance of the service, that he forgot to take care of this circumstance.

6. And when they came to Nachon's threshing-floor, Uzzah put forth his hand to the ark of God, and took hold of it; for the oxen shook it. 7. And the anger of the LORD was kindled against Uzzah; and God smote him there for his error; and there he died by the ark of God. 8. And David was displeased, because the LORD had made a breach upon Uzzah: and he called the name of the place Perez-uzzah to this day. 9. And David was afraid of the LORD that day, and said, How shall the ark of the LORD come to me? 10. So David would not remove the ark of the LORD unto him into the city of David: but David carried it aside into the house of Obed-edom the Gittite. 11. And the ark of the LORD continued in the house of Obed-edom the Gittite three months: and the LORD blessed Obed-edom, and all his household.

We have here Uzzah struck dead for touching the ark, when it was upon its journey toward the city of David; a sad providence, which damped their mirth, stopped the progress of the ark, and, for the present, dispersed this great assembly, which was come together to attend it, and sent them home in a fright.

I. Uzzah's offence seemed very small. He and his brother Ahio, the sons of Abinadab, in whose house the ark had long been lodged, having been used to attend it, to shew their willingness to prefer the public benefit to their own private honour and advantage, undertook to drive the cart in which the ark was carried; this being, perhaps, the last service they were likely to do it, for others would be employed about it when it came to the city of David. Ahio went before, to clear the way, and, if need were, to lead the oxen; Uzzah followed close to the side of the cart; it happened that the oxen shook it, v. 6. The critics are not agreed about the signification of the original word: They stumbled; so our margin: They kicked; so some; perhaps against the goad with which Uzzah drove them. They stuck in the mire, so some. By some accident or other, the ark was in danger of being overthrown. Uzzah thereupon laid hold on it, to save it from falling: we have reason to think, with a very good intention, to preserve the reputation of the ark, and to prevent a bad omen. Yet this was his crime: Uzzah was a Levite, but priests only might touch the ark. The law was express concerning the Kohathites, that, though they were to carry the ark by the staves, yet they must not touch any holy thing, lest they die, Numb. 4. 15. Uzzah's long familiarity with the ark, and the constant attendance he had given to it, might occasion his presumption, but would not excuse it.

II. His punishment for this offence seems very great; (v. 7.) The anger of the Lord was kindled against him, (for in sacred things he is a jealous God,) and he smote him there for his rashness, as the word is, and struck him dead upon the spot. There he sinned, and there he died, by the ark of God; even the mercy-seat would not save him. Why was God thus severe with him? 1. The touching of the ark was forbidden to the Levites, expressly under pain of death, lest they die; and God, by this instance of severity, would shew how he might justly have dealt with our first parents, when they had eaten that which was forbidden under the same penalty, lest ye die. 2. God saw the presumption and irreverence of Uzzah's heart. Perhaps he affected to shew, before this great assembly, how bold he could make with the ark, having been so long acquainted with it. Familiarity, even with that which is most awful, is apt to breed contempt. 3. David afterward owned that Uzzah died for an error they were all guilty of, which was carrying the ark in a cart; because it was not carried on the Levites' shoulders, The Lord made that breach upon us, 1 Chron. 15. 13. But Uzzah was singled out to be made an example, perhaps because he had been most forward in advising that way of conveyance; however, he had fallen into another error, which was occasioned by that. Perhaps the ark was not covered, as it should have been, with the covering of badgers' skins, (Numb. 6. 6.) and that was a further provocation. 4. God would hereby strike an awe upon the thousands of Israel, would convince them that the ark was never the less venerable for its having been so long in mean circumstances; and thus he would teach them to rejoice with trembling, and always to treat holy things with reverence and holy fear. 5. God would hereby teach us that a good intention would not justify a bad action; it will not suffice to say of that which is ill-done, that it was well-meant. He will let us know that he can and will secure his ark, and needs not any man's sin to help him to do it. 6. If it were so great a crime for one to lay hold on the ark of the covenant that had no right to do so, what is it for those to lay claim to the privileges of the covenant, that come not up to the terms of it? To the wicked, God says, What hast thou to do to take my covenant in thy mouth? Ps. 50. 16. Friend, how camest thou in hither? If the ark was so sacred, and not to be touched irreverently, what is the blood of the covenant? Heb. 10. 29.

III. David's feelings on the infliction of this stroke were keen, and perhaps not altogether as they should have been. He should have humbled himself under God's hand, confessed the error, acknowledged God's righteousness, and deprecated the further tokens of his displeasure, and then have gone on with the good work he had in hand. But we find,

1. He was displeased; it is not said because Uzzah had affronted God, but because God had made a breach upon Uzzah, v. 8. David's anger was kindled. It is the same word that is used for God's displeasure, v. 7. Because God was angry, David was angry and out of humour. As if God might not assert the honour of his ark, and frown upon one that touched it rudely, without asking David leave. Shall mortal man pretend to be more just than God, arraign his proceedings, or charge him with iniquity? David did not now act like himself, like a man after God's own heart. It is not for us to be displeased at any thing that God does, how displeasing soever it is to us. The death of Uzzah was indeed an eclipse to the glory of a solemnity which David valued himself upon more than any thing else, and might give birth to some speculations among those that were disaffected to him, as if God were departing from him too; but, however, he ought to have subscribed to the righteousness and wisdom of God in it, and not to have been displeased at it. When we lie under God's anger, we must keep under our own.

2. He was afraid, v. 9. It should seem he was afraid with amazement; for he said, How shall the ark of the Lord come to me? As if God sought advantages against all that were about him, and was so extremely tender of his ark, that there was no dealing with it; and therefore better for him to keep it at a distance. Qui procul a Jove, procul a fulmine—To retire from Jove, is to retire from the thunder-bolt. He should rather have said, "Let the ark come to me, and I will take warning by this to treat it with more reverence." Provoke me not, (says God, Jer. 25. 6.) and I will do you no hurt. Or, this may be looked upon as a good use which David made of this tremendous judgment; he did not say, "Surely, Uzzah was a sinner above all men, because he suffered such things," but is concerned for himself, as one conscious, not only of his own unworthiness of God's favour, but his obnoxiousness to God's displeasure; "God might justly strike me dead, as he did Uzzah; my flesh trembles for fear of thee," Ps. 119. 120. This God intends in his judgments, that others may hear and fear. David therefore will not bring the ark into his own city, (v. 10.) till he is better prepared for its reception.

3. He took care to perpetuate the remembrance of this stroke by a new name he gave to the place, Perez-uzzah, the breach of Uzzah, v. 8. He had been lately triumphing in the breach made upon his enemies, and called the place Baal-perazim, a place of breaches. But here is a breach upon his friends. When we see one breach, we should consider that we know not where the next will be. The memorial of this stroke would be a warning to posterity, to take heed of all rashness and irreverence in dealing about holy things; for God will be sanctified in those that come nigh unto him.

4. He lodged the ark in a good house, the house of Obed-edom, a Levite, which happened to be near the place where this disaster happened, and there, (1.) It was kindly entertained and bid welcome, and continued there three months, v. 10, 11. Obed-edom knew what slaughter the ark had made among the Philistines that imprisoned it, and the Bethshemites that looked into

it. He saw Uzzah struck dead for touching it, and perceived that David himself was afraid of meddling with it; yet he cheerfully invites it to his own house, and opens his doors to it without fear, knowing it was a savour of death unto death, to those only that treated it ill. "Oh the courage," says Bishop Hall, "of an honest and faithful heart; nothing can make God otherwise than amiable to his own: even his very justice is lovely." (2.) It paid well for his entertainment. The Lord blessed Obed-edom and all his household. The same hand that punished Uzzah's proud presumption, rewarded Obed-edom's humble boldness, and made the ark to him a savour of life unto life. Let none think the worse of the gospel for the judgments inflicted on those that reject it, but set in opposition to them the blessings it brings to those that duly receive it. None ever had, or ever shall have, reason to say that it is in vain to serve God. Let masters of families be encouraged to keep up religion in their families, and to serve God and the interests of his kingdom, with their houses and estates, for that is the way to bring a blessing upon all they have. The ark is a guest which none shall lose by, that hid it welcome. Josephus says, that, whereas before Obed-edom was poor, on a sudden, in these three months, his estate increased, to the envy of his neighbours. Piety is the best friend to prosperity. In wisdom's left hand are riches and honour. His household shared in the blessing: it is good living in a family that entertains the ark, for all about it will fare the better for it.

12. And it was told king David, saying, The LORD hath blessed the house of Obed-edom, and all that pertaineth unto him, because of the ark of God. So David went and brought up the ark of God from the house of Obed-edom into the city of David with gladness. 13. And it was so, that when they that bare the ark of the LORD had gone six paces, he sacrificed oxen and fatlings. 14. And David danced before the LORD with all his might; and David was girded with a linen ephod. 15. So David and all the house of Israel brought up the ark of the LORD with shouting, and with the sound of the trumpet. 16. And as the ark of the LORD came into the city of David, Michal, Saul's daughter, looked through a window, and saw king David leaping and dancing before the LORD; and she despised him in her heart. 17. And they brought in the ark of the LORD, and set it in his place, in the midst of the tabernacle that David had pitched for it: and David offered burnt-offerings and peace-offerings before the LORD. 18. And as soon as David had made an end of offering burnt-offerings and peace-offerings, he blessed the people in the name of the LORD of hosts. 19. And he dealt among all the people, even among the whole multitude of Israel, as well to the women as men, to every one a cake of bread, and a good piece of flesh, and a flagon of wine. So all the people departed every one to his house.

We have here the second attempt to bring the ark home to the city of David: and this succeeded, though the former miscarried. It should seem, the blessing with which the house of Obed-edom was blessed for the ark's sake, was a great inducement to David to bring it forward; for when that was told him, v. 12. he hastened to fetch it to him. For 1. It was an evidence that God was reconciled to them, and his anger was turned away. As David could read God's frowns upon them all in Uzzah's stroke, so he could read God's favour to them all in Obed-edom's prosperity; and, if God be at peace with them, they can cheerfully go on with their design. 2. It was an evidence that the ark was not such a burthensome stone as it was taken to be, but, on the contrary, happy was the man that had it near him. Christ is indeed a Stone of stumbling, and a Rock of offence, to them that are disobedient; but to them which believe, he is a Corner-stone, elect, precious, 1 Pet. 2. 6. 3. When David heard that Obed-edom had such joy of the ark, then he would have it in his own city. Note, The experience others have had of the gains of godliness, should encourage us to be religious. Is the ark a blessing to others' houses? let us bid it welcome to our's; we may have it, and the blessing of it, without fetching it from our neighbours.

Let us see how David managed the matter now.

I. He rectified the former error; he did not put the ark in a cart now, but ordered those, whose business it was, to carry it on their shoulders. This is implied here, v. 13. and expressed 1 Chron. 15. 15. Then we make a good use of the judgments of God on ourselves and others, when we are awakened by them to reform and amend whatever has been amiss.

II. At their first setting out, he offered sacrifices to God, v. 13. by way of atonement for their former errors, and in a thankful acknowledgment of the blessings bestowed on the house of Obed-edom. Then we are likely to speed in our enterprises, when we begin with God, and give diligence to make our peace with him. When we attend upon God in holy ordinances, our eye must be to the great Sacrifice, to which we owe it that we are taken into covenant and communion with God, Ps. 50. 5.

III. He himself attended the solemnity with the highest expressions of joy that could be, v. 14. he danced before the Lord with all his might; he leaped for joy, as one transported with the occasion, and the more, because of the disappointment he met with the last time. It is a pleasure to a good man to see his errors rectified, and himself in the way of his duty. His dancing, I suppose, was not artificial, by any certain rule or measure, nor do we find that any danced with him; but it was a natural expression of his great joy and exultation of mind. He did it with all his might; so we should perform all our religious services, as those that are intent upon them, and desire to do them in the best manner: all our might is little enough to be employed in holy duties: the work deserves it all. On this occasion, David laid aside his imperial purple, and put on a plain linen ephod, which was light and convenient for dancing, and was used in religious exercises by those who were no priests, for Samuel wore one, 1 Sam. 2. 18. That great prince thought it no disparagement to him to appear in the habit of a minister to the ark.

IV. All the people triumphed in this advancement of the ark, v. 15. They brought it up into the royal city with shouting, and with sound of trumpet, so expressing their own joy in loud acclamations, and giving notice to all about them to rejoice with them. The public and free administration of ordinances, not only under the protection, but under the smiles, of the civil powers, is just matter of rejoicing to any people.

V. The ark was safely brought to, and honourably deposited in, the place prepared for it, v. 17. They set it in the midst of the tabernacle, or tent, which David had pitched for it; not the tabernacle which Moses reared, that was at Gibeon, 2 Chron. 1. 13. and, we may suppose, being made of cloth, in so many hundred years, it was gone to decay, and not fit to be removed; but this was a tent set up on purpose to receive the ark. He would not bring it into a private house, no not his own, lest it should seem to be too much engrossed, and people's resort, to pray before it, should be less free; yet he would not build a house for it, lest that should supersede the building of a more stately temple in due time; and therefore, for the present, he placed it within curtains, under a canopy, in imitation of Moses's tabernacle. As soon as ever it was lodged, he offered burnt-offerings and peace-offerings, in thankfulness to God, that the business was now done, without any more errors or breaches; and in supplication to God for the continuance of his favour. Note, all our joys must be sanctified both with praises and prayers; for with such sacrifices God is well-pleas'd. Now, it should seem, he penned Ps. 132.

VI. The people were then dismissed with great satisfaction. He sent them away, 1. With a gracious prayer; he blessed them in the name of the Lord of hosts, (v. 18.) having not only a particular interest in heaven as a prophet, but an authority over them as a prince; for the less is blessed of the better, Heb. 7. 7. He prayed to God to bless them, and particularly to reward them for the honour and respect they had now shewn to his ark; assuring them they should be no losers by their journey, but the blessing of God upon their affairs at home would more than bear their charges. He testified his desire for their welfare by this prayer for them, and let them know they had a king that loved them. 2. With a generous treat; for so it was, rather than a distribution of alms; the great men, it is probable, he entertained at his own house, but to the multitude of Israel, men and women, (and children, says Josephus,) he dealt, to each, a cake of bread; (a spice-cake, so some;) a good piece of flesh; (a handsome, decent, piece, so some; a part of the peace-offerings, so Josephus; that they might feast with him upon the sacrifice;) and a flagon, or bottle, of wine, v. 19. Probably, he ordered this provision to be made for them at their respective quarters; and this he did, (1.) In token of his joy and gratitude to God. When the heart is enlarged in cheerfulness, that should open the hand in liberality. The feast of Purim was observed with sending portions one to another, Esth. 9. 22. As they to whom God is merciful, ought to shew mercy in forgiving; so they to whom God is bountiful, ought to exercise bounty in giving. (2.) To recommend himself to the people, and confirm his interest in them; for every one is a friend to him that giveth gifts. They that cared not for his prayers, would love him for his generosity; and this would encourage them to attend him another time, if he saw cause to call them together.

20. Then David returned to bless his household. And Michal the daughter of Saul came out to meet David, and said, How glorious was the king of Israel to-day, who uncovered himself to-day in the eyes of the handmaids of his servants, as one of the vain fellows shamelessly uncovereth himself! 21. And David said unto Michal, It was before the LORD, which chose me before thy father, and before all his house, to appoint me ruler over the people of the LORD, over Israel: therefore will I play before the LORD. 22. And I will yet be more vile than thus, and will be base in mine own sight: and of the maid-servants which thou hast spoken of, of them shall I be had in honour. 23. Therefore Michal the daughter of Saul had no child until the day of her death.

David, having dismissed the congregation with a blessing, returned to bless his household; (v. 20.) that is, to pray with them and for them, and to offer up his family-thanksgiving for this national mercy. Ministers must not think that their public performances will excuse them from their family-worship; but when they have, with their instructions and prayers, blessed the solemn assemblies, they must return in the same manner to bless their households, for with them they are in a particular manner charged. David, though he had prophets, and priests, and Levites, about him, to be his chaplains, yet did not devolve the work upon them, but himself blessed his household. It is angels' work to worship God, and therefore surely that can be no disparagement to the greatest of men.

Never did David return to his house with so much pleasure and satisfaction, as he did now that he had got the ark into his neighbourhood; and yet even this joyful day concluded with some uneasiness, occasioned by the pride and peevishness of his wife. Even the palaces of princes are not exempt from domestic troubles. David had pleased all the multitude of Israel, but Michal was not pleased with his dancing before the ark; for this, when he was at a distance, she scorned him, and when he came home, she scolded him. She was not displeas'd at his generosity to the people, nor did she grudge the entertainment he gave them, but she thought he demeaned himself too much in dancing before the ark. It was not her covetousness, but her pride, that made her fret.

I. When she saw David in the street dancing before the Lord, she despis'd him in her heart, v. 16. She thought this mighty zeal of his for the ark of God, and the transport of joy he was in, upon its coming home to him, was but a foolish thing, and unbecoming so great a soldier, and statesman, and monarch, as he was: it had been enough for him to encourage the devotion of others, but she looked upon it as a thing below him to appear so very devout himself. "What a fool" (thinks she) "does my husband make of himself now! How fond is he of this ark, that might as well have lain still where it had lain for so many years! Much devotion has almost made him mad." Note, The exercises of religion appear very mean in the eyes of those that have little or no religion themselves.

II. When he came home in the very best disposition, she began to upbraid him, and was so full of disdain and indignation, that she could not contain till she had him in private, but went out to meet him with her reproaches.

Observe, 1. How she taunted him; (v. 20.) "How glorious was the King of Israel to-day! What a figure didst thou make to-day in the midst of the mob; how unbecoming thy post and character!" Her contempt of him and his devotion began in the heart, but out of the abundance of that the mouth spake. That which displeas'd her, was, his affection to the ark, which she could wish he had no greater kindness for than she had: but she basely represents his conduct, in dancing before the ark, as lewd and immodest; and, while really she was displeas'd at it, as a diminution to his honour, she pretended to dislike it, as a reproach to his virtue, that he uncover'd himself in the eyes of the maid-servants, so as no man would have done, but one of the vain fellows, that cares not how much he shames himself. We have no reason to think that this was true in fact: David, no doubt, observ'd decorum, and govern'd his zeal with discretion; but it is common for those that reproach religion, thus to put false colours upon it, and lay it under the most odious characters. To have abus'd any man thus, for his pious zeal, had been very profane; but to abuse her own husband thus, whom she ought to reverence, and one whose prudence and virtue were above the reach of malice itself to disparage, one who had shew'd such affection for her, that he would not accept a crown, unless he might have her restored to him, (ch. 3. 13.) was a most base and wicked thing, and shew'd her to have more of Saul's daughter in her, than of David's wife, or Jonathan's sister.

2. How he replied to her reproach. He does not upbraid her with her treacherous departure from him, to embrace the bosom of a stranger. He had forgiven that, and therefore had forgott'n it, though it may be his own conscience on this occasion upbraided him with his folly in receiving her again, (for that is said to pollute the land, Jer. 3. 1.) but he justifies himself in what he did.

(1.) He design'd thereby to honour God, v. 21. It was before the Lord, and with an eye to him. Whatever invidious construction she was pleas'd to put upon it, he had the testimony of his conscience for him, that he sincerely aimed at the glory of God, for whom he thought he could never do enough. Here he reminds her, indeed, of the setting aside of her father's house, to make way for him to the throne, that she might not think herself the most proper judge of propriety; "God chose me before thy father, and appointed me to be ruler over Israel, and now I am the fountain of honour; and if the expressions of a warm devotion to God were look'd upon as mean and unfashionable in thy father's court, yet I will play before the Lord, and thereby bring them into reputation again. And if this be to be vile, v. 22. I will be yet more vile. Note, [1.] We should be afraid of censuring the devotion of others, though it may not agree with our sentiments, because, for aught that we know, the heart may be upright in it, and who are we that we should despise those whom God has accepted? [2.] If we can approve ourselves to God in what we do in religion, and do it as before the Lord, we need not value the censures and reproaches of men. If we appear right in God's eyes, no matter how mean we appear in the eyes of the world. [3.] The more we are vilified for well-doing, the more resolute we should be in it, and hold our religion the faster, and bind it the closer to us, for the endeavours of Satan's agents to shake us, and to shame us out of it. I will be yet more vile.

(2.) He designed thereby to humble himself. "I will be base in mine own sight, and will think nothing too mean to stoop to for the honour of God." In the throne of judgment, and in the field of battle, none shall do more to support the grandeur and authority of a prince than David shall; but in acts of devotion he lays aside the thoughts of majesty, humbles himself to the dust before the Lord, joins in with the meanest services done in honour of the ark, and yet thinks it no diminution to him. The greatest of men is less than the least of the ordinances of Jesus Christ.

(3.) He doubted not but even this would turn to his reputation among those whose reproach he feared: Of the maid-servants shall I be had in honour. The common people would be so far from thinking the worse of him for these pious condescensions, that they would esteem and honour him so much the more. Those that are truly pious are sometimes manifested in the consciences even of those that speak ill of them, 2 Cor. 5. 11. Let us never be driven from our duty by the fear of reproach, for to be steady and resolute in it, will, perhaps, turn to our reputation more than we think it will. Piety will have its praise: let us not then be indifferent in it, nor afraid or ashamed to own it.

David was contented thus to justify himself, and did not any further animadvert upon Michal's insolence; but God punished her for it, writing her for ever childless from this time forward, v. 23. She unjustly reproached David for his devotion, and therefore God justly put her under the perpetual reproach of barrenness. They that honour God, he will honour; but those that despise him, and his servants and service, shall be lightly esteemed.

CHAP. VII.

Still the ark is David's care, as well as his joy. In this chapter, we have, I. His consultation with Nathan about building a house for it; he signifies his purpose to do it, v. 1, 2. and Nathan approves his purpose, v. 3. II. His communion with God about it. 1. A gracious message God sent him about it, accepting his purpose, countermanding the performance, and promising him an entail of blessings upon his family, v. 4. 17. 2. A very humble prayer which David offered up to God, in return to that gracious message: thankfully accepting God's promises to him, and earnestly praying for the performance of them, v. 18. 29. And in both these, there is an eye to the Messiah, and his kingdom.

I. AND it came to pass, when the king sat in his house, and the LORD had given him rest round about from all his enemies; 2. That the king said unto Nathan the prophet, See now, I dwell in an house of cedar, but the ark of God dwelleth within curtains. 3. And Nathan said to the king, Go, do all that is in thine heart; for the LORD is with thee.

Here is,

I. David at rest. He sat in his house, v. 1. quiet and undisturbed, having no occasion to take the field; The Lord had given him rest round about, from all those that were enemies to his settlement in the throne, and he sets himself to enjoy that rest; though he was a man of war, he was for peace, Ps. 120. 7. and did not delight in war. He had not been long at rest, nor was it long before he was again engaged in war; but, at present, he enjoyed a calm, and he was in his element when he was sitting in his house, meditating in the law of God.

II. David's thought of building a temple for the honour of God. He had built a palace for himself, and a city for his servants; and now he thinks of building a habitation for the ark. 1. Thus he would make a grateful return for the honours God had put upon him. Note, When God, in his providence, has remarkably done much for us, it should put us upon contriving what we may do for him and his glory. What shall I render unto the Lord? 2. Thus he would improve the present calm, and make a good use of the rest God had given him. Now that he was not called out to serve God and Israel in the high places of the field, he would employ his thoughts, and time, and estate, in serving him another way, and not indulge himself in ease, much less in luxury. When God, in his providence, gives us rest, and finds us little to do of worldly business, we must do so much the more for God and our souls. How different were the thoughts of David, when he sat in his palace, from Nebuchadnezzar's, when he walked in his! Dan. 4. 29, 30. The proud man thought of nothing but the might of his own power, and the honour of his own majesty; this humble soul is full of contrivance how to glorify God, and give honour to him; and how God resisted the proud, and gave grace and glory to the humble, the event shewed. David considered, v. 2. the stateliness of his own habitation; (I dwell in a house of cedar;) and compared with that the meanness of the habitation of the ark, (that dwells within curtains,) and thought this incongruous, that he should dwell in a palace, and the ark in a tent. David had been uneasy till he found out a place for the ark, Ps. 132. 4, 5. and now he is uneasy till he finds out a better place. Gracious, grateful souls, (1.) Never think they can do enough for God, but, when they have done much, are still projecting to do more, and devising liberal things. (2.) They cannot enjoy their own accommodations, while they see the church of God in distress, and under a cloud. David can take little pleasure in a house of cedar for himself, unless the ark have one. Those who stretched themselves upon beds of ivory, and were not grieved for the affliction of Joseph, though they had David's music, had not David's spirit, Amos, 6. 4, 6. nor they who dwelt in their ceiled houses, while God's house lay waste.

III. His communicating of this thought to Nathan the prophet. He told him, as a friend and confidant, whom he used to advise with. Could not David have gone about it himself? Was it not a good work? Was not he himself a prophet? Yes, but in the multitude of counsellors there is safety. David told him, that by him he might know the mind of God. It was certainly a good work, but it was uncertain whether it was the will of God that David should have the doing of it.

IV. Nathan's approbation of it. Go, do all that is in thine heart: for the Lord is with thee, v. 3. We do not find that David told him that he purposed to build a temple, only that it was a trouble to him that there was not one built; from which Nathan easily gathered what was in his heart, and bade him go on and prosper. Note, We ought to do all we can, to encourage and promote the good purposes and designs of others, and put in a good word, as we have opportunity, to forward a good work. Nathan spoke this, not in God's name, but as from himself; not as a prophet, but as a wise and good man; it was agreeable to the revealed will of God, which requires that all in their places should lay out themselves for the advancement of religion and the service of God, though it seems the secret will was otherwise, that David should not do this. It was Christ's prerogative always to speak the mind of God, which he perfectly knew; other prophets spake it only when the spirit of prophecy was upon them; but, if in any thing they mistook, as Samuel, 1 Sam. 16. 6. and Nathan here, God soon rectified the mistake.

4. And it came to pass that night, that the word of the LORD came unto Nathan, saying, 5. Go and tell my servant David, Thus saith the LORD, Shalt thou build me an house for me to dwell in? 6. Whereas I have not dwelt in any house since the time that I brought up the children of Israel out of Egypt, even to this day, but have walked in a tent and in a tabernacle. 7. In all the places wherein I have walked with all the children of Israel, spake I a word with any of the tribes of Israel, whom I commanded to feed my people Israel, saying, Why build ye not me an house of cedar? 8. Now therefore so shalt thou say unto my servant David, Thus saith the LORD of hosts, I took thee from the sheep-cote, from following the sheep, to be ruler over my people, over Israel: 9. And I was with thee whithersoever thou wentest, and have cut off all thine enemies out of thy sight, and have made thee a great name, like unto the name of the great men that are in the earth. 10. Moreover I will appoint a place for my people Israel, and will plant them, that they may dwell in a place of their own, and move no more; neither shall the children of wickedness afflict them any more, as beforetime. 11. And as since the time that I commanded judges to be over my people Israel, and have caused thee to rest from all thine enemies. Also the LORD telleth thee that he will make thee an house. 12. And when thy days be fulfilled, and thou shalt sleep with thy fathers, I will set up thy seed after thee, which shall proceed out of thy bowels, and I will establish his kingdom. 13. He shall build an house for my name, and I will stablish the throne of his kingdom for ever. 14. I will be his father, and he shall be my son. If he commit iniquity, I will chasten him with the rod of men, and with the stripes of the children of men: 15. But my mercy shall not depart away from him, as I took it from Saul, whom I put away before thee. 16. And thine house and thy kingdom shall be established for ever before thee: thy throne shall be established for ever. 17. According to all these words, and according to all this vision, so did Nathan speak unto David.

We have here a full revelation of God's favour to David, and the kind intentions of that favour; the notices and assurances of which God sent him by Nathan the prophet, whom he intrusted to deliver this long message to him. The design of it is to take him off from his purpose of building the temple, and was therefore sent, 1. By the same hand that had given him encouragement to do it; lest, if it had been sent by any other, Nathan should have been despised and insulted, and David should have been perplexed, being encouraged by one prophet, and discouraged by another. 2. The same night, that Nathan might not continue long in an error, nor David have his head any further filled with thoughts of that which he must never bring to pass. God might have said this to David himself immediately, but he chose to send it by Nathan, to support the honour of his prophets, and to preserve in David a regard to them: though he be the head, they must be the eyes by which he must see the visions of the Almighty, and the tongue by which he must hear the word of God. He that delivered this long message to Nathan assisted his memory to retain it, that he might deliver it fully, (he being resolved to deliver it faithfully,) as he received it of the Lord.

Now in this message we have,

I. David's purpose to build God a house superseded. God took notice of that purpose, for he knows what is in man; and he was well pleased with it, as appears, 1 Kings, 8. 18. Thou didst well that it was in thine heart; yet he forbade him to go on with his purpose, v. 5. "Shalt thou build me a house? No, thou shalt not," as it is explained in the parallel place, 1 Chron. 17. 4. "There is other work appointed for thee to do, which must be done first." David is a man of war, and he must enlarge the borders of Israel, by carrying on their conquests. David is a sweet psalmist, and he must prepare psalms for the use of the temple when it is built, and settle the courses of the Levites; but his son's genius will better suit for building the house, and he will have a better treasure to bear the charge of it, and therefore let it be reserved for him to do. As every man hath received the gift, so let him minister.

The building of a temple was to be a work of time, and preparation made for it; but it was a thing that had never been spoken of till now. God tells him, 1. That hitherto he never had had a house built for him; (v. 6.) a tabernacle had served hitherto, and it might serve a while longer. God values not outward pomp in his service; his presence was as surely with his people when the ark was in a tent, as when it was in a temple; David was uneasy that the ark was in curtains, (a mean and moveable habitation,) but God never complained of it as any uneasiness to him. He did not dwell, but walk, and yet fainted not, nor was weary. Christ, like the ark, when here on earth, walked in a tent and tabernacle, for he went about doing good, and dwelt not in any house of his own, till he ascended on high, to the mansions above, in his Father's house, and there he sat down. The church, like the ark, in this world, is ambulatory, dwells in a tent, because its present state is both pastoral and military; its continuing city is to come. David, in his Psalms, often calls the tabernacle a temple, (as Ps. 5. 7.—27. 4.—29. 9.—65. 4.—138. 2.) because it answered the intention of a temple, though it was made but of curtains: wise and good men value not the shew, while they have the substance. David perhaps had more true devotion, and sweeter communion with God, in a house of curtains, than any of his successors in the house of cedar. 2. That he had never given any orders or directions, or the least intimation, to any of the sceptres of Israel, that is, to any of the judges, 1 Chron. 17. 6. (for rulers are called sceptres, Ezek. 19. 14. the great Ruler is called so, Numb. 24. 17.) concerning the building of the temple, v. 7. That worship only is acceptable which is instituted; why should David therefore design what God never ordained? Let him wait for a warrant, and then let him do it. Better a tent of God's appointing, than a temple of his own inventing.

II. David is reminded of the great things God had done for him, to let him know that he was a favourite of Heaven, though he had not the favour to be employed in this service; as also that God was not indebted to him for his good intentions: but, whatever he did for God's honour, God was beforehand with him, v. 8, 9. 1. He had raised him from a very mean and low condition: he took him from the sheep-cote. It is good for those who are come to great preferment, to be often reminded of their small beginnings, that they may always be humble and thankful. 2. He had given him success and victory over his enemies; (v. 9.) "I was with thee whithersoever thou wentest, to protect thee when pursued, to prosper thee when pursuing; I have cut off all thine enemies, that stood in the way of thine advancement and settlement." 3. He had crowned him not only with power and dominion in Israel, but with honour and reputation among the nations about; I have made thee a great name. He was become famous for his courage, conduct, and great achievements, and was more talked of than any of the great men of his day. A great name is what they who have have great reason to be thankful for, and may improve to good purposes; but what they that have not have no reason to be ambitious of; a good name is more desirable. A man may pass through the world very obscurely and yet very comfortably.

III. A happy establishment is promised to God's Israel, v. 10, 11. This comes in in a parenthesis, before the promises made to David himself, to let him understand, that what God designed to do for him was for Israel's sake, that they might be happy under his administration, and to give him the satisfaction of foreseeing peace upon Israel, when it was promised him that he should see his children's children, Ps. 128. 6. A good king cannot think himself happy, unless his kingdom be so. The promises that follow relate to his family and posterity, these therefore, which speak of the settlement of Israel, intend the happiness of his own reign. Two things are promised. 1. A quiet place; I will appoint a place for my people Israel. It was appointed long ago, yet they were disappointed, but now that appointment should be made good. Canaan should be clearly their own, without any ejection or molestation. 2. A quiet enjoyment of that place; the children of wickedness, meaning especially the Philistines, who had been so long a plague to them, shall not afflict them any more: but, as in the time that I caused judges to be over my people Israel, I cause thee to rest from all thine enemies; so v. 11. may be read; that is, "I will continue and complete that rest; the land shall rest from war, as it did under the judges."

IV. Blessings are entailed upon the family and posterity of David. David had purposed to build God a house, and, in requital, God promises to build him a house, v. 11. Whatever we do for God, or sincerely design to do, though Providence prevents our doing it, we shall in no wise lose our reward. He had promised to make him a name, v. 9. here he promises to make him a house, which should bear up that name. It would be a great satisfaction to David, while he lived, to have the inviolable assurance of a divine promise, that his family should flourish when he is gone. Next to the happiness of our souls, and the church of God, we would desire the happiness of our seed, that those who come of us may be praising God on earth, when we are praising him in heaven.

1. Some of these promises relate to Solomon, his immediate successor, and to the royal line of Judah. (1.) That God would advance him to the throne. Those words, when the days be fulfilled, and thou shalt sleep with thy fathers, intimate that David himself should come to his grave in peace; and then I will set up thy seed. This favour was so much the greater, because it was more than God had done for Moses, or Joshua, or any of the judges, whom he called to feed his people. David's government was the first that was entailed; for the promise made to Christ, of the kingdom, was to reach to his spiritual seed: if children, then heirs. (2.) That he would settle him in the throne. I will establish his kingdom, v. 12. The throne of his kingdom, v. 13. His title shall be clear and uncontested, his interest confirmed, and his administration steady. (3.) That he would employ him in that good work of building the temple, which David had only the satisfaction of designing. He shall build an house for my name, v. 13. The work shall be done, though David shall not have the doing of it. (4.) That he would take him into the covenant of adoption, v. 14, 15. I will be his father, and he shall be my son. We need no more to make us and our's happy, than to have God to be a Father to us and them: and all those to whom God is a Father, he by his grace makes his sons, by giving them the disposition of children. If he be a careful, tender, bountiful, Father to us, we must be obedient, tractable, dutiful, children to him. The promise here speaks as unto sons. [1.] That his Father would correct him, when there was occasion; for what son is he whom the Father chasteneth not? Afflictions are an article of the covenant, and are not only consistent with, but flow from, God's fatherly love. If he commit iniquity, (as it proved he did, 1 Kings, 11. 1.) I will chasten him, to bring him to repentance, but it shall be with the rod of men, such a rod as men may wield, I will not plead against him with the great power of a God, Job, 23. 6. Or rather, such a rod as men may bear. "I will consider his frame, and correct him with all possible tenderness and compassion, when there is need, and no more than there is need of; it shall be with the stripes, the touches, (so the word is,) of the children of men; not a stroke, or wound, but a gentle touch. [2.] That yet he would not disinherit him, v. 15. My mercy (and that is the inheritance of sons) shall not depart from him. The revolt of the ten tribes from the house of David was their correction for iniquity, but the constant adherence of the other two of that family, which was a competent support of the royal dignity, perpetuated the mercy of God to the seed of David, according to this promise; though that family was cut short, yet it was not cut off, as the house of Saul was. Never any other family swayed the sceptre of Judah than that of David. This is that covenant of royalty celebrated, Ps. 89. 3, &c. as typical of the covenant of redemption and grace.

2. Others of them relate to Christ, who is often called David, and the Son of David: that Son of David to whom these promises pointed, and in whom they had their full accomplishment. He was of the seed of David, Acts, 13. 23. To him God gave the throne of his father David, Luke, 1. 32. All power, both in heaven and earth, and authority to execute judgment. He was to build the gospel-temple, a house for God's name, Zech. 6. 12, 13. That promise, I will be his Father, and he shall be my Son, is expressly applied to Christ by the apostle, Heb. 1. 5. But the establishing of his house, and his throne, and his kingdom, for ever, v. 13. and again, and a third time, v. 16. for ever, can be applied to no other than Christ and his kingdom; David's house and kingdom are long since come to an end, it is only the Messiah's kingdom that is everlasting, and of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end. The supposition of committing iniquity cannot indeed be applied to the Messiah himself, but it is applicable (and very comfortably) to his spiritual seed; true believers have their infirmities, for which they may expect to be corrected, but they shall not be cast off. Every transgression in the covenant will not throw us out of covenant.

Now, (1.) This message Nathan faithfully delivered to David, v. 17. Though, in forbidding him to build the temple, he contradicted his own words, yet he was not backward to do it, when he was better informed concerning the mind of God. (2.) These promises God faithfully performed to David, and his seed, in due time. Though David came short of making good his purpose to build God's house, yet he did not come short of making good his promise to build him a house. Such is the tenor of the covenant we are under; though there are many failures in our performances, there are none in God's.

18. Then went king David in, and sat before the LORD, and he said, Who am I, O LORD God? and what is my house, that thou hast brought me hitherto? 19. And this was yet a small thing in thy sight, O LORD God; but thou hast spoken also of thy servant's house for a great while to come. And is this the manner of man, O LORD God? 20. And what can David say more unto thee? for thou, LORD God, knowest thy servant. 21. For thy word's sake, and according to thine own heart, hast thou done all these great things, to make thy servant know them. 22. Wherefore thou art great, O LORD God: for there is none like thee, neither is there any God beside thee, according to all that we have heard with our ears. 23. And what one nation in the earth is like thy people, even like Israel, whom God went to redeem for a people to himself, and to make him a name, and to do for you great things and terrible, for thy land, before thy people, which thou redeemest to thee from Egypt, from the nations and their gods? 24. For thou hast confirmed to thyself thy people Israel to be a people unto thee for ever: and thou, LORD, art become their God. 25. And now, O LORD God, the word that thou hast spoken concerning thy servant, and concerning his house, establish it for ever, and do as thou hast said. 26. And let thy name be magnified for ever, saying, The LORD of hosts is the God over Israel: and let the house of thy servant David be established before thee. 27. For thou, O LORD of hosts, God of Israel, hast revealed to thy servant, saying, I will build thee an house: therefore hath thy servant found in his heart to pray this prayer unto thee. 28. And now, O LORD God, thou art that God, and thy words be true, and thou hast promised this goodness unto thy servant: 29. Therefore now let it please thee to bless the house of thy servant, that it may continue for ever before thee: for thou, O LORD God, hast spoken it: and with thy blessing let the house of thy servant be blessed for ever.

We have here the solemn address David made to God, in answer to the gracious message God had sent him. We are not told what he said to Nathan; no doubt, he received him very kindly and respectfully, as his messenger, but his answer to God he took himself, and did not send by Nathan. When ministers deliver God's message to us, it is not to them, but to God, that our hearts must reply; he understands the language of the heart, and to him we may come boldly. David had no sooner received the message, than, while the impressions of it were fresh, he retired to return an answer. Observe,

I. The place he retired to; he went in before the Lord, that is, into the tabernacle where the ark was, which was the token of God's presence; before that he presented himself. God's will now is, that men pray every where; but, wherever we pray, we must set ourselves as before the Lord, and set him before us.

II. The posture he put himself into; he sat before the Lord. 1. It denotes the posture of his body. Kneeling or standing is certainly the most proper gesture to be used in prayer; but the Jews, from this instance, say, "It was allowed to the kings of the house of David to sit in the temple, and to no other." But this will by no means justify the ordinary use of that gesture in prayer, whatever may be allowed in a case of necessity. David went in, and took his place before the Lord, so it may be read; but when he prayed, he stood up as the manner was. Or, he went in and continued before the Lord; staid some time silently meditating, before he began his prayer, and then remained longer than usual in the tabernacle. Or, 2. It may denote the frame of his spirit at this time. He went in and composed himself before the Lord; thus we should do in all our approaches to God; O God, my heart is fixed, my heart is fixed.

III. The prayer itself, which is full of the breathings of pious and devout affection toward God.

1. He speaks very humbly of himself, and his own merits. So he begins as one astonished, Who am I, O Lord God, and what is my house? v. 18. God had reminded him of the meanness of his original, (v. 8.) and he subscribed to it; he had low thoughts, (1.) Of his personal merits, Who am I? He was, upon all accounts, a very considerable and valuable man. His endowments, both of body and mind, were extraordinary. His gifts and graces were eminent. He was a man of honour, success, and usefulness, the darling of his country, and the dread of its enemies; yet he says, when he comes to speak of himself before God, "Who am I? A man not worth taking notice of." (2.) Of the merits of his family. What is my house? His house was of the royal tribe, and descended from the prince of that tribe; he was allied to the best families of the country, and yet, like Gideon, thinks his family poor in Judah, and himself the least in his father's house, Judg. 6. 15. David thus humbled himself, when Sami's daughter was mentioned to him for a wife, (1 Sam. 18. 18.) but now with much more reason. Note, It very well becomes the greatest and best of men, even in the midst of the highest advancements, to have low and mean thoughts of themselves. For the greatest of men are worms, the best are sinners, and those that are highest advanced, have nothing but what they have received; "What am I, that thou hast brought me hitherto;" brought me to the kingdom, and to a settlement in it, and rest from all mine enemies?" It intimates that he could not have reached this himself by his own management, if God had not brought him to it. All our attainments must be looked upon as God's vouchsafements.

2. He speaks very highly and honourably of God's favours to him. (1.) In what he had done for him. "Thou hast brought me hitherto," to this great dignity and dominion. Hitherto thou hast helped me." Though we should be left at uncertainty concerning further mercy, we have great reason to be thankful for that which has been done for us hitherto, Acts, 26. 22. (2.) In what he had yet further promised him. God had done great things for him already, and yet, as if those had been nothing, he had promised to do much more, v. 19. Note, What God has laid out upon his people is much, but what he has laid up for them is infinitely more, Ps. 31. 19. The present graces and comforts of the saints are invaluable gifts; and yet, as if these were too little for God to bestow upon his children, he has spoken concerning them for a great while to come, even as far as eternity itself reaches. Of this we must own, as David here, [1.] That it is far beyond what we could expect. Is this the manner of men? That is, First, Can man expect to be so dealt with by his Maker? Is this the law of Adam? Note, Considering what the character and condition of man is, it is very surprising and amazing that God should deal with him as he does. Man is a mean creature, and therefore under a law of distance; unprofitable to God, and therefore under a law of disesteem and disregard; guilty and obnoxious, and therefore under a law of death and damnation. But how unlike are God's dealings with man to this law of Adam! He is brought near to God, purchased at a high rate; taken into covenant and communion with God; could this ever have been thought of? Secondly, Do men usually deal thus one with another? No, the way of our God is far above the manner of men. Though he be high, he has respect to the lowly; and is this the manner of men? Though he is offended by us, he beseeches us to be reconciled, waits to be gracious, multiplies his pardons; and is this the manner of men? Some give another sense of this, reading it thus: And this is the law of man, the Lord Jehovah: that is, "This promise of one whose kingdom shall be established for ever, must be understood of one that is a man, and yet the Lord Jehovah, this must be the law of such a one. A Messiah from my loins must be man, but, reigning for ever, must be God." [2.] That beyond this there is nothing we can desire. "And what can David say more unto thee?" v. 20. What can I ask, or wish for, more? Thou, Lord, knowest thy servant, knowest what will make me happy, and what thou hast promised is enough to do so." The promise of Christ includes all; if that man, the Lord God, be our's, what can we ask, or think of, more? Eph. 3. 20. The promises of the covenant of grace are framed by him that knows us, and therefore knows how to adapt them to every branch of our necessity. He knows us better than we know ourselves; and therefore let us be satisfied with the provision he has made for us; what can we say more for ourselves in our prayers, than he has said for us in his promises?

3. He ascribes all to the free grace of God; (v. 21.) both the great things he had done for him, and the great things he had made known to him. All was, (1.) For his word's sake, that is, for the sake of Christ, the Eternal Word; it is all owing to his merit. Or, "That thou mayest magnify thy word of promise above all thy name, in making it the stay and store-house of thy people." (2.) According to thy own heart, thy gracious counsels, and designs, ex mero motu—of thy own good pleasure; Even so, Father, because it seemed good in thine eyes. All that God does for his people in his providences, and secures to them in his promises, is for his pleasure, and for his praise; the pleasures of his will, and the praise of his word.

4. He adores the greatness and glory of God, v. 22. Thou art great, O Lord God, for there is none like thee. God's gracious condescension to him, and the honour he had put upon him, did not at all abate his awful veneration for the Divine Majesty; for the nearer any are brought to God, the more they see of his glory; and the dearer we are in his eyes, the greater he should be in our's. And this we acknowledge concerning God, that there is no Being like him, nor any God beside him; and that what we have seen with our eyes, of his power and goodness, is according to all that we have heard with our ears, and the one half not told us.

5. He expresses a great esteem for the Israel of God, v. 23, 24. As there were none among the gods to be compared with Jehovah, so none among the nations to be compared with Israel; considering, (1.) The works he had done for them. He went to redeem them, applied himself to it as a great work, went about it with solemnity, Elohim halerunt, dii ierunt—The gods went. As if there were the same consultation and concurrence of all the persons in the blessed Trinity, about the work of redemption, that there was about the work of creation, when God said, Let us make man. Whom they that were sent of God went to redeem; so the Chaldee, meaning, I suppose, Moses and Aaron. The redemption of Israel, as described here, was typical of our redemption by Christ, in that, [1.] They were redeemed from the nations and their gods; so are we from all iniquity, and all conformity to this present world; Christ came to save his people from their sins. [2.] They were redeemed to be a people unto God, purified and appropriated to himself, that he might make himself a great name, and do for them great things; the honour of God, and the eternal happiness of the saints, are the two things aimed at in their redemption. (2.) The covenant he had made with them, v. 24. It was, [1.] Mutual; "They to be a people to thee, and thou to be a God to them; all their interests consecrated to thee, and all thine attributes engaged for them." [2.] Immutable; "Thou hast confirmed them." He that makes the covenant makes it sure, and will make it good.

6. He concludes with humble petitions to God. (1.) He grounds his petitions upon the message which God had sent him; v. 27. Thou hast revealed this to thy servant; that is, "Thou hast of thine own good will given me the promise, that thou wilt build me a house, else I could never have found in my heart to pray such a prayer as this; I durst not have asked such great things, if I had not been directed and encouraged by thy promise to ask them; they are indeed too great for me to beg, but not too great for thee to give. Thy servant has found in his heart to pray this prayer;" so it is in the original, and the Septuagint. Many, when they go to pray, have their hearts to seek, but David's heart was found, that is, it was fixed; gathered in from its wanderings, and entirely engaged to the duty, and employed in it. That prayer which is found in the tongue only, will not please God; it must be found in the heart, that must be lifted up and poured out before God. My son, give God thy heart. (2.) He builds his faith, and hopes to speed, upon the fidelity of God's promise, v. 25. Thou art that God; thou art he, even that God; the Lord of hosts, and God of Israel; or, That God whose words are true, that God whom one may depend upon; and thou hast promised this goodness unto thy servant, which I am therefore bold to pray for. (3.) Thence he fetches the matter of his prayer, and refers himself to that, as the guide of his prayers.

[1.] He prays for the performance of his promise, v. 25. "Let the word be made good to me, on which thou hast caused me to hope, Ps. 119. 49. and do as thou hast said; I desire no more, and I expect no less; so full is the promise, and so firm." Thus we must turn God's promises into prayers, and then they shall be turned into performances; for, with God, saying and doing are not two things, as they often are with men; God will do as he hath said.

[2.] He prays for the glorifying of God's name, v. 26. Let thy name be magnified for ever; this ought to be the summary and centre of all our prayers, the Alpha and the Omega of them; begin with Hallowed be thy name, and end with Thine is the glory for ever. Whether I be magnified or no, let thy name be magnified. And he reckons that nothing magnifies God's name more than this, to say, with suitable affections, The Lord of hosts is the God over Israel. This bespeaks the God of Israel gloriously great, that he is the Lord of hosts; and this bespeaks the Lord of hosts gloriously good, that he is God over Israel; in both, let his name be magnified for ever: let all the creatures, and all the churches, give him the glory of these two. David desired the performance of God's promise for the honour, not of his own name, but of God's. Thus the son of David prayed, Father, glorify thy name, John, 12. 28. and ch. 17. 1. Glorify thy Son, that thy Son may also glorify thee.

[3.] He prays for his house, for to that the promise has special reference; First, That it might be happy, v. 29. Let it please thee to bless the house of thy servant, and again, with thy blessing; let the house of thy servant be truly and eternally blessed. Those whom thou blessest, are blessed indeed. The care of good men is very much concerning their families; and the best entail on their families is that of the blessing of God. The repetition of this request is not a vain repetition, but expressive of the value he had of the divine blessing, and his earnest desire of it, as all in all to the happiness of his family. Secondly, That the happiness of it might remain. Let it be established before thee, v. 26. Let it continue for ever before thee, v. 29. He prays, 1. That the entail of the crown might not be cut off, but remain in his family; that none of his might ever forfeit it, but that they might walk before God, and that would be their establishment. 2. That his kingdom might have its perfection and perpetuity in the kingdom of the Messiah. When Christ for ever sat down on the right hand of God, (Heb. 10. 12.) and received all possible assurance that his seed and throne shall be as the days of heaven, this prayer of David the son of Jesse for his seed was abundantly answered, that it might continue before God for ever. See Ps. 72. 17. The perpetuity of the Messiah's kingdom is the desire and faith of all good people.

CHAP. VIII.

David having sought first the kingdom of God and the righteousness thereof, settling the ark as soon as he was himself well settled, we are here told how all things were added to him. Here is an account, I. Of his conquests. He triumphed, 1. Over the Philistines, v. 1. 2. Over the Moabites, v. 1. 3. Over the king of Zobah, v. 3, 4. 4. Over the Syrians, v. 5, 8, 13. 5. Over the Edomites, v. 14. II. Of the presents that were brought him, and the wealth he got from the nations he subdued, which he dedicated to God, v. 9, 12. III. Of his court, the administration of his government, v. 15. and his chief officers, v. 16, 18. This gives us a general idea of the prosperity of David's reign.

1. AND after this it came to pass, that David smote the Philistines, and subdued them: and David took Gath out of the hand of the Philistines. 2. And he smote Moab, and measured them with a line, casting them down to the ground; even with two lines measured he to put to death, and with one full line to keep alive. And so the Moabites became David's servants, and brought gifts. 3. David smote also Hadadezer, the son of Rehob, king of Zobah, as he went to recover his border at the river Euphrates. 4. And David took from him a thousand chariots, and seven hundred horsemen, and twenty thousand footmen: and David houghed all the chariot-horses, but reserved of them for an hundred chariots. 5. And when the Syrians of Damascus came to succour Hadadezer king of Zobah, David slew of the Syrians two and twenty thousand men. 6. Then David put garrisons in Syria of Damascus: and the Syrians became servants to David, and brought gifts. And the LORD preserved David whithersoever he went. 7. And David took the shields of gold that were on the servants of Hadadezer, and brought them to Jerusalem. 8. And from Bethai, and from Berothai, cities of Hadadezer, king David took exceeding much brass.

God had given David rest from all his enemies that opposed him and made head against him; and he, having made a good use of that rest, has now commission given him to make war upon them, and to act offensively for the avenging of Israel's quarrels and the recovery of their rights; for as yet they were not in full possession of that country, which by the promise of God they were entitled to.

I. He quite subdued the Philistines, v. 1. They had attacked him when they thought him weak, ch. 5. 17. and went by the worse then; but when he found himself strong, he attacked them, and made himself master of their country. They had long been vexatious and oppressive to Israel: Saul got no ground against them, but David completed Israel's deliverance, which Samson had begun long before, Judg. 13. 5. Metheg-ammah was Gath, (the chief and royal city of the Philistines,) and the towns belonging to it, among which there was a constant garrison kept by the Philistines on the hill Ammah, (2 Sam. 2. 24.) which was Metheg, a bridle (so it signifies) or curb upon the people of Israel; this David took out of their hand, and used it as a curb upon them. Thus, when the strong man is disarmed, the armour wherein he trusted is taken from him, and used against him, Luke, 11. 22. And, after the long and frequent struggles which the saints have had with the powers of darkness, like Israel with the Philistines, the Son of David shall tread them all under their feet, and make the saints more than conquerors.

II. He smote the Moabites, and made them tributaries to Israel, v. 2. He divided the country into three parts; two of which he destroyed, casting down the strong-holds, and putting all to the sword; the third part he spared, to till the ground, and be servants to Israel. Dr. Lightfoot says, he laid them on the ground, and measured them with a cord, who should be slain, and who should live; and this is called, meting out the volley of Succoth, Ps. 60. 6. The Jews say, he used this severity with the Moabites, because that they had slain his parents, and brethren, whom he put under the protection of the king of Moab during his exile, 1 Sam. 22. 3, 4. He did it in justice, because they had been, and in policy, because, if left in their strength, they still would have been, dangerous enemies to the Israel of God. But observe, though it was necessary that two thirds should be cut off, yet the line that was to keep alive, though it was but one, is ordered to be a full line. Be sure to give that length enough; let the line of mercy be stretched to the utmost, in favorem vite—so as to favour life: acts of indemnity must be construed so as to enlarge the favour. Now Balaam's prophecy was fulfilled, A sceptre shall arise out of Israel, and shall smite the corners of Moab, to the utmost of which the fatal line extended, Numb. 24. 17. The Moabites continued tributaries to Israel till after the death of Ahab, 3 Kings, 3. 4, 5. then they rebelled and were never reduced.

III. He smote the Syrians, or Aramites: of them there were two distinct kingdoms, as we find them spoken of in the title of the 60th Psalm, Aram Naharaim, Syria of the rivers, whose head city was Damascus, (famed for its rivers, 2 Kings, 5. 12.) and Aram Zobah, which joined to it, but extended to Euphrates. These were the two northern crowns. 1. David began with the Syrians of Zobah, v. 3, 4. As he went to settle his border at the river Euphrates, (for so far the laud conveyed by the divine grant to Abraham and his seed did extend, Gen. 15. 18.) the king of Zobah opposed him, being himself possessed of those countries which belonged to Israel; but David routed his forces, and took his chariots and horsemen. The horsemen are here said to be 700, but 1 Chron. 18. 4. seven thousand. If they divided their horse by ten in a company, as it is probable they did, the captains and companies were 700, but the horsemen were 7000. David houghed the horses, cut the sinews of their hams, and so lamed them, and made them unserviceable, at least in war, God having forbidden them to multiply horses, Deut. 17. 16. David reserved only one hundred chariots, out of one thousand, for his own use; for he placed his strength, not in chariots or horses, but in the living God, Ps. 20. 7. and wrote it from his own observation, that a horse is a vain thing for safety, Ps. 33. 16, 17. 2. The Syrians of Damascus coming in to the relief of the king of Zobah, fell with him: 22,000 were slain in the field; v. 5. so that it was easy for David to make himself master of the country, and garrison it for himself, v. 6. The enemies of God's church, that think to secure themselves, will prove, in the end, to ruin themselves, by their confederacies with each other. Associate yourselves, and ye shall be broken in pieces, Isa. 8. 9.

In all these wars, (1.) David was protected. The Lord preserved him whithersoever he went. It seems, he went in person, and, in the cause of God and Israel, jeopardied his own life in the high places of the field; but God covered his head in the day of battle, which he often speaks of, in his psalms, to the glory of God. (2.) He was enriched. He took the shields of gold which the servants of Hadadezer had in their custody, v. 7. and much brass from several cities of Syria, v. 8. which he was entitled to, not only jure belli—by the uncontrollable right of the longest sword, (“Get it, and take it,”) but by commission from heaven, and the ancient entail of these countries on the seed of Abraham.

9. When Toi king of Hamath heard that David had smitten all the host of Hadadezer, 10. Then Toi sent Joram his son unto king David, to salute him, and to bless him, because he had fought against Hadadezer, and smitten him: for Hadadezer had wars with Toi: and Joram brought with him vessels of silver, and vessels of gold, and vessels of brass: 11. Which also king David did dedicate unto the LORD, with the silver and gold that he had dedicated of all nations which he subdued; 12. Of Syria, and of Moab, and of the children of Ammon, and of the Philistines, and of Amalek, and of the spoil of Hadadezer, son of Rehob, king of Zobah. 13. And David gat him a name when he returned from smiting of the Syrians in the valley of salt, being eighteen thousand men. 14. And he put garrisons in Edom; throughout all Edom put he garrisons, and all they of Edom became David's servants. And the LORD preserved David whithersoever he went.

Here is,

1. The court made to David by the king of Hamath, who, it seems, was at this time at war with the king of Zobah. He, hearing of David's success against his enemy, sent his own son ambassador to him, v. 9, 10. to congratulate him on his victory, to return him thanks for the favour he had done him, in breaking the power of one he was in fear of, and to beg his friendship; thus he not only secured but strengthened himself. And David lost nothing by taking this little prince under his protection, any more than the old Romans did by the like policy; for the wealth he had from the countries he conquered by way of spoil, he had from this by way of present or gratuity; Vessels of silver and gold. Better get by composition than by compulsion.

2. The offering David made to God of the spoils of the nations, and all the rich things that were brought him. He dedicated all to the Lord, v. 11, 12. This crowned all his victories, and made them far to outshine Alexander's, or Caesar's, that they sought their own glory, but he aimed at the glory of God. All the precious things he was master of were dedicated things; that is, they were designed for the building of the temple; and a good omen it was of kindness to the Gentiles in the fulness of time, and of the making of God's house a house of prayer for all people, that the temple was built of the spoils and presents of Gentile nations. In allusion to which, we find the kings of the earth bringing their glory and honour into the new Jerusalem, Rev. 21. 24. Their gods of gold David burnt, 2 Sam. 5. 21. but their vessels of gold he dedicated; thus, in the conquest of a soul, by the grace of the Son of David, what stands in opposition to God must be destroyed, every lust mortified and crucified, but what may glorify him must be dedicated, and the property of it altered; even the merchandise and the hire must be holiness to the Lord, Isa. 23. 18. the gain consecrated to the Lord of the whole earth, Mic. 4. 13. and then it is truly our own, and that most comfortably.

3. The reputation he got, in a particular manner, by his victory over the Syrians, and their allies the Edomites, who acted in conjunction with them; as appears by comparing the title of the 60th Psalm, which was penned on this occasion, with v. 13. he gat him a name, for all that conduct and courage which are the praise of a great and distinguished general. Something extraordinary, it is likely, there was in that action, which turned very much to his honour, yet he is careful to transfer the honour to God, as appears by the psalm he penned on this occasion, v. 12. It is through God that we do valiantly.

4. His success against the Edomites; they all became David's servants, v. 14. Now, and not till now, Isaac's blessing was accomplished, by which Jacob was made Esau's lord, Gen. 27. 37. . 40. and the Edomites continued long tributaries to the kings of Judah, as the Moabites were to the kings of Israel, till, in Joram's time, they revolted, 2 Chron. 21. 8. as Isaac had there foretold that Esau should, in process of time, break the yoke from off his neck. Thus David, by his conquests, (1.) Secured peace to his son, that he might have time to build the temple. And, (2.) Procured wealth for his son, that he might have wherewith to build it. God employs his servants variously; some in one employment, others in another; some in the spiritual battles, others in the spiritual buildings; and one prepares work for the other, that God may have the glory of all. All David's victories were typical of the success of the gospel against the kingdom of Satan, in which the Son of David rode forth, conquering and to conquer, and he shall reign, till he has brought down all opposing rule, principality, and power; and he has, as David had, v. 2. a line to kill, and a line to save; for the same gospel is to some a savour of life unto life, to others a savour of death unto death.

15. And David reigned over all Israel; and David executed judgment and justice unto all his people.

16. And Joab the son of Zerniah was over the host; and Jehoshaphat the son of Ahilud was recorder; 17. And Zadok the son of Abitub, and Ahimelech the son of Abiathar, were the priests; and Seraiah was the scribe; 18. And Benaiah the son of Jehoiada was over both the Cherethites and the Pelethites; and David's sons were chief rulers.

David was not so engaged in his wars abroad, as to neglect the administration of the government at home.

1. His care extended itself to all parts of his dominion. He reigned over all Israel, v. 15. not only he had a right to reign over all the tribes, but he did so; they were all safe under his protection, and shared in the fruits of his good government.

2. He did justice with an unbiassed unshaken hand; he executed judgment unto all his people; neither did wrong, nor denied or delayed right to any. It bespeaks, (1.) His industry, and close application to business; also his easiness of access, and readiness to admit all addresses and appeals made to him. All his people, even the meanest, and those too of the meanest tribes, were welcome to his council-board. (2.) His impartiality, and the equity of his proceedings, in administering justice; he never perverted justice for favour or affection, nor had respect of persons, in judgment. Herein he was a type of Christ, who was faithful and true, and who doth in righteousness both judge and make war, Rev. 19. 11. See Ps. 72. 1, 2.

3. He kept good order, and good officers, in his court. David being the first king that had an established government, (for Saul's reign was short and unsettled,) he had the modelling of the administration: in Saul's time, we read of no other great officer than Abner, that was captain of the host; but David instituted more officers. Here are, (1.) Two military officers; Joab that was general of the forces in the field, and Benaiah that was over the Cherethites and Pelethites, who were either the city trainbands, archers and slingers, so the Chaldee, or rather the life-guards, or standing force, that attended the king's person; the pretorian band, the militia. They were ready to do service at home, to assist in the administering of justice, and to preserve the public peace: we find them employed in proclaiming Solomon, 1 Kings, 1. 38. (2.) Two ecclesiastical officers; Zadok and Ahimelech were priests, that is, they were most employed in the priests' work under Abiathar, the high priest. (3.) Two civil officers; one that was recorder or remembrancer, to put the king in mind of business in its season; he was prime minister of state, yet not intrusted with the custody of the king's conscience, as they say of our lord chancellor, but only of the king's memory; let the king be put in mind of business, and he would do it himself. Another that was scribe, or secretary of state, that drew up public orders and dispatches, and recorded judgments given. Lastly, David's sons, as they grew up to be fit for business, were made chief rulers; they had places of honour and trust assigned them, either in the household, or in the camp, or in the courts of justice, according as their genius led them. They were chief about the king; so it is explained, 1 Chron. 15. 17. employed near him, that they might be under his eye. Our Lord Jesus has appointed officers in his kingdom, for his honour and the good of the community; when he ascended on high, he gave these gifts, Eph. 4. 8, 11. to every man his work, Mark, 13. 34. David made his sons chief rulers; but all believers, Christ's spiritual seed, are better preferred, for they are made to our God kings and priests, Rev. 1. 6.

CHAP. IX.

The only thing recorded in this chapter, is, the kindness David shewed to Jonathan's seed for his sake. I. The kind inquiry he made after the remains of the house of Saul, and his discovery of Mephibosheth. v. 1. . 4. II. The kind reception he gave to Mephibosheth, when he was brought to him. v. 5. . 8. III. The kind provision he made for him and his. v. 9. . 12.

1. AND David said, Is there yet any that is left of the house of Saul, that I may shew him kindness for Jonathan's sake? 2. And there was of the house of Saul a servant whose name was Ziba. And when they had called him unto David, the king said unto him, Art thou Ziba? And he said, Thy servant is he. 3. And the king said, Is there not yet any of the house of Saul, that I may shew the kindness of God unto him? And Ziba said unto the king, Jonathan hath yet a son, which is lame on his feet. 4. And the king said unto him, Where is he? And Ziba said unto the king, Behold, he is in the house of Machir, the son of Ammiel, in Lo-debar. 5. Then king David sent, and fetched him out of the house of Machir, the son of Ammiel, from Lo-debar. 6. Now when Mephibosheth, the son of Jonathan, the son of Saul, was come unto David, he fell on his face, and did reverence. And David said, Mephibosheth. And he answered, Behold thy servant! 7. And David said unto him, Fear not: for I will surely shew thee kindness for Jonathan thy father's sake, and will restore thee all the land of Saul thy father; and thou shalt eat bread at my table continually. 8. And he bowed himself, and said, What is thy servant, that thou shouldst look upon such a dead dog as I am?

Here is,

I. David's inquiry after the remains of the ruined house of Saul, v.1. This was a great while after his accession to the throne, for it should seem that Mephibosheth, who was but five years old when Saul died, had now a son born, v.12. David had too long forgotten his obligations to Jonathan, but now, at length, they are brought to his mind. It is good sometimes to bethink ourselves, whether there be any promises or engagements that we have neglected to make good; better do it late than never. The compendium which Paul gives us of the life of David is this, (Acts, 13. 36.) that he served his generation according to the will of God, that is, he was a man that made it his business to do good; witness this instance, where we may observe,

1. That he sought an opportunity to do good. He might perhaps have satisfied his conscience with the performance of his promise to Jonathan, if he had been only ready, upon request or application made to him by any of his seed, to help and succour them. But he does more, he inquires of those about him first, (v.1.) and when he met with a person that was likely to inform him, asked him particularly, "Is there any yet left of the house of Saul, that I may shew him kindness? v.3. Is there any, not only to whom I may do justice, (Numb. 5.8.) but to whom I may shew kindness?" Note, Good men should seek opportunities of doing good. The liberal deviseth liberal things, Isa. 32. 8. For the most proper objects of our kindness and charity are such as will not be frequently met with without inquiry. The most necessitous are the least clamorous.

2. Those he inquired after were the remains of the house of Saul, to whom he would shew kindness for Jonathan's sake; Is there any left of the house of Saul? Saul had a very numerous family, (1 Chron. 8. 33.) enough to replenish a country, and yet so emptied, that none of it appeared; but it was come to this inquiry, Is there any left? See how the providence of God can empty full families; see how the sin of man will do it! Saul's was a bloody house, no marvel it was thus reduced, ch. 21. 1. But though God visited the iniquity of the father upon the children, David would not. "Is there any left that I can shew kindness to, not for Saul's own sake, but for Jonathan's?"

(1.) Saul was David's sworn enemy, and yet he would shew kindness to his house with all his heart, and was forward to do it. He does not say, "Is there any left of the house of Saul, that I may find some way to take them off, and prevent them giving disturbance to me or my successor." It was against Abimelech's mind, that any one was left of the house of Gideon, (Judg. 9. 5.) and against Athaliah's mind, that any one was left of the seed royal; (2 Chron. 22. 10, 11.) those were usurped governments. David's needed no such vile supports; he was desirous to shew kindness to the house of Saul, not only because he trusted in God, and feared not what they could do unto him, but because he was of a charitable disposition, and forgave what they had done to him. Note, We must evidence the sincerity of our forgiving those that have been any way unjust or injurious to us, by being ready, as we have opportunity, to shew kindness both to them and their's. We must not only not avenge ourselves upon them, but we must love them, and do them good, (Matth. 5. 44.) and not be backward to do any office of love and goodwill to those that have done us many an injury, (1 Pet. 3. 9.) but contrariwise, blessing. This is the way to overcome evil, and to find mercy for ourselves and our's, when we or they need it.

(2.) Jonathan was David's sworn friend, and therefore he would shew kindness to his house. This teaches us, [1.] To be mindful of our covenant. The kindness we have promised, we must conscientiously perform, though it should not be claimed. God is faithful to us, let us not be unfaithful to one another. [2.] To be mindful of our friendships, our old friendships. Note, Kindness to our friends, even to them and their's, is one of the laws of our holy religion. He that has friends, must shew himself friendly, Prov. 18. 24. If Providence has raised us, and our friends and their families are brought low, yet we must not forget former acquaintance, but rather look upon that as giving us so much the fairer opportunity of being kind to them; then our friends have most need of us, and we are in the best capacity to help them. Though there be not a solemn league of friendship tying us to this constancy of love, yet there is a sacred law of friendship no less obliging, that to him that is in misery pity should be shewed by his friend; (Job, 6. 14.) A brother is born for adversity. Friendship obliges us to take cognizance of the families and surviving relations of those we have loved, who, when they left us, left behind them their bodies, their names, and their posterity, to be kind to.

3. The kindness he promised to shew them, he calls the kindness of God; not only great kindness, but, (1.) Kindness, in pursuance of the covenant that was between him and Jonathan, to which God was a Witness. See 1 Sam. 20. 42. (2.) Kindness, after God's example; for we must be merciful, as he is. He spares those whom he has advantage against, and so must we. Jonathan's request to David, was, (1 Sam. 20. 14.) "Shew me the kindness of the Lord, that I die not, and the same to my seed." The kindness of God is some greater instance of kindness than one can ordinarily expect from men. (3.) It is kindness done after a godly sort, and with an eye to God, and his honour and favour.

II. Information given him concerning Mephibosheth, the son of Jonathan. Ziba was an old retainer to Saul's family, and knew the state of it; he is sent for and examined, and acquaints the king that Jonathan's son was living, but lame, v. 3. How he came to be so, we read before, (ch. 4. 4.) and that he lived obscure, probably, among his mother's relations in Lo-debar, in Gilead, on the other side Jordan, where he was forgotten, as a dead man out of mind, but bore it the more easily, because he could remember little of the honour he fell from.

III. The bringing of him to court. The king sent (Ziba, it is likely) to bring him up to Jerusalem with all convenient speed, v. 5. Thus he eased Machir of his trouble, and, perhaps, recompensed him for what he had laid out on Mephibosheth's account. This Machir appears to have been a very generous free-hearted man, and to have entertained Mephibosheth, not out of any disaffection to David, or his government, but in compassion to the reduced son of a prince, for afterward we find him kind to David himself, when he fled from Absalom; he is named (ch. 17. 27.) among those that furnished the king with what he wanted at Mahanaim; though when David sent for Mephibosheth from him, he little thought that the time would come when he himself would gladly be beholden to him; and perhaps Machir was then the more ready to help David, in recompence for his kindness to Mephibosheth; therefore we should be forward to give, because we know not but we ourselves may sometime be in want; (Eccl. 11. 2.) And he that watereth shall be watered also himself. Prov. 11. 25.

Now, I. Mephibosheth presents himself to David with all the respect that was owing to his character. Lame as he was, he fell on his face, and did reverence, v. 6. David had thus made his honours to Mephibosheth's father, Jonathan, when he was next to the throne, 1 Sam. 20. 41. he bowed himself to him three times; and now Mephibosheth, in like manner, addresses him, when affairs are so completely reversed. Those who, when they are in inferior relations, shew respect, when they come to be advanced, shall have respect shewed them.

2. David received him with all the kindness that could be. (1.) He spoke to him as one surprised, but pleased, to see him. "Mephibosheth! Why, is there such a man living?" He remembered his name, for it is probable that he was born about the time of the intimacy between him and Jonathan. (2.) He bade him not be afraid. Fear not, v. 7. It is probable that the sight of David put him into some confusion; to free him from which, he assures him that he sent for him, not out of any jealousy he had of him, or with any bad design upon him, but to shew him kindness. Great men should not take a pleasure in the timorous approaches of their inferiors, (for the great God does not,) but should encourage them. (3.) He gives him, by grant from the crown, all the land of Saul his father, that is, his paternal estate, which was forfeited by Ish-bosheth's rebellion, and added to his own revenue. This was a real favour, and more than giving him a kind word. True friendship will be generous. (4.) Though he had thus given him a good estate, sufficient to maintain him, yet, for Jonathan's sake, (whom perhaps he saw some resemblance of in Mephibosheth's face,) he will take him to be a constant guest at his own table, where he will not only be comfortably fed, but have company and attendance suitable to his birth and quality. Though Mephibosheth was lame and unsightly, and does not appear to have any great fitness for business, yet, for his good father's sake, David will take him to be one of his family.

3. Mephibosheth accepts this kindness with great humility and self-abasement. He was none of those that take every favour as a debt, and think every thing too little that their friends do for them; but, on the contrary, speaks as one amazed at the grants David made him, v. 8. What is thy servant, that thou shouldest look upon such a dead dog as I am? How does he vilify himself! Though the son of a prince, and the grandson of a king, yet, his family being under guilt and wrath, and himself poor and lame, he calls himself a dead dog before David. Note, It is good to have the heart humble under humbling providences: if, when Divine Providence brings our condition down, divine grace brings our spirits down with it, we shall be easy. And those who thus humble themselves, shall be exalted. How does he magnify David's kindness! It had been easy to lessen it, if he had been so disposed. Had David restored him his father's estate, it was but giving him his own. Did he take him to his table? That was policy, that he might have an eye upon him. But Mephibosheth thinks all kind that David said and did, and himself less than the least of his favours. See 1 Sam. 13. 18.

9. Then the king called to Ziba, Saul's servant, and said unto him, I have given unto thy master's son all that pertained to Saul and to all his house.

10. Thou therefore, and thy sons, and thy servants, shall till the land for him, and thou shalt bring in the fruits, that thy master's son may have food to eat; but Mephibosheth thy master's son shall eat bread alway at my table. Now Ziba had fifteen sons and twenty servants. 11. Then said Ziba unto the king, According to all that my lord the king hath commanded his servant, so shall thy servant do. As for Mephibosheth, said the king, he shall eat at my table, as one of the king's sons. 12. And Mephibosheth had a young son, whose name was Micha. And all that dwelt in the house of Ziba were servants unto Mephibosheth. 13. So Mephibosheth dwelt in Jerusalem: for he did eat continually at the king's table; and was lame on both his feet.

The matter is here settled concerning Mephibosheth.

1. This grant of his father's estate is confirmed to him, and Ziba called to be a witness to it, v. 9. and, it should seem, Saul had a very good estate, for his father was a mighty man of substance, 1 Sam. 9. 1. and he had fields and vineyards to bestow, 1 Sam. 22. 7. Be it ever so much, Mephibosheth is now master of it all.

2. The management of the estate is committed to Ziba, who knew what it was, and how to make the most of it, whom, having been his father's servant, he might confide in, and who, having a numerous family of sons and servants, had hands sufficient to be employed about it, v. 10. Thus Mephibosheth is made very easy, having a good estate without care, and is in a fair way of being very rich; having much coming in, and little occasion to spend, himself being kept at David's table. Yet he must have food to eat beside his own bread, provisions for his son and servants, and Ziba's sons and servants would come in for their share of his revenue; for which reason, perhaps, their number is here mentioned, fifteen sons and twenty servants, who would require nearly all there was; for as goods are increased, they are increased that eat them, and what good has the owner thereof, save the beholding of them with his eyes? Eccl. 5. 11. All that dwell in the house of Ziba were servants to Mephibosheth, v. 12. that is, they all lived upon him, and made a prey of his estate, under pretence of waiting on him, and doing him service. The Jews have a saying, "He that multiplies servants, multiplies thieves." Ziba is now pleased, for he loves wealth, and will have abundance: "As the king has commanded, so shall thy servant do, v. 11. let me alone with the estate: and as for Mephibosheth," (they seem to be Ziba's words,) "if the king please, he need not trouble the court, he shall eat at my table, and be as well treated as one of the king's sons." But David will have him to his own table, and Mephibosheth is as well pleased with his post, as Ziba with his: how unfaithful Ziba was to him, we shall find afterward, ch. 16. 3.

Now, because David was a type of Christ, his Lord and Son, his Root and Offspring, let his kindness to Mephibosheth serve to illustrate the kindness and love of God our Saviour toward fallen man, which yet he was under no obligation to, as David was to Jonathan. Man was convicted of rebellion against God, and, like Saul's house, under a sentence of rejection from him, was not only brought low and impoverished, but lame and impotent, made so by the fall: the Son of God inquires after this degenerate race, that inquired not after him; comes to seek and save them. To those of them that humble themselves before him, and commit themselves to him, he restores the forfeited inheritance, he entitles them to a better paradise than that which Adam lost, and takes them into communion with himself, sets them with his children at his table, and feasts them with the dainties of heaven. Lord, what is man, that thou shouldest thus magnify him!

CHAP. X.

This chapter gives us an account of a war David had with the Ammonites, and the Syrians their allies, with the occasion and success of it. I. David sends a friendly embassy to Hanun king of the Ammonites, v. 1, 2. II. He, upon a base surmise that it was ill-intended, abused David's ambassadors, v. 3, 4. III. David resenting it, v. 5. the Ammonites prepared for war against him, v. 6. IV. David carries the war into their own country, sends Joab and Abishai against them, who address themselves to the battle with a great deal of conduct and bravery, v. 7, 12. V. The Ammonites, and the Syrians their allies, were totally routed, v. 13, 14. VI. The forces of the Syrians, which rallied again, were a second time defeated, v. 15, 19. Thus did David advance his own reputation for gratitude, in returning kindnesses; and justice, in repaying injuries.

1. AND it came to pass after this, that the king of the children of Ammon died, and Hanun his son reigned in his stead. 2. Then said David, I will shew kindness unto Hanun the son of Nahash, as his father shewed kindness unto me. And David sent to comfort him by the hand of his servants for his father. And David's servants came into the land of the children of Ammon. 3. And the princes of the children of Ammon said unto Hanun their lord, Thinkest thou that David doth honour thy father, that he hath sent comforters unto thee? hath not David rather sent his servants unto thee, to search the city, and to spy it out, and to overthrow it? 4. Wherefore Hanun took David's servants, and shaved off the one half of their beards, and cut off their garments in the middle, even to their buttocks, and sent them away. 5. When they told it unto David, he sent to meet them, because the men were greatly ashamed: and the king said, Tarry at Jericho until your beards be grown, and then return.

Here is,

I. The great respect David paid to his neighbour, the king of the Ammonites, v. 1, 2. 1. The inducement to it, was some kindness he had formerly received from Nahash the deceased king. He shewed kindness to me, says David, v. 2. and therefore (having lately had satisfaction in shewing kindness to Mephibosheth, for his father's sake) he resolves to shew kindness to his son, and to keep up a friendly correspondence with him. Thus the pleasure of doing one kind and generous action should excite us to another. Nahash had been an enemy to Israel, a cruel enemy, 1 Sam. 11. 2. and yet had shewed kindness to David, perhaps only in contradiction to Saul, who was unkind to him: however, if David received kindness, he is not nice in examining the grounds and principles of it, but resolves gratefully to return it. If a Pharisee give alms in pride, though God will not reward it, yet he that receives the alms ought to return thanks for it: God knows the heart, but we do not. 2. The particular instance of respect, was, sending an embassy to condole with him on his father's death, as is common among princes in alliance with each other. David sent to comfort him. Note, It is a comfort to children, when their parents are dead, to find that their parents' friends are their's, and that they intend to keep up acquaintance with them. It is a comfort to mourners, to find that there are those who mourn with them, are sensible of their loss, and share with them in it. It is a comfort to those who are honouring the memory of their deceased relations, to find there are others who likewise honour it, and had a value for those they valued.

II. The great affront which Hanun the king of the Ammonites put upon David in his ambassadors. 1. He hearkened to the spiteful suggestions of his princes, who insinuated that David's ambassadors, under pretence of being comforters, were sent as spies, v. 3. False men are ready to think others as false as themselves; and they that bear ill-will to their neighbours are resolved not to believe that their neighbours bear any good-will to them. They would not thus have imagined that David dissembled, but that they were conscious to themselves that they could have dissembled, to serve a turn. Ill-founded suspicion argues a bad mind. Bishop Patrick's note on this, is, that there is nothing so well meant, but it may be ill-interpreted, and is wont to be so by men who love nobody but themselves. Men of the greatest honour and virtue must not think it strange if they be thus misrepresented. Charity thinketh no evil. 2. Entertaining this vile suggestion, he basely abused David's ambassadors, like a man of a sordid villanous spirit, that was fitter to rake a kennel than to wear a crown. If he had any reason to suspect that David's messengers came on a bad design, he had done prudently enough to be upon the reserve with them, and to dismiss them as soon as he could; but it is plain he only sought an occasion to put the utmost disgrace he could upon them, out of an antipathy to their king and country. They were themselves men of honour, and much more so, as they represented the prince that sent them; they and their reputation were under the special protection of the law of nations; they put a confidence in the Ammonites, and came among them unarmed; yet Hanun used them like rogues and vagabonds, and worse; shaved off the one half of their beards, and cut off their garments in the midst, to expose them to the contempt and ridicule of his servants, that they might make sport with them, and that they might seem vile.

III. David's tender concern for his servants that were thus abused. He sent to meet them, and to let them know how much he interested himself in their quarrel, and how soon he would avenge it, and directed them to stay at Jericho, a private place, where they would not have occasion to come into company, till that half of their beards, which was shaved off, was grown to such a length that the other half might be decently cut to it, v. 5. The Jews wore their beards long, reckoning it an honour to appear aged and grave; and therefore it was not fit that persons of their rank and figure should appear at court unlike their neighbours. Change of raiment, it is likely, they had with them, to put on, instead of those which were cut off; but the loss of their beards would not be so soon repaired; yet, in time, those would grow again, and all would be well. Let us learn not to lay too much to heart unjust reproaches; after a while, they will wear off of themselves, and turn only to the shame of their authors, while the injured reputation in a little time grows again, as these beards did. God will bring forth thy righteousness as a light, therefore wait patiently for him, Ps. 37. 6, 7.

Some have thought that David, in the indignity he received from the king of Ammon, was but well enough served for courting and complimenting that pagan prince, whom he knew to be an inveterate enemy to Israel, and might now remember how, when he would have put out the right eyes of the men of Jabesh-gilead, he designed that, as he did this, for a reproach upon all Israel, 1 Sam. 11. 2. What better usage could he expect from such a spiteful family and people? Why should he covet the friendship of a people, which Israel must have so little to do with, as that an Ammonite might not enter into the congregation of the Lord, even to the tenth generation, Deut. 23. 3.

6. And when the children of Ammon saw that they stank before David, the children of Ammon sent and hired the Syrians of Beth-rehob, and the Syrians of Zoba, twenty thousand footmen, and of king Maacah a thousand men, and of Ish-tob twelve thousand men. 7. And when David heard of it, he sent Joab, and all the host of the mighty men. 8. And the children of Ammon came out, and put the battle in array at the entering in of the gate: and the Syrians of Zoba, and of Rehob, and Ish-tob, and Maacah, were by themselves in the field. 9. When Joab saw that the front of the battle was against him before and behind, he chose of all the choice men of Israel, and put them in array against the Syrians: 10. And the rest of the people he delivered into the hand of Abishai his brother, that he might put them in array against the children of Ammon. 11. And he said, If the Syrians be too strong for me, then thou shalt help me: but if the children of Ammon be too strong for thee, then I will come and help thee. 12. Be of good courage, and let us play the men for our people, and for the cities of our God: and the LORD do that which seemeth him good. 13. And Joab drew nigh, and the people that were with him, unto the battle against the Syrians: and they fled before him. 14. And when the children of Ammon saw that the Syrians were fled, then fled they also before Abishai, and entered into the city. So Joab returned from the children of Ammon, and came to Jerusalem.

Here is,

I. The preparation which the Ammonites make for war, v. 6. They saw they had made themselves very odious to David, and obnoxious to his just displeasure; this they might easily foresee, when they abused his ambassadors, which was no other than a challenge to war, and a bold defiance of him. Yet, it seems, they had not considered how unable they were, with their thousands, to meet his; for, now they found themselves an unequal match, and were forced to hire forces of other nations into their service. Thus sinners daringly provoke God, and expose themselves to his wrath, and never consider that he is stronger than they, 1 Cor. 10. 22. The Ammonites gave the affront first, and they were the first that raised forces to justify it. Had they humbled themselves, and begged David's pardon, probably an honorary satisfaction might have atoned for the offence. But when they were thus desperately resolved to stand by what they had done, they courted their own ruin.

II. The speedy descent which David's forces made upon them, v. 7. When David heard of their military preparations, he sent Joab with a great army to attack them, v. 7. They that are in war with the Son of David, not only give the provocation, but begin the war; for he waits to be gracious, but they strengthen themselves against him, and therefore, if they turn not, he will whet his sword, Ps. 7. 12. God has forces to send against those that set his wrath at defiance, Isa. 5. 19. which will convince them, when it is too late, that none ever hardened his heart against God, and prospered. It was David's prudence to carry the war into their own country, and fight them at the entering in of the gate of their capital city, Rabbah, as some think, or Medeba, a city in their borders, before which they pitched to guard their coast, 1 Chron. 19. 7. Such are the terrors and desolations of war, that every good prince will, in love to his people, keep it, as much as may be, at a distance from them.

III. Preparations made on both sides for an engagement. 1. The enemy disposed themselves into two bodies, one of Ammonites, which, being their own, were posted at the gate of the city; the other of Syrians, whom they had taken into their pay, and who were therefore posted at a distance in the field, to charge the forces of Israel in the flank or rear, while the Ammonites charged them in the front, v. 8. 2. Joab, like a wise general, was soon aware of the design, and accordingly divided his forces: the choicest men he took under his own command, to fight the Syrians, whom, probably, he knew to be the better soldiers, and, being hired men, better versed in the arts of war, v. 9. The rest of the forces he put under the command of Abishai his brother, to engage the Ammonites, v. 10. It should seem, Joab found the enemy so well prepared to receive them, that his conduct and courage were never so tried as now.

IV. Joab's speech before the battle, v. 11, 12. It is not long, but pertinent, and brave. 1. He prudently conceals the matter with Abishai his brother, that the dividing of the forces might not be the weakening of them; but that, which part soever was borne hard upon, the other should come in to its assistance. He supposes the worst, that one of them should be obliged to give back; and, in that case, upon a signal given, the other should send a detachment to relieve it. Note, Mutual helpfulness is brotherly duty. If occasion be, thou shalt help me, and I will help thee.

Christ's soldiers should thus strengthen one another's hands in their spiritual warfare. The strong must succour and help the weak. They that through grace are conquerors over temptation, must counsel, and comfort, and pray for, those that are tempted; When thou art converted, strengthen thy brethren, Luke, 22. 32. The members of the natural body help one another, 1 Cor. 12. 21. 2. He bravely encourages himself, and his brother, and the rest of the officers and soldiers, to do their utmost. Great dangers put an edge upon true courage. When Joab saw the front of the battle was against him, both before and behind, instead of giving orders to make an honourable retreat, he animates his men to charge so much the more furiously; Be of good courage, and let us play the men, not for pay and preferment, for honour and fame, but for our people, and for the cities of our God; for the public safety and welfare, in which the glory of God is so much interested; God and our country, was the word. "Let us be valiant, from a principle of love to Israel, that are our people, descended from the same stock, for whom we are employed, and in whose peace we shall have peace; and from a principle of love to God, for they are his cities that we are fighting in the defence of." The relation which any person or thing stands in to God, should endear it to us, and engage us to do our utmost in its service. 3. He piously leaves the issue with God: "When we have done our part, according to the duty of our place, let the Lord do that which seemeth him good." Let nothing be wanting in us, whatever the success be; let God's work be done by us, and then God's will be done concerning us. When we make conscience of doing our duty, we may, with the greatest satisfaction, leave the event with God; not thinking that our valour binds him to prosper us, but that still he may do as he pleases, yet hoping for his salvation in his own way and time.

V. The victory Joab obtained over the confederate forces of Syria and Ammon, v. 13, 14. He provided for the worst, and put the case that the Syrians or Ammonites might prove too strong for him, v. 11. but he proved too strong for them both. We do not hinder our success by preparing for disappointment. The Syrians were first routed by Joab, and then the Ammonites by Abishai; the latter seem not to have fought at all, but, upon the retreat of the Syrians, to have fled into the city. It is a temptation to soldiers to fly, when they have a city at their backs to fly to. It is one thing when men may either fight or fly, and another thing when they must either fight or die.

15. And when the Syrians saw that they were smitten before Israel, they gathered themselves together. 16. And Hadarezer sent, and brought out the Syrians that were beyond the river: and they came to Helam; and Shobach the captain of the host of Hadarezer went before them. 17. And when it was told David, he gathered all Israel together, and passed over Jordan, and came to Helam. And the Syrians set themselves in array against David, and fought with him. 18. And the Syrians fled before Israel; and David slew the men of seven hundred chariots of the Syrians, and forty thousand horsemen, and smote Shobach the captain of their host, who died there. 19. And when all the kings that were servants to Hadarezer saw that they were smitten before Israel, they made peace with Israel, and served them. So the Syrians feared to help the children of Ammon any more.

Here is,

1. A new attempt of the Syrians to recover their lost honour, and to check the progress of David's victorious arms. The forces, that were lately dispersed, rallied again, and gathered themselves together, v. 15. Even the baffled cause will make head as long as there is any life in it; the enemies of the Son of David do so, Matth. 22. 34. Rev. 19. 19. These, being conscious of their insufficiency, called in the aid of their allies and dependencies on the other side the river, v. 16. and, being thus recruited, they hoped to make their part good against Israel, but they knew not the thoughts of the Lord, for he gathered them as sheaves into the floor; see Mic. 4. 11. . . 13.

2. The defeat of this attempt by the vigilance and valour of David, who, upon notice of their design, resolved not to stay till they attacked him, but went in person at the head of his army over Jordan, v. 17. and, in a pitched battle, routed the Syrians, v. 18. slew 7000 men, who belonged to 700 chariots, and 40,000 other soldiers, horse and foot, as appears by comparing 1 Chron. 19. 18. Their general was killed in the battle, and David came home in triumph, no doubt.

3. The consequence of this victory over the Syrians. (1.) David gained several tributaries, v. 19. The kings, or petty princes, that had been subject to Hadarezer, when they saw how powerful David was, very wisely made peace with Israel, whom they found they could not make war with, and served them who were able to give them protection. Thus the promise made to Abraham, Gen. 15. 18. and repeated to Joshua, ch. 1. 4. that the borders of Israel should extend to the river Euphrates, was performed at length. (2.) The Ammonites lost their old allies. The Syrians feared to help the children of Ammon, not because they had an unrighteous cause, (justifying a crime which was a breach of the law of nations,) but because they found it was an unsuccessful cause. It is dangerous helping those that have God against them; for when they fall, their helpers will fall with them.

Jesus Christ, the Son of David, sent his ambassadors, his apostles and ministers, after all his servants the prophets, to the Jewish church and nation: but they treated them shamefully, as Hannan did David's ambassadors, mocked them, abused them, slew them: and this was it that filled the measure of their iniquity, and brought upon them ruin without remedy, Matth. 21. 35, 41.—22. 7. compare 2 Chron. 36. 16. for Christ takes the affronts and injuries done to his ministers as done to himself, and will avenge them accordingly.

CHAP. XI.

What David said of the mournful report of Saul's death, may more fitly be applied to the sad story of this chapter, the adultery and murder David was guilty of—Tell it not in Gath, publish it not in the streets of Askelon. We wish we could draw a veil over it, and that it might never be known, might never be said, that David did such things as are here recorded of him; but it cannot, it must not, be concealed: the scripture is faithful in relating the faults even of those whom it most applauds, which is an instance of the sincerity of the penmen, and an evidence that it was not written to serve any party: and even such stories as these were written for our learning, that he that thinks he stands, may take heed lest he fall; and that others' harms may be our warnings. Many, no doubt, have been emboldened to sin, and hardened in it, by this story, and to them it is a savour of death unto death; but many have by it been awakened to a holy jealousy over themselves, and constant watchfulness against sin, and to them it is a savour of life unto life. They are very great sins, and greatly aggravated, which here we find David guilty of. I. He committed adultery with Bath-sheba, the wife of Uriah, v. 1. 5. II. He endeavoured to father the spurious brood upon Uriah, v. 6. 13. III. When that project failed, he plotted the death of Uriah by the sword of the children of Ammon, and effected it, v. 14. 25. IV. He married Bath-sheba, v. 26, 27. Is this David? Is this the man after God's own heart? How is his behaviour changed, worse than it was before Ahimelech! How is this gold become dim! Let him that readeth, understand what the best of men are, when God leaves them to themselves.

1. AND it came to pass, after the year was expired, at the time when kings go forth to battle, that David sent Joab, and his servants with him, and all Israel; and they destroyed the children of Ammon, and besieged Rabbah. But David tarried still at Jerusalem. 2. And it came to pass in an evening-tide, that David arose from off his bed, and walked upon the roof of the king's house: and from the roof he saw a woman washing herself; and the woman was very beautiful to look upon. 3. And David sent and inquired after the woman. And one said, Is not this Bath-sheba, the daughter of Eliam, the wife of Uriah the Hittite? 4. And David sent messengers, and took her; and she came in unto him, and he lay with her; for she was purified from her uncleanness: and she returned unto her house. 5. And the woman conceived, and sent and told David, and said, I am with child.

Here is,

1. David's glory, in pursuing the war against the Ammonites, v. 1. We cannot take that pleasure in viewing this great action which hitherto we have taken in observing David's achievements, because the beauty of it was stained and sullied by sin; otherwise we might take notice of David's wisdom and bravery in following his blow. Having routed the army of the Ammonites in the field, as soon as ever the season of the year permitted, he sent more forces to face the country, and further to avenge the quarrel of his ambassadors. Rabbah, their metropolis, made a stand, and held out a great while; that city Joab laid close siege to, and it was at the time of that siege that David fell into this sin.

II. David's shame, in being himself conquered, and led captive, by his own lust. The sin he was guilty of was adultery, against the letter of the seventh commandment, and (in the judgment of the patriarchal age) a heinous crime, and an iniquity to be punished by the Judges, Job, 31. 11. a sin which takes away the heart, and gets a man a wound and dishonour, more than any other, and the reproach of it is not wiped away.

1. Observe the occasions of this sin, which led to it.

(1.) Neglect of his business. When he should have been abroad with his army in the field, fighting the battles of the Lord, he devolved the care upon others, and he himself tarried still at Jerusalem, v. 1. To the war with the Syrians David went in person, ch. 10. 17. Had he been now at his post at the head of his forces, he had been out of the way of this temptation. When we are out of the way of our duty, we are in temptation.

(2.) Love of ease, and the indulgence of a slothful temper. He came off his bed at evening-tide, v. 2. there he had dozed away the afternoon in idleness, which he should have spent in some exercise for his own improvement, or the good of others. He used to pray, not only morning and evening, but at noon, in the day of his trouble: it is to be feared he had, this noon, omitted it. Idleness gives great advantage to the tempter. Standing waters gather filth. The bed of sloth oft proves the bed of lust.

(3.) A wandering eye. He saw a woman washing herself, probably from some ceremonial pollution, according to the law. The sin came in at the eye, as Eve's did. Perhaps, he sought to see her; at least, he did not practise according to his own prayer, Turn away mine eyes from beholding vanity; and his son's caution in a like case, Look not thou on the wine when it is red. Either he had not, like Job, made a covenant with his eyes, or, at this time, he had forgotten it.

2. The steps of the sin. When he saw her, lust immediately conceived, and, (1.) He inquired who she was, v. 3. perhaps, intending only, if she were unmarried, to take her to wife, as he had taken several; but if she were a wife, having no design upon her. (2.) The corrupt desire growing more violent; though he was told she was a wife, and whose wife she was, yet he sent messengers for her, and then it may be intended only to please himself with her company and conversation. But, (3.) When she came, he lay with her, she too easily consenting, because he was a great man, and famed for his goodness too; surely (thinks she) that can be no sin which such a man as David is the mover of. See how the way of sin is down-hill; when men begin to do evil, they cannot soon stop themselves. The beginning of lust, as of strife, is like the letting forth of water; it is therefore wisdom to leave it off before it be meddled with. The foolish fly fires her wings, and fools away her life at last, by playing about the candle.

3. The aggravations of the sin. (1.) He was now in years, fifty at least, some think more, when those lusts which are more properly youthful, one would think, should not have been violent in him. (2.) He had many wives and concubines of his own; this is insisted on, ch. 12. 8. (3.) Uriah, whom he wronged, was one of his own worthies; a person of honour and virtue, one that was now abroad in his service, jeoparding his life in the high places of the field, for the honour and safety of him and his kingdom, where he himself should have been. (4.) Bath-sheba, whom he debauched, was a lady of good reputation, and, till she was drawn by him and his influence into this wickedness, no doubt, had preserved her purity: little did she think that ever she could have done so bad a thing, as to forsake the guide of her youth, and forget the covenant of her God; nor perhaps could any one in the world, but David, have prevailed against her. The adulterer not only wrongs and ruins his own soul, but, as much as he can, another's soul too. (5.) David was a king, whom God hath intrusted with the sword of justice, and the execution of the law upon other criminals, particularly upon adulterers, who were, by the law, to be put to death; for him therefore to be guilty of those crimes himself, was to make himself a pattern, when he should have been a terror, to evil doers. With what face could he rebuke or punish that in others, which he was conscious to himself of being guilty of? See Rom. 2. 22.

Much more might be said to aggravate the sin; and I can think but of one excuse for it, which is, that it was done but once, it was far from being his practice; it was by the surprise of a temptation that he was drawn into it. He was none of those of whom the prophet complains, that they were as fed horses, weighing every one after his neighbour's wife, Jer. 5. 8. but this once God left him to himself, as he did Hezekiah, that he might know what was in his heart, 2 Chron. 32. 31. Had he been told of it before, he would have said, as Hazael, What! Is thy servant a dog? But by this instance we are taught what need we have to pray every day, Father, in heaven, lead us not into temptation, and to watch, that we enter not into it.

6. And David sent to Joab, saying, Send me Uriah the Hittite. And Joab sent Uriah to David. 7. And when Uriah was come unto him, David demanded of him how Joab did, and how the people did, and how the war prospered. 8. And David said to Uriah, Go down to thy house, and wash thy feet. And Uriah departed out of the king's house, and there followed him a mess of meat from the king. 9. But Uriah slept at the door of the king's house with all the servants of his lord, and went not down to his house. 10. And when they had told David, saying, Uriah went not down unto his house, David said unto Uriah, Camest thou not from thy journey? why then didst thou not go down unto thine house? 11. And Uriah said unto David, The ark, and Israel, and Judah, abide in tents: and my lord Joab, and the servants of my lord, are encamped in the open fields; shall I then go into mine house, to eat and to drink, and to lie with my wife? As thou livest, and as thy soul liveth, I will not do this thing. 12. And David said to Uriah, Tarry here to-day also, and to-morrow

I will let thee depart. So Uriah abode in Jerusalem that day, and the morrow. 13. And when David had called him, he did eat and drink before him; and he made him drunk: and at even he went out to lie on his bed with the servants of his lord, but went not down to his house.

Uriah, we may suppose, had now been absent from his wife some weeks, making the campaign in the country of the Ammonites, and not intending to return till the end of it: the situation of his wife would bring to light the hidden works of darkness; and when Uriah, at his return, should find how he had been abused, and by whom, it might well be expected, 1. That he would prosecute his wife, according to law, and have her stoned to death; for jealousy is the rage of a man, especially a man of honour; and he that is thus injured will not spare in the day of vengeance, Prov. 6. 34. This Bath-sheba was apprehensive of, when she sent to let David know she was with child, intimating that he was concerned to protect her, which, it is likely, if he had not promised her so to do, (so wretchedly abusing his royal power,) she would not have consented to him. Hope of impunity is a great encouragement to iniquity. 2. It might also be expected, that, since he could not prosecute David by law for an offence of this nature, he would take his revenge another way, and raise a rebellion against him. There have been instances of kings, who, by provocations of this nature given to some of their powerful subjects, have lost their crowns.

To prevent this double mischief, David endeavours to father the child, which should be born, upon Uriah himself, and therefore sends for him home, to stay a night or two in his own house. Observe,

I. How the plot was laid. Uriah must come home from the army, under pretence of bringing David an account how the war prospered, and how they went on with the siege of Rabbah, v. 7. Thus does he pretend a more than ordinary concern for his army, when that was at present the least thing in his thoughts; if he had not had another turn to serve, an express, of much less figure than Uriah, might have sufficed to bring him a report of the state of the war. David, having had as much conference with Uriah as he thought requisite to cover the design, sent him to his house, and, that he might be the more pleasant there, sent a dish of meat for the entertainment of himself and his wife, v. 8. When that project failed the first night, and Uriah, being weary of his journey, and more desirous of sleep than meat, lay all night in the guard-chamber, the next night he made him drunk, v. 13. or made him merry, tempted him to drink more than was fit, that he might forget his vow, v. 11. and might be disposed to go home to his own bed; to which, perhaps, if David could have made him dead drunk, he would have ordered him to be carried. It is a very wicked thing, upon any design whatsoever, to make a person drunk; Woe to him that doth so, Hab. 2. 15, 16. God will put into their hands a cup of trembling, who put into the hands of others the cup of drunkenness. Robbing a man of his reason, is worse than robbing him of his money; and drawing him into sin, worse than drawing him into any trouble whatsoever. Every good man, especially every magistrate, should endeavour to prevent this sin, by admonishing, restraining, and denying, the glass to those whom they see falling into excess; but to further it, is to do the Devil's work, to officiate as factor for him.

II. How this plot was defeated by Uriah's firm resolution not to lie in his own bed: both nights he slept with the life-guard, and went not down to his house, though, it is probable, his wife pressed him to do it as much as David, v. 9. 12. Now, 1. Some think he suspected what was done, being informed of his wife's attendance at court, and therefore he would not go near her. But if he had had any suspicion of that kind, surely he would have opened the letter that David sent by him to Joab. 2. Whether he suspected any thing or no, Providence put this resolution into his heart, and kept him to it, for the discovering of David's sin, and that the baffling of his design to conceal it might awaken David's conscience to confess it, and repent of it. 3. The reason he gave to David for this strange instance of self-denial and mortification was very brave, v. 11. That, while the army was encamped in the field, he would not lie at ease in his own house. The ark is in a tent, whether at home, in the tent David had pitched for it, or abroad, with Joab in the camp, is not certain. "Joab, and all the mighty men of Israel lie hard and uneasy, and much exposed to the weather, and to the enemy; and shall I go take my ease and pleasure at my own house?" No, he protests he will not do it. Now, (1.) This was in itself a generous resolution, and shews Uriah to be a man of a public spirit, bold and hardy, and mortified to the delights of sense. In times of public difficulty and danger, it does not become us to repose ourselves in security, or roll ourselves in pleasure; or, with the king and Haman, to sit down to drink, when the city Shushan was perplexed, Esth. 3. 15. We should voluntarily endure hardness, when the church of God is constrained to endure it. (2.) It might have been of use to awaken David's conscience, and make his heart to smite him for what he had done, [1.] That he had basely abused so brave a man as Uriah was, a man so heartily concerned for him and his kingdom, and that acted for him and it with so much vigour. [2.] That he was himself so unlike him. The consideration of the public hardships and hazards kept Uriah from lawful pleasures, yet could not keep David, though more nearly interested, from unlawful ones. Uriah's severity to himself should have shamed David for his indulgence of himself. The law was, When the host goeth forth against the enemy, then, in a special manner, keep thyself from every wicked thing, Deut. 23. 9. Uriah outdid that law, but David violated it.

14. And it came to pass in the morning, that David wrote a letter to Joab, and sent it by the hand of Uriah. 15. And he wrote in the letter, saying, Set ye Uriah in the forefront of the hottest battle, and retire ye from him, that he may be smitten, and die. 16. And it came to pass, when Joab observed the city, that he assigned Uriah unto a place where he knew that valiant men were. 17. And the men of the city went out, and fought with Joab: and there fell some of the people of the servants of David; and Uriah the Hittite died also. 18. Then Joab sent and told David all the things concerning the war; 19. And charged the messenger, saying, When thou hast made an end of telling the matters of the war unto the king, 20. And if so be that the king's wrath arise, and he say unto thee, Wherefore approached ye so nigh unto the city when ye did fight? knew ye not that they would shoot from the wall? 21. Who smote Abimelech the son of Jerubbesheth? did not a woman cast a piece of a millstone upon him from the wall, that he died in Thebez? why went ye nigh the wall? then say thou, Thy servant Uriah the Hittite is dead also. 22. So the messenger went, and came and shewed David all that Joab had sent him for. 23. And the messenger said unto David, Surely the men prevailed against us, and came out unto us into the field, and we were upon them even unto the entering of the gate. 24. And the shooters shot from off the wall upon thy servants; and some of the king's servants be dead, and thy servant Uriah the Hittite is dead also. 25. Then David said unto the messenger, Thus shalt thou say unto Joab, Let not this thing displease thee, for the sword devoureth one as well as another; make thy battle more strong against the city, and overthrow it: and encourage thou him. 26. And when the wife of Uriah heard that Uriah her husband was dead, she mourned for her husband. 27. And when the mourning was past, David sent and fetched her to his house, and she became his wife, and bare him a son. But the thing that David had done displeased the Lord.

When David's project of fathering the child upon Uriah himself failed, so that, in process of time, Uriah would certainly know the wrong that had been done him; to prevent the fruits of his revenge, the Devil puts it into David's heart to take him off, and then neither he nor Bath-sheba would be in any danger; what prosecution could there be, when there was no prosecutor? And suggesting further, that, when he was out of the way, Bath-sheba might, if he pleased, be his own for ever. Adulteries have often occasioned murders, and one wickedness must be covered and secured with another. The beginnings of sin are therefore to be dreaded; for who knows where they will end?

It is resolved, in David's breast, (which one would think could never possibly have harboured so vile a thought,) that Uriah must die; that innocent, valiant, gallant, man, who was ready to die for his prince's honour, must die by his prince's hand. David had sinned, and Bath-sheba has sinned, and both against him, and therefore he must die; David determines he must. Is this the man whose heart smote him, because he had cut off Saul's skirt? Quantum mutatus ab illo!—But ah, how changed! Is this he that executed judgment and justice to all his people? How can he now do so unjust a thing? See how fleshly lusts war against the soul, and what devastations they make in that war; how they blind the eyes, harden the hearts, sear the conscience, and deprive men of all sense of honour and justice. Whoso committeth adultery with a woman, lacketh understanding, and quite loses it; he that doth it, destroys his own soul, Prov. 6. 32.

But as the eye of the adulterer, so the hand of the murderer, seeks concealment, Job, 24. 14, 15. Works of darkness hate the light. When David bravely slew Goliath, it was done publicly, and he gloried in it; but when he basely slew Uriah, it must be done clandestinely, for he is ashamed of it, and well he may. Who would do a thing that he dare not own? The Devil having, as a poisonous serpent, put it into David's heart to murder Uriah, as a subtle serpent, he puts it into his head how to do it. Not as Absalom slew Amnon, by commanding his servants to assassinate him, or as Ahab slew Naboth, by suborning witnesses to accuse him, but by exposing him to the enemy; a way of doing it, which, perhaps, would not seem so odious to conscience, and the world, because soldiers expose themselves of course; if Uriah had not been in that dangerous post, another must; he has (as we say) a chance for his life; if he fight stoutly, he may, perhaps, come off; and if he die, it is in the field of honour, where a soldier would choose to die; and yet all this will not save it from being a wilful murder, of malice prepense.

1. Orders are sent to Joab to set Uriah in the front of the hottest battle, and then to desert him, and abandon him to the enemy, v. 14, 15. This was David's project to take off Uriah, and it succeeded, as he designed. Many were the aggravations of this murder. 1. It was deliberate. He took time to consider of it; and though he had time to consider of it, for he wrote a letter about it, and though he had time to have countermanded the order afterward, before it could be put in execution, yet he did not do it. 2. He sent the letter by Uriah himself; than which nothing could be more base and barbarous, to make him accessory to his own death. And what a paradox was it, that he could bear such a malice against him, in whom yet he could repose such a confidence, as that he would carry letters, which he must not know the purport of. 3. Advantage must be taken of Uriah's own courage and zeal for his king and country, which deserve the greatest praise and recompence, to betray him the more easily to his fate. If he had not been forward to expose himself, perhaps he was a man of such importance, that Joab could not have exposed him; and that this noble fire should be designedly turned upon himself, was a most detestable instance of ingratitude. 4. Many must be involved in the guilt; Joab, the general, to whom the blood of his soldiers, especially the worthies, ought to be precious, must do it; he, and all that retire from Uriah, when they ought in conscience to support and second him, become guilty of his death. 5. Uriah cannot thus die alone, the party he commands is in danger of being cut off with him; and it proved so, some of the people, even the servants of David, (so they are called, to aggravate David's sin, in being so prodigal of their lives,) fell with him, v. 17. Nay, this wilful misconduct, by which Uriah must be betrayed, might be of fatal consequence to the whole army, and, having obliged them to raise the siege. 6. It will be the triumph and joy of the Ammonites, the sworn enemies of God and Israel; it will gratify them exceedingly. David prayed for himself, that he might not fall into the hands of man, nor flee from his enemies, ch. 24. 13, 14. yet he sells his servant Uriah to the Ammonites, and not for any iniquity in his hand.

II. Joab executes these orders. In the next assault that was made upon the city, Uriah has the most dangerous post assigned him, is encouraged to hope, that, if he be repulsed by the besieged, he shall be relieved by Joab, in dependence on which, he marches on with resolution, but, succours not coming on, the service proved too hot, and he was slain in it, v. 16, 17. It was strange that Joab would do such a thing merely upon a letter, without knowing the reason. But, 1. Perhaps he supposed Uriah had been guilty of some great crime, to inquire into which, David had sent for him, and that, because he would not punish him openly, he took this course with him to put him to death. 2. Joab had been guilty of blood, and we may suppose it pleased him very well, to see David himself falling into the same guilt, and he was willing enough to serve him in it, that he might continue to be favourable to him. It is common for those who have done ill themselves, to desire to be countenanced therein by others doing ill likewise, especially by the sins of those that are eminent in the profession of religion. Or, perhaps, David knew that Joab had a pique against Uriah, and would gladly be avenged on him; otherwise Joab, when he saw cause, knew how to dispute the king's orders, as ch. 24. 3.—19. 5.

III. He sends an account of it to David. An express is dispatched away immediately, with a report of this last disgrace and loss which they had sustained, v. 18. And, to disguise the affair, 1. He supposes that David would appear to be angry at his bad conduct, would ask why they came so near the wall, v. 20. Did they not know that Abimelech lost his life by doing so? v. 21. We had the story, Judg. 9. 53. which book, it is likely, was published as a part of the sacred history in Samuel's time; and (be it noted to their praise, and for imitation) even the soldiers were conversant with their Bibles, and could readily quote the scripture-story, and make use of it for admonition to themselves, not to run upon the same attempts which there they found to be fatal. 2. He slyly orders the messenger to sooth it with telling him that Uriah the Hittite was dead also, which gave too broad an intimation to the messenger, and by him to others, that David would be secretly pleased to hear that: for murder will out. And when men do such base things, they must expect to be bantered and upbraided with them, even by their inferiors. The messenger delivered his message agreeably to orders, v. 22. 24. He makes the besieged to sally out first upon the besiegers, They came out unto us into the field; represents the besiegers as doing their part with great bravery, We were upon them even to the entering of the gates. we forced them to retire into the city with precipitation; and so concludes with a slight mention of the slaughter made among them by some shot from the wall, Some of the king's servants are dead; and particularly Uriah the Hittite, an officer of note, stood first in the list of the slain.

IV. David receives the account with a secret satisfaction, v. 25. Let not Joab be displeased, for David is not; he blames not his conduct, nor thinks they did ill, in approaching so near the wall; all is well, now that Uriah is got out of the way. This point being gained, he can make light of the loss, and turn it off easily with an excuse, The sword devours one as well as another; it was a chance of war, nothing more common. He orders Joab to make the battle more strong next time, while he, by his sin, was weakening it, and provoking God to blast the undertaking.

Lastly, He married the widow, in a little time. She submitted to the ceremony of mourning for her husband, as little a time as custom would admit, v. 26. and then David took her to his house as his wife, and she bare him a son. Uriah's revenge was prevented by his death, but the birth of the child, so soon after the marriage, published the crime; sin will have shame; yet that was not the worst of it, The thing that David had done displeased the Lord; the whole matter of Uriah, as it is called, 1 Kings, 15. 5. the adultery, falsehood, murder, and this marriage, at last, it was all displeasing to the Lord. He had pleased himself, but displeased God. Note, God sees and hates sin in his own people. Nay, the nearer any are to God in profession, the more displeasing to him their sins are; for in them there is more ingratitude, treachery, and reproach, than in the sins of others. Let none therefore encourage themselves in sin by the example of David; for they that sin as he did will fall under the displeasure of God as he did. Let us therefore stand in awe, and sin not; not sin after the similitude of his transgression.

CHAP. XII.

The foregoing chapter gave us the account of David's sin, this of his repentance; though he fell, he was not utterly cast down, but, by the grace of God, recovered himself, and found mercy with God. Here is, I. His conviction, by a message Nathan brought him from God, which was a parable that obliged him to condemn himself, v. 1. 6. And the interpretation of the parable, in which Nathan charged him with the sin, v. 7. 9. and pronounced sentence upon him, v. 10. 12. II. His repentance, and remission, with a reserve of judgment, v. 13, 14. III. The sickness and death of the child, and his behaviour, while it was sick, and when it was dead, v. 15. 23. in both which, David gave evidences of his repentance. IV. The birth of Solomon, and God's gracious message concerning him, in which God gave an evidence of his reconciliation to David, v. 24, 25. V. The taking of Rabbah, v. 26. 31. which is mentioned as a further instance, that God did not deal with David according to his sins.

1. AND the LORD sent Nathan unto David. And he came unto him, and said unto him, There were two men in one city; the one rich, and the other poor. 2. The rich man had exceeding many flocks and herds: 3. But the poor man had nothing save one little ewe-lamb, which he had bought and nourished up: and it grew up together with him, and with his children; it did eat of his own meat, and drank of his own cup, and lay in his bosom, and was unto him as a daughter. 4. And there came a traveller unto the rich man, and he spared to take of his own flock and of his own herd, to dress for the way-faring man that was come unto him; but took the poor man's lamb, and dressed it for the man that was come to him. 5. And David's anger was greatly kindled against the man; and he said to Nathan, As the LORD liveth, the man that hath done this thing shall surely die: 6. And he shall restore the lamb four-fold, because he did this thing, and because he had no pity. 7. And Nathan said to David, Thou art the man. Thus saith the LORD God of Israel, I anointed thee king over Israel, and I delivered thee out of the hand of Saul; 8. And I gave thee thy master's house, and thy master's wives into thy bosom, and gave thee the house of Israel and of Judah; and if that had been too little, I would moreover have given unto thee such and such things. 9. Wherefore hast thou despised the commandment of the LORD, to do evil in his sight? thou hast killed Uriah the Hittite with the sword, and hast taken his wife to be thy wife, and hast slain him with the sword of the children of Ammon. 10. Now therefore the sword shall never depart from thine house; because thou hast despised me, and hast taken the wife of Uriah the Hittite to be thy wife. 11. Thus saith the LORD, Behold, I will raise up evil against thee out of thine own house, and I will take thy wives before thine eyes, and give them unto thy neighbour, and he shall lie with thy wives in the sight of the sun. 12. For thou didst it secretly: but I will do this thing before all Israel, and before the sun. 13. And David said unto Nathan, I have sinned against the LORD. And Nathan said unto David, The LORD also hath put away thy sin; thou shalt not die. 14. Howbeit, because by this deed thou hast given great occasion to the enemies of the LORD to blaspheme, the child also that is born unto thee shall surely die.

It seems to have been a great while after David had been guilty of adultery with Bath-sheba, before he was brought to repentance for it. For, when Nathan was sent to him, the child was born, v. 14. So that it was about nine months that David lay under the guilt of that sin, and, for aught that appears, unrepented of. What shall we think of David's state all this while? Can we imagine his heart never smote him for it? Or that he never lamented it in secret before God? I would willingly hope that he did, and that Nathan was sent to him, immediately upon the birth of the child, when the thing by that means came to be publicly known and talked of, to draw from him an open confession of the sin, to the glory of God, the admonition of others, and that he might receive, by Nathan, absolution with certain limitations. But, during these nine months, we may well suppose his comforts and the exercises of his graces suspended, and his communion with God interrupted; during all that time, for certain, he penned no psalms, his harp was out of tune, and his soul like a tree in winter, that has life in the root only; therefore, after Nathan had been with him, he prays, Restore unto me the joy of thy salvation, and open thou my lips, Ps. 51. 12, 15. Let us observe,

1. The messenger God sent to him. We were told, by the last words of the foregoing chapter, that the thing David had done displeased the Lord, upon which, one would think, it should have followed that the Lord sent enemies to invade him, terrors to take hold on him, and the messengers of death to arrest him. No, he sent a prophet to him, Nathan, his faithful friend and confidant, to instruct and counsel him, v. 1. David did not send for Nathan, (though he had never had so much occasion as he had now for his confessor,) but God sent Nathan to David. Note, Though God may suffer his people to fall into sin, he will not suffer them to lie still in it. He went on frowardly in the way of his heart, and, if left to himself, would wander endlessly, but (saith God) I have seen his ways, and will heal him, Isa. 57. 17, 18. He sends after us before we seek after him, else we should certainly be lost. Nathan was the prophet by whom God had sent him notice of his kind intentions toward him, ch. 7. 4. and now, by the same hand, he sends him this message of wrath. God's word in the mouth of his ministers must be received, whether it speak terror or comfort. Nathan was obedient to the heavenly vision, and went on God's errand to David. He did not say, "David has sinned, I will not come near him:" no, Count him not as an enemy, but admonish him as a brother, 2 Thess. 3. 15. He did not say, "David is a king, I dare not reprove him;" no, if God send him, he sets his face like a flint, Isa. 50. 7.

II. The message Nathan delivered to him, in order to his conviction.

1. He fetched a compass with a parable, which seemed to David as a complaint made to him by Nathan against one of his subjects that had wronged his poor neighbour, in order to his righting the injured, and punishing the injurious. Nathan, it is likely, used to come to him upon such errands, which made this the less suspected; it becomes those who have interest in princes, and have free access to them, to intercede for those that are wronged, that they may have right done them.

(1.) Nathan represented to David a notorious injury, which a rich man had done to an honest neighbour that was not able to contend with him. The rich man had many flocks and herds, v. 2. the poor man had one only, so unequally is the world divided; and yet infinite wisdom, righteousness, and goodness, make the distribution, that the rich may learn charity, and the poor contentment. This poor man had but one lamb, an ewe-lamb, a little ewe-lamb, having not wherewithal to buy or keep more. But it was a cade-lamb, (as we call it,) it grew up with his children, v. 3. she was fond of it, and it was familiar with him at all times. The rich man, having occasion for a lamb to entertain a friend with, took the poor man's lamb from him by violence, and made use of that, v. 4. either out of covetousness, because he grudged to make use of his own; or rather out of luxury, because he fancied the lamb that was thus tenderly kept, and ate and drank like a child, must needs be more delicate food than any of his own, and have a better relish.

(2.) In this he shewed him the evil of the sin he had been guilty of, in defiling Bath-sheba. He had many wives and concubines, whom he kept at a distance, as rich men kept their flocks in their fields; had he had but one, and had she been dear to him, as the ewe-lamb was to its owner, had she been dear to him as the loving hind and the pleasant roe, her breasts would have satisfied him at all times, and he would have looked no further, Prov. 5. 19. Marriage is a remedy against fornication, but marrying many is not; for when once the law of unity is transgressed, the indulged lust will hardly stint itself. Uriah, like the poor man, had only one wife, who was to him as his own soul, and always lay in his bosom, for he had no other, desired no other, to lie there. The traveller or wayfaring man was, as Bishop Patrick explains it from the Jewish writers, the evil imaginations disposition, or desire, which came into David's heart, which he might have satisfied with some of his own, yet nothing would serve but Uriah's darling. They observe, that this evil disposition is called a traveller, for in the beginning it is only so, but, in time, it becomes a guest, and, in conclusion, is master of the house. For he that is called a traveller, in the beginning of the verse, is called a man, (ish, a husband,) in the close of it. Yet some observe, that in David's breast lust was but as a wayfaring man, that carries only for a night, it did not constantly dwell and rule there.

(3.) By this parable, he drew from David a sentence against himself. For David supposing it to be a case in fact, and not doubting the truth of it, when he had it from Nathan himself, gave judgment immediately against the offender, and confirmed it with an oath, v. 5, 6. [1.] That, for his injustice in taking away the lamb, he should restore four-fold, according to the law, Exod. 22. 1. Four sheep for a sheep. [2.] That, for his tyranny and cruelty, and the pleasure he took in abusing a poor man, he should be put to death. If a poor man steal from a rich man, to satisfy his soul when he is hungry, he shall make restitution, though it cost him all the substance of his house, Prov. 6. 30, 31. and Solomon there compares the sin of adultery with that, v. 32. But if a rich man steal for stealing sake, not for want, but wantonness, merely that he may be imperious and vexatious, he deserves to die for it; for to him restitution is no punishment, or next to none. If the sentence be thought too severe, it must be imputed to the present roughness of David's temper, being under guilt, and not having himself as yet received mercy.

2. He closed in with him, at length, in the application of the parable. In beginning with a parable, he shewed his prudence, and great need there is of prudence in giving reproofs; it is well-managed if, as here, the offender can be brought, ere he is aware, to convict and condemn himself; but here, in his application, he shews his faithfulness, and deals as plainly and roundly with king David himself, as if he had been a common person. In plain terms, "Thou art the man, who hast done this wrong, and a much greater, to thy neighbour; and therefore, by thine own sentence, thou deservest to die, and shalt be judged out of thine own mouth. Did he deserve to die who took his neighbour's lamb, and dost not thou, who hast taken thy neighbour's wife? Though he took the lamb, he did not cause the owner thereof to lose his life, as thou hast done, and therefore much more art thou worthy to die."

Now he speaks immediately from God, and, in his name, begins with, Thus saith the Lord God of Israel, a name sacred and venerable to David, and which commanded his attention; Nathan now speaks, not as a petitioner for a poor man, but as an ambassador from the great God, with whom is no respect of persons.

(1.) God, by Nathan, reminds David of the great things he had done and designed for him, anointing him to be king, and preserving him to the kingdom, v. 7. giving him power over the house and household of his predecessor, and of others that had been his masters, Nabal for one: he had given him the house of Israel and Judah; the wealth of the kingdom was at his service; every body was willing to oblige him; and ready to bestow any thing upon him, to make him easy: I would have given thee such and such things, v. 8. See how liberal God is in his gifts; we are not straitened in him. Where he has given much, yet he gives more. And God's bounty to us is a great aggravation of our discontent, and desire of forbidden fruit. It is ungrateful to covet what God has prohibited, while we have liberty to pray for what God has promised, and that is enough.

(2.) He charges him with a high contempt of the divine authority, in the sins he had been guilty of. Wherefore hast thou (presuming upon thy royal dignity and power) despised the commandment of the Lord? v. 9. This is the spring, and this is the malignity of sin, that it is making light of the divine law, and the Law-maker; as if the obligation of it were weak, the precepts of it trifling, and the threats not at all formidable. Though no man ever wrote more honourably of the law of God, than David did, yet, in this instance, he is justly charged with a contempt of it. His adultery with Bath-sheba, which began the mischief, is not mentioned, perhaps, because he was already convinced of that, but, [1.] The murder of Uriah is twice mentioned. Thou hast killed Uriah with the sword; though not thy sword, yet the sword of the children of Ammon, by ordering him to be set in the forefront of the battle. They that contrive wickedness and command it, are as truly guilty of it as those that execute it. It is repeated, with an aggravation, Thou hast slain him with the sword of the children of Ammon, those uncircumcised enemies of God and Israel. [2.] The marrying of Bath-sheba is likewise twice mentioned, because he thought there was no harm in that, v. 9. Thou hast taken his wife to be thy wife, and again, v. 10. To marry her whom he had before defiled, and whose husband he had slain, was an affront upon the ordinance of marriage, making that not only to palliate, but, in a manner, to consecrate such villanies. In all this he despised the word of the Lord, so it is in the Hebrew, not only his commandment in general, which forbade such things, but the particular word of promise, which God had, by Nathan, sent to him some time before, that he would build him a house; which sacred promise, if he had had a due value and veneration for, he would not thus have polluted his house with lust and blood.

(3.) He threatens an entail of judgments upon his family for this sin, v. 10. "The sword shall never depart from thy house, not in thy time, nor afterward, but, for the most part, thou and thy posterity shall be engaged in war." Or, it points at the slaughters that should be among his children, Amnon, Absalom, and Adonijah, all falling by the sword. God had promised that his mercy should not depart from him and his house, ch. 7. 15. yet here threatens that the sword should not depart. Can the mercy and the sword consist with each other? Yes, those may lie under great and long afflictions, who yet shall not be excluded from the grace of the covenant. The reason given is, Because thou hast despised me. Note, Those who despise the word and law of God, despise God himself, and shall be lightly esteemed.

It is particularly threatened, [1.] That his children should be his grief; I will raise up evil against thee out of thine own house. Sin brings trouble into a family, and one sin is often made the punishment of another. [2.] That his wives should be his shame; that by an unparalleled piece of villany they should be publicly debauched before all Israel, v. 11, 12. It is not said it should be done by his own son, lest the accomplishment should have been hindered by the prediction being too plain; but it was done by Absalom, at the counsel of Ahithophel, ch. 16. 21, 22. He that defiled his neighbour's wife, should have his own defiled, for that sin used to be punished, as appears by Job's imprecation, Job, 31. 10. Then let my wife grind unto another, and that threatening, Hos. 4. 14. The sin was secret, and industriously concealed, but the punishment should be open, and industriously proclaimed, to the shame of David, whose sin in the matter of Uriah, though committed many years before, would then be called to mind, and commonly talked of upon that occasion. As face answers to face in a glass, so does the punishment often answer to the sin; here is blood for blood, and uncleanness for uncleanness. And thus God would shew how much he hates sin, even in his own people, and that, wherever he finds it, he will not let it go unpunished.

3. David's penitent confession of his sin, hereupon. He says not a word to excuse himself, or extenuate his sin, but freely owns it, I have sinned against the Lord, v. 13. It is probable that he said more to this purport; but this is enough to shew that he was truly humbled by what Nathan said, and submitted himself to the conviction. He owns his guilt, I have sinned; and aggravates it, It was against the Lord: on this string he harps in the psalm he penned on this occasion, Ps. 51. 4. Against thee, thee only, have I sinned.

4. His pardon declared, upon this penitent confession, but with a reserve of judgment. When David said, I have sinned, and Nathan perceived that he was a true penitent, (1.) He did, in God's name, assure him that his sin was forgiven, "The Lord also has put away thy sin out of the sight of his avenging eye, thou shalt not die," that is, "not die eternally, nor be for ever put away from God, as thou wouldest have been, if he had not put away the sin." The obligation to punishment is hereby cancelled and vacated. He shall not come into condemnation: that is the nature of forgiveness. "Thy iniquity shall not be thy everlasting ruin. The sword shall not depart from thy house, but," [1.] "It shall not cut thee off, thou shalt come to thy grave in peace." David deserved to die as an adulterer and murderer, but God would not cut him off as he might justly have done. [2.] "Though thou shalt all thy days be chastened of the Lord, yet thou shalt not be condemned with the world." See how ready God is to forgive sin. To this instance, David refers, Ps. 32. 5. I said, I will confess, and thou forgavest. Let not great sinners despair of finding mercy with God, if they truly repent; for who is a God like unto him, pardoning iniquity? (2.) Yet he pronounces a sentence of death upon the child, v. 14. Behold the sovereignty of God! The guilty parent lives, and the guiltless infant dies; but all souls are his, and he may, in what way he pleases, glorify himself in his creatures. [1.] David had, by his sin, wronged God in his honour; he had given occasion to the enemies of the Lord to blaspheme. The wicked people of that generation, the infidels, idolaters, and profane, would triumph in David's fall, and speak ill of God and of his law, when they saw one guilty of such foul enormities, that professed such an honour both for him and it. "These are your professors! This is he that prays and sings psalms, and is so very devout! What good can there be in such exercises, if they will not restrain men from adultery and murder?" They would say, "Was not Saul rejected for a less matter? Why then must David live, and reign still?" Not considering that God sees not as man sees, but searches the heart. To this day there are those who reproach God, and are hardened in sin, through the example of David. Now, though it is true that none have any just reason to speak ill of God, or of his word and ways, for David's sake, and it is their sin that do so, yet he shall be reckoned with that laid the stumbling-block in their way, and gave, though not cause, yet colour, for the reproach. Note, There is this great evil in the scandalous sins of those that profess religion, and relation to God, that they furnish the enemies of God and religion with matter for reproach and blasphemy, Rom. 2. 24. [2.] God will therefore vindicate his honour, by shewing his displeasure against David for this sin, and letting the world see, that, though he loves David, he hates his sin; and he chooses to do it by the death of the child. The landlord may distrain on any part of the premises where he pleases. Perhaps the diseases and deaths of infants were not so common in those days as they are now, which might make this, as an unusual thing, the more evident token of God's displeasure, according to the word he had often said, that he would visit the sins of the fathers upon the children.

15. And Nathan departed unto his house. And the LORD struck the child that Uriah's wife bare unto David, and it was very sick. 16. David therefore besought God for the child; and David fasted, and went in, and lay all night upon the earth. 17. And the elders of his house arose, and went to him, to raise him up from the earth: but he would not, neither did he eat bread with them. 18. And it came to pass on the seventh day, that the child died. And the servants of David feared to tell him that the child was dead: for they said, Behold, while the child was yet alive, we spake unto him, and he would not hearken unto our voice: how will he then vex himself, if we tell him that the child is dead! 19. But when David saw that his servants whispered, David perceived that the child was dead: therefore David said unto his servants, Is the child dead? And they said, He is dead. 20. Then David arose from the earth, and washed, and anointed himself, and changed his apparel, and came into the house of the LORD, and worshipped: then he came to his own house; and when he required, they set bread before him, and he did eat. 21. Then said his servants unto him, What thing is this that thou hast done? thou didst fast and weep for the child, while it was alive; but when the child was dead, thou didst rise and eat bread. 22. And he said, While the child was yet alive, I fasted and wept: for I said, Who can tell whether God will be gracious to me, that the child may live? 23. But now he is dead, wherefore should I fast? can I bring him back again? I shall go to him, but he shall not return to me. 24. And David comforted Bath-sheba his wife, and went in unto her, and lay with her: and she bare a son, and he called his name Solomon: and the LORD loved him. 25. And he sent by the hand of Nathan the prophet; and he called his name Jedidiah, because of the LORD.

Nathan, having delivered his message, stayed not at court, but went home, probably to pray for David, to whom he had been preaching. God, in making use of him as an instrument to bring David to repentance, and as the herald both of mercy and judgment, put an honour upon the ministry, and magnified his word above all his name. David named one of his sons by Bath-sheba, Nathan, in honour of this prophet, 1 Chron. 3. 5. and it was that son of whom Christ, the great Prophet, lineally descended, Luke, 3. 31. When Nathan retired, David, it is probable, retired likewise, and penned the 51st Psalm, in which (though he had been assured that his sin was pardoned) he prays earnestly for pardon, and greatly laments his sin; for then will true penitents be ashamed of what they have done, when God is pacified toward them, Ezek. 16. 63.

Here is,

I. The child's illness. The Lord struck it, and it was very sick, perhaps with convulsions, or some other dreadful distemper, v. 15. The diseases and death of infants, that have not sinna after the similitude of Adam's transgression, especially as they are sometimes sadly circumstanced, are sensible proofs of the original sin in which they are conceived.

II. David's humiliation under this token of God's displeasure, and the intercession he made with God for the life of the child, v. 16, 17. He fasted, and lay all night upon the earth, and would not suffer any of his attendants either to feed him or help him up. This was an evidence of the truth of his repentance. For, 1. Hereby it appeared that he was willing to bear the shame of his sin, to have it ever before him, and to be continually upbraided with it: for this child would be a continual memorandum of it, both to himself and others, if he lived; and, therefore, he was so far from desiring its death, as most, in such circumstances, do, that he prayed earnestly for its life. True penitents patiently bear the reproach of their youth and of their youthful lusts, Jer. 31. 19. 2. A very tender compassionate spirit appeared in this, and great humanity, above what is commonly found in men, especially men of war, toward little children, even their own; and this was another sign of a broken contrite spirit: they that are penitent will be pitiful. 3. He discovered in this a great concern for another world, which is an evidence of repentance. Nathan had told him that certainly the child should die; yet, while it is in the reach of prayer, he earnestly intercedes with God for it, chiefly (as we may suppose) that its soul might be safe and happy in another world, and that his sin might not come against the child, and that it might not fare the worse for that in the future state*. 4. He discovered in this a holy dread of God and of his displeasure. He deprecated the death of the child, chiefly as it was a token of God's anger against him and his house, and was inflicted in performance of a threatening; therefore he prayed thus earnestly, that, if it were the will of God, the child might live, because that would be to him a token of God's being reconciled to him. Lord, chasten me not in thy hot displeasure, Ps. 6. 1.

* Of the propriety of this suggestion, the reader will form a judgment for himself.—ED.

III. The death of the child; it died on the seventh day, v. 18. when it was seven days old, and therefore not circumcised, which David might, perhaps, interpret as a further token of God's displeasure, that it died before it was brought under the seal of the covenant; yet he does not therefore doubt of its being happy, for the benefits of the covenant do not depend upon the seals. David's servants, judging of him by themselves, were afraid to tell him that the child was dead, concluding that then he would disquiet himself most of all; so that he knew not till he asked, v. 19.

IV. David's wonderful calmness, when he understood the child was dead. Observe,

1. What he did. (1.) He laid aside the expressions of his sorrow, washed and anointed himself, and called for clean linen, that he might decently appear before God in his house. (2.) He went up to the tabernacle, and worshipped, like Job when he heard of the death of his children. He went to acknowledge the hand of God in the affliction, and to humble himself under it, and to submit to his holy will in it; to thank God that he himself was spared, and his sin pardoned; and to pray that God would not proceed in his controversy with him, nor stir up all his wrath. Is any afflicted? let him pray. Weeping must never hinder worshipping. (3.) Then he went to his own house, and refreshed himself, as one who found benefit by his religion in the day of his affliction; for, having worshipped, he did eat, and his countenance was no more sad.

2. The reason he gave for what he did. His servants thought it strange that he should afflict himself so for the sickness of the child, and yet take the death of it so easily, and asked him the reason of it, v. 21. In answer to which, he gives this plain account of his conduct. (1.) That, while the child was alive, he thought it his duty to importune the divine favour towards it, v. 22. Nathan had indeed said the child should die, but, for aught that he knew, the threatening might be conditional, as that concerning Hezekiah: upon his great humiliation and earnest prayer, he that had so often heard the voice of his weeping might be pleased to reverse the sentence, and spare the child; Who can tell whether God will yet be gracious to me? God gives us leave to be earnest with him in prayer for particular blessings, from a confidence in his power and general mercy, though we have no particular promise to build upon: we cannot be sure, yet let us pray, for who can tell but God will be gracious to us in this or that particular? When our relations and friends have fallen sick, the prayer of faith has prevailed much; while there is life there is hope, and while there is hope there is room for prayer. (2.) That, the child being dead, he thought it as much his duty to be satisfied in the divine disposal concerning it, v. 23. Now, wherefore should I fast? Two things checked his grief: [1.] I cannot bring him back again; and again, He shall not return to me. Those that are dead are out of the reach of prayer; nor can our tears profit them; we can neither weep nor pray them back to this life. Wherefore, then, should we fast? To what purpose is this waste? Yet David fasted and wept for Jonathan when he was dead, in honour to him. [2.] I shall go to him. First, To him, to the grave. Note, The consideration of our own death should moderate our sorrow at the death of our relations. It is the common lot; instead of mourning for their death, we should think of our own; and, whatever loss we have of them now, we shall die shortly, and go to them. Secondly, To him, to heaven, to a state of blessedness, which even the Old-Testament saints had some expectation of. Godly parents have great reason to hope, concerning their children that die in infancy, that it is well with their souls in the other world; for the promise is to us and to our seed, which shall be performed to those that do not put a bar in their own door, as infants do not. Favores sunt ampliandi—Favours received should produce the hope of more. God calls them his children, that are born unto him; and if they be his, he will save them. This may comfort us when our children are removed from us by death; they are better provided for, both in work and wealth, than they could be in this world. We shall be with them shortly, to part no more.

V. The birth of Solomon. Though David's marrying Bath-sheba had displeased the Lord, yet he was not therefore commanded to divorce her; so far from this, that God gave him that son by her on whom the covenant of royalty should be entailed. Bath-sheba, no doubt, was greatly afflicted with the sense of her sin, and the tokens of God's displeasure. But, God having restored to David the joys of his salvation, he comforted her with the same comforts with which he himself was comforted of God, v. 24. He comforted Bath-sheba. And both he and she had reason to be comforted in the tokens of God's reconciliation to them.

1. Inasmuch as, by his providence, he gave them a son, not as the former, who was given in anger, and taken away in wrath, but a child graciously given, and written among the living in Jerusalem. They called him Solomon, peaceful, because his birth was a token of God's being at peace with them, because of the prosperity which was entailed upon him, and because he was to be a type of Christ, the Prince of peace. God had removed one son from them, but now gave them another instead of him, like Seth instead of Abel, Gen. 4.25. Thus God often balances the griefs of his people with comforts in the same thing wherein he hath afflicted them, setting the one over-against the other. David had very patiently submitted to the will of God in the death of the other child, and now God made up the loss of that, abundantly to his advantage, in the birth of this. The way to have our creature-comforts either continued or restored, or the loss of them made up some other way, is, cheerfully to resign them to God.

2. Inasmuch as, by his grace, he particularly owned and favoured that son; The Lord loved him, v. 24. and, v. 25. ordered him, by the prophet Nathan, to be called Jedidiah, Beloved of the Lord; though a seed of evil-doers, (for such David and Bath-sheba were,) yet so well-ordered was the covenant, and the crown entailed by it, that it took away all attainders, and corruption of blood, signifying, that those who were by nature children of wrath and disobedience, should, by the covenant of grace, not only be reconciled, but made favourites. And, in this name, he typified Jesus Christ, that blessed Jedidiah, the Son of God's love, concerning whom God declared again and again, This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well-pleased.

26. And Joab fought against Rabbah of the children of Ammon, and took the royal city. 27. And Joab sent messengers to David, and said, I have fought against Rabbah, and have taken the city of waters. 28. Now therefore gather the rest of the people together, and encamp against the city, and take it: lest I take the city, and it be called after my name. 29. And David gathered all the people together, and went to Rabbah, and fought against it, and took it. 30. And he took their king's crown from off his head, the weight whereof was a talent of gold with the precious stones, and it was set on David's head. And he brought forth the spoil of the city in great abundance. 31. And he brought forth the people that were therein, and put them under saws, and under harrows of iron, and under axes of iron, and made them pass through the brick-kiln: and thus did he unto all the cities of the children of Ammon. So David and all the people returned unto Jerusalem.

We have here an account of the conquest of Rabbah, and other cities of the Ammonites. Though this comes in here after the birth of David's child, yet it is most probable that it was effected a good while before, and soon after the death of Uriah, perhaps during the days of Bath-sheba's mourning for him.

Observe, 1. That God was very gracious in giving David this great success against his enemies, notwithstanding the sin he had been guilty of, (just at that time when he was engaged in this war,) and the wicked use he had made of the sword of the children of Ammon in the murder of Uriah. Justly might he have made that sword, from thenceforward, a plague to David and his kingdom; yet he breaks it, and makes David's sword victorious, even before he repented, that this goodness of God might lead him to repentance. Good reason had David to own, that God dealt not with him according to his sins, Ps. 103. 10.

2. That Joab acted very honestly and honourably; for when he had taken the city of waters, the royal city, where the palace was, and from which the rest of the city was supplied with water, and which, therefore, upon the cutting off of that, would be obliged speedily to surrender, he sent to David to come in person to complete this great action, that he might have the praise of it, v. 26. . 28. Herein he shewed himself a faithful servant, that sought his master's honour, and his own only in subordination to his, and left an example to the servants of the Lord Jesus, in every thing they do, to consult his honour: Not unto us, but to thy name, give glory.

3. That David was both too haughty and too severe upon this occasion, and neither so humble nor so tender as he should have been. (1.) He seems to have been too fond of the crown of the king of Ammon, v. 30. Because it was of extraordinary value, by reason of the precious stones with which it was set, David will have it set upon his head, though it would have been better to have cast it at God's feet, and, at this time, to have put his own mouth in the dust, under guilt. The heart that is truly humbled for sin is dead to worldly glory, and looks upon it with a holy contempt. (2.) He seems to have been too harsh with his prisoners of war, v. 31. taking the city by storm, after it had obstinately held out against a long and expensive siege; if he had put all to the sword in the heat of battle, whom he found in arms, it had been severe enough; but to kill them afterward, in cold blood, and by cruel tortures, with saws and harrows, tearing them to pieces, did not become him, who, when he entered upon the government, promised to sing of mercy as well as judgment, Ps. 101. 1. Had he made examples of those only who had abused his ambassadors, advised or assisted in it, that being a violation of the law of nations, it might be looked upon as a piece of necessary justice for terror to other nations; but to be thus severe with all the cities of the children of Ammon, (that is, the garrisons or soldiers of the cities,) was extremely rigorous, and a sign that David's heart was not yet made soft by repentance, else the bowels of his compassion would not have been thus shut up; a sign that he had not yet found mercy, else he would have been more ready to shew mercy.

CHAP. XIII.

The righteous God had lately told David, by Nathan the prophet, that, to chastise him for his sin, in the matter of Uriah, he would raise up evil against him out of his own house, ch. 12. 11. And here, in the very next chapter, we find the evil beginning to rise; from henceforward, he was followed with one trouble after another, which made the latter part of his reign less glorious and pleasant than the former part. Thus God chastened him with the rod of men, yet assured him that his loving-kindness he would not utterly take away. Adultery and murder were David's sins, and those sins, among his children, (Amnon defiling his sister Tamar, and Absalom murdering his brother Amnon,) were the beginnings of his punishment, and the more grievous, because he had reason to fear that his bad example might help to bring them to these wickednesses. In this chapter, we have, I. Amnon ravishing Tamar; assisted in his plot to do it by Jonadab his kinsman, and villainously executing it, v. 1. . 20. II. Absalom murdering Amnon for it, v. 21. . 39. Both great griefs to David, and the more, because he was unwittingly made accessory to both, by sending Tamar to Amnon, and Amnon to Absalom.

1. AND it came to pass after this, that Absalom the son of David had a fair sister, whose name was Tamar: and Amnon the son of David loved her. 2. And Amnon was so vexed, that he fell sick for his sister Tamar; for she was a virgin; and Amnon thought it hard for him to do any thing to her. 3. But Amnon had a friend, whose name was Jonadab, the son of Shimeah David's brother: and Jonadab was a very subtle man. 4. And he said unto him, Why art thou, being the king's son, lean from day to day? wilt thou not tell me? And Amnon said unto him, I love Tamar, my brother Absalom's sister. 5. And Jonadab said unto him, Lay thee down on thy bed, and make thyself sick: and when thy father cometh to see thee, say unto him, I pray thee, let my sister Tamar come, and give me meat, and dress the meat in my sight, that I may see it, and eat it at her hand. 6. So Amnon lay down, and made himself sick: and when the king was come to see him, Amnon said unto the king, I pray thee, let Tamar my sister come, and make me a couple of cakes in my sight, that I may eat at her hand. 7. Then David sent home to Tamar, saying, Go now to thy brother Amnon's house, and dress him meat. 8. So Tamar went to her brother Amnon's house; and he was laid down. And she took flour, and kneaded it, and made cakes in his sight, and did bake the cakes. 9. And she took a pan, and poured them out before him; but he refused to eat. And Amnon said, Have out all men from me. And they went out every man from him. 10. And Amnon said unto Tamar, Bring the meat into the chamber, that I may eat of thine hand. And Tamar took the cakes which she had made, and brought them into the chamber to Amnon her brother. 11. And when she had brought them unto him to eat, he took hold of her, and said unto her, Come lie with me, my sister. 12. And she answered him, Nay, my brother, do not force me; for no such thing ought to be done in Israel: do not thou this folly. 13. And I, whither shall I cause my shame to go? and as for thee, thou shalt be as one of the fools in Israel. Now therefore, I pray thee, speak unto the king; for he will not withhold me from thee. 14. Howbeit he would not hearken unto her voice; but, being stronger than she, forced her, and lay with her. 15. Then Amnon hated her exceedingly; so that the hatred wherewith he hated her was greater than the love wherewith he had loved her. And Amnon said unto her, Arise, be gone. 16. And she said unto him, There is no cause: this evil in sending me away is greater than the other that thou didst unto me. But he would not hearken unto her. 17. Then he called his servant that ministered unto him, and said, Put now this woman out from me, and bolt the door after her. 18. And she had a garment of divers colours upon her: for with such robes were the king's daughters that were virgins apparelled. Then his servant brought her out, and bolted the door after her. 19. And Tamar put ashes on her head, and rent her garment of divers colours that was on her, and laid her hand on her head, and went on crying. 20. And Absalom her brother said unto her, Hath Amnon thy brother been with thee? but hold now thy peace, my sister: he is thy brother; regard not this thing. So Tamar remained desolate in her brother Absalom's house.

We have here a particular account of the abominable wickedness of Amnon, in ravishing his sister; a subject not fit to be enlarged upon, nor indeed to be mentioned without blushing, that ever any man should be so vile, especially that a son of David should be so. Amnon's character, we have reason to think, was bad in other things; if he had not forsaken God, he had never been given up to these vile affections. Godly parents have often been afflicted with wicked children; grace does not run in the blood, but corruption does. We do not find that David's children imitated him in his devotion; but his false steps they trod in, and in those did much worse, and repented not. Parents know not how fatal the consequences may be, if, in any instance, they give their children bad examples. Observe the steps of Amnon's sin.

I. The Devil, as an unclean spirit, put it into his heart to lust after his sister Tamar. Beauty is a snare to many, it was so to her, she was fair, and therefore Amnon coveted her, v. 1. They that are peculiarly handsome have no reason, on that account, to be proud, but great reason to stand upon their watch. Amnon's lust was, 1. Unnatural in itself; to lust after his sister, which even natural conscience startles at, and cannot think of without horror. Such a spirit of contradiction there is in man's corrupt nature, that still it desires forbidden fruit, and the more strongly it is forbidden, the more greedily it is desired. Can he entertain the thought of betraying that virtue and honour of which, as a brother, he ought to have been the protector? But what wickedness so vile, as not to find admittance into an unsanctified, unguarded, heart, left to itself? 2. It was very uneasy to him. He was so vexed that he could not gain an opportunity to solicit her chastity, (for innocent converse with her was not denied him,) that he fell sick, v. 2. Fleshly lusts are their own punishment, and not only war against the soul, but against the body too, and are the rotteness of the bones. See what a hard master sinners serve, and how weary his yoke is.

II. The Devil, as a subtle servant, put it into his head how to compass this wicked design. Amnon had a friend, (so he called him, but he was really an enemy to him,) a kinsman, that had in him more of David's blood (for he was his nephew) than of David's spirit, for he was a subtle man, cunning to carry on any bad design, especially an intrigue of this nature, v. 3.

1. He takes notice that Amnon looked ill, and, being a subtle man, concludes that he was love-sick, v. 4. and asks him, "Why art thou, being the king's son, lean from day to day? Why dost thou pine, being the king's eldest son, and heir to the crown? Being the king's son," (1.) "Thou hast the pleasure of the court to divert thee; take those pleasures then, and with them drive away the sorrow, whatever it is." Content and comfort are not always to be found in royal palaces. With much more reason may we ask dejected and disconsolate saints, why they that are the children of the King of kings, and heirs of the crown of life, are thus lean from day to day. (2.) "Thou hast the power of a prince to command what thou wantest and wishest for; use that power therefore, and gratify thyself. Pine not away for that which, lawful or unlawful, thou, being the king's son, mayest have. Quicquid libet licet—Your will is law." Thus Jezebel to Ahab in a like case, 1 Kings, 21. 7. Dost not thou govern Israel? The abuse of power is the most dangerous temptation of the great.

2. Amnon having the impudence to own his wicked lust, mis-calling it love, (I love Tamar;) Jonadab put him in a way to compass his design, v. 5. Had he been what he pretended, (Amnon's friend,) he would have startled at the mention of such horrid wickedness, would have laid before him the evil of it, what an offence it was to God, and what a wrong to his own soul, to entertain such a vile thought; of what fatal consequence it would be to him to cherish and prosecute it; he would have used his subtlety to divert Amnon from it, by recommending some other person to him, whom he might lawfully marry. But he seems not at all surprised at it; objects not either the unlawfulness or the difficulty, the reproach, or so much as his father's displeasure: but puts him in the way to get Tamar to his bed-side, and then he might do as he pleased. Note, The case of those is very miserable, whose friends, instead of admonishing and reproving them, flatter them, and forward them in their sinful ways, and are their counsellors and contrivers to do wickedly. Amnon is already sick, but goes about; he must take upon him to be so ill, (and his thin looks will give colour enough to the pretence,) as not to be able to get up, and to have no appetite to any thing but just that which pleases his fancy. Dainty meat is abhorred, Job, 33. 20. the best dish from the king's table cannot please him; but if he can eat any thing, it must be from his sister Tamar's fair hand. This is what he is advised to.

3. Amnon follows these directions, and thus gets Tamar within his reach. He made himself sick, v. 6. Thus he lieth in wait secretly, as a lion in his den, to catch the poor, and to draw them into his net, Ps. 10. 8. . 10. David was always fond of his children, and concerned if any thing ailed them; he no sooner hears that Amnon is sick, than he comes himself to visit him. Let parents learn hence to be tender of their children, and compassionate toward them. The sick child commonly the mother comforteth, Isa. 66. 13. but let not the father be unconcerned. We may suppose, that, when David came to see his sick son, he gave him good counsel to make a right use of his affliction, and prayed with him, which yet did not alter his wicked purpose. At parting, the indulgent father asks, "Is there any thing thou hast a mind to, that I can procure for thee?" "Yes, Sir," says the dissembling son, "my stomach is weak, and I know not of any thing I can eat, unless it be a cake of my sister Tamar's making, and I cannot be satisfied that it is so, unless I see her make it, and it will do me the more good, if I eat it at her hand." David saw no reason to suspect any mischief intended, God hid his heart from understanding in this matter; he therefore immediately orders Tamar to go and attend her sick brother, v. 7. He does it very innocently, but afterward, no doubt, reflected upon it with great regret. Tamar as innocently goes to her brother's chamber, neither of them dreading any abuse: why should she from a brother, a sick brother? Not disdaining, in obedience to her father, and love to her brother, (though but her half-brother,) to be his nurse, v. 8, 9. Though she was a king's daughter, a great beauty, v. 1. and well-dressed, v. 18. yet she did not think it below her to knead cakes and bake them, nor had she done it now, if she had not been used to it. Good housewifery is not a thing below the greatest ladies, nor ought they to think it a disparagement to them. The virtuous woman, whose husband sits among the elders, yet works willingly with her hands, Prov. 31. 13. Modern ages have not been destitute of such instances, nor is it so unfashionable as some would make it. Preparing for the sick should be more the care and delight of the ladies, than preparing for the nice; charity more than curiosity.

2. Having got her to him, he contrives to have her alone; for the adulterer (much more, so vile an adulterer as this) is in care that no eye see him, Job, 24. 15. The meat is ready, but he cannot eat while he is looked at by those about him; they must all be turned out, v. 9. The sick must be humoured, and think they have a privilege to command. Tamar is willing to humour him, her chaste and virtuous soul has not the least thought of that which his polluted breast is full of; and therefore she makes no scruple of being alone with him in the inner chamber, v. 10. And now the mask is thrown off, the meat is thrown by, and the wicked wretch calls her, sister, and yet impudently courts her to come and lie with him, v. 11. It was a base affront to her virtue, to think it possible to persuade her to consent to such wickedness, when he knew her behaviour to be always exemplarily modest and virtuous. But it is common for those that live in uncleanness, to think others such as themselves, at least, tender to their sparks.

III. The Devil, as a strong tempter, deafens his ear to all the rea-sonings with which she resisted his assaults, and would have persuaded him to desist. We may well imagine what a surprise and terror it was to the young lady, to be thus attacked, how she blushed, and how she trembled; yet, in this great confusion, nothing could be said more pertinently, or with greater strength of argument, than what she said to him.

1. She calls him brother, reminding him of the nearness of the relation, which made it unlawful for him to marry her, much more to debauch her. It was expressly forbidden, Lev. 18. 9. under a severe penalty, Lev. 20. 17. Great care must be taken lest the love that should be among relations degenerate into lust.

2. She entreats him not to force her, which intimates that she would never consent to it in any degree; and what satisfaction could he take in offering violence?

3. She lays before him the great wickedness of it. It is folly; all sin is so, especially uncleanness: it is wickedness of the worst kind. Such abominations ought not to be committed in Israel, among the professing people of God, that have better statutes than the heathen have. We are Israelites; if we do such things, we are more inexcusable than others, and our condemnation will be more intolerable, for we reproach the Lord, and that worthy name by which we are called.

4. She represents to him the shame of it, which perhaps might influence him more than the sin of it. "For my part, whither shall I cause my shame to go? If it should be concealed, yet I shall blush to think of it as long as I live; and if ever it be known, how shall I be able to look any of my friends in the face? For thy part, thou shalt be as one of the fools in Israel," that is, "Thou shalt be looked upon as an atrocious debauchee, the worst of men; thou wilt lose thine interest in the esteem of all that are wise and good, and so will be set aside as unfit to rule, though the first-born; for Israel will never submit to the government of such a fool." Prospect of shame, especially everlasting shame, should deter us from sin.

5. To divert him from his wicked purpose at this time, and (if possible) to get clear of him, she intimates to him, that, probably, the king, rather than he should die for love of her, would dispense with the divine law, and let him marry her: not as if she thought he had such a dispensing power, or would pretend to it; she was confident that, upon notice given to the king by himself, of this wicked desire, which he would scarcely have believed from any one else, he would take an effectual course to protect her from him.

But all her arts and all her arguments availed not. His proud spirit cannot bear a denial; but her comfort, and honour, and all that was dear to her, must be sacrificed to his brutish and outrageous lust, v. 14. It is to be feared that Amnon, though young, had long lived a lewd life, which his father either knew not, or punished not; for a man could not, of a sudden, arrive at such a pitch of wickedness as this. But is this his love to Tamar? Is this the recompence he gives her for her readiness to attend him in his sickness? Will he deal with his sister as with a harlot? Base villain! God deliver all that are modest and virtuous from such wicked and unreasonable men.

IV. The Devil, as a tormentor and betrayer, immediately turns his love of her into hatred, v. 15. He hated her with great hatred, greatly, so it is in the margin, and grew as outrageous in his malice, as he had been in his lust; he basely turned her out of doors by force; nay, as if he now disdained to touch her with his own hands, he ordered his servant to pull her out, and bolt the door after her, v. 17. Now, 1. The innocent injured lady had reason to resent this as a great affront, and, in some respects, (as she says, v. 16.) worse than the former; for nothing could have been done more barbarous, or more disgraceful to her. Had he taken care to conceal what was done, her honour had been lost to herself only. Had he gone down on his knees, and begged her pardon, it might have been some little reparation. Had he given her time to compose herself after the horrid confusion she was put into, she might have kept her countenance when she went out, and so have kept her counsel. But to dismiss her thus hurried, thus rudely, as if she had done some wicked thing, obliged her, in her own defence, to proclaim the wrong that had been done her. 2. We may learn from it, both the malignity of sin, unbridled passions are as bad as unbridled appetites, and the mischievous consequences of sin, at last, it bites like a serpent; for here we find, (1.) That sins, sweet in the commission, afterward become odious and painful, and the sinner's own conscience makes them so to himself. Amnon hated Tamar, because she would not consent to his wickedness, and so take part of the blame upon herself, but, to the last, resisted it, and reasoned against it, and so threw it upon him. Had he hated the sin, and loathed himself for it, we might have hoped he was penitent; Godly sorrow worketh indignation, 2 Cor. 7. 11. but to hate the person he had abused, shewed that his conscience was terrified, but his heart not at all humbled. See what deceitful pleasures those of the flesh are, how soon they pass away, and turn into loathing; see Ezek. 23. 17. (2.) That sins, secret in the commission, afterward become open and public, and the sinners themselves often make them so. Their own tongues fall upon them. The Jewish doctors say, that, upon the occasion of this wickedness of Amnon, a law was made, that a young man and a young woman should never be alone together; for, said they, if the king's daughter be so used, what will become of the children of private men?

We must now leave the criminal to the terrors of his own guilty conscience, and inquire what becomes of the poor victim.

[1.] She bitterly lamented the injury she had received; as it was a stain to her honour, though no real blemish to her virtue. She tore her fine clothes in token of her grief, and put ashes upon her head, to deform herself, loathing her own beauty and ornaments, because they had occasioned Amnon's unlawful love; and she went on crying for another's sin, v. 19.

[2.] She retired to her brother Absalom's house, because he was her own brother, and there she lived in solitude and sorrow, in token of her modesty, and detestation of uncleanness. Absalom spoke kindly to her, bid her pass by the injury, for the present, designing himself to revenge it, v. 20. It should seem, by Absalom's question, (Has Amnon been with thee?) that Amnon was notorious for such lewd practices, so that it was dangerous for a modest woman to be with him; this Absalom might know, and yet Tamar be wholly ignorant of it.

21. But when king David heard of all these things, he was very wroth. 22. And Absalom spake unto his brother Amnon neither good nor bad: for Absalom hated Amnon, because he had forced his sister Tamar. 23. And it came to pass after two full years, that Absalom had sheep-shearers in Baal-hazor, which is beside Ephraim: and Absalom invited all the king's sons. 24. And Absalom came to the king, and said, Behold now, thy servant hath sheep-shearers; let the king, I beseech thee, and his servants, go with thy servant. 25. And the king said to Absalom, Nay, my son, let us not all now go, lest we be chargeable unto thee. And he pressed him: howbeit he would not go, but blessed him. 26. Then said Absalom, If not, I pray thee, let my brother Amnon go with us. And the king said unto him, Why should he go with thee? 27. But Absalom pressed him, that he let Amnon and all the king's sons go with him. 28. Now Absalom had commanded his servants, saying, Mark ye now when Amnon's heart is merry with wine, and when I say unto you, Smite Amnon; then kill him, fear not: have not I commanded you? be courageous, and be valiant. 29. And the servants of Absalom did unto Amnon as Absalom had commanded. Then all the king's sons arose, and every man gat him upon his mule, and fled.

What Solomon says of the beginning of strife, is as true of the beginning of all sin; it is as the letting forth of water; when once the flood-gates are plucked up, an inundation follows; one mischief begets another, and it is hard to say what shall be in the end thereof.

I. We are here told, how David resented the tidings of Amnon's sin; he was very wroth, v. 21. So he had reason to be, that his own son should do such a wicked thing, and draw him to be accessory to it. It would be a reproach to him, for not giving him a better education; it would be a blot upon his family, the ruin of his daughter, a bad example to his kingdom, and a wrong to his son's soul. But was it enough for him to be angry? He ought to have punished his son for it, and to have put him to open shame; both as a father, and as a king, he had power to do it. But the Septuagint here adds these words: But he saddened not the spirit of his son Amnon, because he loved him, because he was his first-born. He fell into Eli's error, whose sons made themselves vile, and he frowned not on them. If Amnon was dear to him, his punishing of him would have been so much the greater punishment to himself for his own uncleanness. But he cannot bear the shame those must submit to, who correct that in others which they are conscious of in themselves, and therefore his anger must serve instead of his justice; this hardens sinners, Eccl. 8. 11.

II. How Absalom resented it. He resolves already to do the part of a judge in Israel; and since his father will not punish Amnon, he will, from a principle, not of justice, or zeal for virtue, but of revenge, because he reckons himself affronted in the abuse done to his sister. Their mother was daughter to a heathen prince, ch. 3. 3. which perhaps they were upbraided with sometimes by their brethren, as children of a stranger; as such a one Absalom thought his sister was now treated; and if Amnon thought her fit to be made his harlot, he would think him fit to be made his slave; this enraged him, and nothing less than the blood of Amnon will quench his rage. Here we have,

1. The design conceived. Absalom hated Amnon, v. 22. and he that hateth his brother is a murderer already, and, like Cain, is of that wicked one, 1 John, 3. 12, 15. Absalom's hatred of his brother's crime had been commendable, and he might justly have prosecuted him for it by a due course of law, for example to others, and the making of some compensation to his injured sister; but to hate his person, and design his death by assassination, was to put a great affront upon God, by offering to repair the breach of his seventh commandment by the violation of his sixth, as if they were not all alike sacred; But he that said, Do not commit adultery, said also, Do not kill, James, 2. 11.

2. The design concealed. He said nothing to Amnon of this matter, either good or bad, appeared as if he did not know it, and maintained toward him his usual civility, only waiting for a fair opportunity to do him a mischief. That malice is the worst, (1.) What is hidden close, and has no vent given to it. If Absalom had reasoned the matter with Amnon, he might have convinced him of his sin, and brought him to repentance; but saying nothing, Amnon's heart was hardened, and his own more and more embittered against him; therefore rebuking our neighbour is opposed to hating him in our hearts, Lev. 19. 17. Let passion have vent, and it will spend itself. (2.) Which is gilded over with a shew of friendship; so Absalom's was, his words smoother than butter, but war in his heart. See Prov. 26. 26. (3.) Which is harboured long; two full years Absalom nursed this root of bitterness, v. 23. It may be, at first, he did not intend to kill his brother, (for if he had, he might have had as fair an opportunity to do it as he had at last,) he only waited for an occasion to disgrace him, or do him some other mischief; but, in time, his hatred ripened to this, that he would be no less than the death of him. If the sun going down once upon the wrath, gives such a place to the Devil as is intimated, Eph. 4. 26, 27. what would the sun-sets of two full years do!

3. The design laid. (1.) Absalom has a feast at his house in the country, as Nabal had, on occasion of his sheep-shearing, v. 23. Attentive as Absalom was to his person, (ch. 14. 26.) and as high as he looked, he knew the state of his flocks, and looked well to his herds. Those that have no other care about their estates in the country, than how to spend them in the town, take a ready way to see the end of them. When Absalom had sheep-shearers, he would himself be with them. (2.) To this feast he invites the king, his father, and all the princes of the blood, v. 24. Not only that he might have this opportunity to pay his respects to them, but that he might make himself the more respected among his neighbours. Those that are akin to great folks are apt to value themselves too much on their kindred. (3.) The king would not go himself, because he would not put him to the expence of his entertainment, v. 25. It seems, Absalom had an estate in his own hands, on which he lived like himself; the king had given it him, but would have him to be a good husband of it: in both these, he is an example to parents, when their children are grown up, to give them a competency to live upon, according to their rank, and then to take care that they do not live above it, especially that they be no way accessory to their doing so. It is prudent for young house-keepers to begin as they can hold out, and not to spend the wool upon the shearing of it. (4.) Absalom got leave for Amnon, and all the rest of the king's sons, to come and grace his table in the country, v. 26, 27. Absalom had so effectually concealed his enmity to Amnon, that David saw no reason to suspect any design upon him in that particular invitation, "Let my brother Amnon go;" but this would make the stroke more cutting to David, that he was himself drawn in to consent to that which gave the opportunity for it, as before, v. 7. It seems, David's sons, though grown up, continued to pay that deference to their father, as not to go such a small journey as this, without his leave. Thus ought children, even when they are become men and women, to honour their parents, advise with them, and do nothing material without their consent, much less against their mind.

4. The design executed, v. 28, 29. (1.) Absalom's entertainment was very plentiful; for he resolves that they shall all be merry with wine; at least, concludes that Amnon will be so, for he knew that he was apt to drink to excess. But, (2.) The orders he gave to his servants concerning Amnon, that they should mingle his blood with his wine, were very barbarous. Had he challenged him, and, in reliance upon the goodness of his cause, and the justice of God, fought him himself, though that had been bad enough, yet it had been more honourable and excusable; (our ancient law, in some cases, allowed trial by battle;) but to murder him, as he did, was to copy Cain's example, only that the reason made a difference; Abel was slain for his righteousness, Amnon for his wickedness. Observe the aggravations of this sin: [1.] He would have Amnon slain, when his heart was merry with wine, and he was, consequently, least apprehensive of danger, least able to resist it, and also least fit to go out of the world; as if his malice aimed to destroy both soul and body, not giving him time to say, Lord, have mercy upon me. What a dreadful surprise has death been to many, whose hearts have been overcharged with surfeiting and drunkenness! [2.] His servants must be employed to do it, and so involved in the guilt. He was to give the word of command, Smite Amnon; and then they, in obedience to him, and, upon presumption that his authority would bear them out, must kill him. What an impious defiance does he bid to the divine law, when, though the command of God is express, Thou shalt not kill, he bids them kill Amnon, with this warrant, "Have not I commanded you? That is enough; Be courageous, and fear neither God nor man." Those servants are ill-taught, (and have wicked masters,) who obey, in contradiction to God. Those are too obsequious, that will damn their souls to please their masters, whose big words cannot secure them from God's wrath. Masters must always command their servants, as those that know they also have a Master in heaven. [3.] He did it in the presence of all the king's sons, of whom it is said, ch. 8. 18. that they were chief rulers; so that it was an affront to public justice, which they had the administration of, and to the king his father whom they represented, and a contempt of that sword which should have been a terror to his evil deeds; while his evil deeds, on the contrary, were a terror to them that bare it. [4.] There is reason to suspect that Absalom did this, not only to revenge his sister's quarrel, but to make way for himself to the throne; which he was ambitious of, and which he would stand fair for, if Amnon the eldest son was taken off.

When the word of command was given, Absalom's servants failed not to execute it, being buoyed up with an opinion, that their master, being now next heir to the crown, (for Chileab was dead, as Bishop Patrick thinks,) would save them from harm. Now the threatened sword is drawn in David's house, which should not depart from it. First, His eldest son falls by it, himself being, by his wickedness, the cause of it, and his father, by his connivance, accessory to it. Secondly, All his sons flee from it, and come home in terror, not knowing how far their brother Absalom's bloody design might extend. See what mischief sin makes in families.

30. And it came to pass, while they were in the way, that tidings came to David, saying, Absalom hath slain all the king's sons, and there is not one of them left. 31. Then the king arose, and tare his garments, and lay on the earth; and all his servants stood by with their clothes rent. 32. And Jonadab, the son of Shimeah David's brother, answered and said, Let not my lord suppose that they have slain all the young men the king's sons: for Amnon only is dead: for by the appointment of Absalom this hath been determined from the day that he forced his sister Tamar. 33. Now therefore let not my lord the king take the thing to his heart, to think that all the king's sons are dead: for Amnon only is dead. 34. But Absalom fled. And the young man that kept the watch lifted up his eyes, and looked, and, behold, there came much people by the way of the hill-side behind him. 35. And Jonadab said unto the king, Behold, the king's sons come: as thy servant said, so it is. 36. And it came to pass, as soon as he had made an end of speaking, that, behold, the king's sons came, and lifted up their voice and wept: and the king also, and all his servants, wept very sore. 37. But Absalom fled, and went to Talmi, the son of Ammihud, king of Geshur. And David mourned for his son every day. 38. So Absalom fled, and went to Geshur, and was there three years. 39. And the soul of king David longed to go forth unto Absalom: for he was comforted concerning Amnon, seeing he was dead.

Here is,

I. The fright that David was put into by a false report brought to Jerusalem, that Absalom had slain all the king's sons, v. 30. It is common for fame to make bad worse; and the first news of such a thing as this, represents it more dreadful than afterward it proves. Let us not therefore be afraid of evil tidings, while they want confirmation, but, when we hear the worst, hope the best, at least, hope better. However, this false news gave as much affliction to David, for the present, as if it had been true; he tare his garments, and lay on the earth, while, as yet, it was only a flying story, v. 31. It was well that David had grace; he had need enough of it, for he had strong passions.

II. The rectifying of the mistake, two ways. 1. By the suggestions of Jonadab, David's nephew, who could tell him, Amnon only is dead, and not all the king's sons, v. 32, 33. and could tell him too that it was done by the appointment of Absalom, and designed from the day he forced his sister Tamar. What a wicked man was he, if he knew all this, or had any cause to suspect it, that he did not make David acquainted with it sooner, that means might have been used to make up the quarrel! such was Jonadab's duty, had he acted as an honest man, or, at least, that David might not have thrown Amnon into the mouth of danger, by letting him go to Absalom's house. If we do not our utmost to prevent mischief, we make ourselves accessory to it. If we say, Behold, we knew it not; doth not he that powdereth the heart, consider whether we did or no? See Prov. 24. 11, 12. It is well if Jonadab was not as guilty of Amnon's death, as he was of his sin; such friends do they prove, who are hearkened to as counsellors to do wickedly: he that would not be so kind as to prevent Amnon's sin, neither would he be so kind as to prevent his ruin, when, it should seem, he might have done both. 2. By the safe return of all the king's sons, except Amnon. They, and their attendants, were speedily discovered by the watch, v. 34, 35. and soon arrived to shew themselves alive, but to bring the certain sad news that Absalom had murdered their brother Amnon. The grief David had been in for that which was not, made him the better able to bear that which was, by giving him a sensible occasion, when he was undeceived, to thank God that all his sons were not dead: yet that Amnon was dead, and slain by his own brother, in such a treacherous barbarous manner, was enough to put the king and court, the king and kingdom, into real mourning. Sorrow is never more reasonable, than when there is sin in the case.

III. Absalom's flight from justice. Absalom immediately fled, v. 34. He was now as much afraid of the king's sons, as they were of him; they fled from his malice, he from their justice; no part of the land of Israel could shelter him, the cities of refuge gave no protection to a wilful murderer; though David had let Amnon's incest go unpunished, Absalom could not promise himself his pardon for this murder; so express was the law in this case, and so well known David's justice, and his dread of blood-guiltiness. He therefore made the best of his way to his mother's relations, and was entertained by his grandfather Talmi, king of Geshur, v. 37. and there he was protected three years, v. 38. David not demanding him, and Talmi not thinking himself obliged to send him back, unless he were demanded.

IV. David's uneasiness for his absence. He mourned for Amnon a good while, v. 37. but, he being past recall, time wore off that grief; he was comforted concerning Amnon: it also wore off too much his detestation of Absalom's sin; instead of loathing him, as a murderer, he longs to go forth to him, v. 39. At first, he could not find in his heart to do justice on him, now he can almost find in his heart to take him into his favour again. This was David's infirmity; something God saw in his heart that made a difference, else we should have thought that he, as much as Eli, honoured his sons more than God.

CHAP. XIV.

Now Absalom threw himself out of his royal father's protection and favour, we read in the foregoing chapter, which left him an exile, outlawed, and proscribed; in this chapter, we have the arts that were used to bring him and his father together again, and how, at last, it was done; which is here recorded, to shew the folly of David, in sparing him, and indulging him in his wickedness, for which he was, soon after, severely corrected by his unnatural rebellion. I. Joab, by bringing a feigned issue (as the lawyers speak) to be tried before him, in the case of a poor widow of Tekoah, gains from him a judgment in general, That the case might be so, as that the putting of a murderer to death ought to be dispensed with, v. 1. 20. II. Upon the application of this, he gains from him an order to bring Absalom back to Jerusalem, while yet he was forbidden the court, v. 21. 24. III. After an account of Absalom, his person, and family, we are told how, at length, he was introduced by Joab into the king's presence, and the king was thoroughly reconciled to him, v. 25. 33.

1. NOW Joab the son of Zeruah perceived that the king's heart was toward Absalom. 2. And Joab sent to Tekoah, and fetched thence a wise woman, and said unto her, I pray thee, feign thyself to be a mourner, and put on now mourning apparel, and anoint not thyself with oil, but be as a woman that had a long time mourned for the dead: 3. And come to the king, and speak on this manner unto him. So Joab put the words in her mouth. 4. And when the woman of Tekoah spake to the king, she fell on her face to the ground, and did obeisance, and said, Help, O king. 5. And the king said unto her, What aileth thee? And she answered, I am indeed a widow woman, and mine husband is dead. 6. And thy handmaid had two sons, and they two strove together in the field, and there was none to part them, but the one smote the other, and slew him. 7. And, behold, the whole family is risen against thine handmaid, and they said, Deliver him that smote his brother, that we may kill him, for the life of his brother whom he slew; and we will destroy the heir also: and so they shall quench my coal which is left, and shall not leave to my husband neither name nor remainder upon the earth. 8. And the king said unto the woman, Go to thine house, and I will give charge concerning thee. 9. And the woman of Tekoah said unto the king, My lord, O king, the iniquity be on me, and on my father's house: and the king and his throne be guiltless. 10. And the king said, Whosoever saith ought unto thee, bring him to me, and he shall not touch thee any more. 11. Then said she, I pray thee, let the king remember the LORD thy God, that thou wouldest not suffer the revengers of blood to destroy any more, lest they destroy my son. And he said, As the LORD liveth, there shall not one hair of thy son fall to the earth. 12. Then the woman said, Let thine handmaid, I pray thee, speak one word unto my lord the king. And he said, Say on. 13. And the woman said, Wherefore then hast thou thought such a thing against the people of God? for the king doth speak this thing as one which is faulty, in that the king doth not fetch home again his banished. 14. For we must needs die, and are as water spilt on the ground, which cannot be gathered up again; neither doth God respect any person; yet doth he devise means, that his banished be not expelled from him. 15. Now therefore that I am come to speak of this thing unto my lord the king, it is because the people have made me afraid: and thy handmaid said, I will now speak unto the king; it may be that the king will perform the request of his handmaid. 16. For the king will hear, to deliver his handmaid out of the hand of the man that would destroy me and my son together out of the inheritance of God. 17. Then thine handmaid said, The word of my lord the king shall now be comfortable: for as an angel of God, so is my lord the king to discern good and bad: therefore the LORD thy God will be with thee. 18. Then the king answered and said unto the woman, Hide not from me, I pray thee, the thing that I shall ask thee. And the woman said, Let my lord the king now speak. 19. And the king said, Is not the hand of Joab with thee in all this? And the woman answered and said, As thy soul liveth, my lord the king, none can turn to the right hand or to the left from aught that my lord the king hath spoken: for thy servant Joab, he bade me, and he put all these words in the mouth of thine handmaid: 20. To fetch about this form of speech hath thy servant Joab done this thing: and my lord is wise, according to the wisdom of an angel of God, to know all things that are in the earth.

Here is,

I. Joab's design to get Absalom recalled out of banishment, his crime pardoned, and his attainder reversed, v.1. Joab made himself very busy in this affair. 1. As a courtier, that was studious, by all ways possible, to ingratiate himself with his prince, and improve his interest in his favour; he perceived that the king's heart was towards Absalom, and that, the heat of his displeasure being over, he still retained his old affection for him, and only wanted a friend to court him to be reconciled, and to contrive for him how he might do it, without impeaching the honour of his justice. Joab, finding how David stood affected, undertook this good office. 2. As a friend to Absalom, whom, perhaps, he had a particular kindness for, at least, looked upon as the rising sun, to whom it was his interest to recommend himself. He plainly foresaw that his father would, at length, be reconciled to him, and therefore thought he should make both his friends, if he were instrumental to bring it about. 3. As a statesman, and one concerned for the public welfare. He knew how much Absalom was the darling of the people, and if David should die while he was in banishment, it might occasion a civil war between those that were for him and those that were against him; for it is probable, that, though all Israel loved his person, yet they were much divided upon his case. 4. As one who was himself a delinquent, by the murder of Abner: he was conscious to himself of the guilt of blood, and that he was himself obnoxious to public justice, and therefore, whatever favour he could procure to be shewn to Absalom, would corroborate his reprieve.

II. His contrivance to do it, by laying somewhat of a parallel case before the king, which was done so dexterously by the person he employed, that the king took it for a real case, and gave judgment upon it, as he had done upon Nathan's parable; and the judgment being in favour of the criminal, the manager might, by that, discover his sentiments so far as to venture upon the application of it, and to shew that it was the case of his own family, which, it is probable, she was instructed not to proceed to, if the king's judgment upon her case had been severe.

1. The person he employed is not named, but is said to be a woman of Tekoah, one whom he knew to be fit for such an undertaking: and it was requisite that the scene should be laid at a distance, that David might not think it strange that he had not heard of it before. It is said, She was a wise woman, one that had a quicker wit, and a readier tongue, than most of her neighbours, v.2. The truth of the story would be the less suspected, when it came, as was supposed, from the person's own mouth.

2. The character she put on, was, that of a disconsolate widow, v.2. Joab knew such a one would have an easy access to the king, who was always ready to comfort the mourners, especially the mourning widows, having himself mentioned it among the titles of God's honour, that he is a Judge of the widows, Ps. 68. 5. God's ear, no doubt, is more open to the cries of the afflicted, and his heart too, than that of the most merciful princes on earth could be.

3. It was a case of compassion which she had to represent to the king, and a case in which she could have no relief but from the chancery in the royal breast: the law (and consequently the judgment of all the inferior courts) being against her. She tells the king that she had buried her husband, v. 5. that she had two sons that were the support and comfort of her widowed state, that these two (as young men are apt to do) fell out and fought, and one of them unhappily killed the other, v. 6. that, for her part, she was desirous to protect the manslayer, for, as Rebekah argued concerning her two sons, Why should she be deprived of them both in one day? Gen. 27. 46. But though she, who was nearest of kin to the slain, was willing to let fall the demands of an avenger of blood, yet the other relations insisted upon it, that the surviving brother should be put to death, according to law, not out of any affection, either to justice or to the memory of the slain brother, but that, by destroying the heir, (which they had the impudence to own was the thing they aimed at,) the inheritance might be their's: and thus they would cut off, (1.) Her comfort; "They shall quench my coal, deprive me of the only support of my old age, and put a period to all my joy in this world, which is reduced to this one coal." (2.) Her husband's memory: "His family will be quite extinct, and they will leave him neither name nor remainder," v. 7.

4. The king promised her his favour, and a protection for her son. Observe how she grew upon the king's compassionate concessions. (1.) Upon the representation of her case, he promised to consider of it, and to give orders about it; v. 8. This was encouraging, that he did not dismiss her petition with "Curat lex—Let the law take its course; blood calls for blood, and let it have what it calls for;" but he will take time to inquire whether the allegations of her petition be true. (2.) The woman is not content with this, but begs that he would immediately give judgment in her favour; and, if the matter of fact were not as she represented it, and consequently a wrong judgment given upon it, let her bear the blame, and free the king and his throne from guilt, v. 9. Yet her saying this would not acquit the king, if he should pass sentence without taking due cognizance of the case. (3.) Being thus pressed, he makes a further promise, that she should not be injured or insulted by her adversaries, but he would protect her from all molestation, v. 10. Magistrates ought to be the patrons of oppressed widows. (4.) Yet this does not content her, unless she can get her son's pardon, and protection for him too. Parents are not easy, unless their children be safe, safe for both worlds, v. 11. "Let not the avenger of blood destroy my son, for I am undone if I lose him; as good take my life as his. Therefore let the king remember the Lord thy God," that is; [1.] "Let him confirm this merciful sentence with an oath, making mention of the Lord our God, by way of appeal to him, that the sentence may be indisputable, and irreversible; and then I shall be easy. See Heb. 6. 17, 18. [2.] "Let him consider what good reason there is for this merciful sentence, and then he himself will be confirmed in it. Remember how gracious and merciful the Lord thy God is, how he bears long with sinners, and does not deal with them according to their deserts, but is ready to forgive. Remember how the Lord thy God spared Cain, who slew his brother, and protected him from the avengers of blood, Gen. 4. 15. Remember how the Lord thy God forgave thee the blood of Uriah, and let the king, that has found mercy, shew mercy." Note, Nothing is more proper, or more powerful, to engage us to every duty, especially to all acts of mercy and kindness, than to remember the Lord our God. [5.] This importunate widow, by pressing the matter thus close, obtains, at last, a full pardon for her son, ratified with an oath as she desired, As the Lord liveth, there shall not one hair of thy son fall to the earth, that is, "I will undertake he shall come to no damage upon this account." The Son of David has assured all that put themselves under his protection, that, though they should be put to death for his sake, not a hair of their head shall perish, Luke, 21. 16, 18. though they should lose for him, they should not lose by him. Whether David did well, thus to undertake the protection of a murderer, whom the cities of refuge would not protect, I cannot say. But, as the matter of fact appeared to him, there was not only great reason for compassion to the mother, but room enough for a favourable judgment concerning the son: he had slain his brother, but he kated him not in time past; it was upon a sudden provocation, and, for aught that appeared, it might be done in his own defence. He pleaded not this himself, but the judge must be of counsel for the prisoner; and therefore, Let mercy, at this time, rejoice against judgment.

5. The case being thus adjudged in favour of her son, it is now time to apply it to the king's son, Absalom. The mask here begins to be thrown off, and another scene opened; the king is surprised, but not at all displeased, to find his humble petitioner, of a sudden, become his reprover, his privy-counsellor, an advocate for the prince his son, and the mouth of the people, undertaking to represent to him their sentiments. She begs his pardon, and his patience, for what she had further to say, v. 12. and has leave to say it, the king being very well pleased with her wit and humour.

(1.) She supposes Absalom's case to be, in effect, the same with that which she had put as her son's; and therefore, if the king would protect her son, though he had slain his brother, much more ought he to protect his own, and to fetch home his banished, v. 13. Mutato nomine, de te fabula narratur—Change but the names, to you the tale belongs. She names not Absalom, nor needed she to name him: David longed so much after him, and had him so much in his thoughts, that he was soon aware whom she meant by his banished. And in those two words were two arguments which the king's tender spirit felt the force of; "He is banished, and has, for three years, undergone the disgrace and terror, and all the inconveniencies, of banishment: sufficient to such a one is this punishment: but he is thy banished, thy own son, a piece of thyself, thy dear son, whom thou lovest.

It is true, Absalom's case differed very much from that which she had put. Absalom did not slay his brother upon a hasty passion; but maliciously, and upon an old grudge; not in the field, where there were no witnesses, but at table, before all his guests. Absalom was not an only son, as her's was; David had many more, and one lately born, more likely to be his successor than Absalom, for he was called Jedidiah, because God loved him. But David was himself too well affected to the cause, to be critical in his remarks upon the disparity of the cases, and was more desirous than she could be, to bring that favourable judgment to his own son which he had given concerning her's.

(2.) She reasons upon it with the king, to persuade him to recall Absalom out of banishment, give him his pardon, and take him into his favour again.

[1.] She pleads the interest which the people of Israel had in him. "What is done against him is done against the people of God, who have their eye upon him as heir of the crown, at least, have their eye upon the house of David in general, with which the covenant is made, and which therefore they cannot see the diminution and decay of, by the fall of so many of its branches in the flower of their age. Therefore the king speaks to one that is faulty, for he will provide that my husband's name and memory be not cut off, and yet takes no care, though his own be in danger, which is of more value and importance than ten thousand of our's.

[2.] She pleads man's mortality, v. 14. "We must needs die, it is appointed for us, we cannot avoid the thing itself, nor defer it till another time. We are all under a fatal necessity of dying; and when we are dead, we are past recall, as water spilt upon the ground; nay, even while we are alive, we are so, we have lost our immortality, past retrieve. Amnon must have died, some time, if Absalom had not killed him; and if Absalom be now put to death for killing him, that will not bring him to life again." This was poor reasoning, and would serve against the punishment of any murderer; but, it should seem, Amnon was a man little regarded by the people, and his death little lamented, and it was generally thought hard that so dear a life as Absalom's should go for one so little valued as Amnon's.

[3.] She pleads God's mercy and his clemency toward poor guilty sinners. "God does not take away the soul, or life, but devises means that his banished, his children that have offended him, and are obnoxious to his justice, as Absalom is to thine, be not for ever expelled from him," v. 14. Here are two great instances of the mercy of God to sinners, properly urged as reasons for shewing mercy. First, The patience he exercises toward them. His law is broken, yet he does not immediately take away the life of those that break it; does not strike sinners dead, as justly he might, in the act of sin, but bears with them, and waits to be gracious. God's vengeance had suffered Absalom to live; why then should not David's justice suffer him? Secondly, The provision he had made for their restoration to his favour, that though by sin they have banished themselves from him, yet they might not be expelled, or cast off, for ever. Atonement might be made for sinners by sacrifice. Lepers, and others ceremonially unclean, were banished, but provision was made for their cleansing, that, though for a time excluded, they might not be finally expelled. The state of sinners is a state of banishment from God. Poor banished sinners are likely to be for ever expelled from God, if some course be not taken to prevent it: it is against the mind of God, that they should be so, for he is not willing that any should perish; infinite wisdom has devised proper means to prevent it; so that it is the sinners' own fault, if they be cast off. This instance of God's good will towards us all, should incline us to be merciful and compassionate one towards another, Matth. 18. 32, 33.

6. She concludes her address, with high compliments to the king, and strong expressions of her assurance that he would do what was just and kind, both in the one case and in the other, v. 15.. 17. for, as if the case had been real, still she pleads for herself, and her son, yet meaning Absalom.

(1.) She would not have troubled the king thus, but that the people made her afraid. Understanding it of her own case, all her neighbours made her apprehensive of the ruin she and her son were upon the brink of, from the avengers of blood, the terror of which made her thus bold in her applications to the king himself. Understanding it of Absalom's case, she gives the king to understand, what he did not know before, that the nation was disgusted at his severity towards Absalom, to that degree, that she was really afraid it would occasion a general mutiny or insurrection, for the preventing of which great mischief, she ventured to speak to the king himself. The fright she was in must excuse her rudeness.

(2.) She applied herself to him with a great confidence in his wisdom and clemency. "I said, I will speak to the king myself, and ask nobody to speak for me; for the king will hear reason, even from so mean a creature as I am, will hear the cries of the oppressed, and will not suffer the poorest of his subjects to be destroyed out of the inheritance of God," that is, "driven out of the land of Israel, to seek for shelter among the uncircumcised, as Absalom is, whose case is so much the worse, that, being shut out of the inheritance of God, he wants God's law and ordinances, which might help to bring him to repentance, and is in danger of being infected with the idolatry of the heathen among whom he sojourns, and of bringing home the infection. To engage the king to grant her request, she expresses a confident hope, that his answer would be comfortable, and such as angels bring, (as Bishop Patrick explains it,) who are messengers of divine mercy. What this woman says, by way of compliment, the prophet says, by way of promise, Zech. 12. 8. that when the weak shall be as David, the house of David shall be as the angel of the Lord. "And, in order to this, the Lord thy God shall be with thee, to assist thee in this and every judgment thou givest." Great expectations are great engagements, especially to persons of honour, to do their utmost not to disappoint those that depend upon them.

Lastly, The hand of Joab is suspected by the king, and acknowledged by the woman, to be in all this, v. 18.. 20.

(1.) The king soon suspected it. For he could not think that such a woman as this, would have appealed to him, in a matter of such moment, of her own head. And he knew none so likely to set her on as Joab, who was a politic man, and a friend of Absalom.

(2.) The woman very honestly owned it. "Thy servant Joab, he bade me. If it be well done, let him have the thanks; if ill, let him bear the blame." Though she found it very agreeable to the king, yet she would not take the praise of it to herself, but speaks the truth as it was, and gives us an example to do likewise, and never to tell a lie for the concealing of a well-managed scheme; Dare to be true, nothing can need a lie.

21 And the king said unto Joab, Behold now, I have done this thing: go therefore, bring the young man Absalom again. 22. And Joab fell to the ground on his face, and bowed himself, and thanked the king, and Joab said, To-day thy servant knoweth that I have found grace in thy sight, my lord, O king, in that the king hath fulfilled the request of his servant. 23. So Joab arose and went to Geshur, and brought Absalom to Jerusalem. 24. And the king said, Let him turn to his own house, and let him not see my face. So Absalom returned to his own house, and saw not the king's face. 25. But in all Israel there was none to be so much praised as Absalom for his beauty: from the sole of his foot even to the crown of his head there was no blemish in him. 26. And when he polled his head, (for it was at every year's end that he polled it: because the hair was heavy on him, therefore he polled it,) he weighed the hair of his head at two hundred shekels after the king's weight. 27. And unto Absalom there were born three sons, and one daughter, whose name was Tamar, she was a woman of a fair countenance.

Observe here,

I. Orders given for the bringing back of Absalom; the errand on which the woman came to David was so agreeable, and her management of it so very ingenious and surprising, that he was brought into a peculiarly kind humour; Go, (says he to Joab,) bring the young man Absalom again, v. 21. He was himself inclined to favour him, yet, for the honour of his justice, he would not do it but upon intercession made for him, which may illustrate the methods of divine grace. It is true, God has thoughts of compassion toward poor sinners, not willing that any should perish, yet he is reconciled to them through a Mediator, who intercedes with him on their behalf, and to whom he has given these orders, Go bring them again. God was in Christ reconciling the world to himself, and he came to this land of our banishment, to bring us to God.

Joab, having received these orders, 1. Returns thanks to the king for doing him the honour to employ him in an affair so universally grateful, v. 22. Joab took it as a kindness to himself, and (some think) as an indication that he would never call him to an account for the murder he had been guilty of. But if he meant so, he was mistaken, as we shall find, 1 Kings, 2. 5, 6. 2. Delays not to execute David's orders; he brought Absalom to Jerusalem, v. 23. I see not how David can be justified in suspending the execution of the ancient law, Gen. 9. 6. Whoso sheds man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed, in which a righteous magistrate ought not to acknowledge even his brethren, or know his own children. God's laws were never designed to be like cobwebs, which catch the little flies, but suffer the great ones to break through. God justly made Absalom a scourge to him, whom his foolish pity thus spared. But, though he allowed him to return to his own house, he forbade him the court, and would not see him himself, v. 24. He put him under this interdict, (1.) For his own honour, that he might not seem to countenance so great a criminal, nor to forgive him too easily. (2.) For Absalom's greater humiliation. Perhaps he had heard something of his conduct, when Joab went to fetch him, which gave him too much reason to think that he was not truly penitent; he therefore put him under this mark of his displeasure, that he might be awakened to a sight of his sin, and to sorrow for it, and might make his peace with God; upon the first notice of which, no doubt, David would be forward to receive him again into his favour.

II. Occasion taken from hence to give an account of Absalom. Nothing is said of his wisdom and piety; though he was the son of such a devout father, we read nothing of his devotion; parents cannot give grace to their children, though they give them ever so good an education. All that is here said of him, is, 1. That he was a very handsome man; there was not his equal in all Israel for beauty, v. 25. A poor commendation for a man that had nothing else in him valuable. Handsome are they that handsome do. Many a polluted deformed soul dwells in a fair and comely body; witness Absalom's, that was polluted with blood, and deformed with unnatural disaffection to his father and prince. In his body there was no blemish, but in his mind nothing but wounds and bruises. Perhaps this was one reason why his father was so fond of him, and protected him from justice. Those have reason to fear affliction in their children, who are better pleased with their beauty than with their virtue. 2. That he had a very fine head of hair. Whether it was the length, or colour, or extraordinary softness of it, something there was which made it very valuable, and very much an ornament to him, v. 26. This notice is taken of his hair, not as the hair of a Nazarite, (he was far from that strictness,) but as the hair of a beau. He let it grow, till it was a burthen to him, and was heavy on him, nor would he cut it, as long as ever he could bear it; as pride feels no cold, so it feels no heat; and that which feeds and gratifies it is not complained of, though very uneasy. When he did poll it at certain times, for ostentation, he had it weighed, that it might be seen how much it excelled other men's, and it weighed two hundred shekels, which some reckon to be three pounds and two ounces of our weight; and with the oil and powder, especially if it were powdered (as Josephus says the fashion then was) with gold-dust, Bishop Patrick thinks it is not at all incredible that it should weigh so much. This fine hair proved his halter, ch. 13. 9. 3. That his family began to be built up. It is probable that it was a good while before he had a child; and then it was, that, despairing of having one, he set up that pillar which is mentioned, ch. 18. 18. to bear up his name; but afterward he had three sons, and one daughter, v. 27. Or, perhaps, these sons, while he was hatching his rebellion, were all cut off by the righteous hand of God, and, thereupon, he set up that monument.

28. So Absalom dwelt two full years in Jerusalem, and saw not the king's face. 29. Therefore Absalom sent for Joab, to have sent him to the king; but he would not come to him; and when he sent again the second time, he would not come. 30. Therefore he said unto his servants, See, Joab's field is near mine, and he hath barley there; go and set it on fire. And Absalom's servants set the field on fire. 31. Then Joab arose, and came to Absalom unto his house, and said unto him, Wherefore have thy servants set my field on fire? 32. And Absalom answered Joab, Behold, I sent unto thee, saying, Come hither, that I may send thee to the king, to say, Wherefore am I come from Geshur? It had been good for me to have been there still: now therefore let me see the king's face; and if there be any iniquity in me, let him kill me. 33. So Joab came to the king, and told him: and when he had called for Absalom, he came to the king, and bowed himself on his face to the ground before the king: and the king kissed Absalom.

Three years, Absalom had been an exile with his father-in-law, and now, two years, a prisoner at large in his own house, and, in both, better dealt with than he deserved; yet his spirit was still unhumiliated, his pride unmortified, and, instead of being thankful that his life is spared, he thinks himself sorely wronged that he is not restored to all his places at court. Had he truly repented of his sin, his distance from the gaieties of the court, and his solitude and retirement in his own house, especially being in Jerusalem the holy city, would have been very agreeable to him. If a murderer must live, yet let him be for ever a recluse. But Absalom cannot bear this just and gentle mortification; he longs to see the king's face, pretending it was because he loved him, but really because he wanted an opportunity to supplant him. He cannot do his father a mischief till he is reconciled to him; this, therefore, is the first branch of his plot; this snake cannot sting again, till he be warmed in his father's bosom. He gained this point, not by pretended submissions and promises of reformation, but (would you think it?) by insults and injuries.

1. By his insolent carriage toward Joab, he brought him to mediate for him. Once and again, he sent to Joab to come and speak with him, for he durst not go to him; but Joab would not come, v. 29. probably, because Absalom had not owned the kindness he had done him, in bringing him to Jerusalem, so gratefully as he thought he should have done; proud men take every service done them for a debt. One would have thought that a person in Absalom's circumstances would have sent to Joab a kindly message, and offered him a large gratuity; courtiers expect it; instead of this, he bids his servants set Joab's corn-fields on fire, v. 30. as spiteful a thing as he could do. Samson could not think of a greater injury to do the Philistines than this. Strange, that Absalom should think, by doing Joab a mischief, to prevail with him to do him a kindness; or to recommend himself to the favour of his prince or people, by shewing himself so very malicious and ill-natured, and such an enemy to the public good, for the fire might spread to the corn of others. Yet by this means he brings Joab to him, v. 38. Thus God, by afflictions, brings those to him that kept at a distance from him. Absalom was obliged by the law to make a restitution, Exod. 22. 6. yet we do not find that either he offered it, or that Joab demanded it. Joab (it might be) thought he could not justify his refusal to go and speak with him; and therefore Absalom thought he could justify his taking this way to fetch him. And now Joab, (perhaps frightened at the surprising boldness and fury of Absalom, and apprehensive that he had made an interest in the people strong enough to bear him out in doing the most daring things, else he would never have done this,) not only puts up with this injury, but goes on his errand to the king. See what some men can do, by threats, and carrying things with a high hand.

2. By his insolent message (for I can call it no better) to the king, he recovered his place at court, to see the king's face, that is, to become a privy counsellor, Esth. 1. 14. (1.) His message was haughty and imperious, and very unbecoming either a son or a subject, v. 32. He undervalued the favour that had been shewed him, in recalling him from banishment, and restoring him to his own house, and that in Jerusalem; Wherefore am I come from Geshur? He denies his own crimes, though most notorious, and will not own that there was any iniquity in him, insinuating that, therefore, he had been wronged in the rebuke he had been under. He defies the king's justice, "Let him kill me, if he can find in his heart;" knowing he loved him too well to do it. (2.) Yet with this message he carried his point, v. 33. David's strong affection for him construed all this to be the language of a great respect to his father, and an earnest desire of his favour, when, alas, it was nothing less. See how easily wise and good men may be imposed upon by their own children that design ill, especially when they are blindly fond of them. Absalom, by the posture of his body, testified his submission to his father, He bowed himself on his face to the ground; and David, with a kiss, sealed his pardon. Did the bowels of a father prevail to reconcile him to an impenitent son, and shall penitent sinners question the compassion of him who is the Father of mercy? If Ephraim bemoan himself, God soon bemoans him, with all the kind expressions of a fatherly tenderness; He is a dear son, and a pleasant child, Jer. 31. 20.

CHAP. XV.

Absalom's name signifies the peace of his father, yet he proves his greatest trouble; so often are we disappointed in our expectations from the creature. The sword, entailed upon David's house, had hitherto been among his children, but now it begins to be drawn against himself, with this aggravation, that he may thank himself for it; for, had he done justice upon the murderer, he had prevented the traitor. The story of Absalom's rebellion begins with this chapter, but we must go over three or four more before we see the end of it. In this chapter, we have, I. The arts Absalom used to insinuate himself into the people's affection, v. 1..6. II. His open avowal of his pretensions to the crown at Hebron, whither he went under colour of a vow, and the strong party that appeared for him there, v. 7..12. III. The notice brought of this to David, and his flight from Jerusalem, thereupon, v. 13..18. In his flight we are told, 1. What passed between him and Ittai, v. 19..22. 2. The concern of the country for him, v. 23. 3. His conference with Zadok, v. 24..29. 4. His tears and prayers upon this occasion, v. 30, 31. 5. Matters concerted by him with Hushai, v. 32..37. Now the word of God was fulfilled, that he would raise up evil against him out of his own house, ch. 12. 10.

1. AND it came to pass after this, that Absalom prepared him chariots and horses, and fifty men to run before him. 2. And Absalom rose up early, and stood beside the way of the gate: and it was so, that when any man that had a controversy came to the king for judgment, then Absalom called unto him, and said, Of what city art thou? And he said, Thy servant is of one of the tribes of Israel. 3. And Absalom said unto him, See, thy matters are good and right; but there is no man deputed of the king to hear thee. 4. Absalom said moreover, Oh that I were made judge in the land, that every man which hath any suit or cause might come unto me, and I would do him justice! 5. And it was so, that when any man came nigh to him to do him obeisance, he put forth his hand, and took him, and kissed him. 6. And on this manner did Absalom to all Israel that came to the king for judgment: so Absalom stole the hearts of the men of Israel.

Absalom is no sooner restored to his place at court, than he aims to be in the throne. He that was unhumiliated under his troubles, became insufferably proud when they were over; and he cannot be content with the honour of being the king's son, and the prospect of being his successor, but he must be king now. His mother was a king's daughter; on that, perhaps, he valued himself, and despised his father, who was but the son of Jesse. She was the daughter of a heathen king, which made him the less concerned for the peace of Israel. David, in this unhappy issue of that marriage, smarted for his being unequally yoked with an unbeliever.

When Absalom was restored to the king's favour, if he had had any sense of gratitude, he would have studied how to oblige his father, and make him easy; but, on the contrary, he meditates how to undermine him, by stealing the hearts of the people from him. Two things recommend a man to popular esteem; greatness, and goodness.

I. Absalom looks great, v. 1. He had learned of the king of Geshur, what was not allowed to the kings of Israel, to multiply horses; which make him look desirable, while his father, on his mule, looks despicable. The people desired a king like the nations; and such a one Absalom will be, appearing in pomp and magnificence above what had been seen in Jerusalem. Samuel had foretold that this would be the manner of the king; He shall have chariots and horsemen, and some shall run before his chariots, 1 Sam. 8. 11. and this is Absalom's manner. Fifty foot-men (in rich liveries we may suppose) running before him, to give notice of his approach, would highly gratify his pride, and the people's foolish fancy. David thinks that it is designed only to grace his court, and connives at it. Those parents know not what they do, who indulge a proud humour in their children; for I have seen more young people ruined by pride than by any one lust whatsoever.

II. Absalom will seem very good too, but with a very bad design. Had he proved himself a good son, and a good subject, and set himself to serve his father's interest, he had done his present duty, and shewed himself worthy of future honours, after his father's death. Those that know how to obey well, know how to rule. But to shew how good a judge, and how good a king, he will be, is but to deceive himself and others. Those are good indeed that are good in their own place, not that pretend how good they will be in other people's places. But this is all the goodness we find in Absalom.

1. He wishes that he were a judge in Israel, v. 4. He had all the pomp and all the pleasure he could wish; yet this will not content him, unless he have power too; Oh that I were a judge in Israel! He, that should himself have been judged to death for murder, has the impudence to aim at being a judge of others. We read not of Absalom's wisdom, virtue, or learning in the laws, nor had he given any proofs of his love to justice, but the contrary; yet he wishes he were a judge. Note, Those are commonly most ambitious of preferment that are least fit for it; the best qualified are the most modest and self-diffident, while it is no better than the spirit of an Absalom that says, Oh that I were a judge in Israel!

2. He takes a very bad course for the accomplishing of his wish. Had he humbly petitioned his father to employ him in the administration of justice, and studied to qualify himself for it, (according to the rule, Exod. 18. 21.) no doubt, he had been sure of the next judge's place that fell; but this is too mean a post for his proud spirit. It is below him to be subordinate, though to the king his father; he must be supreme, or nothing. He wants to be such a judge, that every man who has any cause shall come to him: in all causes, and over all persons, he must preside; little thinking what a fatigue this would be, to have every man come to him. Moses himself could not bear it. Those know not what power is, that grasp at so much, so very much.

To gain the power he aims at, he endeavours to instil into the people's minds,

(1.) A bad opinion of the present administration, as if the affairs of the kingdom were altogether neglected, and no care taken about them. He got round him all he could, that had business at the council-board, inquired what their business was; and, [1.] Upon a slight and general inquiry into their cause, he pronounced it good; Thy matters are right. A fit man indeed to be a judge, who would give judgment upon hearing one side only! For he has a bad cause indeed that cannot put a good colour upon it, when he himself has the telling of the story. But, [2.] He told them that it was to no purpose to appeal to the throne, There is no man deputed of the king to hear thee. The king is himself old, and past business; or so taken up with his devotions, that he never minds business; (his sons were so addicted to their pleasures, that, though they had the name of chief rulers, they took no care of the affairs committed to them;) he further seems to insinuate, what a great loss there was of him, while he was banished and confined, and how much the public suffered by it; what his father said truly in Saul's reign, Ps. 75. 3. he says falsely, The land and all the inhabitants of it are dissolved, all will go to wreck and ruin, unless I bear up the pillars of it. Every appellant shall be made to believe that he will never have justice done him, unless Absalom be viceroy or lord-justice. It is the way of turbulent factious aspiring men to reproach the government they are under, presumptuous are they, self-willed, and not afraid to speak evil of dignities, 2 Pet. 2. 10. Even David himself, the best of kings, and his administration, could not escape the worst of censures. They that aim to usurp, cry out of grievances, and pretend to design nothing but the redress of them: as Absalom here.

2. A good opinion of his own fitness to rule. That the people might say, "Oh that Absalom were a judge!" (and they are apt enough to desire changes,) he recommends himself to them, (1.) As very diligent; he rose up early, and appeared in public before the rest of the king's sons were stirring, and he stood beside the way of the gate, where the courts of judgment sat, as one mightily concerned to see justice done, and public business dispatched. (2.) As very inquisitive and prying, and desirous to be acquainted with every one's case. He would know of what city every one was that came for judgment, that he might inform himself concerning every part of the kingdom, and the state of it, v. 2. (3.) As very familiar and humble. If any Israelite offered to do obeisance to him, he took him, and embraced him as a friend. No man's conduct could be more condescending, while his heart was as proud as Lucifer's. Ambitious projects are often carried on by a shew of humility, Col. 2. 23. He knew what a grace it puts upon greatness to be affable and courteous, and how much it wins upon common people: had he been sincere in it, it had been his praise; but, to fawn upon the people, that he might betray them, was abominable hypocrisy. He croucheth, and humbleth himself, to draw them into his net, Ps. 10. 9, 10.

7. And it came to pass after forty years, that Absalom said unto the king, I pray thee, let me go and pay my vow, which I have vowed unto the LORD, in Hebron. 8. For thy servant vowed a vow, while I abode at Geshur in Syria, saying, If the LORD shall bring me again indeed to Jerusalem, then I will serve the LORD. 9. And the king said unto him, Go in peace. So he arose, and went to Hebron. 10. But Absalom sent spies throughout all the tribes of Israel, saying, As soon as ye hear the sound of the trumpet, then ye shall say, Absalom reigneth in Hebron. 11. And with Absalom went two hundred men out of Jerusalem, that were called; and they went in their simplicity, and they knew not any thing. 12. And Absalom sent for Ahithophel the Gilonite, David's counsellor, from his city; even from Giloh, while he offered sacrifices. And the conspiracy was strong; for the people increased continually with Absalom.

We have here the breaking out of Absalom's rebellion, which he had long been contriving. It is said to be after forty years, v. 7. But whence that is to be dated, we are not told; not from David's beginning his reign, for then it would fall in the last year of his life, which is not probable, but either from his first anointing by Samuel, seven years before, or rather (I think) from the people's desiring a king, and the first change of the government into a monarchy, which might be about ten years before David began to reign; it is fitly dated from thence, to shew that the same restless spirit was still working, and still they were given to change: as fond now of a new man, as then of a new model. So it fell about the thirtieth year of David's reign. Absalom's plot being now ripe for execution,

I. The place he chose for the rendezvous of his party was Hebron, the place where he was born, and where his father began his reign, and continued it several years, which would give some advantage to his pretensions. Every one knew Hebron to be a royal city; and it lay in the heart of Judah's lot, in which tribe, probably, he thought his interest strong.

II. The pretence he had both to go thither, and to invite his friends to him there, was, to offer a sacrifice to God, in performance of a vow he had made during his banishment, v. 7, 8. We have cause enough to suspect that he had not made any such vow, it does not appear that he was so religiously inclined; but he, that stuck not at murder and treason, would not make conscience of a lie to serve his purpose. If he said he had made such a vow, nobody could disprove him. Under this pretence,

1. He got leave of his father to go to Hebron. He would be well-pleased to hear that his son, in his exile, was so desirous to return to Jerusalem, not only his father's city, but the city of the living God; that he looked up to God to bring him back; that he had vowed, if he were brought back, to serve the Lord, whose service he had hitherto neglected; and that now, being brought back, he remembered his vow, and resolved to perform it. If he think fit to do it in Hebron, rather than in Zion or Gibeon, the good king is so well-pleased with the thing itself, that he will not object against his choice of the place. See how willing tender parents are to believe the best concerning their children, and, upon the least indication of good, to hope, even concerning those that have been untoward, that they will repent and reform. But how easy is it for children to take advantage of their good parents' credulity, and to impose upon them with the shew of religion, while still they are what they were! David was overjoyed to hear that Absalom was inclined to serve the Lord, and therefore readily gave him leave to go to Hebron, and to go thither with solemnity.

2. He got a good number of sober substantial citizens to go along with him, v. 11. There went two hundred men, probably of the principal men of Jerusalem, whom he invited to join with him in his feast upon his sacrifice; and they went in their simplicity, not in the least suspecting that Absalom had any bad design in his journey. He knew that it was to no purpose to tempt them into his plot, they were inviolably firm to David; but he drew them in to accompany him, that the common people might think that they were in his interest, and that David was deserted by some of his best friends. Note, It is no new thing for very good men, and very good things, to be made use of by designing men to put a colour upon bad practices. When religion is made a stalking-horse, and sacrifice a shoeing-horn, to sedition and usurpation, it is not to be wondered at if some that were well-affected to religion, as these followers of Absalom here, are imposed upon by the fallacy, and drawn in to give countenance to that with their names, which in their heart they abhor, not having known the depths of Satan.

III. The project he laid, was, to get himself proclaimed king throughout all the tribes of Israel, upon a signal given, v. 10. Spies were sent abroad, to be ready in every country to receive the notice with satisfaction and acclamations of joy, and to make the people believe that the news was both very true and very good, and that they were all concerned to take up arms for their new king. Upon the sudden spreading of this proclamation, Absalom reigns in Hebron, some would conclude that David was dead, others that he had resigned; and thus they that were in the secret would draw in many to appear for Absalom, and come in to his assistance, who, if they had rightly understood the matter, would have abhorred the thought of it, but, being drawn in, would adhere to him. See what artifices ambitious men use for the compassing of their ends; and, in matters of state, as well as in matters of religion, let us not be forward to believe every spirit, but try the spirits.

IV. The person he especially courted and relied upon in this affair, was, Ahithophel, a political thinking man, and one that had a clear head, and a great compass of thought, that had been David's counsellor, his guide, and his acquaintance, Ps. 55. 13. his familiar friend, in whom he trusted, which did eat of his bread, Ps. 41. 9. But, upon some disgust of David's against him, or his against David, he was banished, or retired from public business, and lived privately in the country. How should a man of such good principles as David, and such corrupt principles as Ahithophel, long agree? A fitter tool Absalom could not find in all the kingdom, than one that was so great a statesman, and yet was disaffected to the present ministry. While Absalom was offering his sacrifices, in performance of his pretended vow, he sent for this man. So much was his heart on the projects of his ambition, that he could not stay to make an end of his devotion; which shewed what his eye was upon, in all, and that it was but for a pretence that he made long offerings.

V. The party that joined with him, proved, at last, very considerable. The people increased continually with Absalom, which made the conspiracy strong and formidable. Every one whom he had complimented and carressed, (pronouncing his matters right and good, especially if, afterward, the cause went against him,) not only came himself, but made all the interest he could for him, so that he wanted not for numbers. The majority is no certain rule to judge of equity by. All the world wondered after the beast. Whether Absalom formed this design merely in the height of his ambition and fondness to rule, or whether there was not in it also malice against his father, and revenge for his banishment and confinement, though it was so much less than he deserved, does not appear. But, generally, that which aims at the crown, aims at the head that wears it.

13. And there came a messenger to David, saying, The hearts of the men of Israel are after Absalom. 14. And David said unto all his servants that were with him at Jerusalem, Arise, and let us flee; for we shall not else escape from Absalom: make speed to depart, lest he overtake us suddenly, and bring evil upon us, and smite the city with the edge of the sword. 15. And the king's servants said unto the king, Behold, thy servants are ready to do whatsoever my lord the king shall appoint. 16. And the king went forth, and all his household after him. And the king left ten women, which were concubines, to keep the house. 17. And the king went forth, and all the people after him, and tarried in a place that was far off. 18. And all his servants passed on beside him; and all the Cherethites, and all the Pelethites, and all the Gittites, six hundred men which came after him from Gath, passed on before the king. 19. Then said the king to Ittai the Gittite, Wherefore goest thou also with us? Return to thy place, and abide with the king: for thou art a stranger, and also an exile. 20. Whereas thou camest but yesterday, should I this day make thee go up and down with us? seeing I go whither I may, return thou, and take back thy brethren: mercy and truth be with thee. 21. And Ittai answered the king, and said, As the Lord liveth, and as my lord the king liveth, surely in what place my lord the king shall be, whether in death or life, even there also will thy servant be. 22. And David said to Ittai, Go and pass over. And Ittai the Gittite passed over, and all his men, and all the little ones that were with him. 23. And all the country wept with a loud voice, and all the people passed over: the king also himself passed over the brook Kidron, and all the people passed over, toward the way of the wilderness.

Here is,

I. The notice brought to David of Absalom's rebellion, v. 13. The matter was bad enough, and yet it seems to have been made worse to him (as such things commonly are) than really it was; for he was told, that the hearts of the men of Israel (that is, the generality of them, at least, the leading men) were after Absalom. But David was the more apt to believe it, because now he could call to mind the arts Absalom had used to inveigle them, and perhaps reflected upon it with regret, that he had not done more to counter-work him, and secure his own interest, which he had been too confident of. Note, It is the wisdom of princes, to make sure of the hearts of their subjects; for if they have them, they have their purses, and arms, and all, at their service.

II. The alarm this gave to David, and the resolutions he came to thereupon. We may well imagine him, in a manner, thunder-struck, when he heard that the son he loved so dearly, and had been so indulgent to, was so unnaturally, and ungratefully, in arms against him. Well might he say with Cæsar, Kai sù rékvor — What, thou, my son? Let not parents raise their hopes too high from their children, lest they be disappointed. David did not call a council, but, consulting only with God and his own heart, determined immediately to quit Jerusalem, v. 14. He took up this strange resolve, so disagreeable to his character as a man of courage, either, 1. As a penitent, submitting to the rod, and lying down under God's correcting hand. Conscience now reminded him of his sin in the matter of Uriah, and the sentence he was under for it, which was, that evil should rise against him out of his own house. "Now," thinks he, "the word of God begins to be fulfilled, and it is not for me to contend with it, or fight against it; God is righteous, and I submit." Before unrighteous Absalom, he could justify himself, and stand it out; but, before the righteous God, he must condemn himself, and yield to his judgments. Thus he accepts the punishment of his iniquity. Or, 2. As a politician. Jerusalem was a great city, but not tenable; it should seem, by David's prayer, Ps. 51. 18. that the walls of it were not built up, much less was it regularly fortified; it was too large to be garrisoned by so small a force as David had now with him; he had reason to fear that the generality of the inhabitants were too well-affected to Absalom to be true to him; should he fortify himself there, he might lose the country, in which, especially among those that lay furthest from Absalom's tampering, he hoped to have the most friends. And he had such a kindness for Jerusalem, that he was loth to make that the seat of war, and expose it to the calamities of a siege; he will rather quit it tamely to the rebels. Note, Good men, when they suffer themselves, care not how few are involved with them in suffering.

III. His hasty flight from Jerusalem. His servants agreed to the measures he took, faithfully adhered to him, v. 15. and assured him of their inviolable allegiance. Whereupon, 1. He went out of Jerusalem himself on foot, while his son Absalom had chariots and horses. It is not always the best man, nor the best cause, that makes the best figure. See here, not only the servant, but the traitor, on horseback, while the prince, the rightful prince, walks as a servant upon the earth, Eccl. 10. 7. Thus he chose to do, to abase himself so much the more under God's hand, and in condescension to his friends and followers, with whom he would walk, in token that he would live and die with them. 2. He took his household with him, his wives and children, that he might protect them in this day of danger, and that they might be a comfort to him in this day of grief. Masters of families, in their greatest frights, must not neglect their households. Ten women, that were concubines, he left behind, to keep the house, thinking that the weakness of their sex would secure them from murder, and their age and relation to him would secure them from rape; but God over-ruled this for the fulfilling of his word. 3. He took his life-guard with him, or band of pensioners; the Cherethites and Pelethites, who were under the command of Benaiah; and the Gittites, who were under the command of Ittai, v. 18. These Gittites seem to have been, by birth, Philistines of Gath, who came, a regiment of them, 600 in all, to enter themselves in David's service, having known him at Gath, and being greatly in love with him for his virtue and piety, and having embraced the Jews' religion. David made them of his garde du corps—his body-guard, and they adhered to him in his distress. The Son of David found not so great faith in Israel as in a Roman centurion, and a woman of Canaan. 4. As many as would, of the people of Jerusalem, he took with him, and made a halt at some distance from the city, to draw them up, v. 17. He compelled none; they whose hearts were with Absalom, to Absalom let them go, and so shall their doom be, they will soon have enough of him. Christ enlists none but volunteers.

IV. His discourse with Ittai the Gittite, who commanded the Philistine proselytes. 1. David dissuaded him from going along with him, v. 19, 20. Though he and his men might be greatly serviceable to him, yet, (1.) He would try whether he were hearty for him, and not inclined to Absalom; he therefore bids him return to his post in Jerusalem, and serve the new king. If he were no more than a soldier of fortune, (as we say,) he would be for that side which would pay and prefer him best; and to that side let him go. (2.) If he were faithful to David, yet he would not have him exposed to the fatigues and perils he now counted upon. David's tender spirit cannot bear to think that a stranger and an exile, a proselyte and a new convert, who ought, by all means possible, to be encouraged and made easy, should, at his first coming, meet with such hard usage. "Should I make thee go up and down with us? No, return with thy brethren." Generous souls are more concerned at the shares others have in their troubles, than at their own. Ittai shall therefore be dismissed with a blessing, Mercy and truth be with thee, that is, God's mercy and truth, mercy according to promise, the promise made to those who renounce other gods, and put themselves under the wings of the divine Majesty. This is a very proper pious farewell, when we part with a friend, "Mercy and truth be with thee, and then thou art safe, and mayest be easy wherever thou art." David's dependence was upon the mercy and truth of God, for comfort and happiness, both for himself and his friends; see Ps. 61. 7. 2. Ittai bravely resolves not to leave him, v. 21. Where David is, whether in life or death, safe or in peril, there will this faithful friend of his be; and he confirms his resolution with an oath, that he might not be tempted to break it: such a value has he for David, not for the sake of his wealth and greatness, (for then he would have deserted him, now that he saw him thus reduced,) but for the sake of his wisdom and goodness, which were still the same, that, whatever comes of it, he will never leave him. Note, That is a friend indeed, who loves at all times, and will adhere to us in adversity. Thus should we cleave to the Son of David, with full purpose of heart, that neither life nor death shall separate us from his love.

V. The common people's sympathy with David in his affliction. When he and his attendants passed over the brook Kidron, (the very same brook that Christ passed over when he entered upon his sufferings, John, 18. 1.) toward the way of the wilderness, which lay between Jerusalem and Jericho, all the country wept with a loud voice, v. 23. Cause enough there was for weeping, 1. To see a prince thus reduced; one that had lived so great forced from his palace, and in fear of his life, with a small retinue, seeking shelter in a desert; the city of David, which he himself won, built, and fortified, made an unsafe abode for David himself: it would move the compassion even of strangers, to see a man fallen thus low from such a height, and this by the wickedness of his own son; a piteous case it was. Parents, that are abused and ruined by their own children, merit the tender sympathy of their friends, as much as any of the sons or daughters of affliction. Especially, 2. To see their own prince thus wronged, who had been so great a blessing to their land, and had not done any thing to forfeit the affections of his people; to see him in this distress, and themselves unable to help him, might well draw floods of tears from their eyes.

24. And lo Zadok also, and all the Levites were with him, bearing the ark of the covenant of God; and they set down the ark of God; and Abiathar went up, until all the people had done passing out of the city. 25. And the king said unto Zadok, Carry back the ark of God into the city: if I shall find favour in the eyes of the LORD, he will bring me again, and shew me both it, and his habitation: 26. But if he thus say, I have no delight in thee; behold, here am I, let him do to me as seemeth good unto him. 27. The king said also unto Zadok the priest, Art not thou a seer? return into the city in peace, and your two sons with you, Ahimaaz thy son, and Jonathan the son of Abiathar. 28. See, I will tarry in the plain of the wilderness, until there come word from you to certify me. 29. Zadok therefore and Abiathar carried the ark of God again to Jerusalem: and they tarried there. 30. And David went up by the ascent of mount Olivet, and wept as he went up, and had his head covered, and he went bare-foot: and all the people that was with him covered every man his head, and they went up, weeping as they went up.

Here is,

I. The fidelity of the priests and Levites, and their firm adherence to David and his interest. They knew David's great affection to them and their office, notwithstanding his failings; the method Absalom took to gain people's affections made no impression upon them; he had little religion in him, and therefore they steadily adhered to David; Zadok and Abiathar, and all the Levites, if he go, will accompany him, and take the ark with them, that, by it, they might ask counsel of God for him, v. 24. Note, They that are friends to the ark in their prosperity, shall find it a friend to them in their adversity. Formerly, David would not rest, till he had found a resting-place for the ark; and now, if the priests may have their mind, the ark shall not rest, till David returns to his rest.

II. David's dismissal of them back into the city, v. 25, 26. Abiathar was high priest, 1 Kings, 2. 35. but Zadok was his assistant, and attended the ark most closely, while Abiathar was active in public business, v. 24. Therefore David directs his speech to Zadok, and an excellent speech it is, and shews him to be in a very good frame under his affliction, and that still he holds fast his integrity.

1. He is very solicitous for the safety of the ark; "By all means carry that back into the city, let not that be unsettled and exposed with me, lodge that again in the tent pitched for it; surely Absalom, bad as he is, will do that no harm." David's heart, like Eli's, trembled for the ark of God. Note, It argues a good principle, to be more concerned for the church's prosperity, than for our own, to prefer Jerusalem before our chief joy, Ps. 137. 6. the success of the gospel, and the flourishing of the church, above our own wealth, credit, ease, and safety, even when they are most in hazard.

2. He is very desirous to return to the enjoyment of the privileges of God's house. He will reckon it the greatest instance of God's favour to him, if he may but once more be brought back to see it, and his habitation; this will be more his joy than to be brought back to his own palace and throne again. Note, Gracious persons measure their comforts and conveniences in this world, by the opportunity they give them of communion with God. Hezekiah wishes for the recovery of his health, for this reason, that he might go up to the house of the Lord, Isa. 38. 22.

3. He is very submissive to the holy will of God, concerning the issue of his present dark dispensation. He hopes the best, v. 25. and hopes for it from the favour of God, which he looks upon to be the fountain of all good; "If God favour me so far, I shall be settled again as formerly:" but he provides for the worst; "If he deny me this favour, if he thus say, I have no delight in thee, I know I deserve the continuance of his displeasure, his holy will be done:" see him here waiting to receive the event; "Behold, here am I, as a servant expecting orders;" and see him willing to refer himself to God concerning it, "Let him do to me as seemeth good to him, I have nothing to object, all is well that God does." Observe with what satisfaction and holy complacency he speaks of the divine disposal: not only, "He can do what he will," subscribing to his power, Job, 9. 12. or, "He will do what he will," subscribing to his unchangeableness, Job, 23. 13, 15. but, "Let him do what he will," subscribing to his wisdom and goodness. Note, It is our interest, as well as duty, cheerfully to acquiesce in the will of God, whatever befalls us. That we may not complain of what is, let us see God's hand in all events; and that we may not be afraid of what shall be, let us see all events in God's hand.

III. The confidence David put in the priests, to serve his interest to the utmost of their power in his absence. He calls Zadok a seer, v. 27. that is, a wise man, a man that can see into business, and discern time and judgment; "Thou hast thine eyes in thy head, Eccl. 2. 14. and therefore art capable of doing me service, especially, by sending me intelligence of the enemies' motions and resolutions." One friend that is a seer, in such an exigence as this, was worth twenty that were not so quick-sighted. For the settling of a private correspondence with the priests in his absence, he appoints, 1. Whom they should send to him, their two sons Ahimaaz and Jonathan, whose coat, it might be hoped, would be their protection, and of whose prudence and faithfulness, probably, he had had experience. 2. Whither they should send. He would encamp in the plain of the wilderness, till he heard from them, v. 28. and then would move according to the information and advice they should send him. Hereupon, they returned to the city, to wait the event; it was pity that any disturbance should be given to a state so happy as this was, when the prince and the priests had such an entire affection for, and confidence in, each other.

IV. The melancholy posture that David and his men put themselves into, when, at the beginning of their march, they went up the mount of Olives, v. 30. 1. David himself, as a deep mourner, covered his head and face for shame and blushing, went barefoot, as a prisoner or a slave, and for mortification, and went weeping. Did it become a man of his reputation for courage and greatness of spirit, thus to cry like a child, only for fear of an enemy at a distance, against whom he might easily have made head, and perhaps with one bold stroke have routed him? Yes, it did not ill become him, considering how much there was in this trouble, (1.) Of the unkindness of his son. He could not but weep, to think that one who came out of his bowels, and had so often lain in his arms, would thus lift up the heel against him. God himself is said to be grieved with the rebellions of his own children, Ps. 95. 10. and even broken with their whorish heart, Ezek. 6. 9. (2.) There was much of the displeasure of his God in it; this infused the wormwood and gall into the affliction and misery, Lam. 3. 19. His sin was ever before him, Ps. 51. 3. but never so plain, nor ever appearing so black, as now. He never wept thus when Saul hunted him, but a wounded conscience makes troubles lie heavy, Ps. 33. 4. 2. When David wept, all his company we likewise, being much affected with his grief, and willing to share in it. It is our duty to weep with those that weep, especially our superiors, and those that are better than we; for, if this be done in the green tree, what shall be done in the dry? We must weep with those that weep for sin. When Hezekiah humbled himself for his sin, all Jerusalem joined with him, 2 Chron. 32. 26. To prevent suffering with sinners let us sorrow with them.

31. And one told David, saying, Ahithophel is among the conspirators with Absalom. And David said, O LORD, I pray thee, turn the counsel of Ahithophel into foolishness. 32. And it came to pass, that when David was come to the top of the mount, where he worshipped God, behold, Hushai the Archite came to meet him with his coat rent, and earth upon his head: 33. Unto whom David said, If thou passest on with me, then thou shalt be a burthen unto me: 34. But if thou return to the city, and say unto Absalom, I will be thy servant, O king; as I have been thy father's servant hitherto, so will I now also be thy servant: then mayest thou for me, defeat the counsel of Ahithophel. 35. And hast thou not there with thee Zadok and Abiathar the priests? therefore it shall be, that what thing soever thou shalt hear out of the king's house, thou shalt tell it to Zadok and Abiathar the priests. 36. Behold, they have there with them their two sons, Ahimaaz Zadok's son, and Jonathan Abiathar's son; and by them ye shall send unto me every thing that ye can hear. 37. So Hushai David's friend came into the city, and Absalom came into Jerusalem.

Nothing, it seems, appeared to David more threatening in Absalom's plot, than that Ahithophel was in it; for one good head, in such a design, is worth a thousand good hands. Absalom was himself no politician, but he had got one entirely in his interest that was, and would be the more dangerous, because he had been, all along, acquainted with David's counsels and affairs; if therefore he can be baffled, Absalom is as good as routed, and the head of the conspiracy cut off. This David endeavours to do,

1. By prayer. When he heard that Ahithophel was in the plot, he lifted up his heart to God in this short prayer, Lord, turn the counsel of Ahithophel into foolishness, v. 31. He had not opportunity for a long prayer, but he was none of those that thought he should be heard for his much speaking. It was a fervent prayer, "Lord, I pray thee, do this." God is well-pleased with the importunity of those that come to him with their petitions. David was particular in this prayer; he names the person whose counsels he prays against. God gives us leave, in prayer, to be humbly and reverently free with him, and to mention the particular care, and fear, and grief, that lies heavy upon us. He prays not against Ahithophel's person, but against his counsel, that God would turn it into foolishness; that, though he was a wise man, he might, at this time, give foolish counsel; or, if he gave wise counsel, that it might be rejected as foolish; or, if it were followed, that, by some providence or other, it might be defeated, and not attain the end. David prayed this in a firm belief that God has all hearts in his hand, and tongues too; that, when he pleases, he can take away the understandings of the aged, and make the judges fools, Job, 12. 17. Isa. 3. 2, 3. and in hope that God would own and plead his just and injured cause. Note, We may pray in faith, and should pray with fervency, that God will turn that counsel into foolishness, which is taken against his people.

2. By policy. We must second our prayer with our endeavours, else we tempt God. It is good service to countermine the policy of the church's enemies. When David came to the top of the mount, he worshipped God, v. 32. Note, Weeping must not hinder worshipping, but quicken it rather. Now he penned the third psalm, as appears by the title; and some think that his singing it was the worship he now paid to God. Just now Providence brought Hushai to him; while he was yet speaking, God heard, and sent him the person that should be instrumental to befool Ahithophel. He came to condole with David on his present trouble, with his coat rent, and earth upon his head; but David, having a great deal of confidence in his conduct and faithfulness, resolved to employ him in the nature of a spy upon Absalom: he would not take him with him, v. 33. for he had now more need of soldiers than counsellors, but sent him back to Jerusalem, to wait for Absalom's arrival, as a deserter from David, and to offer him his service, v. 34. Thus he might insinuate himself into his counsels, and defeat Ahithophel, either by dissuading Absalom from following his advice, or by discovering it to David, that he might know where to stand upon his guard. How this gross dissimulation, which David put Hushai upon can be justified as a stratagem in war, I do not see. The best that can be made of it, is, that Absalom, if he rebel against his father, must stand upon his guard against all mankind, and, if he will be deceived, let him be deceived. David recommends him to Zadok and Abiathar, as persons proper to be consulted with, v. 35. and to their two sons, as trusty men to be sent on errands to David, v. 36. Hushai, thus instructed, came to Jerusalem, v. 37. whither also Absalom soon after came with his forces. How soon do royal palaces and royal cities change their masters! but we look for a kingdom which cannot be thus shaken, and in the possession of which we cannot be disturbed.

CHAP. XVI.

In the close of the foregoing chapter, we left David flying from Jerusalem, and Absalom entering into it; in this chapter, 1. We are to follow David in his melancholy flight; and there we find him, 1. Cheated by Ziba, v. 1..4. 2. Cursed by Shimei, which he bears with wonderful patience, v. 5..14. II. We are to meet Absalom in his triumphant entry; and there we find him, 1. Cheated by Hushai, v. 15..19. 2. Counsellor by Ahithophel to go in unto his father's concubines, v. 20..23.

1. AND when David was a little past the top of the hill, behold, Ziba the servant of Mephibosheth met him, with a couple of asses saddled, and upon them two hundred loaves of bread, and an hundred bunches of raisins, and an hundred of summer fruits, and a bottle of wine. 2. And the king said unto Ziba, What meanest thou by these? And Ziba said, The asses be for the king's household to ride on; and the bread and summer fruit for the young men to eat; and the wine, that such as be faint in the wilderness may drink. 3. And the king said, And where is thy master's son? And Ziba said unto the king, Behold, he abideth at Jerusalem: for he said, To-day shall the house of Israel restore me the kingdom of my father. 4. Then said the king to Ziba, Behold, thine are all that pertained unto Mephibosheth. And Ziba said, I humbly beseech thee that I may find grace in thy sight, my lord, O king.

We read before how kind David was to Mephibosheth the son of Jonathan, how he prudently intrusted his servant Ziba with the management of his estate, while he generously entertained him at his own table, ch. 9. 10. This matter was well settled; but, it seems, Ziba is not content to be manager, he longs to be master, of Mephibosheth's estate. Now he thinks is his time to make himself so; if he can procure a grant of it from the crown, he hopes, whether David or Absalom get the better, it is all one to him, he shall secure his prey, which he promises himself by fishing in troubled waters. In order hereunto,

1. He makes David a handsome present of provisions, which was the more welcome, because it came seasonably, v. 1. and with this he designed to incline him to himself; for a man's gift maketh room for him, and bringeth him before great men, Prov. 13. 16. Nay, Whithersoever it turneth, it prospereth, Prov. 17. 8. David inferred from this, that Ziba was a very discreet and generous man. and well-affected to him, when, in all, he designed nothing but to make his own market, and to get Mephibosheth's estate settled upon him. Shall the prospect of advantage in this world, make men generous to the rich; and shall not the belief of an abundant recompence in the resurrection of the just, make us charitable to the poor? Luke, 14. 14. Ziba was very considerate in the present he brought to David; it was what would do him some good in his present distress, v. 2. Observe, The wine is intended for those that were faint, not for the king's own drinking, or the courtiers; it seems, they did not commonly use it, but it was for cordials for them that were ready to perish, Prov. 31. 6. Blessed art thou, O land, when thy princes use wine for strength, as David did, and not for drunkenness, as Absalom did, ch. 13. 28. See Eccl. 10. 17. Whatever Ziba intended in this present, God's providence sent it in to David for his support very graciously. God makes use of bad men for good purposes to his people, and sends them meat by ravens.

2. Having by his present insinuated himself into David's affection, and gained credit with him, the next thing he has to do for the compassing of his end, is, to incense him against Mephibosheth, which he does by a false accusation, representing him as ungratefully designing to raise himself by the present broils, and to recover the crown to his own head, now that David and his son were contending for it. David inquires for him as one of his family, which gives Ziba occasion to tell this false story of him, v. 3. What immense damages do masters often sustain by the lying tongues of their servants! David knew Mephibosheth not to be an ambitious man, but easy in his place, and well affected to him and his government; nor could he be so weak as to expect with his lame legs to climb the ladder of preferment; yet he gives credit to the calumny, and, without further inquiry or consideration, convicts Mephibosheth of treason, seizes his lands as forfeited, and grants them to Ziba; Behold, thine are all that pertaineth to Mephibosheth, v. 4. a rash judgment, and which afterward he was ashamed of, when the truth came to light, ch. 19. 29. Princes cannot help it, but they will be sometimes (as our law speaks) deceived in their grants; but they ought to use all means possible to discover the truth, and to guard against malicious designing men, who would impose upon them, as Ziba did upon David, who, having by his wiles gained his point, triumphed over the king's credulity, congratulated himself on his own success, and parted, with a great compliment upon the king, that he valued his favour more than Mephibosheth's estate, "Let me find grace in thy sight, O king, and I have enough." Great men ought always to be jealous of flatterers, and remember that nature has given them two ears, that they may hear both sides.

5. And when king David came to Bahurim, behold, thence came out a man of the family of the house of Saul, whose name was Shimei, the son of Gera: he came forth, and cursed still as he came.

6. And he cast stones at David, and at all the servants of king David: and all the people and all the mighty men were on his right hand and on his left. 7. And thus said Shimei when he cursed, Come out, come out, thou bloody man, and thou man of Belial: 8. The LORD hath returned upon thee all the blood of the house of Saul, in whose stead thou hast reigned; and the LORD hath delivered the kingdom into the hand of Absalom thy son; and, behold, thou art taken in thy mischief, because thou art a bloody man. 9. Then said Abishai the son of Zeruiah unto the king, Why should this dead dog curse my lord the king? let me go over, I pray thee, and take off his head. 10. And the king said, What have I to do with you, ye sons of Zeruiah? so let him curse, because the LORD hath said unto him, Curse David. Who shall then say, Wherefore hast thou done so? 11. And David said to Abishai, and to all his servants, Behold, my son, which came forth of my bowels, seeketh my life: how much more now may this Benjaminite do it? let him alone, and let him curse; for the LORD hath bidden him. 12. It may be that the LORD will look on mine affliction, and that the LORD will requite me good for his cursing this day. 13. And as David and his men went by the way, Shimei went along on the hill's side over against him, and cursed as he went, and threw stones at him, and cast dust. 14. And the king, and all the people that were with him, came weary, and refreshed themselves there.

We here find how David bore Shimei's curses much better than he had borne Ziba's flatteries; by those he was brought to pass a wrong judgment on another, by these to pass a right judgment on himself; the world's smiles are more dangerous than its frowns. Observe here,

1. How insolent and furious Shimei was, and how his malice took occasion, from David's present distress, to be so much the more outrageous. David, in his flight, was come to Bahurim, a city of Benjamin, or near which this Shimei lived, who, being of the house of Saul, (with the fall of which all his hopes of preferment fell,) had an implacable enmity to David, unjustly looking upon him as the ruin of Saul and his family, only because, by the divine appointment, he succeeded it. While David was in prosperity and power, Shimei hated him as much as he did now, but durst not then say any thing against him. God knows what is in the hearts of those that are disaffected to him and his government, earthly princes do not; but now he came forth, and cursed David with all the bad words and wishes he could invent, v. 5. He took this opportunity to give vent to his malice, 1. Because now he thought he might do it safely; yet, if David had thought proper to resent the provocation, it had cost Shimei his life. 2. Because now it would be most grievous to David, would add affliction to his grief, and pour vinegar into his wounds. He complains of them as most barbarous, who talk to the grief of those whom God has wounded, Ps. 69. 26. So Shimei did, loading him with curses, whom no generous eye could look upon without compassion. 3. Because now he thought that Providence justified his reproaches, and that David's present afflictions proved him to be as bad a man as he was willing to represent him. Job's friends condemned him upon this false principle. They that are under the rebukes of a gracious God, must not think it strange if these bring upon them the reproaches of evil men. If once it be said, God hath forsaken him, presently it follows, Persecute and take him, Ps. 71. 11. But it is the character of a base spirit thus to trample upon those that are down, and insult over them.

See, (1.) What this wretched man did: He cast stones at David, v. 6. as if his king had been a dog, or the worst of criminals, whom all Israel must stone with stones till he die. Perhaps he kept at such a distance, that the stones he threw could not reach David, nor any of his attendants, yet he shewed what he would have done, if it had been in his power. He cast dust, v. 13. which probably would blow into his own eyes, like the curses he threw, which, being causeless, would return upon his own head. Thus, while his malice made him odious, the impotency of it made him ridiculous and contemptible. They that fight against God, though they hate him, cannot hurt him. If thou sinnest, what dost thou against him? Job, 35. 6. It was an aggravation of his wickedness, that David was attended with his mighty men, on his right hand and on his left, so that he was not in so forlorn a condition as he thought; (persecuted, but not forsaken;) and that he continued to do it, and did it the more passionately, for David's bearing it patiently.

(2.) What he said. With the stones he shot his arrows, even bitter words, v. 7, 8. in contempt of that law, Thou shalt not curse the gods, Exod. 22. 28. David was a man of honour and conscience, and in great reputation for every thing that is just and good; what could this foul mouth say against him? Why, truly, what was done long since to the house of Saul is the only thing which he can recall, and with which he upbraids him, because that was the thing that he himself was a loser by. See how apt we are to judge of men and their character, by what they are to us; and to conclude that those are certainly evil men, that have ever so justly been, or that we ever so unjustly think have been, instruments of evil to us. So partial are we to ourselves, that no rule can be more fallacious than this, No man could be more innocent of the blood of the house of Saul than David was. Once and again he spared Saul's life, while Saul sought his. When Saul and his sons were slain by the Philistines, David and his men were many miles off; and, when they heard it, lamented it. From the murder of Abner and Ish-bosheth he had sufficiently cleared himself; and yet all the blood of the house of Saul must be laid at his door: innocency is no fence against malice and falsehood; nor are we to think it strange, if we be charged with that which we have been most careful to keep ourselves from. It is well for us that men are not to be our judges, but He whose judgment is according to truth.

The blood of the house of Saul is here most unjustly charged upon him, [1.] As that which gave him his character, and denominated him a bloody man, and a man of Belial, v. 7. And if a man of blood, no doubt, a man of Belial, that is, a child of the devil, (who is called Belial, 2 Cor. 6. 15.) and who was a murderer from the beginning. Bloody men are the worst of men. [2.] As that which brought the present trouble upon him; "Now that thou art dethroned, and driven out to the wilderness, the Lord has returned upon thee the blood of the house of Saul." See how forward malicious men are to press God's judgments into the service of their own passion and revenge. If any, who, they think, has wronged them, come into trouble, that must be made the cause of the trouble. But we must take heed, lest we wrong God by making his providence thus to patronise our foolish and unjust resentments. As the wrath of man works not the righteousness of God, so the righteousness of God serves not the wrath of man. [3.] As that which would now be his utter ruin; for he endeavours to make him despair of ever recovering his throne again, (now they said, There is no help for him in God, Ps. 3. 2.) The Lord hath delivered the kingdom into the hand of Absalom, (not Mephibosheth, the house of Saul never dreamed of making him king, as Ziba suggested,) and thou art taken in thy mischief, that is, "the mischief that will be thy destruction, and all because thou art a bloody man." Thus Shimei cursed.

II. See how patient and submissive David was under this abuse. The sons of Zeruiah, Abishai particularly, were forward to maintain David's honour with their swords; they resented the affront keenly, as well they might; Why should this dead dog be suffered to curse the king? v. 9. If David will but give them leave, they will put these lying cursing lips to silence, and take off his head; for his throwing stones at the king was an overt-act, which abundantly proved that he compassed and imagined his death. But the king would by no means suffer it, What have I to do with you? So let him curse. Thus Christ rebuked the disciples, who, in zeal for his honour, would have fire from heaven on the town that affronted him, Luke, 9. 55. Let us see with what considerations David quieted himself.

1. The chief thing that silenced him, was, that he had deserved it: this is not mentioned indeed; for a man may truly repent, and yet needs not, upon all occasions, proclaim his penitent reflections. Shimei unjustly upbraided him with the blood of Saul; from that his conscience acquitted him, but, at the same time, charged him with the blood of Uriah: "The reproach is too true," (thinks David,) "though false as he means it." Note, A humble tender spirit will turn reproaches into reproofs, and so get good by them, instead of being provoked by them.

2. He observes the hand of God in it; The Lord hath said unto him, Curse David, v. 10. and again, So let him curse, for the Lord hath bidden him, v. 11. As it was Shimei's sin, it was not from God, but from the Devil, and his own wicked heart, nor did God's hand in it excuse or extenuate it, much less justify it, any more than it did their sin who put Christ to death, Acts, 2. 24.—4. 28. But as it was David's affliction, it was from the Lord, one of the evils which he raised up against him. David looked above the instrument of his trouble to the supreme Director, as Job, when the plunderers had stripped him, acknowledges, The Lord hath taken away. Nothing more proper to quiet a gracious soul under affliction, than an eye to the hand of God in it: I opened not my mouth, because thou didst it. The scourge of the tongue is God's rod.

3. He quiets himself under the lesser affliction, with the consideration of the greater, v. 11. My son seeks my life, much more may this Benjamite. Note, Tribulation works patience in those that are sanctified. The more we bear, the better able we should be to bear still more; what tries our patience should improve it. The more we are inured to trouble, the less we should be surprised at it, and not think it strange. Marvel not that enemies are injurious, when even friends are unkind; nor that friends are unkind, when even children are undutiful.

4. He comforts himself with hopes that God would, some way or other, bring good to him out of his affliction, would balance the trouble itself, and recompense his patience under it; "The Lord will requite me good for his cursing. If God bid Shimei grieve me, it is, that he himself may the more sensibly comfort me; surely he has mercy in store for me, which he is preparing me for by this trial." We may depend upon God as our Paymaster, not only for our services, but for our sufferings. Let them curse, but bless thou. David, at length, is housed at Bahurim, v. 14. where he meets with refreshment, and is hidden from this strife of tongues.

15. And Absalom, and all the people the men of Israel, came to Jerusalem, and Ahithophel with him. 16. And it came to pass, when Hushai the Archite, David's friend, was come unto Absalom, that Hushai said unto Absalom, God save the king, God save the king. 17. And Absalom said to Hushai, Is this thy kindness to thy friend? why wentest thou not with thy friend? 18. And Hushai said unto Absalom, Nay; but whom the LORD, and this people, and all the men of Israel, choose, his will I be, and with him will I abide. 19. And again, whom should I serve? should I not serve in the presence of his son? as I have served in thy father's presence, so will I be in thy presence. 20. Then said Absalom to Ahithophel, Give counsel among you what we shall do. 21. And Ahithophel said unto Absalom, Go in unto thy father's concubines, which he hath left to keep the house; and all Israel shall hear that thou art abhorred of thy father; then shall the hands of all that are with thee be strong. 22. So they spread Absalom a tent upon the top of the house; and Absalom went in unto his father's concubines in the sight of all Israel. 23. And the counsel of Ahithophel, which he counselled in those days, was as if a man had inquired at the oracle of God: so was all the counsel of Ahithophel, both with David and with Absalom.

Absalom had notice sent him speedily by some of his friends at Jerusalem, that David was withdrawn, and with what a small retinue he was gone; so that the coasts were clear, Absalom might take possession of Jerusalem when he pleased. The gates were open, and there were none to oppose him. Accordingly, he came without delay, v. 15. extremely elevated, no doubt, with this success at first, and that that, in which, when he formed his design, probably he apprehended the greatest difficulty, was so easily and effectually done. Now that he is master of Jerusalem, he concludes all his own, the country will follow of course. God suffers wicked men to prosper a while in their wicked plots, even beyond their expectation, that their disappointment may be the more grievous and disgraceful.

The most celebrated politicians of that age were Ahithophel and Hushai, the former Absalom brings with him to Jerusalem, v. 15. the other meets him there, v. 16. so that he cannot but think himself sure of success, when he has both these to be his counsellors; on them he relies, and consults not the ark, though he had that with him. But miserable counsellors were they both; for,

I. Hushai would never counsel him to do wisely, he was really his enemy, and designed to betray him, while he pretended to be in his interest; so that he could not have a more dangerous man about him. 1. Hushai complimented him upon his accession to the throne, as if he were abundantly satisfied in his title, and well pleased that he was come to the possession, v. 16. What arts of dissimulation are those tempted to use, who govern themselves by fleshly wisdom; and how happy are they who have not known these depths of Satan, but have their conversation in the world with simplicity and godly sincerity! 2. Absalom is surprised to find him for him, who was known to be David's intimate friend and confidant. He asks him, Is this thy kindness to thy friend? v. 17. pleasing himself with this thought, that all would be his, since Hushai was. He doubts not of his sincerity, but easily believes what he wishes to be true, that David's best friends were so in love with him, as to take the first opportunity to declare for him, though the pride of his heart deceived him, Obad. 3. 3. Hushai still makes him believe he is hearty for him. For though David is his friend, yet he is for the king in possession, v. 18. Whom the people choose, and Providence smiles upon, he will be faithful to; and he is for the king in succession, v. 19. the rising sun. It was true, he loved his father; but he had had his day, and it was over; and why should he not love his successor as well? Thus he pretends to give reasons for a resolution he abhorred the thought of.

II. Ahithophel did counsel him to do wickedly, and so did as effectually betray him as he did who was designedly false to him. For they that advise men to sin, certainly advise them to their hurt; and that government which is founded in sin, is founded in the sand. It seems Ahithophel was noted as a deep politician; his counsel was as if a man had inquired at the oracle of God, v. 23. Such reputation was he in for subtlety and sagacity in public affairs, such reaches had he beyond other privy-counsellors, such reasons would he give for his advice, and such success generally his projects had, that all people, good and bad, both David and Absalom had a profound regard to his sentiments, too much by far, when they regarded him as an oracle of God; shall the prudence of any mortal compare with Him who is only wise? Let us observe from this account of Ahithophel's fame for policy, 1. That many excel in worldly wisdom, who are utterly destitute of heavenly grace, because those who set up for oracles themselves are apt to despise the oracles of God. God has chosen the foolish things of the world; and the greatest statesmen are seldom the greatest saints. 2. That frequently the great politicians act most foolishly for themselves. Ahithophel is cried up for an oracle, and yet very unwisely takes part with Absalom, who was not only an usurper, but a rash youth, never likely to come to good; whose fall, and the fall of all that adhered to him, any one, with the tenth part of the policy that Ahithophel pretended to, might foresee. Well, after all, honesty is the best policy, and will be found so in the long run.

Observe, (1.) The wicked counsel Ahithophel gave to Absalom: finding that David had left his concubines to keep the house, he advises him to lie with them, v.21. a very wicked thing; the divine law had made it a capital crime, Lev.20.11. The apostle speaks of it as a piece of villany, not so much as named among the Gentiles, 1 Cor.5.1. Reuben lost his birthright for it. But Ahithophel advised to it as a political thing, because it would give assurance to all Israel, [1.] That he was in good earnest in his pretensions; no doubt, he resolved to make himself master of all that belonged to his predecessor, when he began with his concubines. [2.] That he was resolved never to make peace with his father upon any terms; for, by this, he would render himself so odious to his father, that he would never be reconciled to him, which, perhaps, the people were jealous of, and that they must be sacrificed to the reconciliation. Having drawn the sword, he did, by this provocation, throw away the scabbard, which would strengthen the hands of his party, and keep them tight to him. This was his cursed policy, which bespoke him rather an oracle of the Devil, than of God.

(2.) Absalom's compliance with this counsel. It entirely suited his lewd and wicked mind, and he delayed not to put it in execution, v.22. When an unnatural rebellion was the opera, what fitter prologue could there be to it than such unnatural lust? Thus was his wickedness all of a piece, and such as a conscience, not quite seared, could not entertain the thoughts of without the utmost horror. Nay, the client outdoes what his counsel advises: Ahithophel bid him do it, that all Israel might hear of it; but as if that were not enough, so perfectly lost is he to all honour and virtue, he will do it, and all Israel shall see it. A tent is accordingly spread on the top of the house for the purpose; so impudently did he declare his sin, as Sodom. Yet, in this, the word of God was fulfilled in the letter of it: God had threatened, by Nathan, that, for his defiling of Bath-sheba, he should have his own wives publicly debauched, ch.12.11,12. and some think that Ahithophel, in advising it, designed to be avenged on David for the injury done to Bath-sheba, who was his grand-daughter: for she was the daughter of Eliam, ch.11.3. who was the son of Ahithophel, ch.23.34. Job speaks of a circumstance like this, as the just punishment of adultery, ch.31.9,10. and the prophet, Hos.4.13,14. What to think of these concubines, who submitted to this wickedness, it were easy to say; but how unrighteous saever Absalom and they are, we must say, The Lord is righteous: nor shall any word of his fall to the ground.

CHAP. XVII.

The contest between David and Absalom is now drawing towards a crisis. It must be determined by the sword, and preparation is made, accordingly, in this chapter. I. Absalom calls a council of war, in which Ahithophel urges to dispatch, v.1. .4. but Hushai recommends deliberation, v.5. .13. and Hushai's counsel is agreed to, v.14. for vexation at which, Ahithophel hangs himself, v.23. II. Secret intelligence is sent to David (but with much difficulty) of their proceedings, v.15. .21. III. David marches to the other side Jordan, v.22. .24. and there his camp is victualled by some of his friends in that country, v.27. .29. IV. Absalom and his forces march after him into the land of Gilead on the other side Jordan, v.25,26. There we shall, in the next chapter, find the cause decided by a battle: hitherto every thing has looked black upon poor David, but now the day of his deliverance begins to dawn.

1. MOREOVER Ahithophel said unto Absalom, Let me now choose out twelve thousand men, and I will arise and pursue after David this night: 2. And I will come upon him while he is weary and weak-handed, and will make him afraid: and all the people that are with him shall flee; and I will smite the king only: 3. And I will bring back all the people unto thee: the man whom thou seekest is as if all returned: so all the people shall be in peace. 4. And the saying pleased Absalom well, and all the elders of Israel. 5. Then said Absalom, Call now Hushai the Archite also, and let us hear likewise what he saith. 6. And when Hushai was come to Absalom, Absalom spake unto him, saying, Ahithophel hath spoken after this manner: shall we do after his saying? if not; speak thou. 7. And Hushai said unto Absalom, The counsel that Ahithophel hath given is not good at this time. 8. For, said Hushai, thou knowest thy father and his men, that they be mighty men, and they be chased in their minds, as a bear robbed of her whelps in the field: and thy father is a man of war, and will not lodge with the people. 9. Behold, he is hid now in some pit, or in some other place: and it will come to pass, when some of them be overthrown at the first, that whosoever heareth it will say, There is a slaughter among the people that follow Absalom. 10. And he also that is valiant, whose heart is as the heart of a lion, shall utterly melt: for all Israel knoweth that thy father is a mighty man, and they which be with him are valiant men. 11. Therefore I counsel that all Israel be generally gathered unto thee, from Dan even to Beersheba, as the sand that is by the sea for multitude; and that thou go to battle in thine own person. 12. So shall we come upon him in some place where he shall be found, and we will light upon him as the dew falleth on the ground: and of him, and of all the men that are with him, there shall not be left so much as one. 13. Moreover, if he be gotten into a city, then shall all Israel bring ropes to that city, and we will draw it into the river, until there be not one small stone found there. 14. And Absalom and all the men of Israel said, The counsel of Hushai the Archite is better than the counsel of Ahithophel. For the LORD had appointed to defeat the good counsel of Ahithophel, to the intent that the LORD might bring evil upon Absalom.

Absalom is in peaceable possession of Jerusalem, the palace-royal is his own, and the thrones of judgment, even the thrones of the house of David; his good father reigned in Hebron, and only over the tribe of Judah, above seven years, and was not hasty to destroy his rival; his government was built upon a divine promise, which he was sure of the performance of in due time, and therefore he waited patiently in the mean time. But the young man, Absalom, not only hastens from Hebron to Jerusalem, but is impatient there, till he has destroyed his father; cannot be content with his throne, till he has his life; for his government is founded in iniquity, and therefore feels itself tottering, and thinks itself obliged to do every thing with violence. That so profligate a wretch as Absalom should aim at the throne of so good a father, is not so strange: (there are here and there monsters in nature;) but that the body of the people of Israel, to whom David had been so great a blessing in all respects, should join with him in it, is very amazing. But their fathers often mutinied against Moses. The best of parents, and the best of princes, will not think it strange, if they be made uneasy by those who should be their support and joy, when they consider what sons and what subjects David himself had.

David, and all that adhered to him must be cut off. That is resolved, for aught that appears, nemine contradicente—unanimously. None dares mention his personal merits, and great services done to his country, in opposition to this resolve, nor so much as ask, "Why, what evil has he done, to forfeit his crown, much less his head?" None dares propose that his banishment suffice, for the present, or that agents be sent to treat with him to resign the crown, which, having so tamely quitted the city, they might think he would easily be persuaded to do. It was long since Absalom himself fled for a crime, and David contented himself with his being an exile, though he deserved death, nay, he mourned and longed for him; but so perfectly void of all natural affection is this ungrateful Absalom, that he perfectly thirsts after his own father's blood. It is past dispute, David must be destroyed; all the question is, How it may be done?

I. Ahithophel advises that he be pursued immediately, this very night, with a flying army, which he himself undertakes the command of, that the king only be smitten, and his forces dispersed, and then the people that were now for him would fall in with Absalom of course, and there would not be such a long war as had been between the house of Saul and David, v. 1. . 3. The man whom thou seekest is as if all returned. By this, it appears that Absalom had declared his design to be upon David's life, and Ahithophel concurs with him in it; Smite the shepherd, and the sheep will be scattered, and be an easy prey to the wolf. Thus he contrives to include the war in a little compass, by fighting neither with small nor great, but the king of Israel only, and to conclude it in a little time, by falling upon him immediately. Nothing could have been more fatal to David, than the taking of these measures. It was too true, that he was weary and weak-handed; that a little thing would make him afraid, else he had not fled from his house upon the first alarm of Absalom's rebellion; it was probable enough that, upon a fierce attack, especially in the night, the small force he had would be put into confusion and disorder, and it would be an easy thing to smite the king only, and then the business was done, the whole nation would be reduced, of course, and all the people, says he, shall be in peace. See how a general ruin is called, by usurpers, a general peace; but thus the Devil's palace is in peace, while he, as a strong man armed, keeps it. Compare with this the plot of Caiaphas (that second Ahithophel) against the Son of David, to crush his interest by destroying him; Let that one man die for the people, John, 11. 50. Kill the heir, and the inheritance shall be our's, Matth. 21. 38. But the counsel of them both was turned into foolishness. Yet the children of light may, in their generation, learn wisdom from the children of this world. What our hand finds to do, let us do quickly, and with all our might. It is prudence to be vigorous and expeditious, and not to lose time, particularly in our spiritual warfare; if Satan flee from us, let us follow our blow.

They that have quarrelled with crowned heads have generally observed the decorum of declaring only against their evil counselors, and calling them to an account, The king himself can do no wrong, it is they that do it; but Absalom's bare-faced villany strikes at the king directly, nay, at the king only; for (would you think it?) this saying, I will smite the king only, pleased Absalom well, v. 4. nor had he so much sense of honour and virtue left him, as to pretend to startle at it, or even to be reluctant in this barbarous and monstrous resolution. What good can stand before the heat of a furious ambition?

II. Hushai advises that they be not too hasty in pursuing David, but take time to draw up all their force against him, and to overpower him with numbers, as Ahithophel had advised to take him by surprise. Now Hushai, in giving this counsel, really intended to serve David and his interest; that he might have time to send him notice of his proceedings, and that David might gain time to gather an army, and to remove into those countries beyond Jordan, which, lying more remote, Absalom, probably, had got least interest in. Nothing would be of greater advantage to David, in this juncture, than time to turn him in; that he may have that, Hushai counsels Absalom to do nothing rashly, but to proceed with caution, and secure his success by securing his strength.

Now, 1. Absalom gave Hushai a fair invitation to advise him. All the elders of Israel approved of Ahithophel's counsel, yet God overruled the heart of Absalom not to proceed upon it, till he had advised with Hushai, v. 5. Let us hear what he saith. Herein he thought he did wisely, (two heads are better than one,) but God taketh the wise in their own craftiness. See Mr. Pool's note on this.

2. Hushai gave good reasons for what he said.

(1.) He argued against Ahithophel's counsel, and undertook to shew the danger of following his advice. It is with modesty and all possible deference to his settled reputation, that he begs leave to differ from him, v. 7. The counsel of Ahithophel is usually the best, and such as may be relied on; but, with submission to that noble peer, he is of opinion that his counsel is not good at this time, for it was by no means safe to venture so great a cause as that in which they were now engaged, upon so small a number, and such a hasty sally, as Ahithophel advised; remembering the defeat of Israel before Ai, Josh. 7. 4. It has often proved of bad consequence to despise an enemy. See how plausibly Hushai reasons: [1.] He insists much upon it, that David was a great soldier, a man of great conduct, courage, and experience; all knew and owned this, even Absalom himself, Thy father is a man of war, v. 8. a mighty man, v. 10. and not so weary and weak-handed as Ahithophel imagines. His retiring from Jerusalem must be imputed, not to his cowardice, but his prudence. [2.] His attendants, though few, were mighty men, v. 8. valiant men, v. 10. men of celebrated bravery, and versed in all the arts of war. Ahithophel, who perhaps had worn the gown more than the sword, would find himself an unequal match for them. One of them would chase a thousand. [3.] They were all exasperated against Absalom, who was the author of all this mischief, were chafed in their minds, and would fight with the utmost fury; so that, what with their courage, and what with their rage, there would be no standing before them, especially for such raw soldiers as Absalom's generally were. Thus does he represent them as formidable as Ahithophel had made them despicable. [4.] He suggests, that probably David and some of his men would lie in ambush, in some pit, or other close place, and fall upon Absalom's soldiers before they were aware, the terror of which would put them to flight; and the defeat, though but of a small party, would dispirit all the rest, especially their own consciences at the same time accusing them of treason against one that, they were sure, was not only God's anointed, but a man after his own heart, v. 9. "It will soon be given out, that there is a slaughter among Absalom's men, and then they will all make the best of their way, and the heart of Ahithophel himself, though now it seems like the heart of a lion, will utterly melt away. In short, he will not find it so easy a matter to deal with David and his men as he thinks it is; and, if he be foiled, we are all routed."

(2.) He offered his own advice, and gave his reasons; and,

[1.] He counselled that which he knew would gratify Absalom's proud vain-glorious humour, though it would not be really serviceable to his interest. First, He advises that all Israel should be gathered together, that is, the militia of all the tribes; his taking it for granted that they were all for him, and giving them an opportunity to see them altogether under his command, would gratify him as much as any thing. Secondly, He advises that Absalom go to battle in his own person, as if he looked upon him to be a better soldier than Abithophel, more fit to give command, and have the honour of the victory, insinuating that Abithophel had put a slight upon him, in offering to go without him: see how easy it is to betray proud men, by applauding them, and feeding their pride.

[2.] He counselled that which seemed to secure the success, at last, infallibly, without running any hazard. For, if they could raise such vast numbers as they promised themselves, wherever they found him, they should not fail to crush him. First, If in the field, they should fall upon him, as the dew that covers the face of the ground, and cut off all his men with him, v. 12. Perhaps, Absalom was better pleased with the design of cutting off all the men that were with him, having a particular antipathy to some of David's friends, than with Abithophel's project of smiting the king only. Thus Hushai gained his point by humouring his revenge, as well as his pride. Secondly, If in a city, they need not fear conquering him, for they should have hands enough, if occasion were, to draw the city itself into its river with ropes, v. 13. This strange suggestion, how impracticable soever, being new, served for an amusement, and recommended itself by pleasing the fancy, for they would all smile at the humour of it.

By all these arts, Hushai gained not only Absalom's approbation of his advice, but the unanimous concurrence of this great council of war; they all agreed that the counsel of Hushai was better than the counsel of Abithophel, v. 14. See here, First, How much the policy of man can do: if Hushai had not been there, Abithophel's counsel had certainly prevailed; and though all had given their opinion, nothing could be really more for Absalom's interest than that which he advised, yet Hushai, with his management, brings them all over to his side; and none of them are aware that he says all this in favour of David and his interest, but all say as he says. See how the unthinking part are imposed upon by the designing part of mankind; what tools, what fools, great men make of one another by their intrigues; and what tricks there are often in courts, and councils, which they are happiest that are least conversant with. Secondly, See how much more the providence of God can do: Hushai managed the plot with dexterity, yet the success is ascribed to God, and his agency on the minds of those concerned; The Lord had appointed to defeat the good counsel of Abithophel. Be it observed, to the comfort of all that fear God, he turns all men's hearts as the rivers of waters, though they know not the thoughts of the Lord. He stands in the congregation of the mighty, has an over-ruling hand in all counsels, and a negative voice in all resolves, and laughs at men's projects against his anointed.

15. Then said Hushai unto Zadok and to Abiathar the priests, Thus and thus did Abithophel counsel Absalom and the elders of Israel; and thus and thus have I counselled. 16. Now therefore send quickly, and tell David, saying, Lodge not this night in the plains of the wilderness, but speedily pass over; lest the king be swallowed up, and all the people that are with him. 17. Now Jonathan and Ahimaaz stayed by En-rogel; for they might not be seen to come into the city: and a wench went and told them; and they went and told king David. 18. Nevertheless, a lad saw them, and told Absalom: but they went both of them away quickly, and came to a man's house in Bahurim, which had a well in his court, whither they went down. 19. And the woman took and spread a covering over the well's mouth, and spread ground corn thereon; and the thing was not known. 20. And when Absalom's servants came to the woman to the house, they said, Where is Ahimaaz and Jonathan? And the woman said unto them, They be gone over the brook of water. And when they had sought and could not find them, they returned to Jerusalem. 21. And it came to pass, after they were departed, that they came up out of the well, and went and told king David, and said unto David, Arise, and pass quickly over the water: for thus hath Abithophel counselled against you.

We must now leave David's enemies pleasing themselves with the thoughts of a sure victory, by following Hushai's counsel, and sending a summons, no doubt, to all the tribes of Israel, to come to the general rendezvous at a place appointed, pursuant to that counsel; and we next find David's friends consulting how to get him notice of all this, that he might steer his course accordingly. Hushai tells the priests what had passed in council, v. 15. But, it should seem, he was not sure but that yet Abithophel's counsel might be followed, and was therefore jealous, lest, if he made not the best of his way, the king would be swallowed up, and all the people that were with him, v. 16. Perhaps, as he was called in to give his advice, v. 5. so he was dismissed before they came to that resolve, v. 14. in favour of his advice. Or he feared they might afterward change their mind. However, it was good to provide against the worst, and therefore to hasten those valuable lives out of the reach of these destroyers.

Such strict guards did Absalom set upon all the avenues to Jerusalem, that they had much ado to get this necessary intelligence to David. 1. The young priests that were to be the messengers were forced to retire secretly out of the city, by En-rogel; which signifies, as some say, the fountain of a spy. Surely it went ill with Jerusalem, when two such faithful priests as they were might not be seen to come into the city. 2. Instructions were sent to them by a poor simple young woman, who, probably, went to that well under pretence of fetching water, v. 17. If she carried the message by word of mouth, there was danger of her making some mistake or blunder in it; but Providence can make an ignorant girl a trusty messenger, and serve its wise counsels by the foolish things of the world. 3. Yet, by the vigilance of Absalom's spies, they were discovered, and information brought to Absalom of their motions. A lad saw them, and told him, v. 18. 4. They being aware that they were discovered, sheltered themselves in a friend's house in Bahurim, where David had refreshed himself but just before, ch. 16. 14. There they were happily hid in a well, which now, in summer time, perhaps, was dry, v. 18. The woman of the house very ingeniously covered the mouth of the well with a cloth, on which she spread corn to dry, so that the pursuers were not aware that there was a well; else they had searched it, v. 19. Thus far the woman did well; but we know not how to justify her further concealing them with a lie, v. 20. We must not do evil that good may come of it. However, hereby the messengers were protected, and the pursuers were defeated, and returned to Absalom without their prey. It was well that Absalom did not, hereupon, fall upon their two fathers, Zadok and Abiathar, as Saul on Ahimelech for his kindness to David: but God restrained him. Being thus preserved, they brought their intelligence very faithfully to David, v. 21. with this advice of his friends, that he should not delay to pass over Jordan, near to which, it seems, he now was. There, as some think, he penned the 42d and 43d psalms, looking back upon Jerusalem from the land of Jordan, Ps. 42. 6.

22. Then David arose, and all the people that were with him, and they passed over Jordan: by the morning light there lacked not one of them that was not gone over Jordan. 23. And when Ahithophel saw that his counsel was not followed, he saddled his ass, and arose, and gat him home to his house, to his city, and put his household in order, and hanged himself, and died, and was buried in the sepulchre of his father. 24. Then David came to Mahanaim. And Absalom passed over Jordan, he and all the men of Israel with him. 25. And Absalom made Amasa captain of the host instead of Joab: which Amasa was a man's son, whose name was Ithra an Israelite, that went in to Abigail the daughter of Nahash, sister to Zeruiah Joab's mother. 26. So Israel and Absalom pitched in the land of Gilead. 27. And it came to pass, when David was come to Mahanaim, that Shobi the son of Nahash of Rabbah of the children of Ammon, and Machir the son of Ammiel of Lodebar, and Barzillai the Gileadite of Rogelim, 28. Brought beds, and basins, and earthen vessels, and wheat, and barley, and flour, and parched corn, and beans, and lentiles, and parched pulse, 29. And honey, and butter, and sheep, and cheese of kine, for David, and for the people that were with him, to eat: for they said, The people is hungry, and weary, and thirsty, in the wilderness.

Here is,

I. The transporting of David and his forces over Jordan, pursuant to the advice he had received from his friends at Jerusalem, v. 22. He, and all that were with him, went over in the night, whether in ferry-boats, which probably always plied there, or through the fords, does not appear. But special notice may be taken of this, that there lacked not one of them; none deserted him, though his distress was great, none stayed behind sick or weary, nor were any lost or cast away in passing the river. Herein some make him a type of the Messiah, who said, in a difficult day, Of all that thou hast given me have I lost none. Being got over Jordan, he marched many miles forward to Mahanaim, a Levites' city in the tribe of Gad, in the utmost border of that tribe, and not far from Rabbah, the chief city of the Ammonites. This city, which Ish-bosheth had made his royal city, (ch. 2. 8.) David now made his head-quarters, v. 24. And now he had time to raise an army wherewith to oppose the rebels, and give them a warm reception.

II. The death of Ahithophel, v. 23. He died by his own hands, felo de se—a suicide: he hanged himself for vexation that his counsel was not followed; for thereby, 1. He thought himself slighted, and an intolerable slur cast upon his reputation for wisdom. His judgment always used to sway at the council-board, but now another's opinion is thought wiser and better than his; his proud heart cannot bear the affront, it rises and swells, and the more he thinks of it, the more violent his resentments grow, till they bring him, at last, to this desperate resolve, not to live to see another preferred before him. All men think him a wise man, but he thinks himself the only wise man; and therefore, to be avenged upon mankind for not thinking so too, he will die, that wisdom may die with him. The world is not worthy of such an oracle as he is, and therefore he will make them know the want of him. See what real enemies they are to themselves, that think too well of themselves, and what mischiefs they run upon, that are impatient of contempt. That will break a proud man's heart, that will not break a humble man's sleep. 2. He thought himself endangered, and his life exposed. He concluded, that, because his counsel was not followed, Absalom's cause would certainly miscarry, and then, whoever would find David's mercy, he concluded that he who was the greatest criminal, and had particularly advised him to lie with his father's concubines, must be sacrificed to his justice; to prevent therefore the shame and terror of a public and solemn execution, he does justice upon himself, and after all his reputation for wisdom, by this, his last act, puts a far greater disgrace upon himself than Absalom's privy counsel had put upon him, and answers his name, Ahithophel, which signifies, the brother of a fool. Nothing indicates so much folly as self-murder. Observe how deliberately he did it, and of malice prepense against himself; not in a heat, but he went home to his city, to his house, to do it; and, which is strange, took time to consider of it, and yet did it. And, to prove himself coupas mentis—in his senses, when he did it, he first put his household in order, made his will as a man of sane memory and understanding, settled his estate, balanced his accounts; yet he that had sense and prudence enough to do this, had not consideration enough to revoke the sentence his pride and passion had passed upon his own neck, or so much as to suspend the execution of it till he saw the event of Absalom's rebellion. Now herein we may see, (1.) Contempt poured upon the wisdom of man; he that was more renowned for policy than any man, plays the fool with himself more abundantly. Let not the wise man glory in his wisdom, when he sees him that was so great an oracle, dying as a fool dies. (2.) Honour done to the justice of God. When the wicked are thus snares in the work of their own hands, and sunk in a pit of their own digging, the Lord is known by the judgment which he executeth, and we must say, Higgaion, Selah; it is a thing to be marked and meditated upon, Ps. 7. 15, 16. (3.) Prayer answered, and an honest cause served even by its enemies. Now, as David had prayed, Ahithophel's counsel was turned into foolishness to himself. Dr. Lightfoot supposes that David penned the 55th Psalm, upon occasion of Ahithophel's being in the plot against him, and that he is the man complained of, (v. 13.) that had been his equal, his guide, and his acquaintance; and if so, this was an immediate answer to his prayer there, (v. 15.) Let death seize upon them, let them go down quick into hell. Ahithophel's death was an advantage to David's interest; for had he digested that affront, (as those must resolve often to do, that will live in this world,) and continued his post at Absalom's elbow, he might have given him counsel afterward, that might have been of pernicious consequence to David. It is well that that breath is stopt, and that head laid, from which nothing could be expected but mischief. It seems, it was not then usual to disgrace the dead bodies of self-murderers, for Ahithophel was buried, we may suppose honourably buried, in the sepulchre of his father, though he deserved no better than the burial of an ass: see Eccl. 8. 10.

III. Absalom's pursuit of his father; he had now got all the men of Israel with him, as Hushai advised, and he himself, at the head of them, passed over Jordan, v. 24. Not content that he had driven his good father to the utmost corner of his kingdom, he resolved to chase him out of the world. He pitched in the land of Gilead with all his forces, ready to give David battle, v. 26. Absalom made one Amasa his general, (v. 25.) whose father was, by birth, Jether, an Ishmaelite, (1 Chron. 2. 17.) but, by religion, Ithra, (as he is here called,) an Israelite; probably, he was not only proselyted, but, having married a near relation of David's, was, by some act of the state, naturalized, and is therefore called an Israelite. His wife, Amasa's mother, was Abigail, David's sister, whose other sister, Zeruiah, was Joab's mother, 1 Chron. 2. 16. So that Amasa was the same relation to David that Joab was. In honour to his family, even while he was in arms against his father, Absalom made him commander in chief of all his forces. Jesse is here called Natash, for many had two names; or perhaps it was his wife's name.

IV. The friends David met with in this distant country. Even Shobi, a younger brother of the royal family of the Ammonites, was kind to him, v. 27. It is probable that he had detested the indignity which his brother Hanun had done to David's ambassadors, and, for that, had received favours from David, which he now returns. Those that think their prosperity most confirmed, know not but, some time or other, they may stand in need of the kindness of those that now lie at their mercy, and may be glad to be beholden to them; which is a reason, why we should, as we have opportunity, do good to all men, for he that watereth shall be watered also himself, when there is occasion. Machir, the son of Ammiel, was he that maintained Mephibosheth, ch. 9. 4. till David eased him of that charge; and is now repaid for it by that generous man, who, it seems, was the common patron of distressed princes. Barzillai we shall hear of again. These, compassionating David and his men, now that they were weary with a long march, brought him furniture for his house, beds and basins; and provision for his table, wheat and barley, &c. v. 28, 29. He did not put them under contribution, did not compel them to supply him, much less, plunder them; but, in token of their dutiful affection to him, their firm adherence to his government, and their sincere concern for him in his present straits, of their own good will, they brought in plenty of all that which he had occasion for. Let us learn hence to be generous and open-handed, according as our ability is, to all in distress, especially great men, to whom it is most grievous, and good men, who deserve better treatment. Observe here, how God sometimes makes up to his people that comfort from strangers, which they are disappointed of in their own families.

CHAP. XVIII.

This chapter puts a period to Absalom's rebellion and life, and so makes way for David to his throne again, whither the next chapter brings him back in peace and triumph. We have here, I. David's preparations to engage the rebels, v. 1. 5. II. The total defeat of Absalom's party, and their dispersion, v. 6. 8. III. The death of Absalom, and his burial, v. 9. 18. IV. The bringing of the tidings of it to David, who tarried at Mahanaim, v. 19. 32. V. His bitter lamentation of Absalom, v. 33.

1. AND David numbered the people that were with him, and set captains of thousands and captains of hundreds over them. 2. And David sent forth a third part of the people under the hand of Joab, and a third part under the hand of Abishai the son of Zeruiah, Joab's brother, and a third part under the hand of Ittai, the Gittite. And the king said unto the people, I will surely go forth with you myself also. 3. But the people answered, Thou shalt not go forth: for if we flee away, they will not care for us; neither if half of us die, will they care for us: but now thou art worth ten thousand of us: therefore now it is better that thou succour us out of the city. 4. And the king said unto them, What seemeth you best I will do. And the king stood by the gate-side, and all the people came out by hundreds and by thousands. 5. And the king commanded Joab, and Abishai, and Ittai, saying, Deal gently, for my sake, with the young man, even with Absalom. And all the people heard when the king gave all the captains charge concerning Absalom. 6. So the people went out into the field against Israel: and the battle was in the wood of Ephraim; 7. Where the people of Israel were slain before the servants of David, and there was there a great slaughter that day of twenty thousand men. 8. For the battle was there scattered over the face of all the country: and the wood devoured more people that day than the sword devoured.

Which way David raised an army here, and what reinforcements were sent him, we are not told; many, it is likely, from all the coasts of Israel, at least, from the neighbouring tribes, came in to his assistance, so that, by degrees, he was able to make head against Absalom, as Ahithophel foresaw. Now here we have,

I. His army numbered and marshalled, v. 1, 2. He had, no doubt, committed his cause to God by prayer, for that was his relief in all his afflictions; and then he took an account of his forces; Josephus says they were, in all, but about four thousand: these he divided into regiments and companies, to each of which he appointed proper officers, and then disposed them, as is usual, into the right wing, the left wing, and the centre, two of which he committed to his two old experienced generals, Joab and Abishai, and the third to his new friend Ittai. Good order and good conduct may sometimes be as serviceable in an army, as great numbers. Wisdom teaches us to make the best of the strength we have, and let it reach to the utmost.

II. Himself over-persuaded not to go in person to the battle. He was Absalom's false friend, that persuaded him to go, and served his pride more than his prudence; David's true friends would not let him go, remembering what they had been told of Ahithophel's design to smite the king only. David shewed his affection to them by being willing to venture with them, v. 2. And they shewed their's to him by opposing it. We must never reckon it an affront to be gainsayed for our good, and by those that therein consult our interest. 1. They would by no means have him to expose himself, for, (say they,) Thou art worth ten thousand of us. Thus ought good princes to be valued by their subjects, who, for their safety must be willing to expose themselves. 2. They would not so far gratify the enemy, who would rejoice more in his fall, than in the defeat of the whole army. 3. He might be more serviceable to them by tarrying in the city, with a reserve of his forces there, whence he might send them recruits. That may be a post of real service, which yet is not a post of danger. The king acquiesced in their reasons, and changed his purpose, v. 4. What seemeth you best I will do. It is no piece of wisdom to be stiff in our resolutions, but to be willing to hear reason, even from our inferiors, and to be overruled by their advice, when it appears to be for our own good. Whether the people's prudence had an eye to it or no, God's providence wisely ordered it, that David should not be in the field of battle; for then his tenderness had certainly interposed to save Absalom's life, whom God had determined to destroy.

III. The charge he gave concerning Absalom, v. 5. When the army was drawn out, rank and file, Josephus says, he encouraged them, and prayed for them, but withal bade them all take heed of doing Absalom any hurt. How does he render good for evil! Absalom would have David only smitten, David would have Absalom only spared. What foils are these to each other! Never was unnatural hatred to a father more strong than in Absalom; nor was ever natural affection to a child more strong than in David; each did his utmost, and shewed what he could do; how bad it is possible for a child to be to the best of fathers, and how good it is possible for a father to be to the worst of children; as if it were designed to be a resemblance of man's wickedness toward God, and God's mercy toward man, of which it is hard to say which is more amazing. "Deal gently," says David, "by all means, with the young man, even with Absalom, for my sake; he is a young man, rash and heady, and his age must excuse him; he is mine, whom I love; if you love me, be not severe with him." This charge supposes David's strong expectation of success, having a good cause, and a good God; he doubts not but Absalom would lie at their mercy, and therefore bids them deal gently with him, spare his life, and reserve him for his judgment.

Bishop Hall thus descants on this; "What means this ill-placed love? this unjust mercy? Deal gently with a traitor? Of all traitors, with a son? Of all sons, with an Absalom, that graceless darling of so good a father? And all this, for thy sake, whose crown, whose blood, he hunts after? For whose sake must he be pursued, if forborne for thine? Must the cause of the quarrel be the motive of mercy? Even in the holiest parents nature may be guilty of an injurious tenderness, of a "bloody indulgence. But was not this done in type of that unmeasurable mercy of the true King and Redeemer of Israel, who prayed for his persecutors, for his murderers; Father, forgive them. Deal gently with them for my sake." When God sends an affliction to correct his children, it is with this charge, "Deal gently with them for my sake;" for he knows our frame.

IV. A complete victory gained over Absalom's forces. The battle was fought in the wood of Ephraim, v. 6. so called from some memorable action of the Ephraimites there, though it lay in the tribe of Gad. David thought fit to meet the enemy with his forces at some distance, before they came up to Mahanaim, lest he should bring that city into trouble, which had so kindly sheltered him. The cause shall be decided by a pitched battle; Josephus represents the fight as very obstinate, but the rebels were at length totally routed, and 20,000 of them slain, v. 7. Now they smarted justly for their treason against their lawful prince, their uneasiness under so good a government, and their base ingratitude to so good a governor; and found what it was to take up arms for an usurper, who with his kisses and caresses had wheedled them into their own ruin. Now, where are the rewards, the preferments, the golden days, they promised themselves from him? Now, they see what it is to take counsel against the Lord, and his anointed, and to think of breaking his bands asunder. And that they might see that God fought against them, 1. They are conquered by a few, an army, in all probability, much inferior to their's in number. 2. By that flight with which they hoped to save themselves, they destroyed themselves; the wood, which they sought to for shelter, devoured more than the sword: that they might see how, when they thought themselves safe from David's men, and said, Surely the bitterness of death is past, yet the justice of God pursued them, and suffered them not to live. What refuge can rebels find from divine vengeance? The pits and bogs, the stumps and thickets, and, as the Chaldee-paraphrast understands it, the wild beasts of the wood, were, probably, the death of multitudes of the dispersed distracted Israelites, beside the 20,000 that were slain with the sword. God herein fought for David, and yet fought against him; for all these that were slain were his own subjects, and the common interest of his kingdom was weakened by it. The Romans allowed no triumph for a victory in a civil war.

9. And Absalom met the servants of David. And Absalom rode upon a mule, and the mule went under the thick boughs of a great oak, and his head caught hold of the oak, and he was taken up between the heaven and the earth; and the mule that was under him went away. 10. And a certain man saw it, and told Joab, and said, Behold I saw Absalom hanged in an oak. 11. And Joab said unto the man that told him, And, behold, thou sawest him, and why didst thou not smite him there to the ground? and I would have given thee ten shekels of silver, and a girdle. 12. And the man said unto Joab, Though I should receive a thousand shekels of silver in mine hand, yet would I not put forth mine hand against the king's son: for in our hearing the king charged thee, and Abishai, and Ittai, saying, Beware that none touch the young man Absalom. 13. Otherwise I should have wrought falsehood against mine own life: for there is no matter hid from the king, and thou thyself wouldest have set thyself against me. 14. Then said Joab, I may not tarry thus with thee. And he took three darts in his hand, and thrust them through the heart of Absalom, while he was yet alive in the midst of the oak. 15. And ten young men that bare Joab's armour compassed about and smote Absalom, and slew him. 16. And Joab blew the trumpet, and the people returned from pursuing after Israel: for Joab held back the people. 17. And they took Absalom, and cast him into a great pit in the wood, and laid a very great heap of stones upon him: and all Israel fled every one to his tent. 18. Now Absalom in his lifetime had taken and reared up for himself a pillar, which is in the king's dale: for he said, I have no son to keep my name in remembrance: and he called the pillar after his own name; and it is called unto this day, Absalom's place.

Here is Absalom quite at a loss; at his wit's end, first, and then at his life's end. He that began the fight, big with the expectation of triumphing over David himself, with whom, if he had had him in his power, he would not have dealt gently, is now in the greatest consternation, when he meets the servants of David, v. 9. Though they were forbidden to meddle with him, he durst not look them in the face; but, finding they were near him, he makes the best of his way, and so rides headlong upon his own destruction. Thus, he that flies from the fear shall fall into the pit, and he that getteth up out of the pit shall be taken in the snare, Jer. 48. 44. David is inclined to spare him, but divine justice passes sentence upon him as a traitor, and sees it executed; that he hang by the neck, be caught alive, be embowelled, and his body disposed of disgracefully.

I. He is hanged by the neck. Riding furiously under the thick boughs of a great oak which hung low, and had been never cropped, either the twisted branches, or some one forked bough of the oak, caught hold of his head, either by his neck, or, as some think, by his long hair, which had been so much his pride, and was now justly made a halter for him, and there he hung, astonished, that he could not use his hands to help himself, or so entangled, that his hands could not help him, but the more he struggled, the more he was embarrassed. This set him up for a fair mark to the servants of David, and he had the terror and shame of seeing himself thus exposed, while he could do nothing for his own relief, neither fight nor fly.

Observe concerning this, 1. That his mule went away from under him, as if glad to get clear of such a burthen, and resign it to the ignominious tree. Thus the whole creation groans under the burthen of man's corruption, but shall shortly be delivered from its load, Rom. 8. 21, 22. 2. That he hung between heaven and earth, as unworthy of either, as abandoned of both; earth would not keep him, heaven would not take him, hell therefore opens her mouth to receive him. 3. That this was a very surprising unusual thing; it was fit that it should be so, his crime being so monstrous: if, in his flight, his mule had thrown him, and left him half dead upon the ground, till the servants of David had come up and dispatched him, the same thing had been done as effectually; but that had been too common a fate for so uncommon a criminal; God will here, as in the case of those other rebels Dathan and Abiram, create a new thing, that it may be understood how much this man has provoked the Lord, Numb. 16. 29, 30. Absalom is here hung up, in terrorem—to frighten children from disobedience to their parents; see Prov. 30. 17.

II. He is caught alive by one of the servants of David, who went straight, and told Joab in what posture he found that arch-rebel, v. 10. Thus was he set up for a spectacle, as well as a mark, that the righteous might see him, and laugh at him, Ps. 52. 6. while he has this further vexation in his breast, that of all the friends he had courted and confided in, and thought he had sure in his interest, though he hung long enough to have been relieved, yet he had none at hand to disentangle him. Joab chides the man for not dispatching him, v. 11. telling him, if he had given that bold stroke, he would have rewarded him with ten half crowns, and a girdle, that is, a captain's commission, which, perhaps, was signified by the delivery of a belt or girdle; see Isa. 22. 21. But the man, though zealous enough against Absalom, justified himself in not doing it: "Dispatch him!" says he, "not for all the world; it would have cost me my head: and thou thyself wast witness to the king's charge concerning him, (v. 12.) and, for all thy talk, wouldest have been my persecutor if I had done it," v. 13. Those that love the treason, hate the traitor. Joab could not deny this, nor blame the man for his caution, and therefore makes him no answer, but breaks off the discourse, under colour of haste, v. 14. I may not tarry thus with thee. Superiors should consider a reproof before they give it, lest they be ashamed of it afterward, and find themselves unable to make it good.

III. He is (as I may say) embowelled and quartered, as traitors are, so pitifully mangled is he as he hangs there, and receives his death in such a manner, as to see all its terrors, and feel all its pain. 1. Joab throws three darts into his body, which put him, no doubt, to exquisite torment, while he is yet alive in the midst of the oak, v. 14. I know not whether Joab can be justified in this direct disobedience to the command of his sovereign; was this to deal gently with the young man? Would David have suffered him to do it, if he had been upon the spot? Yet this may be said for him, that while he broke the order of a too indulgent father, he did real service both to his king and country, and would have endangered the welfare of both, if he had not done it. Salus populi suprema lex—The safety of the people is the supreme law. 2. Joab's young men, ten of them, smite him, before he is dispatched, v. 15. They surrounded him, made a ring about him in triumph, and then smote him, and slew him. So let all thine enemies perish, O Lord. Joab, hereupon, sounds a retreat, v. 16. the danger is over now that Absalom is slain; the people will soon return to their allegiance to David, and therefore no more blood shall be spilt; no prisoners are taken, to be tried as traitors, and made examples; let every man return to his tent; they are all the king's subjects, all his good subjects again.

IV. His body is disposed of disgracefully, v. 17, 18. They cast it into a great pit in the wood; they would not bring it to his father, (for that circumstance would but have added to his grief,) nor would they preserve it to be buried, according to his order, but threw it into the next pit with indignation. Now, where is the beauty he had been so proud of, and for which he had been so much admired? Where are his aspiring projects, and the castles he had built in the air? His thoughts perish, and he with them. And, to signify how heavy his iniquity lay upon his bones, as the prophet speaks, Ezek. 32. 27. they raised a great heap of stones upon him, to be a monument of his villany, and to signify that he ought to have been stoned as a rebellious son, Deut. 21. 21. Travellers say, that the place is taken notice of to this day, and that it is common for passengers to throw a stone to this heap, with words to this purport; Cursed be the memory of rebellious Absalom, and cursed for ever be all wicked children that rise up in rebellion against their parents. To aggravate the ignominy of Absalom's burial, the historian takes notice of a pillar he had erected in the valley of Kidron, near Jerusalem, to be a monument for himself, and keep his name in remembrance, v. 18. at the foot of which, it is probable, he designed to be buried. What foolish insignificant projects do proud men fill their heads with! And what care do many people take about the disposal of their bodies, when they are dead, that have no care at all what shall become of their precious souls! Absalom had three sons, ch. 14. 27. but, it seems, now he had none; God had taken them away by death; and justly is a rebellious son written childless; to make up the want, he erects this pillar for a memorial; yet, in this also, Providence crosses him, and a rude heap of stones shall be his monument, instead of this marble pillar. Thus, they that exalt themselves shall be abased. His care was, to have his name kept in remembrance, and it is so, to his everlasting dishonour. He could not be content in the obscurity of the rest of David's sons, of whom nothing is recorded but their names, but would be famous, and is therefore justly made for ever infamous. The pillar shall bear his name, but not to his credit; it was designed for Absalom's glory, but proved Absalom's folly.

19. Then said Ahimaaz the son of Zadok, Let me now run, and bear the king tidings, how that the LORD hath avenged him of his enemies. 20. And Joab said unto him, Thou shalt not bear tidings this day, but thou shalt bear tidings another day: but this day thou shalt bear no tidings, because the king's son is dead. 21. Then said Joab to Cush, Go tell the king what thou hast seen. And Cush bowed himself unto Joab, and ran. 22. Then said Ahimaaz the son of Zadok yet again to Joab, But howsoever, let me, I pray thee, also run after Cush. And Joab said, Wherefore wilt thou run, my son, seeing that thou hast no tidings ready? 23. But howsoever, said he, let me run. And he said unto him, Run. Then Ahimaaz ran by the way of the plain, and over-ran Cush. 24. And David sat between the two gates: and the watchman went up to the roof over the gate unto the wall, and lifted up his eyes, and looked, and behold a man running alone. 25. And the watchman cried, and told the king. And the king said, If he be alone, there is tidings in his mouth. And he came apace, and drew near. 26. And the watchman saw another man running, and the watchman called unto the porter, and said, Behold another man running alone. And the king said, He also bringeth tidings. 27. And the watchman said, Methinketh the running of the foremost is like the running of Ahimaaz the son of Zadok. And the king said, He is a good man, and cometh with good tidings. 28. And Ahimaaz called, and said unto the king, All is well. And he fell down to the earth upon his face before the king, and said, Blessed be the LORD thy God, which hath delivered up the men that lifted up their hand against my lord the king. 29. And the king said, Is the young man Absalom safe? And Ahimaaz answered, When Joab sent the king's servant, and me thy servant, I saw a great tumult, but I knew not what it was. 30. And the king said unto him, Turn aside, and stand here. And he turned aside, and stood still. 31. And, behold, Cush came; and Cush said, Tidings, my lord the king: for the LORD hath avenged thee this day of all them that rose up against thee. 32. And the king said unto Cush, Is the young man Absalom safe? And Cush answered, The enemies of my lord the king, and all that rise against thee to do thee hurt, be as that young man is. 33. And the king was much moved, and went up to the chamber over the gate, and wept: and as he went, thus he said, O my son Absalom, my son, my son Absalom! would God I had died for thee, O Absalom, my son, my son!

Absalom's business is done; we are now told,

I. How David was informed of it. He stayed behind at the city of Mahanaim, some miles from the wood where the battle was, and in the utmost border of the land: Absalom's scattered forces all made homeward toward Jordan, which was the contrary way from Mahanaim, so that his watchmen could perceive nothing how the battle went, till an express came on purpose to bring advice of the issue, which the king sat in the gate expecting to hear, v. 24.

1. Cushy was the man Joab ordered to carry the tidings, v. 21. an Ethiopian, so his name signifies, and some think that he was so by birth; a black that waited on Joab, probably one of the ten that had helped to dispatch Absalom, v. 15. as some think, though it was dangerous for one of those to bring the news to David, lest his fate should be the same with their's that reported to him Saul's death, and Ish-bosheth's.

2. Ahimaaz, the young priest, (one of those who brought David intelligence of Absalom's motions, ch. 17. 17.) was very forward to be the messenger of these tidings, so transported was he with joy that this cloud was blown over; let him go tell the king that the Lord hath avenged him of his enemies, v. 19. This he desired, not so much in hope of a reward, (he was above that,) as that he might have the pleasure and satisfaction of bringing the king, whom he loved, this good news. Joab knew David better than Ahimaaz did, and that the tidings of Absalom's death, which must conclude the story, would spoil the acceptableness of all the rest; and he loves Ahimaaz too well to let him be the messenger of those tidings, v. 20. they are fitter to be brought by a footman than by a priest. However, when Cushy was gone, Ahimaaz begged hard for leave to run after him, and with great importunity obtained it, v. 22, 23. One would wonder why he should be so very fond of this office, when another was employed in it. (1.) Perhaps it was to show his swiftness; observing how heavily Cushy ran, and that he took the worst way, though the nearest, he had a mind to show how fast he could run, and that he could go the furthest way about, and yet beat Cushy. No great praise for a priest to be swift of foot, yet perhaps Ahimaaz was proud of it. (2.) Perhaps it was in prudence and tenderness to the king, that he desired it. He knew he could get before Cushy, and therefore was willing to prepare the king, with an amusing story, for the plain truth which Cushy was ordered to tell him. If bad news must come, it is best that it come gradually, and will be the better borne.

3. They are both discovered by the watchman on the gate of Mahanaim; Ahimaaz first, v. 24. for though Cushy had the lead, he soon overran him; but, presently after, Cushy appeared, v. 26. (1.) When the king hears of one running alone, he concludes he is an express, v. 25. If he be alone, there is tidings in his mouth; for if they had been beaten, and were flying back from the enemy, there would have been many. (2.) When he hears it is Ahimaaz, he concludes he brings good news, v. 27. Ahimaaz, it seems, was so famous for running, that he was known by it at a distance; and so eminently good, that it is taken for granted, if he be the messenger, the news must needs be good: he is a good man, zealously affected to the king's interest, and would not bring bad news. It is pity that the good tidings of the gospel should always be brought by good men; and how welcome should they be to us for their message-sake!

4. Ahimaaz is very forward to proclaim the victory, v. 28. cries at a distance, "Peace, there is peace;" peace after war, which is doubly welcome. "All is well, my lord, O king, the danger is over, and we may return, when the king pleases, to Jerusalem." And, when he comes near, he tells him the news more particularly. They are all cut off, that lifted up their hand against the king; and, as became a priest, while he gives the king the joy of it, he gives God the glory of it, the God of peace and war, the God of salvation and victory; "Blessed be the Lord thy God, that has done this for thee, as thy God, pursuant to the promises made to uphold thy throne," ch. 7. 16. When he said this, he fell down upon his face, not only in reverence to the king, but in humble adoration of God, whose name he praises for this success. By directing David thus to give God thanks for his victory, he prepares him for the approaching news of its alloy. The more our hearts are fixed, and enlarged, in thanksgiving to God for our mercies, the better disposed we shall be to bear with patience the afflictions mixed with them. Poor David is so much a father, that he forgets he is a king, and therefore cannot rejoice in the news of a victory, till he know whether the young man Absalom be safe, for whom his heart seems to tremble, almost as Eli's, in a like case, for the ark of God. Ahimaaz soon discerns what Joab intimated to him, that the death of the king's son would make the tidings of the day very unwelcome, and therefore in his report leaves that matter doubtful; and though he gives occasion to suspect how it was, yet, that the thunderclap might not come too suddenly upon the poor perplexed king, he refers him to the next messenger, whom they saw coming, for a more particular account of it. "When Joab sent the king's servant, namely, Cushy, and me thy servant, to bring the news, I saw a great tumult, occasioned by something extraordinary, as you will hear by and by; but I have nothing to say about it, I have delivered that which was my message, Cushy is better able to inform you than I am. I will not be the messenger of evil tidings; nor will I pretend to know that which I cannot give a perfect account of." He is therefore bid to stand by till Cushy came, v. 30. and now, we may suppose, he gives the king a more particular account of the victory, which was the thing he came to bring the news of.

5. Cushy, the slow post, proves the sure one, and beside the confirmation of the news of the victory which Ahimaaz had brought, v. 31. (The Lord has avenged thee of all them that rose up against thee,) he satisfies the king's inquiry concerning Absalom, v. 32. Is he safe? says David; "Yes," says Cushy, "he is safe in his grave;" but he tells the news so properly, that, how unwelcome soever the message was, the messenger could have no blame. He does not tell him plainly that Absalom was hanged, and run through, and buried under a heap of stones; but only that his fate was what he desired might be the fate of all that were traitors against the king, his crown and dignity. "The enemies of my lord the king, whoever they are, and all that rise against thee to do thee hurt, be as that young man is; I need wish them no worse."

II. We are told how David received the intelligence; he forgets all the joy of his deliverance, and is quite overwhelmed with the sorrowful tidings of Absalom's death, v. 33. As soon as he perceived by Cushy's expression that Absalom was dead, he asked no more questions, but fell into a passion of weeping, retired from company, and abandoned himself to sorrow; as he was going up to his chamber, he was over-heard to say, "O my son Absalom, my son, my son Absalom; alas for thee! I lament thee: how art thou fallen! Would God I had died for thee, and that thou hadst remained alive this day;" so the Chaldee adds, O Absalom, my son, my son. I wish I could see reason to think that this arose from a concern about Absalom's everlasting state, and that he wished to have died for him, because he had good hopes of his own salvation, and of Absalom's repentance, if he had lived: it rather seems to have been spoken inconsiderately, and in a passion, and it was his infirmity. He is to be blamed, 1. For shewing so great a fondness for a graceless, however handsome and witty, son, that was justly abandoned both of God and man. 2. For quarrelling, not only with divine providence, the disposals of which he ought silently to acquiesce in, but divine justice, the judgments of which he ought to adore and subscribe to: see how Bildad argues, Job, 8. 3, 4. If thy children have sinned against him, and he have cast them away in their transgression, thou shouldest submit, for doth God pervert judgment? See Lev. 10. 3. 3. For opposing the justice of the nation, which, as king, he was intrusted with the administration of, and which, with other public interests, he ought to prefer before any natural affection. 4. For despising the mercy of his deliverance, and the deliverance of his family and kingdom, from Absalom's wicked designs, as if this were no mercy, nor worth giving thanks for, because it cost the life of Absalom. 5. For indulging a strong passion, and speaking unadvisedly with his lips. He now forgot his own reasonings upon the death of another child, (Can I bring him back again?) and his own resolution to keep his mouth as with a bridle, when his heart was hot within him; as well as his own practice at other times, when he quieted himself as a child that was weaned from his mother. The best men are not always in a good frame; what we over-loved, we are apt to over-grieve for: in each affection, therefore, it is wisdom to have rule over our own spirits, and to keep a strict guard upon ourselves, when that is removed from us which was very dear to us. Losers think they may have leave to speak; but little said is soon amended. The penitent patient sufferer sitteth alone, and keepeth silence, Lam. 3. 28. or rather, with Job, says, Blessed be the name of the Lord.

CHAP. XIX.

We left David's army in triumph, Dand yet avid himself in tears: now here we have, I. His return to himself, by the persuasion of Joab, v. 1. .8. II. His return to his kingdom from his present banishment. 1. The men of Israel were forward of themselves to bring him back, v. 9. .10. 2. The men of Judah were dealt with by David's agents to do it, v. 11. .14. and did it, v. 15. III. At the king's coming over Jordan, Shimei's treason is pardoned, v. 16. .23. Mephibosheth's failure is excused, v. 24. .30. And Barzillai's kindness is thankfully owned, and recompensed to his son, v. 31. .40. IV. The men of Israel quarrelled with the men of Judah for not calling them to the ceremony of the king's restoration, which occasioned a new rebellion in the next chapter, v. 41. .43.

1. AND it was told Joab, Behold, the king weepeth and mourneth for Absalom. 2. And the victory that day was turned into mourning unto all the people: for the people heard say that day how the king was grieved for his son. 3. And the people gat them by stealth that day into the city, as people being ashamed steal away when they flee in battle. 4. But the king covered his face, and the king cried with a loud voice, O my son Absalom, O Absalom, my son, my son! 5. And Joab came into the house to the king, and said, Thou hast shamed this day the faces of all thy servants, which this day have saved thy life, and the lives of thy sons and of thy daughters, and the lives of thy wives, and the lives of thy concubines; 6. In that thou lovest thine enemies, and hatest thy friends. For thou hast declared this day, that thou regardest neither princes nor servants: for this day I perceive, that if Absalom had lived, and all we had died this day, then it had pleased thee well. 7. Now therefore arise go forth, and speak comfortably unto thy servants: for I swear by the LORD, if thou go not forth, there will not tarry one with thee this night: and that will be worse unto thee than all the evil that befel thee from thy youth until now. 8. Then the king arose, and sat in the gate. And they told unto all the people, saying, Behold the king doth sit in the gate. And all the people came before the king: for Israel had fled every man to his tent.

Soon after the messengers had brought the news of the defeat and death of Absalom to the court of Mahanaim, Joab and his victorious army followed, to grace the king's triumphs, and receive his further orders. Now here we are told,

I. What a damp it was to them to find the king in tears for Absalom's death, which they construed as a token of his displeasure against them for what they had done, whereas they expected him to have met them with joy and thanks for their goods services. It was told Joab, v. 1. The report of it ran through the army, v. 2. how the king was grieved for his son. The people will take particular notice what their princes say and do: the more eyes we have upon us, and the greater our influence is, the more need we have to speak and act wisely, and to govern our passions strictly.

When they came to the city, they found the king in close mourning, v. 4. He covered his face, and would not so much as look up, nor take any notice of the generals, when they attended him. It could not but surprise them to find, 1. How the king proclaimed his passion, which he ought to have been ashamed of, and which he should have striven to smother and conceal, if he had consulted either his reputation or courage, which was lessened by his mean submission to the tyranny of so absurd a passion, or his interest in the people, which would be prejudiced by his discountenancing what was done in zeal for his honour and the public safety. Yet see how he avows his grief, He cries with a loud voice, O my son Absalom. "My servants are all come home safe, but where is my son? He is dead; and, dying in sin, I fear, he is lost for ever: I cannot now say, I shall go to him, for my soul shall not be gathered with such sinners; what shall be done for thee, O Absalom, my son, my son!" 2. How he prolonged his passion, even till the army was come up to him, which must be some time after he received the first intelligence. If he had contented himself with giving vent to his passion for an hour or two, when he first heard the news, it had been excusable, but to continue it thus for so bad a son as Absalom, like Jacob for so good a son as Joseph, with a resolution to go to the grave mourning, and to stain his triumphs with his tears, was very unwise and very unworthy.

Now, see how ill this was taken by the people. They were loath to blame the king, for whatever he did used to please them, ch. 3. 36. but they took it as a great mortification to them. Their victory was turned into mourning, v. 2. They stole into the city as men ashamed, v. 3. In compliment to their sovereign, they would not rejoice in that which they perceived so afflictive to him, and yet they could not but be uneasy that they were thus obliged to conceal their joy. Superiors ought not to put such hardships as these on their inferiors.

II. How plainly and vehemently Joab reproved David, for this indiscreet management of himself in this critical juncture. David never more needed the hearts of his subjects than now, nor was ever more concerned to secure his interest in their affections; and therefore, whatever tended to disoblige them now, was the most impolitic thing he could do, and the greatest wrong imaginable to his friend that adhered to him. Joab therefore censures him, v. 5. .7. where he speaks a great deal of reason, but not with the respect and deference which he owed to his prince. Is it fit to say to a king, Thou art wicked? A plain case may be fairly pleaded with those that are above us, and they may be reprov'd for what they do amiss, but it must not be done with rudeness and insolence.

David did indeed need to be roused and alarmed; and Joab thought it no time to dally with him. If superiors do that which is foolish, they must neither think it strange, nor take it ill, if their inferiors tell them of it, perhaps too bluntly. 1. Joab magnifies the services of David's soldiers; "This day they have saved thy life, and therefore deserve to be taken notice of, and have reason to resent it, if they be not." It is implied, that Absalom, whom he honoured with his tears, sought his ruin, and the ruin of his family, while those, whom by his tears he puts a slight upon, were such as preserved from ruin him and all that was dear to him. Great mischiefs have arisen to princes from their contempt of great merits. 2. He aggravates the discouragement David had given them; "Thou hast shamed their faces, for while they have shewn such a value for thy life, thou hast shewn no value for their's, but preferrest a spoiled wicked youth, a false traitor to his king and country, whom we are happily rid of, before all thy wise counsellors, brave commanders, and loyal subjects. What can be more absurd than to love thine enemies and to hate thy friends?" 3. He advises him to present himself immediately at the head of his troops, to smile upon them, welcome them home, congratulate their successes, and return them thanks for their services. Even those that may be commanded, yet expect to be thanked, when they do well, and ought to be. 4. He threatens him with another rebellion if he would not do this, intimating, that, rather than serve so ungrateful a prince, he himself would head a revolt from him, and then, (so confident is Joab of his own interest in the people,) "There will not tarry with thee one man. If I go, they all go. Thou hast now nothing to mourn for; but if thou persist in thy murmurs, I will bring upon thee" (as Josephus expresses it) "real and more bitter sorrow."

III. How prudently and mildly David took the reproof and counsel given him, v. 8. He shook off his grief, anointed his head, and washed his face, that he might not appear unto men to mourn, and then made his appearance in public in the gate, which was as the guild-hall of the city. Hither the people flocked to him, to congratulate his and their safety, and all was well. Note, When we are convinced of a fault, we must amend, though we are told of it by our inferiors, and indecently, or in heat and passion.

9. And all the people were at strife throughout all the tribes of Israel, saying, The king saved us out of the hand of our enemies, and he delivered us out of the hand of the Philistines; and now he is fled out of the land for Absalom. 10. And Absalom, whom we anointed over us, is dead in battle. Now therefore why speak ye not a word of bringing the king back? 11. And king David sent to Zadok and to Abiathar the priests, saying, Speak unto the elders of Judah, saying, Why are ye the last to bring the king back to his house? seeing the speech of all Israel is come to the king, even to his house. 12. Ye are my brethren, ye are my bones and my flesh: wherefore then are ye the last to bring back the king? 13. And say ye to Amasa, Art thou not of my bone, and of my flesh? God do so to me, and more also, if thou be not captain of the host before me continually in the room of Joab. 14. And he bowed the heart of all the men of Judah, even as the heart of one man; so that they sent this word unto the king, Return thou, and all thy servants. 15. So the king returned, and came to Jordan. And Judah came to Gilgal, to go to meet the king, to conduct the king over Jordan.

It is strange that David did not immediately, upon the defeat and dispersion of Absalom's forces, march with all expedition back to Jerusalem, to regain the possession of his capital city, while the rebels were all in confusion, and before they could rally again. What occasion was there to bring him back? Could not he himself go back with the victorious army he had with him in Gilead? He could, no doubt; but, 1. He would come back as a prince, with the consent and unanimous approbation of the people, and not as a conqueror forcing his way: he would restore their liberties, and not take occasion to seize them, or encroach upon them. 2. He would come back in peace and safety, and be sure that he should meet with no difficulty or opposition in his return; and therefore would be satisfied that the people were well-affected to him before he would stir. 3. He would come back in honour, and like himself; and therefore would come back, not at the head of his forces, but in the arms of his subjects; for the prince that has wisdom and goodness enough to make himself his people's darling, without doubt, looks greater, and makes a much better figure than the prince that has strength enough to make himself his people's terror.

It is resolved therefore that David must be brought back to Jerusalem, his own city, and his own house there, with some ceremony, and here we have that matter concerted. *

I. The men of Israel (that is, the ten tribes) were the first that talked of it, v. 9, 10. The people were at strife about it; it was the great subject of discourse and dispute throughout all the country. Some perhaps opposed it. "Let him either come back himself, or stay where he is;" others appeared zealous for it, and reasoned as follows here, to further the design, 1. That David had formerly helped them, had fought their battles, subdued their enemies, and done them much service, and therefore it was a shame that he should continue banished from their country, who had been so great a benefactor to it. Note, Good services done to the public, though they may be forgotten for a while, yet will be remembered again when men come to their right minds. 2. That Absalom had now disappointed them. "We were foolishly sick of the cedar, and chose the branch to reign over us; but we have had enough of him, he is consumed, and we narrowly escaped being consumed with him: let us therefore return to our allegiance, and think of bringing the king back." Perhaps this was all the strife among them, not a dispute whether the king should be brought back or no, (all agreed it was to be done,) but whose fault it was, that it was not done; as is usual in such cases, every one justified himself, and blamed his neighbour. The people laid the fault on the elders, and the elders on the people, and one tribe upon another. Mutual excitements to the doing of a good work are laudable, but not mutual accusations for the not doing of it; for usually when public services are neglected, all sides must share in the blame; each might do more than he does, in reformation of manners, healing of divisions, and the like.

II. The men of Judah, by David's contrivance, were the first that did it. It is strange that they, being David's own tribe, were not so forward as the rest. David had intelligence of the good disposition of all the rest toward him, but nothing from Judah, though he had always been particularly careful of them. But we do not always find the most kindness from those whom we have most reason to expect it. Yet David would not return till he knew the sense of his own tribe, (Judah was his lawgiver, Ps. 60. 7.) that his way home might be the more clear.

1. He employs Zadok and Abiathar, the two chief priests, to treat with the elders of Judah, and to excite them to give the king an invitation back to his house, even to his house, which was the glory of their tribe, v. 11, 12. No men more proper to negotiate this affair than the two priests, who were firm to David's interest, were prudent men, and had great influence with the people. Perhaps the men of Judah were remiss and careless, and did it not, because nobody put them on to do it, and then it was proper to stir them up to it. Many will follow, who, in a good work, will not lead: it is a pity that they should continue idle for want of being spoken to. Or, perhaps, they were so sensible of the greatness of the provocation they had given to David, by joining with Absalom, that they were afraid to bring him back, despairing of his favour; he therefore warrants his agents to assure them of it, with this reason, "Ye are my brethren, my bone and my flesh, and therefore I cannot be severe with you." The Son of David has been pleased to call us brethren, his bone and his flesh, which encourages us to hope that we shall find favour with him. Or, perhaps, they were willing to see what the rest of the tribes would do, before they stirred, with which they are here upbraided; "The speech of all Israel is come to the king to invite him back, and shall Judah be the last, that should have been the first? Where is now the celebrated bravery of that royal tribe? Where its loyalty?" Note, We should be stirred up to that which is great and good, by the examples both of our ancestors, and of our neighbours, and by the consideration of our rank. Let not the first in dignity be last in duty.

2. He particularly courts into his interest Amasa, who had been Absalom's general, but was his own nephew as well as Joab, v. 13. He owns him for his kinsman, and promises him, that, if he would appear for him now, he would make him captain-general of all his forces in the room of Joab, would not only pardon him, (which, it may be, Amasa questioned,) but prefer him. Sometimes there is nothing lost in purchasing the friendship of one that has been an enemy. Amasa's interest might do David good service at this juncture. But if David did wisely for himself in designating Amasa for this post, (Joab being now grown intolerably haughty,) he did not do kindly by Amasa in letting his design be known, for it occasioned his death by Joab's hand, ch. 20. 10.

3. The point was hereby gained. He bowed the heart of the men of Judah to pass a vote, namine contradicente—unanimously, for the recall of the king, v. 14. God's providence, by the priests' persuasions and Amasa's interest, brought them to this resolve. David stirred not till he received this invitation, and then he came as far back as Jordan, at which river they were to meet him, v. 15. Our Lord Jesus will rule in those that invite him to the throne in their hearts, and not till he is invited. He first bows the heart, and makes it willing in the day of his power, and then rules in the midst of his enemies, Ps. 110. 2, 3.

16. And Shimei the son of Gera, a Benjamite, which was of Bahurim, hasted and came down with the men of Judah to meet king David. 17. And there were a thousand men of Benjamin with him, and Ziba the servant of the house of Saul, and his fifteen sons and his twenty servants with him; and they went over Jordan before the king. 18. And there went over a ferry-boat to carry over the king's household, and to do what he thought good. And Shimei the son of Gera fell down before the king, as he was come over Jordan; 19. And said unto the king, Let not my lord impute iniquity unto me, neither do thou remember that which thy servant did perversely the day that my lord the king went out of Jerusalem, that the king should take it to his heart. 20. For thy servant doth know that I have sinned: therefore, behold, I am come the first this day of all the house of Joseph to go down to meet my lord the king. 21. But Abishai the son of Zeruiah answered and said, Shall not Shimei be put to death for this, because he cursed the LORD's anointed? 22. And David said, What have I to do with you, ye sons of Zeruiah, that ye should this day be adversaries unto me? shall there any man be put to death this day in Israel? for do not I know that I am this day king over Israel? 23. Therefore the king said unto Shimei, Thou shalt not die. And the king sware unto him.

Perhaps Jordan was never passed with so much solemnity, nor with so many remarkable occurrences, as it was now, since Israel passed it under Joshua. David, in his afflictive flight, remembered God particularly from the land of Jordan, Ps. 42. 6. and now that land, more than any other, was graced with the glories of his return. David's soldiers furnished themselves with accommodations for their passage over this river, but, for his own family, a ferry-boat was sent on purpose, v. 18. A fleet of boats, say some; a bridge of boats was made, say others; the best convenience they had to serve him with.

Two remarkable persons met him on the banks of Jordan, who had abused him wretchedly when he was in his flight.

I. Ziba, who had abused him with his fair tongue, and, by accusing his master, had obtained from the king a grant of his estate, ch. 16. 4. A greater abuse he could not have done him, than, by imposing upon his credulity, to draw him in to do a thing so unkind to the son of his friend Jonathan. He comes now, with a retinue of sons and servants, to meet the king, v. 17. that he might obtain the king's favour, and so come off the better, when Mephibosheth would shortly undeceive him, and clear himself, v. 26.

II. Shimei, who had abused him with his foul tongue, railed at him, and cursed him, ch. 16. 5. If David had been defeated, no doubt he would have continued to trample upon him, and have gloried in what he had done; but now that he sees him coming home in triumph, and returning to his throne, he thinks it his interest to make his peace with him. Those who now slight and abuse the Son of David would be glad to make their peace too, when he shall come in his glory; but it will be too late. Shimei, to recommend himself to the king, 1. Came with good company, with the men of Judah, as one in their interest. 2. He brought a regiment of the men of Benjamin with him, a thousand, of which, perhaps, he was chiliarch, or commander in chief, offering his own and their service to the king; or, perhaps, they were volunteers, whom by his interest he had got together to meet the king, which was the more obliging, because, of all the tribes of Israel, there were none, except these and Judah, that appeared to pay him this respect. 3. What he did, he hastened to do; he lost no time; Agree with thine adversary quickly, while thou art in the way.

Here is, (1.) The criminal's submission, v. 19, 20. He fell down before the king, as a penitent, as a supplicant; and, that he might be thought sincere, he did it publicly before all David's servants, and his friends the men of Judah, yea, and before his own thousand. The offence was public, therefore the submission ought to be so. He owns his crime, Thy servant doth know that I have sinned; he aggravates it, I did perversely; he begs the king's pardon, Let not the king impute iniquity to thy servant, that is, deal with me as I deserve: he intimates, that it was below the king's great and generous mind to take it to his heart; and pleads his early return to his allegiance, that he was the first of all the house of Joseph (that is, of Israel, who in the beginning of David's reign had distinguished themselves from Judah, by their adherence to Ishbosheth, ch. 2. 10.) that came to meet the king. He came first, that, by his example of duty, the rest might be disposed, and, by his experience of the king's clemency, the rest might be encouraged, to follow.

(2.) A motion made for judgment against him, v. 21. Shall not Shimei be put to death for a traitor? Let him, of all men, be made an example. Abishai moved it, who would have ventured his life to have been his death, then when he was cursing, ch. 16. 9. David did not think fit to have it done then, because his judicial power was cut short; but, now that it was restored, why should not the law have its course? Abishai herein consulted what he supposed to be David's feelings more than his true interest. Princes have need to arm themselves against temptations to severity.

(3.) His discharge by the king's order, v. 22, 23. He rejected Abishai's motions with displeasure; What have I to do with you, ye sons of Zeruiah? The less we have to do with those who are of an angry revengeful spirit, and who put us upon doing what is harsh and rigorous, the better. He looks upon these prosecutors as adversaries to him, though they pretended friendship and zeal for his honour. Those who advise us to what is wrong are really Satan's adversaries to us. [1.] They were adversaries to his inclination, which was to clemency. He knew that he was this day king in Israel, restored to, and re-established in, his kingdom, and therefore his honour inclined him to forgive. It is the glory of kings to forgive those that humble and surrender themselves: Satis est prestrasse leoni—It suffices the lion, that he has laid his victim prostrate. His joy inclined him to forgive : the pleasantness of his spirit on this great occasion forbade the entrance of any thing that was sour and peevish : joyful days should be forgiving days. Yet this was not all ; his experience of God's mercy in restoring him to his kingdom, his exclusion from which he attributed to his sin, inclined him to show mercy to Shimei. They that are forgiven, must forgive. David had severely revenged the abuses done to his ambassadors by the Ammonites, (ch. 12. 31.) but easily passes by the abuse done to himself by an Israelite. That was an affront to Israel in general, and touched the honour of his crown and kingdom ; this was purely personal, and therefore (according to the usual disposition of good men) he could the more easily forgive it. [2.] They were adversaries to his interest : if he should put Shimei to death, who cursed him, they would expect the same fate, who had taken up arms, and actually levied war against him, which would drive them from him, while he was endeavouring to draw them to him. Acts of severity are seldom acts of policy : The throne is established by mercy. Shimei, hereupon, has his pardon signed and sealed with an oath ; yet bound, no doubt, to his good behaviour, and liable to be prosecuted if he afterward misbehaved ; and thus he was reserved to be, in due time, as much a monument of the justice of the government, as he was now of its clemency, and in both of its prudence.

24. And Mephibosheth the son of Saul came down to meet the king, and had neither dressed his feet, nor trimmed his beard, nor washed his clothes, from the day the king departed until the day he came again in peace. 25. And it came to pass, when he was come to Jerusalem to meet the king, that the king said unto him, Wherefore wentest not thou with me, Mephibosheth ? 26. And he answered, My lord, O king, my servant deceived me : for thy servant said, I will saddle me an ass, that I may ride thereon, and go to the king ; because thy servant is lame. 27. And he hath slandered thy servant unto my lord the king ; but my lord the king is as an angel of God : do therefore what is good in thine eyes. 28. For all of my father's house were but dead men before my lord the king : yet didst thou set thy servant among them that did eat at thine own table. What right therefore have I yet to cry any more unto the king ? 29. And the king said unto him, Why speakest thou any more of thy matters ? I have said, Thou and Ziba divide the land. 30. And Mephibosheth said unto the king, Yea, let him take all, forasmuch as my lord the king is come again in peace unto his own house.

The day of David's return was a day of bringing to remembrance, a day of account, in which what had past in his flight, was called over again ; among other things, after Shimei's comes Mephibosheth's case, to be inquired into, and he himself brings it on.

1. He went down in the crowd to meet the king, (v. 24.) and, as a proof of the sincerity of his joy in the king's return, we are here told what a true mourner he was for the king's banishment. During that melancholy time, when one of the greatest glories of Israel was departed, Mephibosheth continued in a very melancholy state. He was never trimmed, nor put on clean linen, but wholly neglected himself, as one abandoned to grief for the king's affliction, and the kingdom's misery. In times of public calamity, we ought to abridge ourselves of the delights of sense, in conformity to the season. There are times when God calls to weeping and mourning, and we must comply with the call.

2. When the king came to Jerusalem, (since he could not sooner have an opportunity,) he made his appearance before him, v. 25. And when the king asked him, why he, being one of his family, had stayed behind, and not accompanied him in his exile, he opened his case fully to the king. (1.) He complains of Ziba, his servant, who should have been his friend, but had been, two ways, his enemy ; for, first, he had hindered him from going along with the king, by taking the ass himself, which he was ordered to make ready for his masters, (v. 26.) basely taking advantage of his lameness, and his inability to help himself ; and, secondly, he had accused him to David of a design to usurp the government, v. 27. How much mischief it is in the power of a wicked servant to do to the best master ! (2.) He gratefully acknowledges the king's great kindness to himself, when he and all his father's house lay at the king's mercy, v. 28. When he might justly have been dealt with as a rebel, he was treated as a friend, as a child : Thou didst set thy servant among them that did eat at thine own table. This shows that Ziba's suggestion was improbable : for could Mephibosheth be so foolish as to aim higher, when he lived so easily, so happily, as he did ? And could he be so very disingenuous as to design any harm to David, of whose great kindness to him he was thus sensible ? (3.) He refers himself to the king's pleasure, Do what is good in thine eyes, with me and my estate ; depending on the king's wisdom, and his ability to discern between truth and falsehood ; My lord the king is as an angel of God ; and disclaiming all pretensions of his own merit ; " So much kindness I have received above what I deserved, and what right have I to cry any more unto the king ? Why should I trouble the king with my complaints, who have already been so troublesome to him ? Why should I think any thing hard that is put upon me, who have hitherto been so kindly treated ?" We are all as dead men before God ; yet he has not only spared us, but taken us to sit at his table. How little reason then have we to complain of any trouble we are in : and how much reason to take all well that God does.

3. David hereupon recalls the sequestration of Mephibosheth's estate ; being deceived in his grant, he revokes it, and confirms his former settlement of it ; I have said, Thou and Ziba divide the land ; [v. 20.] that is, " Let it be as I first ordered it, (ch. 9. 10.) the property shall still be vested in thee, but Ziba shall have the occupancy, he shall till the land, paying thee a rent." Thus Mephibosheth is where he was, no harm is done, only Ziba goes away unpunished for his false and malicious information against his master ; David either feared him too much, or loved him too well, to do justice upon him according to that law, Deut. 19. 18, 19. and he was now in the humour of forgiving, and resolved to make every body easy.

4. Mephibosheth downs all his cares about his estate in his joy for the king's return ; (v. 30.) " Yea, let him take all, the presence and favour of the king shall be to me instead of all." A good man can contentedly bear his own private losses and disappointments, while he sees Israel in peace, and the throne of the Son of David exalted and established. Ziba, take all, so that David may be in peace.

31. And Barzillai the Gileadite came down from Rogelim, and went over Jordan with the king, to conduct him over Jordan. 32. Now Barzillai was a very aged man, even fourscore years old ; and he had provided the king of sustenance while he lay at Mahanaim ; for he was a very great man. 33. And the king said unto Barzillai, Come thou over with me, and I will feed thee with me in Jerusalem. 34. And Barzillai said unto the king, How long have I to live, that I should go up with the king unto Jerusalem? 35. I am this day fourscore years old: and can I discern between good and evil? can thy servant taste what I eat or what I drink? can I hear any more the voice of singing men and singing women? wherefore then should thy servant be yet a burthen unto my lord the king? 36. Thy servant will go a little way over Jordan with the king: and why should the king recompense it me with such a reward? 37. Let thy servant, I pray thee, turn back again, that I may die in mine own city, and be buried by the grave of my father and of my mother. But behold thy servant Chimham; let him go over with my lord the king; and do to him what shall seem good unto thee. 38. And the king answered, Chimham shall go over with me, and I will do to him that which shall seem good unto thee: and whatsoever thou shalt require of me, that will I do for thee. 39. And all the people went over Jordan. And when the king was come over, the king kissed Barzillai, and blessed him; and he returned unto his own place.

David had already graced the triumphs of his restoration with the generous remission of the injuries that had been done him; we have him here gracing them with the no less generous reward of the kindnesses that had been shewn him. Barzillai, the Gileadite, who had a noble seat at Rogelim, not far from Mahanaim, was the man who, of all the nobility and gentry of that country, had been most kind to David in his distress. If Absalom had prevailed, it is likely he might have suffered for it; but now he and his shall be no losers by it.

Here is,

I. Barzillai's great respect to David, not only as a good man, but as his rightful sovereign. He provided him with much sustenance, for himself and his family, while he lay at Mahanaim, v. 32. God had given him a large estate, for he was a very great man, and, it seems, he had a large heart to do good with it: what else but that is a large estate good for? To reduced greatness, generosity obliges us, and to oppressed goodness, piety obliges us, to be, in a particular manner, kind to the utmost of our power. Barzillai, to shew that he was not weary of David, though he was so great a charge to him, attended him to Jordan, and went over with him, v. 31. Let subjects learn hence, to render tribute to whom tribute is due, and honour to whom honour, Rom. 13. 7.

II. The kind invitation David gave him to court, v. 33. Come thou over with me. He invited him, 1. That he might have the pleasure of his company, and the benefit of his counsel; for we may suppose that he was very wise and good, as well as very rich, else he had not been called here a very great man; for it is what a man is, more than what he has, that bespeaks him truly great. 2. That he might have an opportunity of returning his kindness; "I will feed thee with me, thou shalt fare as sumptuously as I fare, and this, at Jerusalem, the royal and holy city." David did not take Barzillai's kindness to him as a debt, (he was none of those arbitrary princes, who think that whatever their subjects have is their's when they please,) but accepted it and rewarded it as a favour. We must always study to be grateful to our friends, especially to those who have helped us in distress.

III. Barzillai's reply to this invitation, wherein,

1. He admires the king's generosity in making him this offer, lessening his service, and magnifying the king's return for it; Why should the king recompense it with such a reward? v. 36. Will the master thank that servant who only does what was his duty to do? He thought he had done himself honour enough, in doing the king any service. Thus when the saints shall be called to inherit the kingdom, in consideration of what they have done for Christ in this world, they will be amazed at the disproportion between the service and the recompense, Matth. 25. 37. Lord, when saw we thee hungry, and fed thee?

2. He declines accepting the invitation, begs his majesty's pardon for refusing so generous an offer: he should think himself very happy in being near the king, but, (1.) He is old, and unfit to remove at all, especially to court: old, and unfit for the business of the court; "Why should I go up with the king to Jerusalem? I can do him no service there, in the council, the camp, the treasury, or the courts of justice; for how long have I to live? v. 34. Shall I think of going into business, now that I am going out of the world?" Old, and unfit for the diversions of the court, which will be ill-bestowed, and even thrown away, upon one that can relish them so little, v. 35. As it was in Moses's time, so it was in Barzillai's, and it is not worse now, that if men be so strong that they come to fourscore years, their strength then is labour and sorrow, Ps. 90. 10. These were then, and are still, years of which men say they have no pleasure in them, Eccl. 12. 1. Dainties are insipid, when desire fails; and songs to the aged are little better than those sung to a heavy heart; how should they choose, when the daughters of music are brought low? Let those that are old, learn of Barzillai to be dead to the delights of sense; let grace second nature, and make a virtue of the necessity. Nay, Barzillai, being old, thinks he shall be a burthen to the king, rather than any credit to him; and a good man would not go any where to be burthensome, or, if he must be so, will rather be so to his own house than to another's. (2.) He is dying, and must begin to think of his long journey, his removal out of the world, v. 37. It is good for us all, but it especially becomes old people, to think and speak much of dying. "Talk of going to court!" says Barzillai; "let me go home and die in my own city, the place of my father's sepulchre; let me die by the grave of my father, that my bones may be quietly carried to the place of their rest. The grave is ready for me, let me go and get ready for it, go and die in my nest."

3. He desires the king to be kind to his son Chimham, Let him go over with my lord the king, and have preferment at court; what favour is done to him, Barzillai will take as done to himself. They that are old must not grudge young people those delights which they themselves are past the enjoyment of, nor oblige them to retire as they do. Barzillai will go back himself, but he will not make Chimham go back with him; though he could ill spare Chimham, yet, thinking it would gratify and improve him, he is willing to do it.

IV. David's farewell to Barzillai. 1. He sends him back into his country with a kiss and a blessing, v. 50. signifying, that, in gratitude for his kindnesses, he would love him and pray for him; and with a promise, that, whatever request he should at any time make to him, he would be ready to oblige him, v. 38. Whatsoever thou shalt think of, when thou comest home, to ask of me, that will I do for thee. What is the chief excellency of power, but this, that it gives men a capacity of doing the more good? 2. He takes Chimham forward with him, and leaves it to Barzillai to choose him his preferment; I will do to him what shall seem good unto thee, v. 38. And, it should seem, Barzillai, who had experienced the innocency and safety of retirement, begged a country-seat for him near Jerusalem, but not in it; for, long after, we read of a place near Beth-lehem, David's city, which is called, The habitation of Chimham, allotted him, probably, not out of the crown-lands, or the forfeited estates, but David's paternal estate.

40. Then the king went on to Gilgal, and Chimham went on with him: and all the people of Judah conducted the king, and also half the people of Israel. 41. And, behold, all the men of Israel came to the king, and said unto the king, Why have our brethren the men of Judah stolen thee away, and have brought the king, and his household, and all David's men with him over Jordan? 42. And all the men of Judah answered the men of Israel, Because the king is near of kin to us: wherefore then be ye angry for this matter? Have we eaten at all of the king's cost? Or hath he given us any gift? 43. And the men of Israel answered the men of Judah, and said, We have ten parts in the king, and we have also more right in David than ye: why then did ye despise us, that our advice should not be first had in bringing back our king? And the words of the men of Judah were fiercer than the words of the men of Israel.

David came over Jordan, attended and assisted by the men of Judah; when he was advanced as far as Gilgal, the first stage on this side Jordan, half the people of Israel, that is, of their elders and great men, were come to wait upon him, to kiss his hand, and congratulate him on his return, but found they came too late to witness the solemnity of his first entrance. This put them out of humour, and occasioned a quarrel between them and the men of Judah, which was a damp to the joy of the day, and the beginning of further mischief.

Here is, 1. The complaint which the men of Israel brought to the king against the men of Judah, (v. 41.) that they had performed the ceremony of bringing the king over Jordan, and not given them notice, that they might have come to join in it. This reflected upon them, as if they were not so well affected to the king and his restoration as the men of Judah were, whereas the king himself knew that they had spoken of it, before the men of Judah thought of it, v. 11. It seemed likewise as if they intended to monopolize the king's favours when he was come back, and to be looked upon as his only friends. See what mischief comes from pride and jealousy.

2. The excuse which the men of Judah made for themselves, v. 42. (1.) They plead relation to the king; "He is near of kin to us, and therefore, in a matter of mere ceremony, as this was, we may claim precedency. It was into our country that he was to be brought, and therefore who so fit as we to bring him." (2.) They deny the insinuated charge of self-seeking in what they had done. "Have we eaten at all of the king's cost? No, we have all borne our own charges. Hath he given us any gift? No, we have no design to engross the advantages of his return, you are come time enough to share in them." Too many that attend princes, do it only for what they can get.

3. The men of Israel's vindication of their charge, v. 43. They pleaded, "We have ten parts in the king," (Judah having Simeon only, whose lot lay within his, to join with him,) "and therefore it is a slight upon us, that our advice was not asked about bringing back the king." See how uncertain the multitude is; they were lately striving against the king, to drive him out; now they are striving about him, which shall honour him most; a good man and a good cause will thus recover their credit and interest, though, for a time, they may seem to have lost them. See what is commonly the origin of strife; nothing so much as impatience of contempt, or the least seeming slight. The men of Judah had done better, if they had taken their brethren's advice and assistance; but since they did not, why should the men of Israel lay it so much to heart? If a good work be done, and well done, let us not be displeas'd, nor the work disparag'd, though we had no hand in it.

Lastly, The scripture takes notice, by way of blame, which of the contending parties managed the cause with most passion: The words of the men of Judah were fiercer than those of the men of Israel. Though we have reason and right on our side, if we speak it with fierceness, God takes notice of it, and is much displeas'd with it.

CHAP. XX.

How do the clouds return after the rain! No sooner is one of David's troubles over, than another arises, as it were out of the ashes of the former, wherein the threatening is fulfilled, that the sword should never depart from his house. I. Before he reaches Jerusalem, a new rebellion is raised by Sheba, v. 1, 2. II. His first work, when he comes to Jerusalem, is, to condemn his concubines to perpetual imprisonment, v. 3. III. Amasu, whom he intrusts to raise an army against Sheba, is too slow in his motions, which puts him into a fright, v. 4—6. IV. One of his generals barbarously murders the other, when they were taking the field, v. 7—13. V. Sheba is at length shut up in the city of Abel, (v. 14, 15.) but the citizens delivered him up to Joab, and so his rebellion was crushed, v. 16—22. This chapter concludes with a short account of David's great officers, v. 23—26.

1. AND there happened to be there a man of Belial, whose name was Sheba, the son of Bichri, a Benjamite: and he blew a trumpet, and said, We have no part in David, neither have we inheritance in the son of Jesse: every man to his tents, O Israel. 2. So every man of Israel went up from after David, and followed Sheba the son of Bichri: but the men of Judah clave unto their king, from Jordan even to Jerusalem. 3. And David came to his house at Jerusalem, and the king took the ten women his concubines, whom he had left to keep the house, and put them in ward, and fed them, but went not in unto them. So they were shut up unto the day of their death, ving in widowhood.

David, in the midst of his triumphs, has here the affliction to see his kingdom disturbed, and his family disgraced.

I. His subjects revolting from him at the instigation of a man of Belial, whom they followed when they forsook the man after God's own heart. Observe, 1. That this happened immediately upon the crushing of Absalom's rebellion. We must not think it strange, while we are in this world, if the end of one trouble be the beginning of another: deep sometimes calls unto deep. 2. That the people were now just returning to their allegiance, when, of a sudden, they flew off from it. When a reconciliation is newly made, it ought to be handled with great tenderness and caution, lest the peace break again before it be settled. A broken bone, when it is set, must have time to knit. 3. That the ringleader of this rebellion was Sheba, a Benjamite by birth, (v. 1.) who had his habitation in mount Ephraim, v. 21. Shimei and he were both of Saul's tribe, and both retained the ancient grudge of that house. Against the kingdom of the Messiah there is an hereditary enmity in the serpent's seed, and a succession of attempts to overthrow it; (Ps. 2. 1, 2.) but He that sits in Heaven, laughs at them all. 4. That the occasion of it was that foolish quarrel, which we read of in the close of the foregoing chapter, between the elders of Israel and the elders of Judah, about bringing the king back. It was a point of honour that was disputed between them, which had most interest in David; "We are more numerous," say the elders of Israel; "We are nearer a-kin to him," say the elders of Judah. Now one would think David very safe and happy, when his subjects are striving which shall love him best, and be most forward to show him respect; yet even that strife proves the occasion of a rebellion. The men of Israel complained to David of the slight which the men of Judah had put upon them, if he had now countenanced their complaint, commended their zeal, and returned them thanks for it, he might have confirmed them in his interest; but he seemed partial to his own tribe: their words prevailed above the words of the men of Israel; as some read the last words of the foregoing chapter. David inclined to justify them; which when the men of Israel perceived, they flew with indignation: "If the king will suffer himself to be engrossed by the men of Judah, let him and them make the best of one another, and we will set up one for ourselves. We thought we had had ten parts in David, but that will not be allowed us; the men of Judah tell us, in effect, we have no part in him, and therefore we will have none, nor will we attend him any further in his return to Jerusalem, nor own him for our king." This Sheba proclaimed, v. 1. who, probably, was a man of note, and had been active in Absalom's rebellion; the disgusted Israelites took the hint, and went up from after David to follow Sheba, v. 2. that is, the generality of them did so, only the men of Judah adhered to him.

Learn hence, (1.) That it is as impolitic for princes to be partial in their attentions to their subjects, as it is for parents to be so to their children; both should carry it with an even hand. (2.) Those know not what they do that make light of the affections of their inferiors, by not countenancing and accepting them. Their hatred may be feared whose love is despised. (3.) The beginning of strife is as the letting forth of water; it is therefore wisdom to leave it off before it be meddled with, Prov. 17. 14. How great a matter doth a little of this fire kindle! (4.) The perverting of words is the subverting of peace; and much mischief is made by forcing invidious constructions upon what is said and written, and drawing consequences that were never intended. The men of Judah said, The king is near of kin to us, by which, say the men of Israel, you mean, We have no part in him; whereas they meant no such thing. (5.) People are very apt to run into extremes, We have ten parts in David, said they; and, almost in the next breath, We have no part in him. To-day, Hosanna; to-morrow, Crucify.

II. His concubines shut up and imprisoned for life, and he himself under a necessity of doing it, because they had been defiled by Absalom, v. 3. David had multiplied wives, contrary to the law, and they proved a grief and shame to him. Those whom he had sinfully taken pleasure in, he was now, 1. Obligated, in duty, to put away, they being rendered unclean to him, by the vile uncleanness his son had committed with them. They whom he had loved must now be loathed. 2. Obligated, in prudence, to shut them up in privacy, not to be seen abroad for shame, lest the sight of them should give occasion to people to speak of what Absalom had done to them, which ought not to be so much as named, 1 Cor. 5. 1. That that villany might be buried in oblivion, they must be buried in obscurity. 3. Obligated, in justice, to shut up in prison, to punish them for their easy submission to Absalom's lust, despairing perhaps of David's return, and giving him up for gone. Let none expect to do ill, and fare well.

4. Then said the king to Amasa, Assemble me the men of Judah within three days, and be thou here present. 5. So Amasa went to assemble the men of Judah: but he tarried longer than the set time which he had appointed him. 6. And David said to Abishai, Now shall Sheba the son of Bichri do us more harm than did Absalom: take thou thy lord's servants, and pursue after him, lest he get him fenced cities, and escape us. 7. And there went out after him Joab's men, and the Cherethites, and the Pelethites, and all the mighty men: and they went out of Jerusalem, to pursue after Sheba the son of Bichri. 8. When they were at the great stone which is in Gibeon, Amasa went before them. And Joab's garment that he had put on was girded unto him, and upon it a girdle with a sword fastened upon his loins in the sheath thereof; and as he went forth it fell out. 9. And Joab said to Amasa. Art thou in health, my brother? And Joab took Amasa by the beard with the right hand to kiss him. 10. But Amasa took no heed to the sword that was in Joab's hand: so he smote him therewith in the fifth rib, and shed out his bowels to the ground, and struck him not again; and he died. So Joab and Abishai his brother pursued after Sheba the son of Bichri. 11. And one of Joab's men stood by him, and said, He that favoureth Joab, and he that is for David, let him go after Joab. 12. And Amasa wallowed in blood in the midst of the highway. And when the man saw that all the people stood still, he removed Amasa out of the highway into the field, and cast a cloth upon him, when he saw that every one that came by him stood still. 13. When he was removed out of the highway, all the people went on after Joab, to pursue after Sheba the son of Bichri.

We have here Amasa's fall, just as he began to rise. He was nephew to David, ch. 17. 25. had been Absalom's general, and commander-in-chief of his rebellious army. But, that being routed, he came over into David's interest, upon a promise that he should be general of his forces, instead of Joab. Sheba's rebellion gives David an occasion to make good that promise sooner than he could wish, but Joab's envy and emulation made it injurious both to him and David.

I. Amasa has a commission to raise forces for the suppressing of Sheba's rebellion, and is ordered to do it with all possible expedition, v. 4. It seems, the men of Judah, though forward to attend the king's triumphs, were backward enough to fight his battles; else, when they were all in a body, attending him to Jerusalem, they might immediately have pursued Sheba, and have crushed that cocatrice in the egg; but most love a loyalty, as well as a religion, that is cheap and easy. Many boast of their being akin to Christ that yet are very loth to venture for him. Amasa is sent to assemble the men of Judah within three days; but he finds them so backward and unready, that he cannot do it within the time appointed, v. 5. though the promotion of Amasa, who had been their general under Absalom, was very agreeable, and a proof of the clemency of David's government.

II. Upon Amasa's delay, Abishai, the brother of Joab, is ordered to take the guards and standing forces, and with them to pursue Sheba, v. 6, 7. for nothing could be of more dangerous consequence than to give him time. David gives these orders to Abishai, because he resolves to mortify Joab, and degrade him, not so much, I doubt, for the blood of Abner, which he shed basely, as for the blood of Absalom, which he had shed justly and honourably. "Now," (says Bishop Hall,) "Joab smarteth for a loyal disobedience. How slippery are the stations of earthly honours, and subject to continual mutability! Happy are they who are in favour with Him in whom there is no shadow of change." Joab, without orders, though in disgrace, goes along with his brother, knowing he might be serviceable to the public, or, perhaps, now meditating the removal of his rival.

III. Joab, near Gibeon, meets with Amasa, and barbarously murders him, v. 8, 9, 10. It should seem the great stone in Gibeon was the place appointed for the general rendezvous: there the rivals met; and Amasa, relying upon his commission, went before, as general, both of the new-raised forces which he had got together, and of the veteran troops which Abishai had brought in; but Joab there took an opportunity to kill him with his own hand; and, 1. He did it subtilly, and with contrivance, and not upon a sudden provocation. He girds his coat about him, that that might not hang in his way, and girds his belt upon his coat, that his sword might be the readier to him; he puts his sword in a sheath too big for it, that, whenever he pleased, it might, upon a little shake, fall out, as if it fell by accident, and so he might take it into his hand, unsuspected, as if he were going to return it into the scabbard, when he designed to sheath it in the bowels of Amasa. The more there is of plot in a sin, the worse it is. 2. He did it treacherously, and under pretence of friendship, that Amasa might not be upon his guard. He called him brother, for they were own consins, inquired of his welfare, Art thou in health? and took him by the beard, as one he was free with, to kiss him, while with the drawn sword in his other hand he was aiming at his heart. Was this done like a gentleman, like a soldier, like a general? No, but like a villain, like a base coward. Just thus he slew Abner, and went unpunished for it, which encouraged him to do the like again. 3. He did it impudently, not in a corner, but at the head of his troops, and in their sight, as one that was neither ashamed nor afraid to do it, that was so hardened in blood and murders, that he could neither blush nor tremble. 4. He did it at one blow, gave the fatal push with a good-will, as we say, so that he needed not strike him again; with such a strong and steady hand he gave this one stroke, that it was fatal. 5. He did it in contempt and defiance of David, and the commission he had given to Amasa; for that commission was the only ground of his quarrel with him, so that David was struck at through the side of Amasa; and was, in effect, told to his face, that Joab would be general, in spite of him. 6. He did it very unseasonably, when they were going against a common enemy, and were concerned to be unanimous. This ill-timed quarrel might have scattered their forces, or engaged them one against another, and so have made them all an easy prey to Sheba. So contentedly could Joab sacrifice the interest both of king and kingdom to his personal revenge.

IV. Joab immediately resumes his general's place, and takes care to lead the army on in pursuit of Sheba, that, if possible, he might prevent any prejudice to the common cause by what he had done. 1. He leaves one of his men to make proclamation to the forces that were coming up, that they were still engaged in David's cause, but under Joab's command, v. 11. He knew what an interest he had in the soldiery, and how many favoured him, rather than Amasa, that had been a traitor, was now a turn-coat, and had never been successful; on this he boldly relied, and called them all to follow him. What man of Judah would not be for his old king, and his old general? But one would wonder with what face a murderer could pursue a traitor; and how, under such a heavy load of guilt, he had courage to enter upon danger; his conscience was seared with a hot iron. 2. Care is taken to remove the dead body out of the way, because at that they made a stand, (as ek. 2. 23.) and to cover it with a cloth, v. 12, 13. Wicked men think themselves safe in their wickedness, if they can but conceal it from the eye of the world: if it be hidden, it is with them as if it never were done. But the covering of blood with a cloth cannot stop its cry in God's ear for vengeance, or make it the less loud. However, since this was no time to arraign Joab for what he had done, and the common safety called for expedition, it was prudent to remove that which retarded the march of the army; and then they all went on after Joab, while David, who, no doubt, had notice soon brought him of this tragedy, could not but reflect upon it with regret, that he had not formerly done justice upon Joab for the death of Abner, and that he now had exposed Amasa by preferring him. And, perhaps, his conscience reminded him of his employing Joab in the murder of Uriah, which had helped to harden him in cruelty.

14. And he went through all the tribes of Israel unto Abel, and to Beth-maachah, and all the Berites: and they were gathered together, and went also after him. 15. And they came and besieged him in Abel of Beth-maachah, and they cast up a bank against the city, and it stood in the trench; and all the people that were with Joab battered the wall, to throw it down. 16. Then cried a wise woman out of the city, Hear, hear; say, I pray you, unto Joab, Come near hither, that I may speak with thee. 17. And when he was come near unto her, the woman said, Art thou Joab? And he answered, I am he. Then she said unto him, Hear the words of thine handmaid. And he answered, I do hear. 18. Then she spake, saying, They were wont to speak in old time, saying, They shall surely ask counsel at Abel: and so they ended the matter. 19. I am one of them that are peaceable and faithful in Israel: thou seekest to destroy a city and a mother in Israel: why wilt thou swallow up the inheritance of the LORD? 20. And Joab answered and said, Far be it, far be it from me, that I should swallow up or destroy. 21. The matter is not so: but a man of mount Ephraim, Sheba the son of Bichri by name, hath lifted up his hand against the king, even against David: deliver him only, and I will depart from the city. And the woman said unto Joab, Behold, his head shall be thrown to thee over the wall. 22. Then the woman went unto all the people in her wisdom: And they cut off the head of Sheba the son of Bichri, and cast it out to Joab. And he blew a trumpet, and they retired from the city, every man to his tent. And Joab returned to Jerusalem unto the king.

We have here the conclusion of Sheba's attempt.

I. The rebel, when he had rambled over all the tribes of Israel, and found them not so willing, upon second thoughts to follow him, as they had been, upon a sudden provocation, to desert David, (having only picked up a few like himself, that sided with him,) entered Abel Beth-maachah, a strong city in the north, in the lot of Naphtali, where we find it placed, 2 Kings, 15, 29. Here he took shelter, whether by force or with consent does not appear, but his adherents were mostly Berites of Beeroth in Benjamin, v. 14. One bad man will find and make more.

II. Joab drew up all his force against the city, besieged it, battered the wall, and made ready for a general storm, v. 15. Justly is that place attacked with all this fury, which dares harbour a traitor; nor will that heart fare better which indulges those rebellious lusts that will not have Christ to reign over them.

III. A discreet good woman of the City of Abel, none o matter, by her prudent management, to a good issue, so as to satisfy Joab, and yet save the city. Here is,

1. Her treaty with Joab, and her capitulation with him, by which he is engaged to raise the siege, upon condition that Sheba be delivered up. It seems, none of all the men of Abel, brings this the elders or magistrates, offered to treat with Joab, no, not when they were reduced to the last extremity; either they were stupid, and unconcerned for the public safety, or they stood in awe of Sheba, or they despaired of gaining any good terms with Joab, or they had not wit enough to manage the treaty. But this one woman with her wisdom saved the city. Souls know no difference of sexes; though the man be the head, it does not therefore follow that he has the monopoly of the brains, and therefore he ought not, by any salique law,* to have the monopoly of the crown; many masculine heart, and more than masculine, has been found in a female breast; nor is the treasure of wisdom the less valuable for being lodged in the weaker vessel.

* An Ancient law of France, which debarred females from succeeding to the throne.—ED.

In the treaty between this nameless heroine and Joab,

(1.) She gains his audience and attention, v. 16, 17. We may suppose it was the first time he had ever treated with a woman in martial affairs.

(2.) She reasons with him on behalf of her city, and very ingeniously. [1.] That it was a city famous for wisdom, v. 18. as we translate it; she pleads that this city had been long in such reputation for prudent knowing men, that it was the common referee of the country, and all agreed to abide by the award of its elders. Their sentence was an oracle; let them be consulted and the matter is ended, all sides will acquiesce. Now, shall such a city as this be laid in ashes, and never treated with? [2.] That the inhabitants were generally peaceable and faithful in Israel, v. 19. She could speak, not for herself only, but for all those whose cause she pleaded, that they were not of turbulent and seditious spirits, but of known fidelity to their prince, and peaceableness with their fellow-subjects; neither seditious, nor litigious. [3.] That it was a mother in Israel, a guide and nurse to the towns and country about; and that it was a part of the inheritance of the Lord, a city of Israelites, not of heathen; and the destruction of it would lessen and weaken that nation which God had chosen for his heritage. [4.] That they expected him to offer them peace, before he made an attack upon them, according to that known law of war, Deut. 20. 10. So the margin reads, v. 18. They plainly spake in the beginning, (of the siege,) saying, Surely they will ask of Abel; that is, "The besiegers will demand the traitor, and will ask us to surrender him; and, if they do, we will soon come to an agreement, and so end the matter." Thus she tacitly upbraids Joab for not offering them peace, but hopes it is not too late to beg it.

(3.) Joab and Abel's advocate soon agree, that Sheba's head shall be the ransom of the city. Joab, though, in a personal quarrel, he had lately swallowed up and destroyed Amasa, yet, when he acts as a general, will by no means bear the imputation, "Far be it from me that I should delight to swallow up or destroy, or design it, but when it is necessary for the public safety, v. 20. The matter is not so, our quarrel is not with your city, we would hazard our lives for its protection; our quarrel is only with the traitor that is harboured among you; deliver him up, and we have done." A great deal of mischief would be prevented, if contending parties would but understand one another. The city obstinately holds out, believing Joab aims at its ruin; Joab furiously attacks it, believing the citizens all confederates with Sheba; whereas both were mistaken; let both sides be undeceived, and the matter is soon accommodated. The single condition of peace, is, the surrender of the traitor; it is so in God's dealing with the soul, when it is besieged by conviction and distress; sin is the traitor; the beloved lust is the rebel: part with that, cast away the transgressions, and all shall be well. No peace on any other terms. Our wise woman immediately agrees to the proposal: Behold, his head shall be thrown to thee presently.

2. Her treaty with the citizens. She went to them in her wisdom, (and perhaps she had as much need of it in dealing with them, as in dealing with Joab,) and persuaded them to cut off Sheba's head, probably, by some public order of their government, and it was thrown over the wall to Joab. He knew the traitor's face, and therefore looked no further, intending not that any of his adherents should suffer. The public safety was secured, and he felt no wish to gratify the public revenge. Joab, hereupon, raised the siege, and marched back to Jerusalem, with the trophies rather of peace than victory.

23. Now Joab was over all the host of Israel: and Benaiah the son of Jehoiada was over the Cherethites and over the Pelethites: 24. And Adoram was over the tribute: and Jehoshaphat the son of Ahilud was recorder: 25. And Sheva was scribe:

and Zadok and Abiathar were the priests: 26. And Ira also the Jairite was a chief ruler about David.

Here is an account of the state of David's court, after his restoration. Joab was continued general, being too great to be displaced; Benaiah, as before, captain of the guards. Here is one new office erected which we had not, ch. 8. 16. that of treasurer, or one over the tribute, for it was not till toward the latter end of his time, that he began to raise taxes. Adoram was long in this office, but it cost him his life at last, 1 Kings, 12. 18.

CHAP. XXI.

The date of the events of this chapter is uncertain. I incline to think that they happened as they are here placed, after Absalom's and Sheba's rebellion, and toward the latter end of David's reign. That the battles with the Philistines, mentioned here, were long after the Philistines were subdued, appears by comparing 1 Chron. 18. 1. with ch. 20. 4. The numbering of the people was just before the firing of the place of the temple, as appears, 1 Chron. 22. 1. and that was toward the close of David's life; and, it should seem, the people were numbered just before the three years' famine for the Gibeonites, for that which is threatened as three years' famine, 1 Chron. 21. 12. is called seven years, 2 Sam. 24. 12, 13. Three more, with the year current, added to those three. We have here, I. The Gibeonites avenged, 1. By a famine in the land, v. 1. 2. By the putting of seven of Saul's posterity to death, v. 2. 9. care, however, taken of their dead bodies, and of the bones of Saul, v. 10. 14. II. The giants of the Philistines slain in several battles, v. 15. .22

1. THEN there was a famine in the days of David three years, year after year; and David inquired of the LORD. And the LORD answered, It is for Saul, and for his bloody house, because he slew the Gibeonites. 2. And the king called the Gibeonites, and said unto them; (now the Gibeonites were not of the children of Israel, but of the remnant of the Amorites; and the children of Israel had sworn unto them: and Saul sought to slay them in his zeal to the children of Israel and Judah.) 3. Wherefore David said unto the Gibeonites, What shall I do for you? And where-with shall I make the atonement, that ye may bless the inheritance of the LORD? 4. And the Gibeonites said unto him, We will have no silver nor gold of Saul, nor of his house; neither for us shalt thou kill any man in Israel. And he said, What ye shall say, that will I do for you. 5. And they answered the king, The man that consumed us, and that devised against us that we should be destroyed from remaining in any of the coasts of Israel; 6. Let seven men of his sons be delivered unto us, and we will hang them up unto the LORD in Gibeah of Saul, whom the LORD did choose. And the king said, I will give them. 7. But the king spared Mephibosheth, the son of Jonathan the son of Saul, because of the LORD's oath that was between them, between David and Jonathan the son of Saul. 8. But the king took the two sons of Rizpah the daughter of Aiab, whom she bare unto Saul, Armoni and Mephibosheth; and the five sons of Michal the daughter of Saul, whom she brought up for Adriel the son of Barzillai the Meholathite: 9. And he delivered them into the hands of the Gibeonites, and they hanged them in the hill before the LORD: and they fell all seven together, and were put to death in the days of harvest, in the first days, in the beginning of barley harvest.

Here,

I. We are told of the injury which Saul had, long before this, done to the Gibeonites, which we had no account of in the history of his reign, nor should have heard of here, but that it came now to be reckoned for. The Gibeonites were of the remnant of the Amorites, v. 2. who by a wife had made peace with Israel, and had the public faith pledged to them by Joshua for their safety. We had the story, Josh. 9. where it was agreed, v. 23. that they should be secured, but deprived of their lands and liberties, that they and their's should be tenants in villanage to Israel. It does not appear that they had broken their part of the covenant, either by denying their service, or attempting to recover their lands or liberties; nor was it pretended; but Saul, under colour of zeal for the honour of Israel, that it might not be said that they had any of the natives among them, aimed to root them out, and, in order to that, slew many of them. Thus he would seem wiser than his predecessors the judges, and more zealous for the public interest; and perhaps he designed it for an instance of his royal prerogative, and the power which as king he assumed to rescind the former acts of government, and to disannul the most solemn leagues. It may be, he designed, by this severity toward the Gibeonites, to atone for his clemency toward the Amalekites. Some conjecture that he sought to cut off the Gibeonites at the same time when he put away the witches, 1 Sam. 28. 3. or, perhaps, many of them were remarkably pious, and he sought to destroy them when he slew the priests their masters. That which made this an exceeding sinful sin, was, that he not only shed innocent blood, but therein violated the solemn oath by which the nation was bound to protect them. See what brought ruin on Saul's house; it was a bloody house.

II. We find the nation of Israel chastised with a sore famine, long after, for this sin of Saul. Observe, 1. Even in the land of Israel, that fruitful land, and in the reign of David, that glorious reign, there was a famine, not extreme, for then it would sooner have been taken notice of, and inquiry made into the cause of it, but great drought, and scarcity of provisions, the consequence of it, for three years together. If corn miss one year, commonly the next makes up the deficiency; but if it miss three years successively, it will be a sore judgment; and the man of wisdom will by it hear God's voice crying to the country, to repent of the abuse of plenty. 2. David inquired of God concerning it. Though he was himself a prophet, he must consult the oracle, and know God's mind in his own appointed way. Note, When we are under God's judgments, we ought to inquire into the grounds of the controversy. Lord, shew me wherefore thou contendest with me. It is strange that David did not sooner consult the oracle, not till the third year; but, perhaps, till then, he apprehended it not to be an extraordinary judgment for some particular sin. Even good men are often slack and remiss in doing their duty. We continue in ignorance, and under mistake, because we delay to inquire. 3. God was ready in his answer, though David was slow in his inquiries, It is for Saul. Note, God's judgments often look a great way back, which obliges us to do so, when we are under his rebukes. It is not for us to object against the people's smarting for the sin of their king, perhaps they were aiding and abetting; nor against this generation's suffering for the sin of the last, God often visiteth the sins of the fathers upon the children, and his judgments are a great deep: he gives not account of any of his matters. Time does not wear out the guilt of sin; nor can we build hopes of impunity upon the delay of judgments. There is no statute of limitation to be pleaded against God's demands. Nullum tempus occurrit Deo—God may punish when he pleases.

III. We have vengeance taken upon the house of Saul, for the turning away of God's wrath from the land, which, at present, smarted for his sin.

1. David, it is probable by divine direction, referred it to the Gibeonites themselves, to prescribe what satisfaction should be given them for the wrong that had been done them, v. 3. They had many years remained silent, had not appealed to David, nor given the kingdom any disturbance with their complaints or demands; and now, at length, God speaks for them; I heard not, for thou wilt hear, Ps. 38. 14, 15. and they are recompensed for their patience with this honour, that they are made judges in their own cause, and have a blank given them to write their demands on; What ye shall say, that will I do, v. 4. that atonement may be made, and that ye may bless the inheritance of the Lord, v. 3. It is sad for any family or nation to have the prayers of oppressed innocency against them, and therefore the expense of a just restitution is well-bestowed for the retrieving of the blessing of those that were ready to perish, Job, 29. 13. "My servant Job, whom you have wronged, shall pray for you," says God, "and then I will be reconciled to you, and not till then." Those understand not themselves, that value not the prayers of the poor and despised.

2. They desired that seven of Saul's posterity might be put to death, and David granted them their demand.

(1.) They required no silver, nor gold, v. 4. Note, Money is no satisfaction for blood; see Numb. 35. 31. . 33. It is the ancient law, blood calls for blood, Gen. 9. 6. and those over-value money, and under-value life, that sell the blood of their relations for corruptible things, such as silver and gold. The Gibeonites had now a fair opportunity to get a discharge from their servitude, in compensation for the wrong done them, according to the equity of that law, Exod. 21. 26. If a man strike out a servant's eye, he shall let him go free for his eye's sake. But they did not insist on this; though the covenant was broken on the other side, it should not be broken on their's. They were Nethinim, given to God and his people Israel, and they would not seem weary of the service.

(2.) They required no lives but of Saul's family; he had done them the wrong, and therefore his children must pay for it. We sue the heirs for the parent's debts; men may not extend that so far as life, Dent. 24. 16. The children, in an ordinary course of law, shall never be put to death for the parents, but this case of the Gibeonites was altogether extraordinary. God had made himself an immediate party to the cause, and, no doubt, put it into the heart of the Gibeonites to make this demand, for he owned what was done, v. 14. and his judgments are not subject to the rules which men's judgments must be subject to. Let parents take heed of sin, especially the sin of cruelty and oppression, for their poor children's sake, who may be smarting for it by the just hand of God, when they are in their graves. Guilt and a curse are a bad entail upon a family. It should seem, Saul's posterity trod in his steps, for it is called a bloody house; it was the spirit of the family, and therefore they are justly reckoned with for his sin, as well as for their own.

(3.) They would not impose it upon David to do this execution, Thou shalt not for us kill any man, v. 4. but we will do it ourselves, we will hang them up unto the Lord, v. 6. that if there were any hardship in it, they might bear the blame, and not David or his house. By our old law, if a murderer had judgment given against him upon an appeal, the relations that appealed, had the executing of him.

(4.) They did not require this out of malice against Saul or his family, (had they been revengeful, they would have moved it themselves long before,) but out of love to the people of Israel, whom they saw plagued for the injury done to them. "We will hang them up unto the Lord, v. 6. to satisfy his justice, not to gratify any revenge of our own; for the good of the public, not for our own reputation."

(5.) The nomination of the persons they left to David; who took care to secure Mephibosheth for Jonathan's sake, that while he was avenging the breach of one oath, he might not himself break another, v. 7. but he delivered up two of Saul's sons whom he had by a concubine, and five of his grandsons, whom his daughter Merab bore to Adriel, 1 Sam. 18. 19. but his daughter Michal brought up, v. 8. Now Saul's treachery was punished, in giving Merab to Adriel, when he had promised her to David, with a design to provoke him. "It is a dangerous matter," says Bishop Hall, upon this, "to offer injury to any of God's faithful ones: if their meekness have easily remitted it, their God will not pass it over without a severe retribution, though it may be long first."

(6.) The place, time, and manner, of their execution, all added to the solemnity of their being sacrificed to divine justice. [1.] They were hanged up as anathemas, under a peculiar mark of God's displeasure, for the law had said, He that is hanged is accursed of God, Deut. 21. 23. Gal. 3. 13. Christ, being made a curse for us, and dying to satisfy for our sins, and to turn away the wrath of God, became obedient to this ignominious death. [2.] They were hanged up in Gibeah of Saul, v. 6. to shew that it was for his sin that they died. They were hanged, as it were, before their own door, to expiate the guilt of the house of Saul; and thus God accomplished the ruin of that family, for the blood of the priests, and their families, which, doubtless, now came in remembrance before God, and inquisition was made for it, Ps. 9. 12. Yet the blood of the Gibeonites only is mentioned; because that was shed in violation of a sacred oath, which, though sworn long before, though obtained by a wile, and the promise made to Canaanites, yet is thus severely reckoned for. The despising of the oath, and breaking of the covenant, will be recompensed on the head of those who thus profane God's sacred name, Ezek. 17. 18, 19. And thus God would shew, that with him rich and poor meet together. Even royal blood must go to atone for the blood of Gibeonites, who were but the vassals of the congregation. [3.] They were put to death in the days of harvest, v. 9. at the beginning of harvest, v. 10. to shew that they were thus sacrificed for the turning away of that wrath of God which had withheld from them their harvest mercies for some years past, and to obtain his favour in the present harvest. Thus there is no way of appeasing God's anger, but by mortifying and crucifying our lusts and corruptions. In vain do we expect mercy from God, unless we do justice upon our sins. Those executions must not be complained of as cruel which are become necessary in the public welfare. Better that seven of Saul's bloody house be hanged, than that all Israel be famished.

10. And Rizpah the daughter of Aiah took sackcloth, and spread it for her upon the rock, from the beginning of harvest until water dropped upon them out of heaven, and suffered neither the birds of the air to rest on them by day, nor the beasts of the field by night. 11. And it was told David what Rizpah the daughter of Aiah, the concubine of Saul, had done. 12. And David went and took the bones of Saul and the bones of Jonathan his son from the men of Jabesh-gilead, which had stolen them from the street of Beth-shan, where the Philistines had hanged them, when the Philistines had slain Saul in Gilboa: 13. And he brought up from thence the bones of Saul and the bones of Jonathan his son; and they gathered the bones of them that were hanged. 14. And the bones of Saul and Jonathan his son buried they in the country of Benjamin in Zelah, in the sepulchre of Kish his father: and they performed all that the king commanded. And after that God was entreated for the land.

Here we have,

I. Saul's sons not only hanged, but hanged in chains, their dead bodies left hanging, and exposed, till the judgment ceased, which their death was to turn away, by the sending of rain upon the land. They died as sacrifices, and thus they were, in a manner, offered up, not consumed all at once by fire, but gradually by the air. They died as anathemas, and by this ignominious usage they were represented as execrable, because iniquity was laid upon them. When our blessed Saviour was made sin for us, he was made a curse for us. But how shall we reconcile this with the law, which expressly obliged to bury those that were hanged, the same day? Deut. 21. 23. One of the Jewish Rabbins wished this passage of story were expunged, that the name of God might be sanctified, which, he thinks, is dishonoured by his acceptance of that which was a violation of his law; but this was an extraordinary case, and did not fall within that law; nay, the very reason for that law is a reason for this exception. He that is thus left hanged is accursed, therefore ordinary malefactors must not be so abused; but therefore these must; because they were sacrificed, not to the justice of the nation, but for the crime of the nation, no less a crime than the violating of the public faith, and for the deliverance of the nation from no less a judgment than a general famine. Being thus made as the off-scouring of all things, they were made a spectacle to the world, 1 Cor. 4. 9, 13. God appointing, or at least allowing, it.

II. Their dead bodies watched by Rizpah, the mother of two of them, v. 10. It was a great affliction to her, now in her old age, to see her two sons, who, we may suppose, had been a comfort to her, and were likely to be the support of her declining years, cut off in this dreadful manner. None know what sorrow they are reserved for. She may not see them decently interred, but they shall be decently attended. She attempts not to violate the sentence past upon them, that they should hang there till God sent rain; she neither steals nor forces away the dead bodies, though the divine law might have been cited to bear her out; she patiently submits, pitches a tent of sackcloth near the gibbets, where, with her servants and friends, she protected the dead bodies from birds and beasts of prey. Thus, 1. She indulges her grief, as mourners are too apt to do, to no good purpose. When sorrow, in such cases, is in danger of growing excessive, we should rather study how to divert and pacify it, than how to humour and gratify it. Why should we thus harden ourselves in sorrow? 2. She testified her love. Thus she let the world know that her sons died, not for any sin of their own, not as stubborn and rebellious sons, whose eye had despised to obey their mother; if that had been the case, she would have suffered the ravens of the valley to pick it out, and the young eagles to eat it, Prov. 30. 17. But they died for their father's sin, and therefore her mind could not be alienated from them by their hard fate. Though they must die, yet they shall die pitied and lamented.

III. The solemn interment of their dead bodies, with the bones of Saul and Jonathan, in the burying-place of their family. David was so far from being displeased at what Rizpah had done, that he was himself stirred up by it to do honour to the house of Saul, and to these branches of it among the rest; thus it appeared that it was not out of any personal disgust to the family that he delivered them up, and that he had not desired the woeful day, but that he was obliged to do it for the public good. 1. He now bethought himself of removing the bodies of Saul and Jonathan from the place where the men of Jabesh-gilead had decently, but privately and obscurely, interred them, under a tree, 1 Sam. 31. 12, 13. Though the shield of Saul was vilely cast away, as if he had not been anointed with oil, yet let not royal dust be lost in the graves of the common people. Humanity obliges us to respect human bodies, especially of the great and good, in consideration both of what they have been, and what they are to be. 2. With them he buried the bodies of them that were hanged; for when God's anger was turned away, they were no longer to be looked upon as a curse, v. 13, 14. When water dropped upon them out of heaven, v. 10. that is, when God sent rain to water the earth, (which, perhaps, was not many days after they were hung up,) then they were taken down, for then it appeared that God was entreated for the land. When justice is done on earth, vengeance from heaven ceases. Through Christ, who was hanged on a tree, and so made a curse for us, to expiate our guilt, (though he was himself guiltless,) God is pacified, and is entreated for us: and it is said, Acts, 13. 29. that when they had fulfilled all that was written of him, in token of that and of God's acceptance of it, they took him down and laid him in a sepulchre.

15. Moreover the Philistines had yet war again with Israel; and David went down, and his servants with him, and fought against the Philistines; and David waxed faint. 16. And Ishbi-benob, which was of the sons of the giant, the weight of whose spear weighed three hundred shekels of brass in weight, he being girded with a new sword, thought to have slain David. 17. But Abishai the son of Zeruiah succoured him, and smote the Philistine, and killed him. Then the men of David swore unto him, saying, Thou shalt go no more out with us to battle, that thou quench not the light of Israel. 18. And it came to pass after this, that there was again a battle with the Philistines at Gob; then Sibbechai the Hushathite slew Saph, which was of the sons of the giant. 19. And there was again a battle in Gob with the Philistines, where Elhanan the son of Jaare-oregim, a Beth-lehemite, slew the brother of Goliath the Gittite, the staff of whose spear was like a weaver's beam. 20. And there was yet a battle in Gath, where was a man of great stature, that had on every hand six fingers, and on every foot six toes, four and twenty in number; and he also was born to the giant. 21. And when he defied Israel, Jonathan the son of Shimea the brother of David slew him. 22. These four were born to the giant in Gath, and fell by the hand of David, and by the hand of his servants.

We have here the story of some conflicts with the Philistines, which happened, as it should seem, in the latter end of David's reign. Though he had so subdued them, that they could not bring any great numbers into the field, yet, as long as they had any giants among them to be their champions, they would never be quiet, but took all occasions to disturb the peace of Israel, to challenge them, or to make incursions upon them.

1. David himself was engaged with one of the giants: the Philistines began the war yet again, v. 15. The enemies of God's Israel are restless in their attempts against them. David, though old, desired not a writ of ease from the public service, but he himself went down in person to fight against the Philistines. Senescit, non segnescit—He grows old, but not indolent. A sign that he sought, not for his own glory, (at this age he was loaded with that, and needed no more,) but for the good of his kingdom. But in this engagement, 1. We find him in distress and danger. He thought he could bear the fatigues of war as well as he had done formerly; his will was good, and he hoped he could do as at other times; but he found himself deceived, age had cut his hair, and, after a little toil, he waxed faint. His body could not keep pace with his mind. The champion of the Philistines was soon aware of his advantage, perceived that David's strength failed him, and, being himself strong and well-armed, he thought to have slain David; but God was not in his thoughts, and therefore in that very day they all perished. The enemies of God's people are often very strong, very subtle, and very sure of success, like Ishbi-benob, but there is no strength, nor counsel, nor confidence, against the Lord. 2. Wonderfully rescued by Abishai, who came seasonably in to his relief, v. 17. Herein we must own Abishai's courage and fidelity to his prince, to save whose life he bravely ventured his own; but much more the good providence of God, which brought him in to David's succour, in the minute of his extremity. Such a cause and such a champion, though distressed, shall not be deserted. When Abishai succoured him, gave him a cordial, it may be, to relieve his fainting spirits, or appeared as his second, he (namely, David, so I understand it,) smote the Philistine, and killed him, for it is said, v. 22. David had himself a hand in slaying the giants. David fainted, but he did not flee; though his strength failed him, he bravely kept his ground, and then God sent him this help in the time of need, which, though brought him by his junior and inferior, he thankfully accepted, and, with a little recruiting, gained his point, and came off a conqueror. Christ, in his agonies, was strengthened by an angel. In spiritual conflicts, even strong saints sometimes wax faint; then Satan attacks them furiously; but they that stand their ground, and resist him, shall be relieved, and made more than conquerors. 3. David's servants, hereupon, resolved that he should never expose himself thus any more. They had easily persuaded him not to fight against Absalom, ch. 18. 3. but against the Philistines he would go, till, having had this narrow escape, it was resolved in council, and confirmed with an oath, that the light of Israel (its guide and glory, so David was) should never be put again into such hazard of being blown out. Such valuable lives as David's was, ought to be preserved with a double care, both by themselves and others.

II. The rest of the giants fell by the hand of David's servants. 1. Saph was slain by Sibbechai, one of David's worthies, v. 18. 1 Chron. 11. 29. 2. Another, who was brother to Goliath, was slain by Elhanan, who is mentioned, ch. 23. 24. 3. Another, who was of such an unusual bulk, that he had more fingers and toes than other people, v. 20. and such an unparalleled insolence, that, though he had seen the fall of other giants, yet he defied Israel, was slain by Jonathan the son of Shimea. Shimea had one son named Jonadab, 2 Sam. 13. 3. I should have taken it for the same with this Jonathan; but that was noted for subtlety, this for bravery. These giants, probably, were the remains of the sons of Anak, who, though long feared, fell at last.

Now observe, (1.) It is folly for the strong man to glory in his strength; David's servants were no larger or stronger than other men; yet thus, by divine assistance, they mastered one giant after another. God chooses by the weak things to confound the mighty. (2.) It is common for those to go down slain to the pit, who have been the terror of the mighty in the land of the living, Ezek. 32. 27. (3.) The most powerful enemies are often reserved for the last conflict. David began his glory with the conquest of one giant, and here concludes it with the conquest of four. Death is a Christian's last enemy, and a son of Anak: but, through Him that triumphed for us, we hope even over that enemy to be more than conquerors at last.

CHAP. XXII.

This chapter is a psalm, a psalm of praise; we find it afterward inserted among David's psalms, Ps. 18. with some little variation. We have it here, as it was first composed for his own closet, and his own harp; but there we have it, as it was afterward delivered to the chief musician for the service of the church; a second edition, with some amendments: for though it was calculated primarily for David's ease, yet it might indifferently serve the devotion of others, in giving thanks for their deliverances; or, it was intended that his people should thus join with him in his thanksgivings, because, being a public person, his deliverances were to be accounted public blessings, and called for public acknowledgments. The inspired historian, having largely related David's deliverances in this and the foregoing book, and one particularly in the close of the foregoing chapter, thought fit to record this sacred poem as a memorial of all that had been before related. Some think that David penned this psalm when he was old, upon a general review of the mercies of his life, and the many wonderful preservations God had blessed him with, from first to last. We should, in our praises, look as far back as we can, and not suffer time to wear out the sense of God's favours. Others think that he penned it when he was young, upon occasion of some of his first deliverances, and kept it by him for his use afterward, and that, upon every new deliverance, his practice was to sing this song. But the book of Psalms shews that he varied, as there was occasion, and confined not himself to one form. Here is, I. The title of the psalm, v. 1. II. The psalm itself; in which, with a very warm devotion, and very great fluency and copiousness of expression, 1. He gives glory to God. 2. He takes comfort in him; and he finds matter for both, (1.) In the experiences he had of God's former favours. (2.) In the expectations he had of his further favours. These are intermixed throughout the whole psalm.

1. AND David spake unto the LORD the words of this song, in the day that the LORD had delivered him out of the hand of all his enemies, and out of the hand of Saul:

Observe here, 1. That it has often been the lot of God's people to have many enemies, and to be in imminent danger of falling into their hands. David was a man after God's heart, but not after men's heart; many were those that hated him, and sought his ruin; Saul is particularly named, either, (1.) As distinguished from his enemies of the heathen nations; Saul hated David, but David did not hate Saul, and therefore would not reckon him among his enemies; or, rather, (2.) As the chief of his enemies, that was more malicious and powerful than any of them. Let not those whom God loves, marvel if the world hate them.

2. They that trust God in the way of duty shall find him a present help to them in their greatest dangers. David did so, God delivered him out of the hand of Saul, he takes special notice of that; remarkable preservations should be mentioned in our praises with a particular emphasis. He delivered him also out of the hand of all his enemies, one after another; sometimes in one way, sometimes in another: and David, from his own experience, has assured us, that though many are the troubles of the righteous, yet the Lord delivers them out of them all, Ps. 34. 19. We shall never be delivered from all our enemies till we get to heaven; and to that heavenly kingdom God will preserve all his, 2 Tim. 4. 18.

3. Those that have received many signal mercies from God ought to give him the glory of them. Every new mercy in our hand should put a new song into our mouth, even praises to our God. Where there is a grateful heart, out of the abundance of that the mouth will speak; David spake, not to himself, only for his own pleasure, or to those about him, only for their instruction, but to the Lord, for his honour, the words of this song. Then we sing with grace, when we sing to the Lord. In distress he cried with his voice, Ps. 142. 1. therefore with his voice he gave thanks: that is the sweetest music.

4. We ought to be speedy in our thankful returns to God: in the day that God delivered him, he sang this song. While the mercy is fresh, and we are most affected with it, let the thank-offering be brought, to be kindled with the fire of that affection.

2. And he said, The LORD is my rock, and my fortress, and my deliverer; 3. The God of my rock; in him will I trust: he is my shield, and the horn of my salvation, my high tower, and my refuge, my Saviour; thou savest me from violence. 4. I will call on the LORD, who is worthy to be praised: so shall I be saved from mine enemies. 5. When the waves of death compassed me, the floods of ungodly men made me afraid; 6. The sorrows of hell compassed me about; the snares of death prevented me; 7. In my distress I called upon the LORD, and cried to my God: and he did hear my voice out of his temple, and my cry did enter into his ears. 8. Then the earth shook and trembled; the foundations of heaven moved and shook, because he was wroth. 9. There went up a smoke out of his nostrils, and fire out of his mouth devoured: coals were kindled by it. 10. He bowed the heavens also, and came down; and darkness was under his feet. 11. And he rode upon a cherub, and did fly: and he was seen upon the wings of the wind. 12. And he made darkness pavilions round about him, dark waters, and thick clouds of the skies. 13. Through the brightness before him were coals of fire kindled. 14. The LORD thundered from heaven, and the most High uttered his voice. 15. And he sent out arrows, and scattered them; lightning, and discomfited them. 16. And the channels of the sea appeared, the foundations of the world were discovered, at the rebuking of the LORD, at the blast of the breath of his nostrils. 17. He sent from above, he took me; he drew me out of many waters; 18. He delivered me from my strong enemy, and from them that hated me: for they were too strong for me. 19. They prevented me in the day of my calamity: but the LORD was my stay. 20. He brought me forth also into a large place: he delivered me, because he delighted in me. 21. The LORD rewarded me according to my righteousness: according to the cleanness of my hands hath he recompensed me. 22. For I have kept the ways of the LORD, and have not wickedly departed from my God. 23. For all his judgments were before me: and as for his statutes, I did not depart from them. 24. I was also upright before him, and have kept myself from mine iniquity. 25. Therefore the LORD hath recompensed me according to my righteousness; according to my cleanness in his eye-sight. 26. With the merciful thou wilt shew thyself merciful, and with the upright man thou wilt shew thyself upright. 27. With the pure thou wilt shew thyself pure; and with the froward thou wilt shew thyself unsavoury. 28. And the afflicted people thou wilt save: but thine eyes are upon the haughty, that thou mayest bring them down. 29. For thou art my lamp, O LORD: and the LORD will lighten my darkness. 30. For by thee I have run through a troop: by my God have I leaped over a wall. 31. As for God, his way is perfect; the word of the LORD is tried: he is a buckler to all them that trust in him. 32. For who is God, save the LORD? and who is a rock, save our God? 33. God is my strength and power: and he maketh my way perfect. 34. He maketh my feet like hinds' feet: and setteth me upon my high places. 35. He teacheth my hands to war; so that a bow of steel is broken by mine arms. 36. Thou hast also given me the shield of thy salvation: and thy gentleness hath made me great. 37. Thou hast enlarged my steps under me; so that my feet did not slip. 38. I have pursued mine enemies, and destroyed them; and turned not again until I had consumed them.

39. And I have consumed them, and wounded them, that they could not arise: yea, they are fallen under my feet. 40. For thou hast girded me with strength to battle: them that rose up against me hast thou subdued under me. 41. Thou hast also given me the necks of mine enemies, that I might destroy them that hate me. 42. They looked, but there was none to save; even unto the LORD, but he answered them not. 43. Then did I beat them as small as the dust of the earth, I did stamp them as the mire of the street, and did spread them abroad. 44. Thou also hast delivered me from the strivings of my people, thou hast kept me to be head of the heathen: a people which I knew not shall serve me. 45. Strangers shall submit themselves unto me: as soon as they hear, they shall be obedient unto me. 46. Strangers shall fade away, and they shall be afraid out of their close places. 47. The LORD liveth; and blessed be my rock; and exalted be the God of the rock of my salvation. 48. It is God that avengeth me, and that bringeth down the people under me, 49. And that bringeth me forth from mine enemies: thou also hast lifted me up on high above them that rose up against me: thou hast delivered me from the violent man. 50. Therefore I will give thanks unto thee, O LORD, among the heathen, and I will sing praises unto thy name. 51. He is the tower of salvation for his king: and sheweth mercy to his anointed, unto David, and to his seed for evermore.

Let us observe, in this song of praise,

I. How David adores God, and gives him the glory of his infinite perfections. There is none like him, nor any to be compared with him, v. 32. Who is God, save the Lord? All others that are adored as deities, are counterfeits and pretenders. None are to be relied on besides. Who is a rock, save our God? They are dead, but the Lord liveth, v. 47. They disappoint their worshippers, when they most need them. But as for God, his way is perfect, v. 31. Men begin in kindness, but end not; promise, but perform not; but God will finish his work, and his word is tried, and what we may trust.

II. How he triumphs in the interest he had in this God, and his relation to him, which he lays down as the foundation of all the benefits he had received from him. He is my God; as such he cries to him, v. 7. and cleaves to him, v. 22. and if my God, then my Rock, v. 2. that is, my Strength and my Power, v. 33. the Rock under which I take shelter, and who is to me as the shadow of a great rock in a weary land; the Rock on which I build my hope, v. 3. Whatever is my strength and support, it is the God of my rock that makes it so; nay, he is the God of the rock of my salvation, v. 47. my saving strength is in him and from him. David often hides himself in a rock, 1 Sam. 24. 2. but God was his chief Hiding-place. "He is my Fortress, in whom I am safe, and think myself so, my high Tower, or strong-hold, in which I am out of the reach of real evils, the Tower of salvation, v. 51. which can neither be scaled, nor battered, nor undermined; salvation itself saves me. Am I in distress? He is my Deliverer: Struck at, shot at? He is my Shield: Pursued? He is my Refuge: Oppressed? He is my Saviour, that rescues me out of the hand of those that seek my ruin. Nay, he is the horn of my salvation, by which I am strongly protected, and my enemies strongly pushed." Christ is spoken of as the Horn of salvation in the house of David, Luke, 1. 69. "Am I burthened, and ready to sink? The Lord is my Stay, v. 19. by whom I am supported. Am I in the dark, benighted, at a loss? Thou art my Lamp, O Lord, to shew me my way, and wilt lighten my darkness, v. 29. If we sincerely take the Lord for our God, all this, and much more, he will be to us, all we need and can desire.

III. What improvement he makes of his interest in God. If he be mine, 1. In him will I trust, v. 3. that is, "I will resign myself to him, and then depend upon his power, and wisdom, and goodness, to conduct me well. 2. On him I will call, v. 4. for he is worthy to be praised. What we have found in God, that is worthy to be praised, should engage us to pray to him, and thereby we do, in effect, praise him, and give glory to him. 3. To him will I give thanks, v. 50. and that publicly; when he was among the heathen, he would neither be afraid nor ashamed to own his obligations to the God of Israel.

IV. The full and large account he keeps for himself, and gives to others, of the great and kind things God had done for him. This takes up most of the song. He gives God the glory both of his deliverances, and of his successes; shewing both the perils he was delivered from, and the power he was advanced to.

1. He magnifies the great salvations God had wrought for him. God sometimes brings his people into very great difficulties and dangers, that he may have the honour of saving them, and they the comfort of being saved by him. He owns, Thou hast saved me from violence, v. 3. from mine enemies, v. 5. from my strong enemy, meaning Saul, who, if God had not succoured him, would have been too hard for him, v. 18. Thou hast given me the shield of thy salvation, v. 36. To magnify the salvation, he observes,

(1.) That the danger was very great and threatening, out of which he was delivered. Men rose up against him, v. 40, 49. that hated him, v. 41. a violent man, v. 49. namely, Saul, who was malicious in his designs against him, and vigorous in his pursuits. This is expressed figuratively, v. 5, 6. He was surrounded with death on every side, threatened to be overwhelmed, and saw no way of escape. So violently did the waves of death beat upon him, so strongly did the cords and snares of death hold him, that he could not help himself, any more than a man in the grave can. The floods of Belial, the wicked one, and his wicked instruments, made him afraid; he trembled to see not only earth, but death and hell, in arms against him.

(2.) That his deliverance was an answer to prayer, v. 7. He has here left us a good example, when we are in distress, to cry unto God with importunity, as children, in a fright, cry to their parents; and great encouragement to do so, in that he found God ready to answer prayer out of his temple in heaven, where he is continually served and adored.

(3.) That God appeared in a singular and extraordinary manner for him, and against his enemies: the expressions are borrowed from the descent of the divine majesty upon mount Sinai, v. 8, 9, &c. We do not find, that, in any of David's battles, God fought for him either with thunder, as in Samuel's time, or with hail, as in Joshua's time, or with the stars in their courses, as in Deborah's time: but those lofty metaphors are used, [1.] To set forth the glory of God, which was manifested in his deliverance; his wisdom and power, his goodness and faithfulness, his justice and holiness, and his sovereign dominion over all the creatures and all the counsels of men, which appeared in favour of David, were as clear and bright a discovery of God's glory, to an eye of faith, as those would have been to an eye of sense. [2.] To set forth God's displeasure against his enemies; God so espoused his cause, that he shewed himself an Enemy to all his enemies; his anger is set forth by a smoke out of his nostrils, and fire out of his mouth, v. 9. coals kindled, v. 13. arrows, v. 15. Who knows the power and terror of his wrath? [3.] To set forth the vast confusion which his enemies were put into, and the consternation that seized them; as if the earth had trembled, and the foundations of the world had been discovered, v. 8, 16. Who can stand before God, when he is angry? [4.] To shew how ready God was to help him; he rode upon a cherub, and did fly, v.11. God hastened to his succour, and came in to him with seasonable relief. Though he had seemed at a distance, yet he was a God hiding himself, (Isa.45.15.) for he made darkness his pavilion, v.12. for the amazement of his enemies, and the protection of his own people.

(4.) That God manifested his particular favour and kindness to him in these deliverances, v.20. He delivered me, because he delighted in me. The deliverance came not from common providence, but covenant-love; he was herein treated as a favourite; so he perceived by the communications of divine grace and comfort to his soul, with these deliverances, and the communion he had with God in them. Herein he was a type of Christ, whom God upheld, because he delighted in him, Isa.42.1,2.

2. He magnifies the great successes God had crowned him with; he had not only preserved, but prospered him. He was blest, (1.) With liberty and enlargement. He was brought into a large place, v.20. where he had room to thrive; and his steps were enlarged under him, so that he had room to stir, v.37. no longer straitened and confined. (2.) With military skill, and strength, and swiftness: though he was bred up to the crook, he was well-instructed in the arts of war, and qualified for the toils and perils of it. God having called him to fight his battles, qualified him for the service, made him very ingenious: he teacheth my hands to war, v.35. and this ingenuity was as good as strength, for it follows, so that a bow of steel is broken by my arms, not so much by main force as by dexterity. He was also very vigorous and valiant: Thou hast girded me with strength to battle, v.40. He gives God the glory of all his courage and ability for service. He was very expeditious too. He maketh my feet swift like hinds' feet, v.34. which is of great advantage, both in charging and retreating. (3.) With victory over his enemies, not only Saul and Absalom, but the Philistines, Moabites, Ammonites, Syrians, and other neighbouring nations, whom he subdued, and made tributaries to Israel. His wonderful victories are here described, v.38.43. They were speedy victories; I turned not again till I had consumed them, v.38. and complete victories; the enemies of Israel were wounded, destroyed, consumed, fell under his feet, trampled upon, and disabled to rise, and their necks lay at his mercy. They cried both to earth and heaven for help, but in vain, there was none to ave, none that durst appear for them; God answered them not, for they were not on his side, nor did they cry unto him, till they were brought to the last extremity; being thus abandoned, they became an easy prey to David's righteous and victorious sword, so that he beat them as small as the dust of the earth, which is scattered by the wind, and trodden on by every foot. (4.) With advancement to honour and power. To this he was anointed before his troubles began, and at length, post tot discrimina rerum—after all his dangers and disasters, he gained his point. God made his way perfect, v.33. gave him success in all his undertakings, set him upon his high places, v.34. denoting both safety and dignity. God's gentleness, his grace, and tender mercy, made him great, v.36. gave him great wealth and great authority, and a name like that of the great men of the earth. He was kept to be the head of the heathen, v.41. his signal preservations evinced that he was designed and reserved for something great—to rule over all Israel, notwithstanding the strivings of the people, and so that they whom he had not known should serve him, many of the nations that lay remote. Thus he was lifted up on high, as high as the throne, above those that rose up against him, v.49.

V. The comfortable reflections he makes upon his own integrity, which God, by those wonderful deliverances, had graciously owned, and witnessed to, v.21.25. He means especially his integrity with reference to Saul and Ish-bosheth, Absalom and Sheba, and those who either opposed his coming to the crown, or endeavoured to dethrone him; they falsely accused him, and misrepresented him, but he had the testimony of his conscience for him, that he was not an ambitious aspiring man, a false and bloody man, as they called him; that he had never taken any indirect unlawful courses to secure or raise himself, but in his whole conduct had kept in the way of his duty: and that in the whole course of his conversation he had, for the main, made religion his business, so that he could take God's favours to him as the rewards of his righteousness, not of debt, but of grace; God had recompensed him, though not for his righteousness, as if that had merited any thing at the hand of God, yet according to his righteousness, which he was well-pleased with, and had an eye to.

His conscience witnessed for him, 1. That he had made the word of God his rule, and had kept to it, v.23. Wherever he was, God's judgments were before him as his guide; whithersoever he went, he took his religion along with him; and though he was forced to depart from his country, and sent, as it were, to serve other gods, yet, as for God's statutes, he did not depart from them, but kept the way of the Lord, and walked in it. 2. That he had carefully avoided the by-paths of sin. He had not wickedly departed from his God; he could not say but that he had taken some false steps, but he had not deserted God, or forsaken his way. Sins of infirmity he could not acquit himself from, but the grace of God had kept him from presumptuous sins. Though he had sometimes weakly departed from his duty, he had never wickedly departed from his God. By this it appeared that he was upright before God, or to God, in his sight, and with an eye to him—that he kept himself from his own iniquity: not only from that particular sin of killing Saul, when it was in the power of his hand to do it, but, in general, he was afraid of sin, and watchful against it, and made conscience of what he said and did. The matter of Uriah is an exception, 1 Kings, 15.5. like that in Hezekiah's character, 2 Chron. 32.31. Note, A careful abstaining from our own iniquity, is one of the best evidences of our own integrity; and the testimony of our conscience for us, that we have done so, will be such a rejoicing as will not only lessen the griefs of an afflicted state, but increase the comforts of an advanced state. David reflected with more comfort upon his victories over his own iniquity, than upon his conquest of Goliath and all the hosts of the uncircumcised Philistines; and the witness of his own heart to his uprightness was sweeter, though more silent music, than their's that sang, David has slain his ten thousands. If a great man be a good man, his goodness will be much more his satisfaction than his greatness. Let favour be shewn to the upright, and his uprightness will sweeten it, will double it.

VI. The comfortable prospects he has of God's farther favour; as he looks back, so he looks forward, with pleasure, and assures himself of the kindness God had in store for all the saints, for himself and his seed.

1. For all good people, v.26.28. As God had dealt with him according to his uprightness, so he will with all others. He takes occasion here to lay down the established rules of God's proceedings with the children of men: (1.) That he will do good to those that are upright in their hearts. As we are found toward God, he will be found toward us. [1.] God's mercy and grace will be the joy of those that are merciful and gracious: even the merciful need mercy, and they shall obtain it. [2.] God's uprightness, his justice, and faithfulness, will be the joy of those that are upright, just, and faithful, toward God and man. [3.] God's purity and holiness will be the joy of those that are pure and holy, who therefore give thanks at the remembrance of it. And if any of these good people be afflicted people, he will save them, either out of their afflictions, or by and after them. On the other hand, (2.) That those who turn aside to crooked ways, he will lead forth with the workers of iniquity, as he says in another psalm. With the froward he will wrestle; and those with whom God wrestles are sure to be foiled. Woe unto him that strives with his Maker! He will walk contrary to those that walk contrary to him, and be displeased with them. As for the haughty, his eyes are upon them, marking them out, as it were, to be brought down: for he resists the proud.

2. For himself. He foresees that his conquests and kingdom should be yet further enlarged, v.45,46. Even the sons of the stranger, that should hear the report of his victories, and the tokens of God's presence with him, should be possessed with a fear of him, should be forced to submit to him, though feignedly, and should be obedient to him. The successes which he had had, he looked upon as earnest of more, and means of more: who durst oppose him, whom so many had been overcome by? Thus the Son of David goes on, conquering and to conquer, Rev. 6. 2. His gospel, which has been victorious, shall be so more and more.

2. For his seed. He sheweth mercy to his Messiah, v. 51. not only to David himself, but to that seed of his for evermore. David was himself anointed of God, not an usurper, but duly called to the government, and qualified for it, therefore he doubted not but God would shew mercy to him: that mercy he had promised not to take from him, nor from his posterity, ch. 7. 15, 16. on that promise he depends, with an eye to Christ, who alone is his Seed for evermore, whose throne and kingdom still continue, and will to the end, whereas the seed and lineage of David are long since extinct. See Ps. 89. 23, 29. Thus all his joys and all his hopes terminate, as our's should, in the great Redeemer.

CHAP. XXIII.

The historian is now drawing towards a conclusion of David's reign, and therefore gives us an account here, I. Of some of his last words, which he spake by inspiration, and which seem to have reference to his Seed, that was to be for evermore, spoken of in the close of the foregoing chapter, v. 1. 7. II. Of the great men, especially the military men, that were employed under him, the first three, v. 8. 17. two of the next three, v. 18. 23. And then the thirty, v. 24. 39.

1. NOW these be the last words of David. David the son of Jesse said, and the man who was raised up on high, the anointed of the God of Jacob, and the sweet psalmist of Israel, said, 2. The Spirit of the LORD spake by me, and his word was in my tongue. 3. The God of Israel said, the Rock of Israel spake to me, He that ruleth over men must be just, ruling in the fear of God. 4. And he shall be as the light of the morning, when the sun riseth, even a morning without clouds; as the tender grass springing out of the earth by clear shining after rain. 5. Although my house be not so with God; yet he hath made with me an everlasting covenant, ordered in all things, and sure: for this is all my salvation, and all my desire, although he make it not to grow. 6. But the sons of Belial shall be all of them as thorns thrust away, because they cannot be taken with hands: 7. But the man that shall touch them must be fenced with iron, and the staff of a spear, and they shall be utterly burned with fire in the same place.

We have here the last will and testament of king David, or a codicil annexed to it, after he had settled the crown upon Solomon, and his treasures upon the temple which was to be built. The last words of great and good men are thought worthy to be, in a special manner, remarked and remembered; David would have those taken notice of, and added, either to his psalms, (as they are here to that in the foregoing chapter,) or to the chronicles of his reign. These words especially, v. 5. though recorded before, we may suppose, he often repeated for his own consolation, even to his last breath, and therefore they are called his last words. When we find death approaching, we should endeavour both to honour God, and to edify those about us, with our last words. Let those that have had long experience of God's goodness, and the pleasantness of wisdom, when they come to finish their course, leave a record of that experience, and bear their testimony to the truth of the promise. We have upon record the last words of Jacob and Moses, and here of David, designed, as those, for a legacy to them that were left behind. We are here told,

1. Whose last will and testament this is. This is related, either, as is usual, by the testator himself, or, rather, by the historian, v. 1. He is described, 1. By the meanness of his original: he was the son of Jesse. It is good for those who are advanced to be corner-stones and top-stones, to be reminded, and often to remind themselves, of the rock out of which they were hewn. 2. The height of his elevation: he was raised up on high, as one favoured of God, and designed for something great; raised up as a prince, to sit higher than his neighbours, and as a prophet, to see further; for, (1.) He was the anointed of the God of Jacob, and so was serviceable to the people of God in their civil interests, the protection of their country, and the administration of justice among them. (2.) He was the sweet psalmist of Israel, and so was serviceable to them in their religious exercises; he penned the psalms, set the tunes, appointed both the singers and the instruments of music, by which the devotions of good people were much excited and enlarged. Note, Singing of psalms is a sweet ordinance, very agreeable to those that delight in praising God. It is reckoned among the honours to which David was raised up, that he was a psalmist: in that, he was as truly great as in his being the anointed of the God of Jacob. Note, It is true preferment to be serviceable to the church in acts of devotion, and instrumental to promote the blessed work of prayer and praise. Observe, Was David a prince? He was so for Jacob. Was he a psalmist? He was so for Israel. Note, The dispensation of the Spirit is given to every man to profit withal, and, therefore, as every man has received the gift, so let him minister the same.

II. What the purport of it is. It is an account of his communion with God. Observe,

1. What God said to him, both for his direction and for his encouragement, as a king, and to be, in like manner, of use to his successors. Pious persons take a pleasure in calling to mind what they have heard from God, in recollecting his word, and revolving it in their minds. Thus what God spake once, David heard twice, yea, often.

See here, (1.) Who spake. The Spirit of the Lord; the God of Israel, and the Rock of Israel; which, some think, is an intimation of the Trinity of persons in the Godhead; the Father, the God of Israel, the Son, the Rock of Israel, and the Spirit, proceeding from the Father and the Son, who spake by the prophets, and particularly by David, and whose word was not only in his heart, but in his tongue, for the benefit of others. David here avows his divine inspiration, that in his psalms, and in this composition here, the Spirit of God spake by him. He, and other holy men, spake and wrote as they were moved by the Holy Ghost. This puts an honour upon the book of psalms, and recommends them to our use in our devotions, that they are words which the Holy Ghost teaches.

(2.) What was spoken. Here seems to be a distinction made between what the Spirit of God spake by David, which includes all his psalms, and what the Rock of Israel spake to David, which concerned himself and his family. Let ministers observe, that those by whom God speaks to others are concerned to hear and heed what he speaks to themselves. They, whose office it is to teach others their duty, must be sure to learn and do their own.

Now that which is here said, v. 3, 4. may be considered,

[1.] With application to David, and his royal family. And so here is, First, The duty of magistrates enjoined them. When a king was spoken to from God, he was not to be complimented with the height of his dignity, and the extent of his power, but to be told his duty; he must be just, ruling in the fear of God; and so must all inferior magistrates in their places. Let rulers remember that they rule over men; not over beasts, whom they may enslave and abuse at pleasure, but over reasonable creatures, and of the same rank with themselves. They rule over men that have their follies and infirmities, and therefore must be borne with. They rule over men, but under God, and for him; and therefore, 1. They must be just, both to those over whom they rule, in allowing them their rights and properties; and between those over whom they rule, using their power to right the injured against the injurious; see Deut. 1. 16, 17. It is not enough that they do no wrong, but they must not suffer wrong to be done. 2. They must rule in the fear of God, that is, they must themselves be possessed with a fear of God, by which they will be effectually restrained from all acts of injustice and oppression: Nehemiah was so, ch. 5. 15. So did not I, because of the fear of God; and Joseph, Gen. 42. 18. They must also endeavour to promote the fear of God, that is, the practice of religion, among those over whom they rule. The magistrate is to be the keeper of both tables, and to protect both godliness and honesty. Secondly, Prosperity promised them, if they do this duty. He that rules in the fear of God, shall be as the light of the morning, v. 4. Light is sweet and pleasant, and he that does his duty shall have the comfort of it; his rejoicing will be the testimony of his conscience. Light is bright, and a good prince is illustrious; his justice and piety will be his honour. Light is a blessing, nor are there greater and more extensive blessings to the public, than princes that rule in the fear of God. It is like the light of the morning, which is most welcome after the darkness of the night, so was David's government after Saul's, Ps. 75. 3. and which is increasing, shines more and more to the perfect day; such is the growing lustre of a good government. It is likewise compared to the tender grass, which the earth produces for the service of man; it brings with it a harvest of blessings. See Ps. 72. 6, 16. which were also some of the last words of David, and seem to refer to these here.

[2.] With application to Christ, the Son of David, and then it must all be taken as a prophecy, and the original will bear it; There shall be a ruler among men, or over men, that shall be just, and shall rule in the fear of God, that is, shall order the affairs of religion, and divine worship, according to his Father's will: and he shall be as the light of the morning, &c. for he is the Light of the world, and as the tender grass, for he is the Branch of the Lord, and the Fruit of the earth, Isa. 4. 2. Compare this with those promises of Christ which speak of his reigning in righteousness, and being of quick understanding in the fear of the Lord, Isa. 11. 1. . 5.—32. 1, 2. Ps. 72. 2. God, by the Spirit, gave David the foresight of this, to comfort him under the many calamities of his family, and the melancholy prospects he had of the degeneracy of his seed.

2. What comfortable use he made of this which God spake to him, and what were his devout meditations on it, by way of reply, v. 5. It is not unlike his meditation, on occasion of such a message, 2 Sam. 7. 18, &c. What goes before, the Rock of Israel spake to him; this the Spirit of God spake by him, and it is a most excellent confession of his faith and hope in the everlasting covenant. Here is,

(1.) Trouble supposed. Although my house be not so with God, and although he make it not to grow. David's family was not so with God, as is described, v. 3, 4. and as he could wish; not so good, not so happy; it had not been so while he lived, he foresaw it would not be so when he was gone; that his house would be neither so pious nor so prosperous as one might have expected the offspring of such a father to be. [1.] Not so with God. Note, We and our's are that really, which we are with God. This was it that David's heart was upon concerning his children, that they might be right with God, faithful to him, and zealous for him. But the children of godly parents are often neither so holy, nor so happy, as might be expected. We must be made to know, that it is corruption, not grace, that runs in the blood; that the race is not to the swift, but that God gives his Spirit as a free Agent. [2.] Not made to grow, in number, in power; it is God that makes families to grow, or not to grow, Ps. 107. 41. Good men have often the melancholy prospect of a declining family. David's house was typical of the church of Christ, which is his house, Heb. 3. 3. Suppose this be not so with God as we could wish, suppose it be diminished, distressed, disgraced, and weakened, by errors and corruptions, yea, almost extinct, yet God has made a covenant with the church's Head, the Son of David, that he will preserve in him a seed, that the gates of hell shall never prevail against his house. This our Saviour comforted himself with, in his sufferings, that the covenant with him stood firm, Isa. 53. 10. . 12.

(2.) Comfort insured. Yet he hath made with me an everlasting covenant. Whatever trouble a child of God may have the prospect of, still he has some comfort or other to balance it with, 2 Cor. 4. 8, 9. and none like this here. [1.] It may be understood of the covenant of royalty, (in the type,) which God made with David and his seed, touching the kingdom, Ps. 132. 11, 12. But, [2.] It must look further, to the covenant of grace, made with all believers, that God will be, in Christ, to them a God, which was signified by the covenant of royalty, and therefore the promises of the covenant are called, the sure mercies of David, Isa. 55. 3. It is this only that is the everlasting covenant, and it cannot be imagined that David, who, in so many of his psalms, speaks so clearly concerning Christ, and the grace of the gospel, should forget it in his last words. God has made a covenant of grace with us in Jesus Christ, and we are here told, First, That it is an everlasting covenant, from everlasting, in the contrivance and counsel of it, and to everlasting, in the continuance and consequences of it. Secondly, That it is ordered, well-ordered, in all things, admirably well, to advance the glory of God, and the honour of the Mediator, together with the holiness and comfort of believers. It is herein well-ordered, that whatever is required in the covenant is promised, and that every transgression in the covenant does not throw us out of covenant, and that it puts our salvation, not in our own keeping, but in the keeping of a Mediator. Thirdly, That it is sure, and therefore sure, because well-ordered; the general offer of it is sure, the promised mercies are sure, on the performance of the conditions. The particular application of it to true believers is sure, it is sure to all the seed. Fourthly, That it is all our salvation: nothing but this will save us, and this is sufficient: it is this only upon which our salvation depends. Fifthly, That therefore it must be all our desire. Let me have an interest in this covenant, and the promises of it, and I have enough, I desire no more.

3. Here is the doom of the sons of Belial read, v. 6, 7. (1.) They shall be thrust away as thorns, rejected, abandoned; they are like thorns, not to be touched with hands, so passionate and furious that they cannot be managed or dealt with by a wise and faithful reproof, but must be restrained by law, and the sword of justice; Ps. 32. 9. and therefore like thorns, (2.) They shall, at length, be utterly burnt with fire in the same place, Heb. 6. 8. Now this is intended either, [1.] As a direction to magistrates, to use their power for the punishing and suppressing of wickedness. Let them thrust away the sons of Belial; see Ps. 101. 8. Or, [2.] As a caution to magistrates, and particularly to David's sons and successors, to see that they be not themselves sons of Belial, (as too many of them were,) for then neither the dignity of their place, nor their relation to David, would secure them from being thrust away by the righteous judgments of God. Though men could not deal with them, God would. Or, [3.] As a prediction of the ruin of all the implacable enemies of Christ's kingdom. There are enemies without, that openly oppose it, and fight against it; and enemies within, that secretly betray it, and are false to it; both are sons of Belial, children of the wicked one, of the serpent's seed; both are as thorns, grievous and vexatious; but both shall be so thrust away, as that Christ will set up his kingdom, in despite of their enmity, will go through them, Isa. 27. 4. and will, in due time, bless his church with such peace, that there shall be no pricking brier, nor grieving thorn. And those that will not repent, to give glory to God, shall, in the judgment-day, (to which the Chaldee paraphrast refers this,) be burnt with unquenchable fire. See Luke, 19. 27.

8. These be the names of the mighty men whom David had: The Tachmonite that sat in the seat, chief among the captains; the same was Adino the Ezrite: he lift up his spear against eight hundred, whom he slew at one time. 9. And after him was Eleazar the son of Dodo the Ahohite, one of the three mighty men with David, when they defied the Philistines that were there gathered together to battle, and the men of Israel were gone away: 10. He arose, and smote the Philistines until his hand was weary, and his hand clave unto the sword: and the LORD wrought a great victory that day; and the people returned after him only to spoil. 11. And after him was Shammah the son of Agee the Hararite. And the Philistines were gathered together into a troop, where was a piece of ground full of lentiles: and the people fled from the Philistines. 12. But he stood in the midst of the ground, and defended it, and slew the Philistines: and the LORD wrought a great victory. 13. And three of the thirty chief went down, and came to David in the harvest-time unto the cave of Adullam: and the troop of the Philistines pitched in the valley of Rephaim: 14. And David was then in an hold, and the garrison of the Philistines was then in Beth-lehem. 15. And David longed, and said, Oh that one would give me drink of the water of the well of Beth-lehem, which is by the gate! 16. And the three mighty men brake through the host of the Philistines, and drew water out of the well of Beth-lehem, that was by the gate, and took it, and brought it to David: nevertheless he would not drink thereof, but poured it out unto the LORD. 17. And he said, Be it far from me, O LORD, that I should do this: Is not this the blood of the men that went in jeopardy of their lives? therefore he would not drink it. These things did these three mighty men. 18. And Abishai, the brother of Joab, the son of Zeruah, was chief among three. And he lifted up his spear against three hundred, and slew them, and had the name among three. 19. Was he not most honourable of three? therefore he was their captain: howbeit he attained not unto the first three. 20. And Benaiah the son of Jehoiada, the son of a valiant man, of Kabzeel, who had done many acts, he slew two lion-like men of Moab; he went down also and slew a lion in the midst of a pit in time of snow: 21. And he slew an Egyptian, a goodly man: and the Egyptian had a spear in his hand; but he went down to him with a staff, and plucked the spear out of the Egyptian's hand, and slew him with his own spear. 22. These things did Benaiah the son of Jehoiada, and had the name among three mighty men. 23. He was more honourable than the thirty, but he attained not to the first three. And David set him over his guard. 24. Asahel the brother of Joab was one of the thirty; Elhanan the son of Dodo of Beth-lehem, 25. Shammah the Harodite, Elika the Harodite, 26. Helez the Paltite, Ira the son of Ikkesh the Tekoite, 27. Abiezer the Anethothite, Mebunnai the Hushathite, 28. Zalmon

the Ahothite, Maharai the Netophathite, 29. Heleb the son of Baanah, a Netophathite, Ittai the son of Ribai out of Gibeah of the children of Benjamin, 30. Benaiah the Pirathonite, Hiddai of the brooks of Gaash, 31. Abi-albon the Arbathite, Azmaveth the Barhumite, 32. Elishba the Shaalbonite, of the sons of Jashen, Jonathan, 33. Shammah the Hararite, Abiam the son of Sharar the Hararite. 34. Eliphelet the son of Ahasbai, the son of the Maachathite, Eliam the son of Ahithophel the Gilonite, 35. Hezrai the Carmelite, Paarai the Arbite, 36. Igal the son of Nathan of Zobah, Bani the Gadite, 37. Zelek the Ammonite, Naharai the Beerothite, armour-bearer to Joab the son of Zeruah, 38. Ira an Ithrite, Gareban Ithrite, 39. Uriah the Hittite: thirty and seven in all.

The catalogue which the historian has here left upon record of the great soldiers that were in David's time, is intended, 1. For the honour of David, who trained them up in the arts and exercises of war, and set them an example of conduct and courage. It is the reputation, as well as the advantage, of a prince, to be attended and served by such brave men as are here described. 2. For the honour of those worthies themselves, who were instrumental to bring David to the crown, settle and protect him in the throne, and enlarge his conquests. Note, Those that in public stations venture themselves, and lay out themselves, to serve the interests of their country, are worthy of double honour, both to be respected by those of their own age, and to be remembered by posterity. 3. To excite those that come after to a generous emulation. 4. To show how much religion contributes to the inspiring of men with true courage. David, both by his psalms, and by his offerings for the service of the temple, greatly promoted piety among the grandees of the kingdom, 1 Chron. 29. 6. and when they became famous for piety, they became famous for bravery.

Now these mighty men are here divided into three ranks.

I. The first three, who had done the greatest exploits, and thereby gained the greatest reputation: Adino, v. 8. Eleazar, c. 9, 10. and Shammah, v. 11, 12. I do not remember that we read of any of these, or of their actions, any where in all the story of David, but here, and in the parallel place, 1 Chron. 11. Many great and remarkable events are passed by in the annals, which relate rather the blemishes, than the glories, of David's reign, especially after his sin in the matter of Uriah; so that we may conclude it to have been more illustrious than it has appeared to us while reading the records of it.

The exploits of this brave triumvirate are here recorded. They signalized themselves in the wars of Israel against their enemies, especially the Philistines. 1. Adino slew eight hundred at once, with his spear. 2. Eleazar defied the Philistines, as they, by Goliath, had defied Israel, but with better success, and greater bravery; for, when the men of Israel were gone away, he not only kept his ground, but arose, and smote the Philistines, on whom God struck a terror, equal to the courage with which this great hero was inspired. His hand was weary, and yet it clave to his sword; as long as he had any strength remaining, he held his weapon, and followed his blow. Thus, in the service of God, we should keep up the willingness and resolution of the spirit, notwithstanding the weakness and weariness of the flesh: faint, yet pursuing, (Judg. 8. 4.) the hand weary, yet not quitting the sword. Now that Eleazar had beaten the enemy, the men of Israel, who were gone away from the battle, v. 9. returned to spoil, v. 10. It is common for those who quit the field when any thing is to be done, to hasten to it when any thing is to be gotten. 3. Shammah met with a party of the enemy, that were foraging, and routed them, v. 11, 12. But observe, both concerning this exploit and the former, it is here said, The Lord wrought a great victory. Note, How great soever the bravery of the instruments is, the praise of the achievement must be given to God. These fought the battles, but God wrought the victory. Let not the strong man then glory in his strength, or any of his military operations, but let him that glories glory in the Lord.

II. The next three were distinguished from, and dignified above, the thirty, but attained not to the first three, v. 23. All great men are not of the same size. Many a bright and benign star there is, which is not of the first magnitude; and many a good ship not of the first rate: of this second triumvirate, two only are named, Abishai and Benaiah, whom we have often met with in the story of David; and who seem to have been not inferior in serviceableness, though they were in dignity, to the first three.

Here is, 1. A brave action of these three in conjunction. They attended David in his troubles, when he absconded, in the cave of Adullam, v. 13. suffered with him, and therefore were afterward preferred by him. When David, and his brave men who attended him, who had acted so vigorously against the Philistines, were, by the iniquity of the times in Saul's reign, driven to shelter themselves from his rage in caves and strong holds, no marvel that the Philistines pitched in the valley of Rephaim, and put a garrison even in Beth-lehem itself, v. 13, 14. If the church's guides are so misled, as to persecute some of her best friends and champions, the common enemy will, no doubt, get advantage by it. If David had had his liberty, Beth-lehem would not have been now in the Philistines' hands.

But being so, we are here told, (1.) How earnestly David longed for the water of the well of Beth-lehem. Some make it a public-spirited wish, and that he meant, "Oh that we could drive the garrison of the Philistines out of Beth-lehem, and make that beloved city of mine our own again;" the well being put for the city, as the river often signifies the country it passes through. But, if he meant so, those about him did not understand him; therefore it seems rather to be an instance of his weakness. It was harvest-time, the weather was hot, he was thirsty, perhaps good water was scarce, and therefore he earnestly wishes, "Oh that I could but have one draught of the water of the well of Beth-lehem!" With the water of that well he had often refreshed himself when he was a youth, and nothing now will serve him but that, though it is almost impossible to come at it. He strangely indulged a humour which he could give no reason for. Other water might quench his thirst as well, but he had a fancy for that above any. It is folly to entertain such fancies, and greater folly to insist upon the gratification of them. We ought to check our appetites, when they go out inordinately toward those things that really are more pleasant and grateful than other things. Be not desirous of dainties, much more when they are thus set upon such things as only please a humour. (2.) How bravely his three mighty men, Abishai, Benaiah, and another not named, ventured through the camp of the Philistines, upon the very mouth of danger, and fetched water from the well of Beth-lehem, without David's knowledge. When he wished for it, he was far from desiring that any of his men should venture their lives for it; but those three did, v. 16. To shew, [1.] How much they valued their prince, and with what pleasure they could run the greatest hazards, and undergo the greatest hardships, in his service. David, though anointed king, was, as yet, an exile, a poor prince, that had no external advantages to recommend him to the affection and esteem of his attendants, nor was he in any capacity to prefer or reward them; yet those three were thus zealous for his satisfaction, firmly believing the time of recompence would come. Let us be willing to venture in the cause of Christ, even when it is a suffering cause, as those who are assured that it will prevail, and that we shall not lose by it at last. Were they so forward to expose themselves, upon the least hint of their prince's mind, and so ambitious to please him? and shall not we covet to approve ourselves to our Lord Jesus, by a ready compliance with every intimation of his will, given us by his word, Spirit, and providence? [2.] How little they feared the Philistines. They were glad of an occasion to defy them. Whether they broke through the host clandestinely, and with such art that the Philistines did not discover them, or openly, and with such terror in their looks that the Philistines durst not oppose them, is not certain; it should seem they forced their way, sword in hand. But see, (3.) How self-denyingly David, when he had this far-fetched, dear-bought water, poured it before the Lord, v. 17. [1.] Thus he would shew the tender regard he had to the lives of his soldiers, and how far he was from being prodigal of their blood, Ps. 72. 14. In God's sight, the death of his saints is precious. [2.] Thus he would testify his sorrow for speaking that foolish word which occasioned those men to put their lives in their hands. Great men should take heed what they say, lest any bad use be made of it by those about them. [3.] Thus he would prevent the like rashness in any of his men for the future. [4.] Thus he would cross his own foolish fancy, and punish himself for entertaining and indulging it, and shew that he had sober thoughts to correct his rash ones, and knew how to deny himself even in that which he was most fond of. Such generous mortifications become the wise, the great, and the good. [5.] Thus he would honour God, and give glory to him; the water purchased at this rate, he thought too precious for his own drinking, and fit only to be poured out to God as a drink-offering. If it was the blood of these men, it was God's due, for the blood was always his. [6.] Bishop Patrick speaks of some who think that David hereby shewed that it was not material water he longed for, but the Messiah, who had the water of life; who, he knew, should be born at Beth-lehem, which the Philistines therefore should not be able to destroy. Lastly, Did David look upon that water as very precious, which was got at the hazard of these men's blood, and shall not we much more value those benefits, for the purchasing of which our blessed Saviour shed his blood? Let us not undervalue the blood of the covenant, as they do, that undervalue the blessings of the covenant.

2. The brave actions of two of them, on other occasions. Abishai slew three hundred men at once, v. 18, 19. Benaiah did many great things: (1.) He slew two Moabites that were lion-like men, so bold and strong, so fierce and furious. (2.) He slew a lion in a pit, either in his own defence, as Samson, or, perhaps, in kindness to the country, a lion that had done mischief. It being in a time of snow, he was more stiff, and the lion more fierce and ravenous, and yet he mastered him. (3.) He slew an Egyptian, on what occasion it is not said; he was well armed, but Benaiah attacked him with no other weapon than a walking-staff, dexterously wrested his spear out of his hand, and slew him with it, v. 21. For these, and the like exploits, David preferred him to be captain of the life-guard of standing forces, v. 23.

III. Inferior to the second three, but of great note, were the thirty-one here mentioned by name, v. 24, &c. Asahel is the first, who was slain by Abner in the beginning of David's reign, but lost not his place in this catalogue. Elhanan is the next, brother to Eleazar, one of the first three, v. 9. The surnames here given them, are taken, as it should seem, from the places of their birth or habitation, as many surnames with us originally were. From all parts of the nation, the most wise and valiant were picked up to serve the king. Several of these here named, we find captains of the twelve courses which David appointed, one for each month in the year, 1 Chron. 27. They that did worthily were preferred according to their merits. One of them was the son of Abithophel, v. 34. the son famous in the camp, as the father at the council-board. But to find Uriah the Hittite bringing up the rear of these worthies, as it revives the remembrance of David's sin, so it aggravates it; that a man who deserved so well of his king and country should be so ill treated. Joab is not mentioned among all these, either, 1. Because he was so great, that he did not need to be mentioned; the first of the first three sat chief among the captains, but Joab was over them as general. Or, 2. Because he was so bad, that he did not deserve to be mentioned; for though he was confessedly a great soldier, and one that had so much religion in him as to dedicate of his spoils to the house of God, 1 Chron. 26. 21. yet he lost as much honour by slaying two of David's friends, as ever he got by slaying his enemies.

Christ, the son of David, has worthies too, who, like David's, are influenced by his example, fight his battles against the spiritual enemies of his kingdom, and in his strength are more than conquerors. Christ's apostles were his immediate attendants, did and suffered great things for him, and, at length, came to reign with him. They are mentioned with honour in the New Testament, as these in the Old, especially, Rev. 21. 14. Nay, all the good soldiers of Jesus Christ have their names better preserved than even these worthies have; for they are written in heaven. This honour have all his saints

CHAP. XXIV.

The last words of David, which we read in the chapter before, were admirably good, but in this chapter we read of some of his last works, which were none of the best; yet he repented, and did his first works again, and so he finished well. We have here, I. His sin, which was, numbering the people in the pride of his heart, v. 1. .9. II. His conviction of the sin, and repentance for it, v. 10. III. The judgment inflicted upon him for it, v. 11. 15. IV. The staying of the judgment, v. 16, 17. V. The erecting of an altar in token of God's reconciliation to him and his people, v. 18. .25.

1. AND again the anger of the LORD was kindled against Israel, and he moved David against them to say, Go, number Israel and Judah. 2. For the king said to Joab the captain of the host, which was with him, Go now through all the tribes of Israel, from Dan even to Beer-sheba, and number ye the people, that I may know the number of the people. 3. And Joab said unto the king, Now the LORD thy God add unto the people, how many soever they be, an hundred fold, and that the eyes of my lord the king may see it: but why doth my lord the king delight in this thing? 4. Notwithstanding the king's word prevailed against Joab, and against the captains of the host. And Joab and the captains of the host went out from the presence of the king, to number the people of Israel. 5. And they passed over Jordan, and pitched in Aroer, on the right side of the city that lieth in the midst of the river of Gad, and toward Jazer: 6. Then they came to Gilead, and to the land of Tahtim-hodshi: and they came to Dan-jaan, and about to Zidon, 7. And came to the strong hold of Tyre, and to all the cities of the Hivites, and of the Canaanites: and they went out to the south of Judah, even to Beer-sheba. 8. So when they had gone through all the land, they came to Jerusalem at the end of nine months and twenty days. 9. And Joab gave up the sum of the number of the people unto the king: and there were in Israel eight hundred thousand valiant men that drew the sword; and the men of Judah were five hundred thousand men.

Here we have,

I. The orders which David gave to Joab to number the people of Israel and Judah, v. 1, 2. Two things here seem strange.

1. The sinfulness of this. What harm was there in it? Did not Moses twice number the people, without any crime? Does not political arithmetic come in among the other policies of a prince? Should not the shepherd know the number of his sheep? Does not the Son of David know all his own by name? Might not he make good use of this calculation? What evil has he done, if he do this?

Answer. It is certain that it was a sin, and a great sin; but where the evil of it lay is not so certain. (1.) Some think that the fault was, that he numbered them that were under twenty years old, if they were but of stature and strength able to bear arms; and that was the reason why this account was not enrolled, because it was illegal, 1 Chron. 27. 23, 24. (2.) Others think the fault was, that he did not require the half-shekel which was to be paid for the service of the sanctuary, whenever the people were numbered, as a ransom for their souls, Exod. 30. 12. (3.) Others think that he did it with a design to impose a tribute upon them for himself, and to be put into his treasury; this by way of poll, which, when he knew their numbers, he could tell what it would amount to: but nothing of this appears, nor was David ever a raiser of taxes. (4.) This was the fault, that he had no orders from God to do it, nor was there any occasion for the doing of it. It was a needless trouble both to himself and to his people. (5.) Some think that it was an affront to the ancient promise which God made to Abraham, that his seed should be innumerable as the dust of the earth: it savoured of distrust of that promise, or a design to shew that it was not fulfilled in the letter of it. He would number those of whom God had said that they could not be numbered. Those know not what they do, that go about to disprove the word of God. (6.) That which was the worst thing in numbering the people, was, that David did it in the pride of his heart, which was Hezekiah's sin in shewing his treasures to the ambassadors. [1.] It was a proud conceit of his own greatness, in having the command of so numerous a people, as if their increase had been owing to any conduct of his, which was to be ascribed purely to the blessing of God. [2.] It was a proud confidence in his own strength. By publishing among the nations the number of his people, he thought to appear the more formidable; and doubted not, if he should have any war, that he should overpower his enemies with the multitude of his forces; trusting in an arm of flesh, more than he should have done, who had written so much of trusting in God only. God judges not of sin as we do. What appears to us harmless, or, at least, but a small offence, may be a great sin in the eye of God, who sees men's principles, and is a Discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart. But his judgment, we are sure, is according to truth.

2. The spring from which it is here said to arise, is yet more strange, v. 1. It is not strange that the anger of the Lord should be kindled against Israel; there was cause enough for it, they were unthankful for the blessings of David's government, and strangely drawn in to take part with Absalom first, and afterwards with Sheba: we have reason to think that their peace and plenty made them secure and sensual, and for this, God was displeased with them; but that, in his displeasure, he should move David to number the people, is very strange. We are sure that God is not the Author of sin; he tempts no man: we are told, 1 Chron. 21. 1. that Satan provoked David to number Israel; Satan, as an enemy, suggested it for a sin, as he put it into the heart of Judas to betray Christ. God, as a righteous Judge, permitted it, with a design, from this sin of David, to take an occasion to punish other sins of Israel, which he might justly have punished them for, without this. But, as before, he brought a famine upon them for the sin of Saul, so now, a pestilence for the sin of David; that princes may, from these instances, learn, when the judgments of God are abroad, to suspect that their sins are the ground of the controversy, and may therefore repent and reform themselves, which should have a great influence upon national repentance and reformation; and that people may learn to pray for those in authority, that God would keep them from sin; because if they sin, the kingdom smarts.

II. The opposition which Joab made to these orders. Even he was aware of David's folly and vain-glory in his design. He observed that David gave no reason for it, only, Number the people, that I may know the number of the people; and therefore he endeavours to divert his pride, and in a much more decent manner than he had before endeavoured to divert his passion upon the death of Absalom; then he spake rudely and insolently, ch. 19. 5. .7. but now, as became him, v. 3. Now the Lord thy God add unto the people an hundred fold. There is no occasion either to tax them, or enlist them, or make any distribution of them. They are all easy and happy; and it is his wish, both that their number might increase, and that the king, though old, might live to see it, and have the satisfaction of it. But why doth my lord the king delight in this thing? What need is there of doing it? Pauperis est numerare pecus—Leave it to the poor to count their flocks. Especially, why should David, who speaks so much of delighting in God, and the exercises of devotion, and who, being old, one would think, should have put away childish things, take a pleasure (so he calls it modestly, but means taking pride) in a thing of this nature? Note, Many things, not in themselves sinful, turn into sin to us by our inordinate delighting in them. Joab was aware of David's vanity herein, but he himself was not. It would be good for us to have a friend that would faithfully admonish us, when we say or do any thing proud or vain-glorious, for we often do so, and are not ourselves aware of it.

III. The orders executed notwithstanding. The king's word prevailed, v. 4. he would have it done; Joab must not gainsay it, lest he be thought to grudge his time and pains in the king's service. It is an unhappiness to great men, to have those about them, that will aid them and serve them in that which is evil; Joab according to order, applied himself with some reluctancy to this unpleasing task, and took the captains of the host to help him. They began in the most distant places; in the east first, on the other side Jordan, v. 5. then they went toward Dan in the north, v. 6. so to Tyre on the east, and thence to Beer-sheba in the south, v. 7. Above nine months were spent in taking this account, a great deal of trouble and amazement was occasioned by it in the country, v. 8. and the sum total was, at length, brought to the king at Jerusalem, v. 9. Whether the numbers answered David's expectation or no, we are not told, nor whether the account fed his pride or mortified it. They were very many, but, it may be, not so many as he thought they were. They had not increased in Canaan as they had in Egypt, nor were much more than double to what they were when they came into Canaan under Joshua, about 400 years before; yet it is an evidence that Canaan was a very fruitful land, that so many thousands were maintained within so narrow a compass.

10. And David's heart smote him after that he had numbered the people. And David said unto the LORD, I have sinned greatly in that I have done: and now, I beseech thee, O LORD, take away the iniquity of thy servant; for I have done very foolishly. 11. For when David was up in the morning, the word of the LORD came unto the prophet Gad, David's seer, saying, 12. Go and say unto David, Thus saith the LORD, I offer thee three things; choose thee one of them, that I may do it unto thee. 13. So Gad came to David, and told him, and said unto him, shall seven years of famine come unto thee in thy land? or wilt thou flee three months before thine enemies, while they pursue thee? or that there be three days' pestilence in thy land? Now advise, and see what answer I shall return to him that sent me. 14. And David said unto Gad, I am in a great strait: let us fall now into the hand of the LORD; for his mercies are great; and let me not fall into the hand of man. 15. So the LORD sent a pestilence upon Israel from the morning even to the time appointed: and there died of the people from Dan even to Beer-sheba seventy thousand men. 16. And when the angel stretched out his hand upon Jerusalem to destroy it, the LORD repented him of the evil, and said to the angel that destroyed the people, It is enough: stay now thine hand. And the angel of the LORD was by the threshing-place of Araunah the Jebusite. 17. And David spake unto the LORD, when he saw the angel that smote the people, and said, Lo, I have sinned, and I have done wickedly: but these sheep, what have they done? let thine hand, I pray thee, be against me, and against my father's house.

We have here David repenting of the sin, and yet punished for it; God repenting of the judgment, and David thereby made more penitent.

I. Here is David's penitent reflection upon, and confession of, his sin in numbering the people. While the thing was in doing, during all those nine months, we do not find that David was sensible of his sin, (for then he would have countermanded the orders he had given,) but when the account was finished and laid before him, that very night, his conscience was awakened, and he felt the pain of it, just then when he promised himself the pleasure of it. When he was about to feast on the satisfaction of the numbers of his people, it was turned into the gall of asps within him; sense of the sin cast a damp upon the joy, v. 10. 1. He was convinced of his sin; his heart smote him, before the prophet came to him, (I think it should not be read for, v. 11. but, and when David was up, so it is in the original,) his conscience shewed him the evil of what he had done; now that appeared sin, and exceeding sinful, which, before, he saw no harm in. He reflected upon it with great regret, and his heart reproached him for it. Note, It is a good thing, when a man has sinned, to have a heart within him to smite him for it; it is a good sign of a principle of grace in the heart, and a good step toward repentance and reformation. 2. He confessed it to God, and begged earnestly for the forgiveness of it. (1.) He owns he had sinned, sinned greatly, though to others it might seem no sin at all, or a very little one. True penitents, whose consciences are tender and well informed, see that evil in sin, which others do not see. (2.) He owns he had done foolishly, very foolishly, because he had done it in the pride of his heart; and it was folly for him to be proud of the numbers of his people, when they were God's people, not his, and, as many as they were, God could soon make them fewer. (3.) He cries to God for pardon: I beseech thee, O Lord, take away the iniquity of thy servant. If we confess our sins, we may pray in faith that God will forgive them, and take away, by pardoning mercy, that iniquity which we cast away by sincere repentance.

II. The just and necessary correction which he suffered for his sin. David had been full of tossings to and fro, all night, under the sense of his sin, no rest in his bones because of it, and he arose in the morning, expecting to hear of God's displeasure against him for what he had done, or designing to speak with Gad his seer concerning it; Gad is called his seer, because he had him always at hand to advise with in the things of God, and made use of him as his confessor and counsellor; but God prevented him, and directed the prophet Gad what to say to him, v. 11. and it is taken for granted, 1. That David must be corrected for his fault; it is too great a crime, and reflects too much dishonour upon God, to go unpunished, even in David himself; of the seven things that God hates, pride is the first, Prov. 6. 17. Note, Those who truly repent of their sins, and have them pardoned, yet are often made to smart for them in this world. 2. The punishment must answer to the sin. He was proud of the numbers of his people, and therefore the judgment he must be chastised with for this sin must be such as will make them fewer. Note, What we make the matter of our pride, it is just with God to take from us, or embitter to us, and, some way or other, to make the matter of our punishment. 3. It must be such a punishment as the people must have a large share in, for God's anger was kindled against Israel, v. 1. Though it was David's sin that immediately opened the sluice, the sins of the people all contributed to the deluge.

Now, as to the punishment that must be inflicted,

(1.) David is bid to choose what rod he will be beaten with, v. 12, 13. His heavenly Father must correct him, but, to shew that he does not do it willingly, he gives David leave to make choice whether it shall be by war, famine, or pestilence, three sore judgments, and which greatly weaken and diminish a people. God, by putting him thus to his choice, designed, [1.] To humble him the more for his sin, which he would see to be exceeding sinful, when he came to consider each of these judgments as exceeding dreadful. [2.] To upbraid him with the proud conceit he had of his own sovereignty over Israel: he that is so great a prince, begins to think he may have what he will; "Come," says God, "then, which wilt thou have of these three things?" Compare Jer. 34. 17. I proclaim a liberty for you, but it is such a liberty as this of David's, to the sword, to the pestilence, and to the famine; and Jer. 15. 2. Such as are for death, to death. Or, [3.] To give him some encouragement under the correction, letting him know that God did not cast him out of communion with himself, but that still his secret was with him, and in afflicting him, he considered his frame, and what he could best bear. Or, [4.] That he might the more patiently bear the rod, when it was a rod of his own choosing. The prophet bids him advise with himself, and then tell him what answer he should return to him that sent him. Note, Ministers are sent of God to us, and they must give an account of the success of their embassy; it concerns us, therefore, to consider what answer they shall return from us, that they may give up their account of us with joy.

(2.) He excepts only against the judgment of the sword, and for the other two, he refers himself to God, but intimates his choice of the pestilence rather, v. 14. I am in a great strait, and well he might be, when fear, and the pit, and the snare, are before him, and if he escape one, he inevitably falls into the other, Jer. 48. 43, 44. Note, Sin brings men into straits; wise and good men often distress themselves by their own folly. [1.] He begs that he may not fall into the hand of man; whatever comes, Let us not flee three months before our enemies; that will sully all the glory of David's triumphs, and give occasion to the enemies of God and Israel to behave themselves proudly. See Deut. 32. 26, 27. Their tender mercies are cruel; and in three months they will do that damage to the nation which many years will not repair. But, [2.] He casts himself upon God; Let us fall now into the hand of the Lord, for his mercies are great. Men are God's hand, so they are called, Ps. 17. 14. the sword of his sending, yet there are some judgments which come more immediately from his hand than others, as famine and pestilence, and which of these shall be the scourge, he refers it to God, who chooses the shortest, that he might the sooner testify his being reconciled. But some think that David, by these words, intimates his choice of the pestilence. The land had not yet recovered the famine under which it smarted three years upon the Gibeonites' account, and therefore let us not be corrected with that rod, for that also will be the triumph of our neighbours; hence we read of the reproach of famine, Ezek. 36. 30. but, if Israel must be diminished, let it be by the pestilence, for that is falling into the hands of the Lord, who usually inflicted that judgment by the hand of his own immediate servants, the angels, as in the death of the first-born of Egypt. That is a judgment to which David himself, and his own family, lie as open as the meanest subject, but not so either to famine or sword, and therefore David, tenderly conscious of his guilt, chooses that. Sword and famine will devour one as well as another, but, it may be thought, the destroying angel will draw his sword against those who are known to God to be most guilty. This will be of the shortest continuance, and he dreads the thought of lying long under the tokens of God's displeasure. It is a dreadful thing, the apostle says, to fall into the hands of the living God, Heb. 10. 31. a fearful thing indeed for sinners that have, by their impenitency, shut themselves out from all hope of his mercy: but David, a penitent, dares cast himself into God's hand, knowing he shall find that his mercies are great. Good men, even when they are under God's frowns, yet will entertain no other than good thoughts of him: Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him.

(3.) A pestilence is, accordingly, sent, v. 15. from Dan to Beer-sheba, from one end of the kingdom to the other, which shews it to come immediately from God's hand, and not from any natural causes: David has his choice, he suffers by miracle, and not by ordinary means. For the continuance of it, it lasted from morning (this very morning on which it was put to David's choice to the time appointed, that is, to the third day, so Mr. Pool; or only to the evening of the first day, the time appointed for the evening sacrifice, so Bishop Patrick and others, who reckon that the pestilence lasted but nine hours, and that, in compassion to David, God shortened the time he had first mentioned. The execution the pestilence did was very severe, there died seventy thousand men, that were all well, and sick, and dead, in a few hours. What a great cry, may we suppose, was there now throughout all the land of Israel, as there was in Egypt when the first-born were slain: but that was at midnight, this, in the day-time, Ps. 91. 6. See the power of the angels, when God gives them commission, either to save or destroy: Joab is nine months in passing with his pen, the angel but nine hours in passing with his sword, through all the coasts and corners of the land of Israel. See how easily God can bring down the proudest sinners, and how much we owe daily to the divine patience. David's adultery is punished, for the present, only with the death of one infant, his pride with the death of all those thousands; so much does God hate pride. The number slain amounts almost to a half decimation; seventy thousand was about one in twenty: now, we may suppose, David's flesh trembled for fear of God, and he was afraid of his judgments, Ps. 119. 120.

III. God's gracious relaxation of the judgment, when it began to be inflicted upon Jerusalem, v. 16. The angel stretched out his hand upon Jerusalem, as if he intended to do greater execution there than any where else, even to destroy it; the country had drunk of the bitter cup, but Jerusalem must drink the dregs: it should seem, that was last numbered, and therefore was reserved to be last plagued; perhaps there was more wickedness, especially more pride, (and that was the sin now chastised,) in Jerusalem than elsewhere, therefore the hand of the destroyer is stretched out upon that: but then the Lord repenteth him of the evil, changed not his mind, but his way, and said to the destroying angel, It is enough, stay now thine hand, and let mercy rejoice against judgment. Jerusalem shall be spared for the ark's sake, for it is the place God has chosen to put his name there. See here how ready God is to forgive, and how little pleasure he takes in punishing; and let it encourage us to meet him by repentance in the way of his judgments. This was on mount Moriah. Dr. Lightfoot observes, that in the very place where Abraham, by a countermand from heaven, was stayed from slaying his son, this angel, by a like countermand, was stayed from destroying Jerusalem. It is for the sake of the great Sacrifice, that our forfeited lives are preserved from the destroying angel.

IV. David's renewed repentance for his sin upon this occasion, v. 17. He saw the angel, (God opening his eyes for that purpose,) saw his sword stretched out to destroy, a flaming sword; saw him ready to sheath it, upon the orders given him to stay proceedings; seeing this, he spoke, not to the angel, (he knew better than to address himself to the servant in the presence of the Master, or to give that honour to the creature which is the Creator's due,) but to the Lord, and said, Lo, I have sinned. Note, True penitents, the more they receive of God's sparing pardoning mercy, the more humbled they are for sin, and the more resolved against it more. They shall be ashamed, when I am pacified toward them, Ezek. 16. 63. Observe, 1. How he criminales himself, as if he could never speak ill enough of his own fault; "I have sinned, and I have done wickedly, mine is the crime, and therefore on me be the cross; Let thy hand be against me, and my father's house; I am the sinner, let me be the sufferer;" so willing was he to accept the punishment of his iniquity, though he was worth ten thousand of them. 2. How he intercedes for the people, whose bitter lamentations made his heart to ache, and his ears to tingle; These sheep, what have they done? Done! Why they had done much amiss; it was their sin that provoked God to leave David to himself to do as he did; yet, as became a penitent, he is severe upon his own faults, while he extenuates their's. Most people, when God's judgments are abroad, charge others with being the cause of them, and care not who falls by them, so they can escape; but David's penitent and public spirit was otherwise affected. Let this remind us of the grace of our Lord Jesus, who gave himself for our sins, and was willing that God's hand should be against him, that we might escape. The shepherd was smitten, that the sheep might be spared.

18. And Gad came that day to David, and said unto him, Go up, rear an altar unto the LORD in the threshing-floor of Araunah the Jebusite. 19. And David, according to the saying of Gad, went up as the LORD commanded. 20. And Araunah looked, and saw the king and his servants coming on toward him: and Araunah went out, and bowed himself before the king on his face upon the ground. 21. And Araunah said, Wherefore is my lord the king come to his servant? And David said, To buy the threshing-floor of thee, to build an altar unto the LORD, that the plague may be stayed from the people. 22. And Araunah said unto David, Let my lord the king take and offer up what seemeth good unto him: behold, here be oxen for burnt-sacrifice, and threshing instruments, and other instruments of the oxen for wood. 23. All these things did Araunah, as a king, give unto the king. And Araunah said unto the king, The LORD thy God accept thee. 24. And the king said unto Araunah, Nay; but I will surely buy it of thee at a price: neither will I offer burnt-offerings unto the LORD my God of that which doth cost me nothing. So David bought the threshing-floor and the oxen for fifty shekels of silver. 25. And David built there an altar unto the LORD, and offered burnt-offerings and peace-offerings. So the LORD was entreated for the land, and the plague was stayed from Israel.

Here is,

I. A command sent to David, to erect an altar in the place where he saw the angel, v. 18. This was to intimate to David, 1. That, upon his repeated submission and humiliation, God was now thoroughly reconciled to him; for if the Lord had been pleased to kill him, he would not have accepted an offering, and therefore would not have ordered him to build an altar. God's encouraging us to offer to him spiritual sacrifices, is a comfortable evidence of his reconciling us to himself. 2. That peace is made between God and sinners by sacrifice, and not otherwise, even by Christ the great Propitiation, of whom all the legal sacrifices were types. It is for his sake that the destroying angel is bid to stay his hand. 3. That when God's judgment graciously stayed, we ought to acknowledge it with thankfulness, to his praise. This altar was to be for thank-offerings. See Isa. 12. 1.

II. The purchase which David made of the ground, in order hereunto. It seems, the owner was a Jebusite, Araunah by name, proselyted, no doubt, to the Jewish religion, though by birth a Gentile, and therefore allowed, not only to dwell among the Israelites, but to have a possession of his own in a city, Lev. 25. 29, 30. The piece of ground was a threshing-floor, a mean place, yet thus dignified; a place of labour, therefore thus dignified. Now,

1. David went in person to the owner, to treat with him. See his justice, that he would not so much as use it in the present exigence, though the proprietor was an alien, though himself was a king, and though he had express orders from God to rear an altar there, till he had bought it, and paid for it. God hates robbery for burnt-offering. See his humility, how far he was from taking state; though a king, he was now a penitent, and therefore, in token of his self-abasement, he neither sent for Araunah to come to him, nor sent another to deal with him, but went himself, v. 19. and, though it looked like a diminution of himself, he lost no honour by it; Araunah, when he saw him, went and bowed himself to the ground before him, v. 20. Great men will be never the less respected for their humility, but the more.

2. Araunah, when he understood his business, v. 21. generously offered him, not only the ground to build his altar on, but oxen for sacrifices, and other things that might be of use to him in the service, v. 22. and all this, gratis, and a good prayer into the bargain; The Lord thy God accept thee! This he did, (1.) Because he had a generous spirit with a great estate. He gave as a king, v. 23. though an ordinary subject, he had the spirit of a prince. In the Hebrew it is, He gave, even the king to the king, whence it is supposed that Araunah had been king of the Jebusites in that place; or was descended from their royal family, though now a tributary to David. (2.) Because he greatly honoured David, though his conqueror, upon the score of his personal merits, and never thought he could do too much to oblige him. (3.) Because he had an affection for Israel, and earnestly desired that the plague might be stayed; and the honour of its being stayed at his threshing-floor he would account a valuable consideration for all he now tendered to David.

3. David resolves to pay the full value of it, and does so, v. 24. Here were two generous souls well-met. Araunah is very willing to give; but David is determined to buy, and, for a good reason, he will not offer that to God which cost him nothing. He would not take advantage of the pious Jebusite's generosity, he thanks him, no doubt, for his kind offer, but pays him now fifty shekels of silver, for the floor and the oxen, for the present service, and afterward 600 shekels of gold for the ground adjoining, to build the temple on. Note, Those know not what religion is, all whose care it is to make it cheap and easy to themselves, and who are best pleased with that which costs them least pains or money. What have we our substance for, but to honour God with it; and how can it be better bestowed?

III. The building of the altar, and the offering of the proper sacrifices upon it, v. 25. Burnt-offerings, to the glory of God's justice in the execution that had been done; and peace-offerings, to the glory of his mercy in the reasonable staying of the process. Hereupon, God shewed (it is supposed by fire from heaven consuming the sacrifices) that he was entreated for the land, and that it was in mercy that the plague was removed, and in token of God's being reconciled both to prince and people. Christ is our Altar, our Sacrifice; in him alone we may expect to find favour with God, to escape his wrath, and the sword, the flaming sword, of that cherubim which keeps the way of the tree of life.
